

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

At 7 33

Gentleman's Magazine,

AND

Historical Chronicle:

VOLUME LIV.

For the YEAR MDCCLXXXIV.

PART THE SECOND.

PRODESSE & DELECTARE

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

By SYLVANUS URBAN, Gent.

L O N D O N:

Printed by JOHN NICHOLS, for D. HENRY, late of St. John's Gate; and sold by E. NEWBERRY, the Corner of St. Paul's Church-Yard, Ludgate-Street. 1784.

Dr. JOHNSON's Latin Ode to Mr. URBAN, in 1738, (see the Back of Title to Part I.) translated.

URBAN, whom neither toil profound,
Fatigues, nor calumnies, o'erthrow,
The wreath, thy learned brows around,
Still grows, and will for ever grow.

Of Rivals let no cares infest,
Of what they threaten or prepare;
Blest in thyself, thy projects blest,
Thy hours let the Muses share.

The leaden shafts, which Folly throws,
In silent dignity despise:
Superior o'er opposing Foes
Thy vigorous diligence shall rise.

Exert thy strength, each vain design,
Each rival soon shalt thou disdain;
Arise, for see thy task to join,
Approach the Muses' fav'ring train.

How grateful to each Muse the page,
Where grave with sprightly themes are join'd;
And useful levities engage,
And recreate the wearied mind!

Thus the pale Violet to the rose,
Adds beauty 'midst the garland's dies;
And thus the changeful rainbow throws
Its varied splendours o'er the skies.

1784.

X.

DIRECTIONS for placing the PLATES.
in the SECOND PART of VOL. LIV.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. CANOE of the Sandwich Isles. p. 483 | 6. Miscellaneous Plate of curious Antiquities. 671 |
| 2. Order of St. Patrick, and Medal of Capt. Cook. 528 | 7. Arch over the New River at Bush-Hill. 723 |
| 3. Francis I. and St. Martin and the Beggar. 568 | 8. Miscellaneous Plate of Antiquities. 734 |
| 4. A New Zealander and Native of Otaheite. | 9. Cromlech, Pulpit at Paul's Cross, &c. 809 |
| 5. Frame of the New River at Bush-Hill. 643 | 10. Medals of the King of Spain, &c. 817 |
| | 11. Portrait of Richard Russell, Esq. 890 |
| | 12. Miscellaneous Plate. 911 |
| | 13. Miscellaneous Antiquities. 961 |

Occurrences, &c.

against	Westminster , High Bailiff's
807	return for	381
leath	election	145, 314,
477	381, 382, 383, 390, 459,
	460, 461, 462, 464, 465,
	466, 473, 474
	Whitbread , Mr. his speech	474
his
478	Wild , Chief Baron, circum-
65	stances relative to him,
	where to be found	264
	Wilberforce , Mr. his speeches
rease		133, 298, 299
18	Wilkes , Ald. his speech	51
hical	speech to Mr. Pitt, on pre-
420	sending him the freedom of
out	the city of London	204.
406	address to the freeholders
290	of Middlesex	304
	Wilkes , Mrs. her death	317
	Wilkinson , Mr. his speech	50
	Williams , Sir Booth, his death
his		153
218	Wilson , Rev. Dr. Thomas, his
his	death and character	317.
237	his body brought to town
ferred		379
227	Rev. Dr. Bernard,
ac-	sued for breach of a mar-
74	riage contract	353
and	Wolsey , Cardinal, set in the
150	stocks for drunkenness	344
150	Wood , method to prevent its mak-	burning, described	66
and	Wood-engraver and diamond-
148	cutter apprehended for for-cern-	gery	227
252	Worcester , Marquis of, particlock-	culars of, where to be found cha-		364. See p. 350
151	Wray , Sir Cecil, his speeches
ob-		49, 54, 132
167	Daniel, Esq; his death
le of	and character	72
237	Wren , Gen. Jorden, intricate swell	circumstances relative to
203	his will	315
98,	Wrey , Sir Bourchier, Bart.
347	his death and character	317
osen
143,	Y.
of
474	Y ellow Tower at Trim, dearing	scription of	80
vere	Yerke , Mr. P. his speeches	63,
306.		131
erate	Yowling , derivation of that
394	word	347
inla-	Yule , feast of, explained	27,
248		347
223,
377	Z.
sent
l. de	Zingaro , description of	79
him
311

INDEX of NAMES to the FIFTY-FOURTH VOLUME

N. B. The small numerals after the figures signify that the name is so many times repeated in that page.

A.		Barnes	398	Bramston	155	Cartwright	315	Cooper
A Bdy	475	Barnston	477	Brand	150, 154	Carysfort	239	Cope
Abell	74	Barré	75	Bree	479	Caunt	150	Copley
Abergavenny	397	Barrett	239	Brenner	395	Chalmers	72	Coppin
Ackland	73	Barrow	398	Brett	75, 318, 399	Chambers	398	Cornewall
Adam	239	Barry	39	Brettell	152	Chamberlaine		Corrie
Adams	395	Barton	155	Brickdale	72		239	Cosby
Addison	316	Baseley	317	Brickless	399	Chandler	399	Costa
Adlard	319	Bateman	154	Bridgeman	395, 475	Chaney	319	Cottilby
Affleck	154	Bates	75, 316			Chapman	399	Cotton	154, 155
Aikman	72	Bathurst	75, 318	Bristowe	398	Chase	397	Cottrell	73, 154
Alcock	239	Bawn	75	Broadmead	239	Chatham	475	Coulston
Aldridge	319	Bayley	74	Brockland	154	Chauncy	151	Count
Alkin	75	Bearblock	318, 475	Brook	152	Chaworth	397	Courtney
Allen	151, 154, 479			Brooke	475, 479	Chesterfield	75, ii.	Cowper
		Beaulieu	479	Brookes	235	Chewton	475	Craig
Altham	236	Beaumont	316	Broome	395	Chipperfield	236	Crawford
Ambrose	395	Beauvor	154, 315	Brown	152, 155, 318, 319	Chisholm	479	Crawley
Amery	74	Beckett	392			Christian	239	Crgan
Amyand	152, 234	Bedford	398	Bryan	397	Chubb	398	Crisp
Andrew	154	Beddulph	397	Brydges	475	Church	155	Croft	3
Andrews	155, 238, 475	Bell	317	Bruce	475	Churchill	154	Crofts	154, 4
		Bellian	399	Buchanan	73, 239, 475, ii.	Clarendon	75	Crossman
Angel	239, 315	Bennett	155			Clark	318, 319, 398	Crouch	4
Anhault - Bem-		Bentley	235	Buckle	315			Crowe	3
burg-Schaum-		Benton	399	Budd	475	Clarkson	398, 479	Cunningham
bourg	396	Bergholt	239	Buffar	239	Clarke	155, 398	Curson	3
Annaly	316	Bermore	75	Bulkeley	315, 398	Clavering	315
Annesley	235	Bere	72			Clay	151
Anspach	151	Bevan	316	Bull	73	Cleaver	319	D.
Anthony	236	Bewdley	399	Bulter	154	Clerk	315	D'Aeth	1
Appleton	479	Bewicke	398, ii.	Bullock	318, 399	Cliffe	478	Dalton	4
Arden	318	Bicknell	479	Bulworth	151	Clifton	239	Dandison	15
Argent	155	Biddle	155, 317, 475	Bund, alias Ver-		Clive	395	Dangerfield	9
Arnold	479			non	152	Clogher	476	Daniel	15
Arrowsmith	319	Biddulph	395	Burke	234	Close	75	Darby	2
Arthur	395	Bigland	239	Burnaby	313	Clough	151	Dare	3
Aspinall	237	Bigrave	155	Burns	479	Cochran	399	Darker	15
Astle	154	Bill	479	Burnett	155	Cochrane	239	Darkin	23
Atkinson	75, 398, 477	Binstead	475	Burrell	396, 475	Cocks	398	Davall	3
		Birdsworth	475	Burtensaw	155	Cocksedge	897	Davies	154, 318, 475
Attley	155	Bishop	105	Burlton	155	Coffin	395	Davis	75, 395, 475
Aubrey	74, 234	Blackston	74	Burton	318	Cole	155	Dawes	235, 318
Auger	313	Blackiston	74	Buch	235	Colebrook	150	Day	15
Awcock	475	Blany	316	Buxton	478	Colebrooke	397, 475	Deane	3
Aylesford	75, ii.	Blenkinsop	397	Byrne	316			Dean	47
Ayton	239	Blyth	74	Byron	475	Coleman	150	De Boock	3
		Bolas	398, ii.	Bythesea	150	Colen	319	Decaux	47
B.		Boldero	150			Collier	73	De Crans	15
		Bond	476	C.		Collins	319, 479, ii.	De Ferrara	2
B		Boon	152	C				De Gruchy	3
Abington	234	Booth	316	Æsar	154, 234	Colmore	476	Delapierre	8
Bacchus	479	Borrodaile	395	Calcut	155	Collyer	73	Deletenville	2
Bacon	150, 399	Boscawen	395	Caldwell	151	Cologan	151	Denmark	8
Baker	399	Boucher	237	Callingwood	319	Cologne	318	Dent	15
Bailey	150, 475	Bourchier	475	Calthorpe	238	Colt	395	Denward	15
Baldwin	319	Box	72	Campbell	316	Connolly	234	Dermer	3
Bamford	155	Boyd	150	Carr	398	Constable	398	Dibley	15
Bankman	239	Boyer	155	Cargill	235	Conyers	75	Dickinson	3
Barber	316	Boynton	155	Carpenter	399	Cook	155, ii. 319	Dickinson	7
Banks	399, 479	Bradley	155	Carter	155	Cooke	234, 239, 397	Dickson	47
Barford	239	Bradburn	155	Carteret	75, 154			Digby	318
Barker	399	Bragg	393	Carruthes	155	Cookson	150	Dillingham	476
Barlow	150

The Gentleman's Magazine;

ST. JOHN'S GATE

London Gazette
Daily Advertiser
Public Advertiser
Gazetteer
Morning Chron.
Morning Herald
Morning Post
Public Ledger
Daily Courant
Gener. Advertiser
St. James's Chron.
General Evening
Whitehall Even.
London Evening
London Chron.
Lloyd's Evening
English Chron.
Oxford
Cambridge
Bristol's papers
Bath 2
Birmingham 2
Derby
Coventry 2
Hereford 2
Chester 2
Manchester 2
Canterbury 2

Edinburgh 5
Dublin 5
Newcastle 5
York 2
Leeds 2
Norwich 2
Nottingham 2
Exeter 2
Liverpool 2
Gloucester 2
Bury St. Edmund's
Lewes
Sheffield
Shrewsbury
Winchester
Ipswich
Salisbury
Leicester
Worcester
Stamford
Chelmsford
Southampton
Northampton
Reading
Whitehaven
Dumfries
Aberdeen
Glasgow

For JULY, 1784.
CONTAINING

More in Quantity and greater Variety than any Book of the Kind and Date.

Meteorological Diary for July, 1783.	482	Anecdotes of Bp. Hoadly and Abp. Secker	508
Average Prices of Corn and Grain	ib.	Strictures on the "Anecdotes of Painting"	509
Royal Society's Medal of Capt. Cook	483	Thoughts on the improving of Coast Fisheries	511
Canoe of the Sandwich Islands described	ib.	Memoirs of Dr. Wm. Robertson corrected	513
Penny Weddings—E. of Leicester's Tale	484	On the present State of the Convict Laws	514
Dr. Gifford's Curiosities, how disposed of	485	Further Character of Mr. Davis, &c. &c.	516
The Holly Tree—Miscellaneous Remarks	486	REVIEW OF NEW PUBLICATIONS, viz. Me-
Theatrical Character of Colley Cibber	ib.	moirs of Voltaire—History of Ayder Ali Khan
Lionel's Library—Mr. S. Richardson	488	—Essay on Medals—Ld Melcombe's Diary—
Biographical Anecdotes of Abé Winkelman	489	Essay on Croyland Abbey—Hayley's Plays—
Miscellaneous Remarks and Explanations	494	Logan's Runnede—Clark on Knighthood
Memoirs of Major General Greene	497	—Coxe's Travels, &c. &c. &c.	517—531
Cost of Sir C. Wren's Fifty new Churches	499	SELECT POETRY, viz. To M ^{rs} Williams, on
Letter from Miss Seward on her "Louisa"	500	her Poem of Peru—Sonnet to a Friend—An
Memoirs of Dr. Anton. N. R. Sanchez	502	Horatian Epistle—A Summer's Day—Ode for
Highland Address to King George I. 1715	503	the Anniversary Dinner of the Quintuple Alli-
The Constabularius Regis in Ireland, what	504	ance—On the Opening of the new Organ at
Antiquarian Intelligence from Scotland	ib.	Canterbury Cathedral, &c. &c. &c.	532—536
Answers to Quæries, and Misc. Observations	505	Proceedings in Parliament	537—547
Synonyms in England and Scotland explained	506	Foreign Affairs—American, Irish, Scotch, and
Epitaphs on Dean Aldrich and Bp. Gifford	ib.	Domestic News, &c. &c.	548—554
Origin of the Word Punch	507	Lists of Births, Marriages, and Deaths—Promo-
Extract from Dr. F.'s "Hints on Animation"	ib.	tions, Preferments, and Bankrupts	555—559
Embellished with a picturesque Representation of a CANOE of the SANDWICH ISLANDS, the Rowers masked; also with the Royal Society's MEDAL of Capt. Cook; and the STAR and of ST. PATRICK.

L V A N U S -U R B A N, Gent.

J. NICHOLS, for D. HENRY, late of ST. JOHN'S GATE

Observations.

at-Night

AVERAGE PRICES of CORN, from July 12, to July 17, 1784.

Wheat Rye Barley Oats Beans										COUNTIES upon the COAST.
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
London	6	3	3	4	2	1	2	6	3	1	Essex	6	3	0	0	3	4	2	8	3	9
COUNTIES INLAND.										Suffolk	5	11	3	3	2	10	2	5	3	2
Middlesex	6	0	0	0	3	7	2	9	3	7	Norfolk	5	10	3	4	2	9	2	6	0
Surry	6	7	0	0	3	8	2	8	4	3	Lincoln	5	8	3	4	3	3	2	1	2	11
Hertford	6	4	0	0	4	3	2	8	4	2	York	5	6	3	10	0	0	2	3	4	1
Bedford	6	2	4	2	3	8	2	5	3	10	Durham	6	2	0	0	0	0	2	4	4	2
Cambridge	5	10	3	5	0	0	2	2	3	5	Northumberland	5	5	3	11	3	4	2	5	3	11
Huntingdon	5	8	0	0	0	0	2	3	3	6	Cumberland	6	0	4	3	3	5	2	9	4	6
Northampton	6	3	4	1	3	9	2	2	3	6	Westmorland	6	3	4	6	3	7	2	5	0	0
Rutland	6	1	0	0	3	10	2	5	3	10	Lancashire	6	8	0	0	0	0	2	7	4	8
Leicester	6	2	4	10	4	0	2	1	3	11	Cheshire	6	9	5	4	3	10	2	3	0	0
Nottingham	5	7	3	11	3	3	2	4	3	10	Monmouth	6	6	0	0	3	7	2	1	0	0
Derby	6	3	0	0	0	0	2	4	4	5	Somerset	5	11	0	0	3	7	2	7	4	0
Stafford	6	1	0	0	0	0	2	6	4	3	Devon	6	5	0	0	3	2	2	0	0	0
Salop	6	2	4	4	4	0	2	1	4	11	Cornwall	6	9	0	0	3	4	1	10	0	0
Hereford	5	5	0	0	0	0	1	10	0	0	Dorset	5	11	0	0	2	8	2	6	4	1
Worcester	5	10	0	0	0	0	2	5	3	9	Hampshire	5	10	0	0	3	1	2	7	3	9
Warwick	5	10	0	0	0	0	1	11	3	7	Sussex	6	1	0	0	3	4	2	5	0	0
Gloucester	5	10	0	0	2	10	2	0	3	11	Kent	6	5	3	0	3	8	2	6	3	6
Wilts	5	8	0	0	3	0	2	7	4	4	WALES, July 5, to July 10, 1784.
Berks	6	1	0	0	3	7	2	7	3	7	North Wales	7	1	5	4	4	5	2	3	5	9
Oxford	6	4	0	0	3	6	2	6	4	1	South Wales	6	7	4	7	4	0	1	11	4	9
Bucks	6	4	0	0	3	9	2	6	3	8

WALES, July 5, to July 10, 1784.

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For JULY, 1784.

BEING THE FIRST NUMBER OF VOL. LIV. PART II.

MR. URBAN,

I gives me pleasure to be able to send you an early copy of a Medal lately struck to perpetuate the memory of Capt. COOK, the execution of which is equal to the subject. On one side is a bold relief of Capt. Cook, with this inscription, IAC. COOK OCEANI INVESTIGATOR ACERRIMVS: Immediately under the head is expressed, in lesser characters, REG. SOC. LOND. SOCIO SUO. On the reverse appears an erect figure of Britannia standing on a plain. The left arm rests upon an hieroglyphic pillar. Her spear is in her hand, and her shield placed at the foot of the pillar. Her right arm is projected over a globe, and contains a symbol, expressive of the celebrated circumnavigator's enterprising genius. The inscription round the reverse is, NIL INTENTATVM NOSTRI LIQVERE; and under the figure of Britannia, AUSPICIIS GEORGII III.

The medal was engraved by Pingo at the expence of the Royal Society. Six impressions have been struck in gold, and two hundred and fifty in silver. The gold medals are disposed of as follows: One to his Britannic Majesty, under whose auspices Capt. Cook proceeded on his discoveries; one to the King of France, for his great courtesy, in giving a specific charge to his naval commanders, to forbear shewing hostility to the Resolution and Discovery, the two sloops under Capt. Cook's command, and to afford him every succour in their power, in case they fell in with him; one to the Empress of Russia, for her great hospitality to Capt. Cook when he touched at Kamtskatka; one to Mrs. Cook, the captain's relict; one to be deposited in the British Museum; and one to remain in the College of the Royal Society. The silver medals were distributed among the Members of the Royal Society, some particular Lords of the Admiralty, and a few other distinguished persons. Yours, &c.

CANOE of the SANDWICH ISLANDS described. (See the annexed PLATE.)

THESE canoes are in general about twenty-four feet long, and have the bottom, for the most part, formed of a single piece or log of wood, hollowed out to the thickness of an inch, or an inch and an half, and brought to a point at each end. The sides consist of three boards, each about an inch thick, and neatly fitted and lashed to the bottom part. The extremities, both at head and stern, are a little raised, and both are made sharp, somewhat like a wedge; but they flatten more abruptly; so that the two side-boards join each other, side by side, for more than a foot. But Mr Webber's drawing (says Capt. Cook) will explain their construction more accurately than my description in words. As they are not more than 15 or 18 inches broad, those that go single (for they sometimes join them, as at the other islands) have out-riggers, which are shaped and fitted with more judgment than any I had before seen. They are rowed by paddles, such as we had generally met with; and some of them have a light triangular sail, like those of

of the Friendly Islands, extended to a mast and boom. The ropes used for their boats, and the smaller cords for their fishing-tackle, are strong and well made.

MR. URBAN,

June 17:

YOUR correspondent D. A. B. in the Magazine for May, p. 343, speaking of Biddings at marriages in S. Wales, brings to my mind the account I have often heard given by some of my own relations of what they called Penny Weddings in Scotland, which seem to have been a custom something similar. When there was a marriage of two poor people who were esteemed by any of the neighbouring gentry, they agreed among themselves to meet and have a dance upon the occasion, the result of which was a handsome donation, in order to assist the new-married couple in their out-set in life.

In H. L. M.'s curious account of Roger Crabb, p. 351, col. 1, for Ickman, I should incline to read Ickenham, which is a little village very near Uxbridge.

You have dug deep to vindicate the claim of your noble President to the title of Earl of Leicester (see p. 352), and indeed it must be acknowledged that that title is, for the reasons you adduce, with the greatest propriety conferred upon him, though, as clearly appears by Crito's paper, it cannot be said to have been "unclaimed." As to what you say in the note, I find by a small but pretty accurate British Compendium of 1738, that the family of Sidney were earls of the county of Leicester.

P. 188. l. 1. for Countess Talbot, r. Lady Talbot. The earldom was extinct by the death of the late earl.

P. 201. col. 2. in the Epitaphium. Without entering into the consideration of the false quantities, of which perhaps more might be found, is not debetur a mistake for dabatur?

P. 236. col. 2. in the account of the wife of Prince Charles—II Re, as he was commonly styled in Italy—the Duke of Berwick and Liria there mentioned is, as I called him in the paper I sent you, grandson to K. James II. the son of his natural son.

P. 396. col. 1. read Mr. George Martin, surgeon of St. Thomas's Hospital.

Surely that fasciculus, the 2d article under the head of Ecclesiastical Preferences, p. 398. col. 1, are all in Nottinghamshire, not Suffex. E.

MR. URBAN,

IN the curious pedigree in your last, p. 408, Robert, the 4th Earl of Leicester, I apprehend, is omitted, as is his elder sister and co-heir, Amicia, married to Simon de Montfort, Earl of Montfort, and in right of his wife Earl of Leicester. His son Simon, also Earl of Leicester, married K. Henry III's sister, but being slain in rebellion at the battle of Evesham, 1265, the family of Montfort was totally disinherited, and the King conferred the Earldom of Leicester on his second son Edmund Plantagenet. Thus the Earldom having been in abeyance at the death of the 4th Earl between his two sisters, and granted by the King to the elder, it is presumed that no claim can legally be made by the descendants of the younger—not to mention that all claims are effectually barred by the above-mentioned attainder, and that Mr. Sidney's legal right to this title of modern creation was allowed on both sides in his late trial with Mrs. Perry (see vol. LII. p. 344.).

CRITO.

MR. URBAN,

IN p. 408, 409, of your volume for last year, you admitted a few strictures upon Mr. Pennant's journey to "Snowdon;" to which you will permit me now to add a remark or two on his "Continuation" of the Journey. It must first be observed, that in his "Advertisement" prefixed to "Snowdon," he promised a more general title page to the "Continuation;" and that this promise is not performed.

Page 227, line 19, we should read "opinatissimus." P. 239, l. 11, "disputant." The incorrectness of the passages from Tacitus, in p. 232 and 422, reminds me of a former observation on the errors to be found in almost every Latin quotation throughout his "Journey from Chester to London." A little more respect to the public is requisite from such a writer as Mr. Pennant.

P. 249, l. 20, we should read "Il-ding." The person mentioned in p. 306, l. 12, as also in p. 165 preceding, was John Caswell, of whom a short account is given in A. Wood's "Athen. Oxon." ii, 1103.

P. 316, l. 1, 2, should we not for "presented" read "instituted"? P. 317. l. 1, the Greek sigma should twice be substituted for the Roman S.—P. 322, l. 6, read "Antoniana." The illuminated M. S. described in p. 327, does not seem to have been known to the industrious trious Mr. Strutt; in whose "Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England" it deserves to be recorded.

P. 399, l. 17, we should read "quarta decima." The battle of Shrewsbury, mentioned in p. 407, was on July 21, 1403. ANTIQUARIUS.

MR. URBAN,

I send the following information for your Querist, in p. 349.

The Duddery, tho' I know not the square in question, is a place where rags were sold or hung out. Vide Gal. Dict.

Article dud. Duds, an old English word, and still used in Scotland, signifies rags, tatters. From the Celtic.

Talbooth is directly Galic, and signifies a heap of cells or holes, i. e. a prison.

Tolsey, or tholsel, is a Celtic or Galic word, compounded of toll, a hole, sealbh, or scale, to possess, hold, keep, confine. In Ireland they call it tolcel, but spell it tholsel. In proof of this etymology, see Shaw's Galic Dictionary, Articles toll, and sealbhingham, to possess, keep, &c.

Though I know not the street at Oxford called the Turl, I conceive that it may be of Celtic or Saxon origin; if Celtic, it signifies a descent; and if Turl-street be on a hill or declivity, it will be a proof of this circumstance; or it may be situated in the purlieus of Oxford, and denote the place where the country people used to alight at a ford or entrance to the town; and in either case become a denominative name, and all Celtic proper names are generally such.

Mull in the Galic, or Earse, or Irish, language, signifies a cape, headland, promontory; the Mull of Kintyre, of Galloway, &c. signify the headland or Cape of Galloway, Kintyre, &c. See Shaw's Gal. Dict. Article maol.

Surloin, is, I conceive, if not knighted by King James, as is reported, compounded of the French sur, upon, and the English loin, for the sake of euphony; our particles not easily submitting to composition. In proof of this, the piece of beef so called grows upon the loin, and behind the small ribs of the animal.

MR. URBAN,

July 22.

IT may be an acceptable information to many of your curious readers, to tell them, that the late learned Dr. Gifford's valuable collection of books, MSS. pictures, and curiosities, is bequeathed to the Baptist Academy of Messieurs Evans and Newton, at Bristol, there to be preserved for public use, in a room called

DR. GIFFORD'S MUSEUM. A catalogue of them, it is hoped, will be printed, to render the intention of the benevolent donor more extensively useful.

One curiosity, which I remember to have seen in the Doctor's apartment, is a stone found lately in digging the foundation of a Baptist meeting-house in Snows Fields, inscribed,

D. M.

IVL. VALIVS

MILLE CXXVV

AN. XL. H. S E.

C. A. FLAVIO

. ATTIO HER.

Dr. Gifford had also a good collection of portraits, particularly several eminent Baptist and other Dissenting Ministers (in collecting which the Doctor was indefatigable), and an original of Oliver Cromwell. The more valuable part of his coins, it seems, was purchased to enrich the collection of King George II.

Among the more valuable books is, a capital collection of various editions of the Bible, and parts of the Bible; particularly that rare edition of Tindal's Bible, which is described by Mr. Ames, p. 490. This copy, originally bought by one of the Earl of Oxford's collectors, was esteemed so valuable a purchase, that his Lordship settled 20l. a year for life on the person who bought it; and, at this rate, it cost 240l. as Dr. Gifford was informed by Mr. Lockwood, who had been valet to the Earl, and was afterwards 24 years messenger in and at the British Museum.

His lordship's library being afterwards purchased by Mr. Osborne, of Gray's-Inn, this Bible was marked in a printed catalogue at 15 shillings, for which price it was bought by Mr. Ames; after whose death, Mr. Jn. White purchased it, May 13, 1760, for 14 guineas and a half, and sold it again to Dr. Gifford for twenty guineas.—Many other valuable articles will be found in the bequest to the Academy at Bristol, which a slight inspection, with which your correspondent was indulged in the hurry of packing them up for Bristol, would not permit him to particularise. He recollects, however, a fine copy of the Nuremberg Chronicle; some early books of Caxton; two volumes of MSS. intitled, "A. and E. Gifford's Remains;" The Loyal Martyrology, 1665, (bound up with Leicester's Civil Wars of England), full of portraits; and copies of Ames on Printing, Folkes on Coins, and Lewis's History of the Translations of formed to shine in, he will be ashamed to suppose himself qualified for sustaining the dignified inflexibility of a Cato; the rapid and ungovernable impetuosity of a Hotspur; the wavering, genteel perplexity of an amorous Mark Antony; or the sanguinary and disdainful subtleties which even his Richard the Third should be marked by.

So that I intreat you, Mr. Outis, (though we know how nearly you are concerned in the fame of this admired actor), give us up that unaccountable assertion, that he performs every part inimitably.

In one part, however, I must allow it an injustice, not to confess him inimitable. His New Year's Odes will, for ever, be matchless! And, though nobody delights more than I do in the repetition of his majesty's praises, it is impossible for the most loyal of his subjects not to be desirous that much less should be indulged us, by this great poet of the household, upon those anniversary occasions; so surprisingly does the laureat's genius confess the sack, and the salary!

I will freely and impartially close this paper with an honest character of your friend, Mr. Cibber. It may hereafter be a welcome and curious piece of antiquity, when the people of the present age shall become ancestors, and no such living testimony as yours, Mr. Outis, can be paid to the distinction of his qualities.

Mr. Cibber was a ludicrous and representatory personage, who, though he is said to have had works some time extant in his name, seems to have been memorable for nothing but his playing. As to his person, his shape was finely proportioned, yet not graceful; easy, but not striking. Though it was reported by his enemies, that he wanted a soul, yet it was visible enough that he had one, because he carried it in his countenance; for his features were narrowly earnest, and attentively insignificant. There was a peeping pertness in his eye, which would have been spirit had his heart been warmed with humanity, or his brain been stored with ideas. In his face was a contracted kind of passive, yet protruded, sharpness, like a pig half-roasted; and a voice not unlike his own might have been borrowed from the same suffering animal, while in a condition a little less desperate. With all these comick accomplishments of person, he had an air and a mind which compleated the risible talent, inso much that when he represented a ridiculous humour, he had a mouth in every nerve, and became eloquent without speaking. His attitudes were pointed and exquisite, and his expression was stronger than painting. He was beautifully absorbed by the character, and demanded and monopolised attention. His very extravagances were coloured with propriety; and affectation sat so easy about him, that it was in danger of appearing amiable. It had been in nobody's power but his own, to demonstrate him incapable of some parts he ought never to have appeared in: but while he forgot his own limits, he trespassed in the enclosures of others; and carrying his fool's coat into the council-chamber, made it observed there to his disadvantage, that he was unlike the rest of the company; and had mistaken the place he was dressed for.

The description of Mr. Wilks, in the character of Hamlet, shall be sent you, Mr. Urban, for next month. N. T. A.

MR. URBAN,

AS you have mentioned that a gentleman of Suffolk had purchased the library of the late Linnæus, I have now the satisfaction of being able to inform the lovers of natural history in this country, that the Linnæan library and museum, consisting of the books, manuscripts, and correspondence, the herbarium, insects, shells, corals, and minerals of this celebrated naturalist, are soon to be removed from Upsal to London.—This valuable collection having been offered for sale since the death of the younger Linnæus, has been purchased by Mr. Smith of Norwich, now a student of physic at Edinburgh, for the sum of 900 guineas. Z.

MR. URBAN;

July 13.

THE family of the late Mr. Samuel Richardson observing in your Magazine for November last, p. 924, that you have, by misinformation, been led into an error respecting that gentleman's birth and education, think it necessary (for the present) only to say, that though he was born in Derbyshire, his family were not originally of that county; that his father was not a farmer; and that Mr. Richardson had a private grammar-school education in the neighbourhood of the place of his birth, and was originally intended for the church.

Your early insertion of this will much oblige
Yours, &c. M. B.

MR.

July 3. profession nent per-accident it the Abbe
d in your wing are which are character age by M. n of them
1781.

" This wonderful man, born at Stendall, in the old Mark of Brandenburg, in the beginning of the year 1718, the son of a shoemaker, to all appearance destined by his birth to superintend a little school in an obscure town in Germany, raised himself to the office of president of antiquities in the Vatican. While engaged, as he tells us, in teaching some dirty boys their A B C, he aspired to a knowledge of the beautiful, and silently meditated on the comparisons of Homer's Greek with the Latin literature, and a critical acquaintance with the respective languages, which were more familiar to him than they had ever been to any former lover of antiquity, both by his application in studying them, and his public lectures as professor of them. His extensive reading was improved in the noble and large library which he afterwards superintended. The solitude and the beauty of the spot where he lived, and the Platonic reveries which he indulged, all served to prepare his mind for the enthusiasm which he felt at the sight of the master-pieces of art. His first steps in this career bespoke a man of genius; but what a concurrence of circumstances were necessary to develop his talents! The magnificent gallery of paintings and the cabinet of antiquities at Dresden, the conversation of artists and amateurs, his journey to Rome, the friendship of his residence in the cardinal Albani, his visits to the Vatican, and that which procured him means to him the use of the collection of the designs of the great masters, all lived in a state of which is the true meaning himself with life, and knowing those which tended pursuit. An active man, though he aspired to conceal it by a stoicism. A lively imagination, an excellent memory, enabled him to derive great advantages from the study of the works of the ancients. His steady indefatigable zeal led him to new discoveries. He kindled the torch of sound studies in the works of the ancients. His acquaintance with them enabled him to throw greater certainty upon his own notions, and even upon his conclusions, and to overthrow many arbitrary principles and ancient prejudices. His merit is to have pointed out the source of the study of antiquity is the knowledge of art, to which a writer had before attended. He carried with him into Italy a taste for beauty and art, which led him to admire the master-pieces of the ancients and with which he began to flourish. He soon increased his knowledge of art, was not till after he had thus put to the test, and conceived an idea of beauty, which transported him into the secrets of art, that he began to the explanation of other monuments which his great learning could not distinguish him. At the same time another immortal scholar treated of antiquity in the same manner on this side the Alps. Count Caylus, profound and extensive knowledge of arts, was master of the mechanics and drew and engraved in a capital. W. was not endowed with these talents, but in point of classical erudition surpassed the Count; and while he employed himself in excellent collections of little objects, the most continually before him at Rome the greatest monuments of ancient art. His erudition enabled him to fill up the principal plan of writing the History of Art. He began with a little work on the Greek artists there. He is the description of the galleries of Rome, Italy, or of the statues of the British Museum, or a history of the corruption of art, the restoration of statues, the illustration of the obscure points of mythology. All these assisted him to his History of Art, and his menti laudati. It must however be confessed, that the first of these works was not all the clearness and precision might be expected in its general and division of its parts and but it has enlarged and en-ideas both of antiquaries and collectors. The description of the gems and sulphurs of the Stosch cabinet contributed not a little to extend Mr. W's knowledge. Few persons have opportunities of contemplating such vast collections. The engravings of Lippert and C. Caylus are all that many can arrive at. Mr. W's Monumenti Inediti seem to have secured him the esteem of antiquaries. He there explained a number of monuments, and particularly bas reliefs, till then accounted inexplicable, with a parade of learning more in compliance with the Italian fashion than was necessary. Had he lived, we should have had a work long wished for, a complete collection of the bas reliefs discovered from the time of Bartoli to the present, the greater part of which are in the possession of Cardinal Albani. But however we may regret his tragical end, the intenseness of his application, and the eagerness of his pursuit after ancient monuments, had at last so bewildered him in conjectures, that from a commentator on the works of the ancients, he became a kind of seer or prophet. His warm imagination outran his judgment. As he proceeded in his knowledge of the characters of art in monuments, he exhausted his fund of observations drawn from the ancients, and particularly from the Greeks. He cited early editions, which are frequently not divided into chapters; and he was entirely unacquainted with the publications in the rest of Europe on the arts and antiquity. Hence his History of Art is full of anachronisms." Thus far from Heyne.

His letters (of which I am going to give you some extracts, interspersing his account of his learned contemporaries and acquaintances) are addressed to Count Bunau, author of an "History of the Empire," whose fine library at Rothenitz, since added to the public library of Dresden, and valued in 1749 at 15,000 English crowns, was under the care of Mr. W. 1748, who made a most methodical and intelligent catalogue of it, in 4 vols. The Count died 1762. In one of W's letters, dated 1754, he gives an account of his change of religion, which too plainly appears to have been guided by motives of interest to make his way to Rome, and gain a better livelihood. He went to Dresden 1754. In 1755 he published at Dresden, "Reflections on the Imitation of the Works of the Greeks," 4to. republished 1756, 4to. In 1756 he went to Rome, where he made an acquaintance with Mengs, first painter to the king of Poland; soon got access to the library of Card. Passionei, where all who frequented it were forbid to take off their hats, or sit uncovered, when the owner appeared. Lenglet de Fresnoy, who fell into the fire, and was burnt to death for want of assistance, had by mistake asserted that the Cardinal bought the Campini library. In 1756 W. planned his "Restoration of Ancient Statues," and a larger work on the "Taste of the Greek Artists;" and designed an account of the Galleries of Rome and Italy, in the manner of Richardson, who only ran over Rome.

He describes the villa Hadriani at Tivoli as most surprising; the ruins extend 3 Italian miles, including 4 or 5 temples half entire. At the entrance are the Cento camere, or apartments of the prætorian guards; 100 vaults little injured by time, not communicating with each other formerly, as now, by breaches made in the walls, but probably by a gallery. The Jesuits and Count Fede possess the greatest part of these ruins; where the former make an excellent wine, and lodge it in an ancient temple. Almost all the steps of the theatre remain on the outside of these ruins.

The knowledge of Greek MSS. not much kept up at Rome.

Giacomelli, canon of St. Peter, &c. had published two tragedies of Æschylus and Sophocles, with an Italian translation and notes, and was about a new edition of Chrysostom de Sacerdotio; and W. had joined with him in an edition of an unprinted Greek Oration of Libanius, from two MSS. in the Vatican and Barberini libraries.

1757, he laments the calamities of his country, Saxony. He was going to Naples, with 100 crowns, part of a pension from the K. of Poland, for his travelling charges, and thence to Florence, at the invitation of Baron Stosch. Cardinal Archinto, secretary of state, employed him to take care of his library. Every thing cheap at Rome except cloaths. The conclave was building for the cardinals, and the pope designed to see the preparations.

Card. Passionei sent Count Bunau the pope's great work, "De Synodo Diocesana," with the new edition of his "Acta Apostol. Helvet." He is represented as a most catholic and respectable character, who only wanted ambition to be pope. His catalogue was making by an Italian, and the work was intended for Winkelmann.

W

W. "Reflections on the Imitation of the Works of the Greeks" was translated into French 1755.

"The winter at Rome is so very mild that you would think it was spring. I have seen no snow but on the mountains towards Naples. It has frozen a little for two nights at the end of January 1756, but at noon it is so hot as to promote perspiration. Oranges hang on the trees in many gardens. The flowers usually begin to appear towards the middle of February. All the gardens are full of laurels, orange-trees, cypresses, &c. There is a certain wine that grows round Genzano, which tastes and smells like amire and aromatic herbs*. What pleases me most is the brocoli, a kind of red cabbage as to colour, but shaped like a colliflower, and eaten boiled with oil and vinegar.

"I have formed the plan of a great work on the taste of the Greek artists, beginning with a volume on the Belvedere Statues. In the preface I shall mention the fate of these statues at the sacking of Rome 1527, when the soldiers made a fire in Raphael's lodge, which spoiled many things.

"To see a villa or palace, it costs always 12 gros.

"What writer has troubled himself about ancient statues? More attention has been paid to inscriptions. The most rare are those that have been printed. They are broken to pieces, and used for building. A certain restorer† of statues has bought above 100 family ones, found in a vault.

"Abbé Mariani, who wrote "Etruria Metropoli," is one of the few persons who understands Greek at Rome, and what is there called Scriptor Græcus. There are twelve such in the Vatican for different languages.

"Montfaucon says, there is not a copy of Pausanias in that library; but he has

* Thus the rich Maronean wine of Ulysses (Odys. IX.) breathed aromatic fragrances around; and thus Julian mentions "a sweet and fragrant wine," pressed from grapes that were "as odoriferous as roses." Ep. XLVII.

† This is supposed to be Cavaceppi, a Roman Statuary, with whom W. engaged some years after his unfortunate journey to Germany, and who afterwards published a magnificent "Raccolta d'antiche Statue, Bassi Relievi, et altre Sculpture restituite da B. C. Roma, vol. I. 1768, vol. II. 1769," fol. with plates; of which M. Heyne says, he sought more to deceive the lovers of antiquity, than to give them exact notions of the same.

run over the Vatican, and every thing else like a true Frenchman. His "Antiquity explained" swarms with errors.

"Canon Mazzochi at Naples is 80 years old, and the most learned Grecian of our time. His Commentary on two bronze tables inscribed in the Doric dialect is a wonderful work.

"One of my friends here, 70 years old, is a painter and sculptor, and of great learning and experience, and a very amiable old man. This liveliness is not uncommon here in persons of this age, and Card. Passionei thinks himself still able to jump over a chair. Giacomelli is without dispute the greatest scholar in Rome, a great mathematician, naturalist, poet, and Grecian, as his works before mentioned shew. He reads and explains Dante with me. P. Bianchi, a Franciscan, vicar of his order, has a cabinet of medals collected chiefly in Egypt and Asia. M. Baldani is one of those geniuses so numerous in Italy who have no itch to write but contents himself with knowing his ability to do great things.

"Card. Albani is building his villa, which will be a master-piece of art. He is the greatest antiquary that ever lived: he brings things to light, and pays for them with the spirit of a prince. If we have a pope of this turn we shall by his care make still greater discoveries (for not being in orders he cannot be elected pope), and we know the proper spots. His palace is adorned with so many columns of porphyry, granite, and oriental alabaster, that they seemed a forest before they were arranged.

"Next to Card. Passionei's library is that of the Jesuits here, including the whole library of Antonio Mureti. P. Lazenì has published 3 volumes of anecdotes concerning it. P. Contucci, of the same convent, and director of their great museum of antiquities and natural curiosities, is the real author of Eicoroni's "Maschere Sceniche, Rom. 1736," 4to.

"The cabinet of Q. Christina described by Havercamp, which was thought to be at Rome in the Bracciani palace, has been sold into Spain.

"P. Corfini, general of the Schola Pie, is engaged in a collection of Greek Inscriptions found in Asia.

"I have sent to England for Sylburgius's Aristotle, Francf. 1587, in 5 vols. 4to. containing only the Greek text, which will cost me 3 ducats and $\frac{1}{2}$, or 7 Roman crowns. This edition was bought by C. Passionei for 2 crowns at Paris, but is not in the library at Rothenitz. The reason of its being so scarce is that the volumes were printed separately. The electoral library at Dresden has a copy in 4 vols. the 7th part containing the Problems, which Clement, in his Biblioth. Cur. II. 97, says, are wanting both in the King's and Buneman's copies.

"They are printing in England an edition of Demosthenes in royal 4to. of which 3 volumes have been published: Four of the 9 volumes of the Glasgow Plato must be printed by this time, in characters like Bryan's Plutarch.

"I have just read Reinold's "Historia Literaria, Græc. et Lat. Eton. 1762," 4to. of which only 250 copies were printed, and 50 of them were lost between Marseilles and Leghorn. This led me to examine the Apotheosis of Homer, which Schot and Cupar have explained; but, as the former did not sufficiently examine the inscription part of it, all who followed him have been misled, so that great part of these works falls to decay.

"The first volume of ancient paintings at Portici is published, with many indifferent plates. The first plate contains four figures, with the name of the artist.

ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΣ ΕΡΠΑΘΕΝ.

I think it should be ΕΡΠΑΥΕΝ. Bayardi has nothing now to do with this work, which is conducted by fifteen persons, at whose head is Mazzochi, and who meet weekly at the house of the Marquis Tanucci, minister and secretary of state, and formerly professor at Pisa, who has not his fellow in the world, and is the very man that Diogenes sought for.

"My "Remarks on ancient Architecture" are ready for a second edition. I am about a work, in Italian, to clear up some obscure points in mythology and antiquities, with above 50 plates; another in Latin, explanatory of the Greek medals that are least known; and I shall soon send to be printed in England, "An Essay on the Style of Sculpture before Phidias." I have read Caliri's Catalogue of the Arabian MSS in the Escorial; but there is not much of value in the collection *.

1762. "We are in great want of English books here; for the English who travel seldom bring any but their favourite poet. The best books in that language I saw four years ago in the house of the Count de Firmian, when he was Ambassador at Naples: he brought at once from England as many boxes of books as weighed 100 hundred weight.

"A work in 4to. has just appeared at Zurich, addressed to Mr. W. by Mr. Mengs, but without his name. He is first painter to the Kings of Spain and Poland, and is gone to Madrid with an appointment of 10,000 crowns.

"It is intitled, "Thoughts on Beauty and Taste in Painting," and was published by J. C. Fuchsli.

"It is said the magnificent library of the late Cardinal Passionei will be purchased for the small sum of 32,000 crowns by old Cardinal Colonna; but this did not take place. If it is to be united to the Vatican, it will be buried. Cardinal Albani succeeds to his place of Librarian of the Vatican, and is endeavouring to get me a place for the Hebrew language. I have refused a canonry, because I will not take the tonsure. I was born free, and I will die free.

"I know two English gentlemen who will make themselves talked of. Adam, a lover of architecture, and a man of large fortune, who pays an architect, an engraver, and several draughtsmen: he is publishing a magnificent work on the palace of Diocletian at Salona in Dalmatia, and intends to travel over Greece, the Levant, and Egypt. The other is the Chevalier Montagu, a gentleman about 47 years of age, who in his youth was at Constantinople, where his father was Ambassador to the Porte. He is well versed in the mathematics, natural history, and particularly in the eastern languages, and is going into Egypt and Arabia. Voltaire mentions him in his "Letters on the English Nation." Would you believe it, the English are the only wise people? what poor wretches are most of our German lords that travel, compared with them! I was strongly solicited at Naples by Lord Granville *, the English Ambassador, to accompany him to Constantinople. I have given up my desire to visit Greece: I grow old; I love my ease, and seek to enjoy it for the rest of my life.

1763. "I have been for some weeks past attending as Ciceroni on a certain Lord Baltimore, who is the most extra-

* The second volume appeared 1770; and a volume of Greek MSS. 1769. This catalogue was printed at the King's expense, and we believe not sold.

* The late Mr. Henry Granville. ordinary ever saw. He g, and secured

ut St. Peter's Belvedere. He Rastinople, but grew so trou-obliged to tell d not go back ure. He has and knows not ar we had here a man of the same stamp.

The electoral prince has given me, unsolicited, the place of counsellor Richter, the direction of the royal cabinet of medals at Dresden; but it cannot be filled up till after the war, which does not seem likely to end. Among the books sent me from Switzerland is "The Origin of Laws, Arts, and Sciences, Paris 1760," 6 vols. 8vo. one of the best works I have read. Upon the death of the Abbé Venuti I have been appointed president of the antiquities at Rome, notwithstanding many competitors. This is a post of honour, with an income of 150 scudi per annum, so that I am settled here for the rest of my life, and can live cheaper here than I could at Dresden with double that sum. I have a prospect of the place of president of antiquities in the Vatican, going to be created, at 16 scudi per month, and if I can obtain a writer's place in the Vatican, I would not change places with a German privy-counsellor. My patron Cardinal Spinelli died a few years ago, aged 69. I am named corresponding member of the Academy of Inscriptions. I shall endeavour to make a catalogue of Queen Christina's Greek MSS. The Duke of Parma has purchased Count Pertusati's library for 28,000 crowns, and they are sending it away. The Vatican may be compared to those misers who crave without enjoyment, and one may apply to it Plato's saying of Sparta, "All the treasures of Greece go thither, but not to come back again." Among the strangers at Rome is a young man of Zurich named Fuesli, about knowledge, an agreeable n the great-on this side covery made ry-gate, for whether they e city. Aost the best Abbé Eug-

gini, who in a fit of melancholy shot himself in his 56th year. I may perhaps soon take a third journey to Naples, in the company of D. Camillo Paderno, keeper of the cabinet of Herou-lanum.

"The Duke of York has been six months at Geneva, and is expected here. The Pope intends to pay him all the honours that he wishes to receive, and I have orders to prepare some ancient works of art intended to be presented to him. Among others, a mosaic of the Barberini palace, representing Europa, which I think is indifferently engraved in Turnbull's wretched book of Ancient Painting.

1764. "I have long thought of publishing an "Essay on the Depravation of Taste in the Arts and Sciences." My picture has been drawn by a German lady born at Kottwitz, but carried when young into Italy by her father, who is a painter. She paints well in oil, and her lowest price is 30 sequins. She has drawn me half-length sitting. She has etched it in a 4to size, and another artist has done it in mezzotinto. This lady, whose name is Angelica Kauffmann, speaks Italian as familiarly as German, and also French and English with much ease. She draws all the English who come to Rome. She is handsome, and sings well.

"A head of Pallas has lately been found, so beautiful that it surpasses all the sublimest pieces, even Niobe herself; and the marble is so hard that nothing could damage it. I was lost in wonder when I first beheld it.

1765. "The King of Prussia has offered me, by Col. Quintus Icilius, the place of librarian and director of his cabinet of medals and antiquities, void by the death of M. Gautier de la Croze, with a handsome appointment. I made no scruple of accepting the offer, but, when it came to the Pope's ears, he added an appointment out of his own purse, and I shall remain where I am. Nothing gives me so much pleasure as to meet with, among the persons who travel hither, persons of reputation, and of a similar taste with my own. Of this sort is the young Duke de Rochefoucault, who travels with two scholars, one of whom is M. Desmaretz, a celebrated naturalist. While I attended on this nobleman at Cardinal Albani's villa at Castle Gondolfo, the Prince of Mecklenburg, brother to the Queen of England, who arrived at Rome the day before, came to me. I obtained leave of the Cardinal to absent myself from the Vatican, to shew the city to this prince, who is about sixteen, and of an amiable character; and travels from England, through Spain and France, intending to spend a whole year here. Count Moltke has sent me by him a Greek Homer, printed at Glasgow, in two small folio volumes. Never was a more splendid Greek work printed.

came

(To be continued.)

MR. URBAN,

YOUR correspondent R. C. in your LIId volume, p. 675, mentions a statue of Egidius Romanus in the Pomfret Collection, but not engraved among the Oxford Marbles. A nameless correspondent in the same volume, p. 926, has thrown out some hints about the person represented by this statue. I have lately been at Oxford, and seen all the antique marbles and statues preserved there in two different rooms; but the statue in question escaped my most diligent search. I found indeed one or two whole figures of Roman emperors, whose originality is questioned in the printed Guides, but not the least trace of the inscription given by your correspondent, or of any other inscription.

I have been told that the accident of the centinel, mentioned in your Magazine for April, p. 252, occasioned the total removal of those men from the stage.

The seal engraved in your plate for May, No 3, belongs to the Benedictine priory of Sela in Suffex, founded in the end of the 11th century on land given by Wm. de Braiosa (1075) to the abbey of St. Florence at Salmur. This alien priory was made denison 19 Richard II. and at the suppression valued at 26*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* and annexed to Magdalen College, Oxford*. The inscription round it is,

Sigillum commune prioratus Sancti Petri de Sela.

The arms I could wish to see properly explained.

See a description of its ruins in Mr. Grose's Appendix.

No 4. belongs to St. John Baptist's hospital without the E. gate of Oxford, which subsisted in the reign of K. John, who was a benefactor to it. Henry III. rebuilt it, laying the first stone himself. Henry VI. gave the master and brethren leave to convey it (about 1456) to Wm. Wainfleet, Bp. of Winchester, who on or near its site laid the foundation of his magnificent college of St. Mary Magdalen†.

The inscription is,

Sigillum commune domus hospitalis Sancti Johannis Baptiste extra portam orientalem Oxonie.

No 5. circumscribed

Sigillum hospitalis Sanctorum Jacobi et Johannis de Brakeley, belongs to the hospital founded at Brackley, co. Northampton, in honour of St. James and St. John, by Robert earl of Leicester, and his son Robert, in the middle of the 12th century; as Leland† by Lord Lovel, or as Camden by Lord Zouch§. St. James is represented as a pilgrim, as St. James of Compostella; St. John has the nimbus, but what he holds in his left hand is not distinguishable. If the drawing is correct, it should seem there were three tapers burning before each saint.

I wish some of your correspondents would favour you with some particulars of John Seward, a poet of the reign of Henry IV. as I understand Mr. Camden, who, in his description of Monmouthshire, has preserved some lines of his in praise of that victorious monarch, and calls him, "Poeta non infimi sub-sellii illis temporibus." Mr. Warton|| says, he can assign only one poet to the reign of Henry IV. which is Johannes Capellanus, who translated Boethius, by which, I suppose, he means an English poet. Bp. Tanner says nothing of Seward.

From the words of Favorinus, cited by Aulus Gellius, it should seem the dove of Archytas was a piece of clock-work. It flew about till it settled, and when once it settled it could not rise again. Επεινε περιετραν ζυλινην ωισμενην· ηλις· επολε καθισμενη ουκ εις ανιστασθαι· μιχρη γαρ τειλε. I suppose it required fresh winding up. Strada†† tells a story of one Janellus Turrianus, who made figures of armed men, horse and foot, who tilted at one another, beat drums, and sounded trumpets, to amuse Charles V. in his retirement. He sometimes let fly wooden sparrows, who flew backwards and forwards in the apartment, to the great astonishment of the emperor's chamberlain, who thought the devil was in

* See Tanner's Not. Mon. p. 552.

† See Wood's Hist. and Antiq. Univ. Ox. II. 187, 188. Tanner, 429.

‡ Itin. VII. f. 5.

§ See Tanner, p. 380.

|| Hist. of Eng. Poetry, II. 34.

 X. 12. see p. 329.

†† B. I.

them. This last piece of mechanism is not noticed by Dr. Robertson in his account of the last days of this great prince's amusements*. I have somewhere read of a fly or an eagle, or both, that by some such contrivance came out to meet the Emperor Maximilian on one of his public entries.

I am at a loss to find wherein consists Mr. Cole's panegyric on Mr. Piazza, p. 333. It seems a fair and candid narrative, and nothing more. It is pity as much cannot be said of his strictures on your valuable correspondent Mr. Pegge, who is so far from triumphing over Dr. Willis, that he merely points out his errors, which it was impossible for him to know he had corrected; so that if any one triumphs before the victory, it is Mr. Cole; and the best apology for his exultation on this subject must be his zeal for his friend and patron.

The custom of chusing a mayor at Randwic, co. Gloucester, p. 335, is thus described by Mr. Rudder, in his History of that county, p. 619. "At this place an annual revel is kept on the Monday after Low Sunday, probably the wake of the church, attended with much irregularity and intemperance, and many ridiculous circumstances in the choice of a mayor, who is yearly elected on that day from among the meanest of the people. They plead the prescriptive right of ancient custom for the licence of the day, and the authority of magistracy is not able to suppress it." There seems to be nothing else to distinguish this village, whose manor is first mentioned in the reign of Henry VI. The drift of the song is obviously a panegyric on the wool-len manufactory, drawn from the story of Hercules debasing himself to spin with Deianira, and a similar degradation of Apollo for a like reason. Many obscure places in England claim the privilege of choosing a mayor, which some of your correspondents may be able to account for. At present Pleshy in Essex, the residence of our high constables almost from the Conquest, and perhaps of eminence in the Roman times, may serve as one instance among others.

T. Row's quotation (LIII. 751) from the anonymous author πρὸς ἀπρίαν, published by Dr. Gale, explains away the ascent of Bellorophon into heaven, to be only a flight thither by astronomical contemplation.

The absurdity which your correspondent, p. 336, apprehends, in supposing the address of Lucan to Nero to be written so short a time before the poet's death, will vanish if it be considered that Lucan died at a time of life and under circumstances which he could not have foreseen, and consequently had not put the last hand to his poem, which might possibly at one time have begun at the 67th line, Fert animus causas tantarum exponere rerum.

a commencement not unlike that of Ovid's Metamorphoses, which must be fresh in every one's memory; and he might have at another time have added the preceding lines, and introduced the allusions assigned by either of your correspondents.

P. 338. col. 1. l. 11. r. dicuntur.

P. 345. Dr. N. Lancaster was possessed of those specious virtues which render men agreeable in a general view: a character which cannot be too much guarded against, when accompanied with that degree of imprudence (one can scarce refrain from giving it the name of assurance) that urged him to indecent applications for the supply of his necessities.

P. 349. Dr. Stukeley, in his History of Carausius, I. 207. explains the Dudery in Stirbitch Fair to be pure British, preserved here from the Romans leaving us through the provincial language. Dod-reu, household stuff, furniture there sold. The word row in Garlic-row, one name of a principal street, from 'the Welsh rhodio, to walk. Hence the rows of the city of Chester and others. Your readers will find much lively invention in this history about this fair, whose origin is dated from the making of the Cardike navigation by Carausius, and which flourished to a late period, till the introduction of riders diverted trade into a different channel, and that species of middle men gave place to their masters, who prefer doing their own business themselves.

Skinner explains Tolsey Publicanorum sedes, the seat where the collectors of tolls sat; and gives the same etymology of Tolbooth. At Bristol the Tolley and Exchange are different places, and, if I mistake not, at Liverpool. At Edinburgh there is only a Tolbooth. At Gloucester, the Booth-hall (vulgarly Bootal or Botbal) may have been of the like kind.

Trill or Turl gate at Oxford was so called from Peter Thurold, or Thurald, or Edward Torald, who lived by it, and built it since the foundation of Exeter College, i. e. after 1316. It gave name to the narrow street leading to it*.

St. Lawrence's day is the last of the Dog-days; consequently when a labourer has been spent with the heat of the rest, he may be said to have finished his work, and received his wages, which ought to be high in proportion to his expence of strength.

The epitaph at Kirklees, in which Robin Hood is styled Earl of Huntingdon, is generally thought to be spurious. Dr. Stukeley † indeed supposed his true name was Fitz-Oetb, descended from a Norman of that name, lord of Kyme, co. Linc. and that his mother was daughter of Payne Beauchamp and Roisia de Vere, though he owns he was only pretended E. of Huntingdon. Bp. Percy ‡ says, the most ancient poems on R. H. make no mention of this earldom; though Sir J. Hawkins § says, there is extant a dramatic history of the death of Robin Hood, which gives him that title. Would it be thought too forced a conjecture, or too near a pun, to imagine that this title of Earl of Huntingdon was given to him as the Coryphæus of deer-stealers?

By the proceedings on the barony of Bergavenny ||, it should seem that only barons by writ were summoned to parliament, and that the first, or at least the first frequent use of barons by writ, was in the reign of Henry III. when, after the defeat of the E. of Leicester at Evesham, the king summoned all abbots, &c. which held not by barony, as well as others of the most worthy of the laity not holding by barony.

The best genealogists in Scotland know nothing of Colville of Preston. Among 12 or 15 of the Colvilles in their books, not one is designed of Preston. There is no other place of that name except that in East Lothian. A branch of the Hamiltons was long designed of Preston; another terminating in Fala of Little Preston, now Preston-Hall, which belonged to the old duchess of Gordon.

P. 350. In the ballad of Sir Guy of Warwick  it seems evident that the dragon was slain in Greece.

P. 351. As it may be presumed the best portrait of Sir Paul Pindar is that which still serves as a sign to his original mansion in Bishopsgate-street.

P. 417. The rare tract here mentioned by Mr. Greene, was first mentioned in Mr. Ames's History of Printing, p. 539. and from thence in the British Topography, II. 305. It was written by R. Laneham, or Langham, mercer, merchant adventurer, and clerk of the council-chamber door, and also keeper of the same. To this last office he alludes in the letter which you have printed. It is addressed to his good friend master Humfrey Martin, mercer; and gives a list of the romantic and humorous books and ballads used in this age, &c. &c. The late Mr. West's copy was bought by the duchess of Portland for 3l. 5s. The "Princelie Pleasures of Kenilworth Castle" are by Geo. Gascoyne, and printed among his works by Jeffes, 1587, 4to.

The inscription round the seal, p. 419, is ar de Saliginac esc. Richard Salegniac, escuyer. The arms are en faced. There is a noble family of that name or title now in France.

P. 409. Bp. Lacey was buried (1455) in the N. part of the presbytery at Exeter, as Leland ††, or in the N. wall of it, as Godwin ‡‡: perhaps we should read panete in the former as well as in the latter. Over what is shewn for his tomb is this inscription in black letters:

"Ista figura docet nos omnes premeditari,

"Qualiter ipsa nocet mors quando venire dominari;"

alluding to the skeleton. The bishop's figure is on the tomb in pontificals. On one side of the arch the coat, engraved in your plate, fig. 2, being the arms of the see of Exeter; on the other side 2 keys in saltire.

The arms on the tomb on the N. side of the altar in Clerkenwell church are, Erm. in chief, Az. 3 bezants; quartering A. 3 camels passant S. and belong to the family of Weston. The motto, ANY BORO. Dugdale, in his Antiquities of Warwickshire, p. 969, gives SANE BARO under a chevron ingrailed between 3 fermeaux in chief a Jerusalem cross, over the kitchen chimney at Balshall, where was a preceptory of Templars.

P. Q.

* Peshall's Hist. of Oxf. p. 199.

† Palæog. Brit. II. 115.

§ Hist. of Musc. III. 412.

 Percy's Reliques, III. 104.

†† De præf. ed Richardson, p. 413.

‡ Reliques of Ant. Eng. Poetry, I. 83.

|| See Collins on Baronies, p. 118.

Ritson's Songs, II. 298.

†† Itin. III. 32.

hands, soon appeared; and they had scarcely time to retire to their boats, and gain the opposite shore, when the garrison surrendered prisoners of war. As they had not gained the fort, even the American troops were ignorant of their being within the lines.

The actions at Trenton and Princeton, and the celebrated manœuvre of passing the rear of the British army by a night march, were the most remarkable events of the war, and turned the tide of American fortune, when at its lowest ebb.

In all these General Greene bore a very important share, and held a considerable command. At the battle of Brandywine, when the American army was totally defeated, he distinguished himself by supporting their right wing when it gave way, and judiciously covering the whole when routed and retreating in confusion. Their safety from utter ruin was generally ascribed to his skill and exertions on this occasion, which were well seconded by the troops under his command.

At German Town, when the Americans were again unsuccessful, he commanded the left wing of their army; and though the failure was at first imputed to him, as being too late in the attack, and not seasonably co-operating, the Commander in Chief is said to have very generously vindicated him from the censure. After this, General Greene continued in the line of the army, and rising in military reputation, when he was recommended by General Washington, and appointed by Congress, Quarter Master General. In this new capacity he fully answered the expectations formed of his abilities, restored order, regularity, and effect, to a department, which, by various means, was greatly deranged, and enabled the American army to move with a celerity and vigour never known before.

At the battle of Monmouth, Gen. Washington, being disgusted with the behaviour of Gen. Lee, displaced him in the field, and appointed Gen. Greene to the command of the right wing, where he greatly contributed to retrieve the errors of his predecessor, and to the subsequent event of the day.

Soon after this action, the French fleet and troops, under the command of the Count d'Estaing, arrived on the coast of America, and, in concert with a body of American troops under Gen.

Gen Sullivan, directed their operations against Newport, or Rhode Island, then garrisoned by a detachment from the army of Gen. Howe at New York. In this enterprize, in which his native state was so much concerned, and where his personal knowledge and influence were considerable, Gen. Greene was sent from the main army to assist.

In a short time every thing appeared favourable to the Americans and their allies, and the success certain; but the sudden appearance of Lord Howe with a British fleet, and a violent storm ensuing, a change of operations also ensued. An attack was concerted on the British lines, but this was also laid aside, in consequence of some disappointment: events which gave rise to misunderstandings between the commanding officers of the American army and their allies, and boded ill to their common interest.

It is difficult to say to what length resentments might have been carried, if the united efforts of Gen. Greene and the Marquis de Fayette had not obviated them. The Count d'Estaing soon after proceeded to the southward, and no farther consequences followed. This seems to be the only interruption of the harmony, which, contrary to all expectation, has subsisted between the Americans and their allies in the whole course of their united operations against the British army; and the Americans are fully sensible of the merit of these two celebrated officers on this occasion, as any dissensions at so early a period must have had fatal effects on their cause.

We now proceed to the more brilliant part of Gen. Greene's character; to form a proper idea of which, it is necessary to take a view of the state of the war in the southern parts of America, previous to his taking upon him the chief command.

The capture of Charlestown, the total defeat given by Lord Cornwallis to Gen. Gates at Camden, with the rapid successes of Col. Tarleton, had almost annihilated the American interests in that quarter. A general submission of the inhabitants, both of South and North Carolina, was reasonably expected. The utmost pains were taken to intimidate all who had espoused the American cause, and to encourage those of an opposite character. A British post had been established in North Carolina with little opposition; and the well-affected to England were daily joining them. The remains of the American army seemed incapable of farther resistance, the militia discouraged, and the people desponding. Under these unpromising circumstances, the Congress referred the appointment of Gen. Gates's successor to Gen. Washington, who immediately selected the subject of these memoirs, and he instantly repaired to his command.

His first care was to collect the fragments of the American troops, re-animate the country, and procure supplies, in the mean time industriously avoiding his enemy, flushed with conquest and repeated success. In this line of conduct he persisted, and with admirable address eluded every effort of Lord Cornwallis to bring him to action. At the same time perceiving the great importance of cavalry, he set himself zealously to raise an effective corps, which was at length completed under the command of the Colonels Lee and Washington. The operations of this corps were soon felt, and those officers now stand high in the American line of military merit.

From this period the affairs of America changed their complexion. Occasional skirmishes gave confidence to the increasing troops, and animated the discouraged country; while the various marches and counter-marches, retreats, and advances, afforded an ample field for the display of the talents of the respective generals. At length the desired advantage gained over Colonel Tarleton by General Morgan, at the affair of the Cowpens, placed the two little armies more upon a level, and they soon after met at Guildford, where a severe conflict ensued, and a well-directed charge of the American cavalry under Colonel Washington had ruined the British army, if the seasonable interposition of a Hessian regiment had not prevented it. The British guards suffered exceedingly on the occasion. Upon the whole, the action was severe and bloody; and both sides, after great exertions, claimed the victory.

To which it belonged, we shall not presume to determine; but it had all the consequences of a defeat to Lord Cornwallis, as he was obliged to retreat in a few days, to procure supplies, and take care of his wounded. The remainder of the campaign was spent in manœuvring, until he formed his plan, character in that country. He has married an amiable lady of his own country, by whom he has several children. He is about forty years of age middling size, but of a strong make, and halts a little with one leg, owing to some accident in his youth. He has an open manly countenance, pleasing aspect, and lively eye. His manners are engaging, and he has little reserve in his deportment the celebrated American Command Chief. Though he has not had a formal education, General Greene is allowed to possess a well-improved mind, a clear sound judgement, quick perception, and a great fund of good sense and observation.

This short Recapitulation of the principal Events of the American War can, we hope, displease no one.

MR. URBAN,

AS your Magazine is the common register of every thing memorable, the following account of the cost of the fifty new churches built in London by Sir Christopher Wren may perhaps to fill a corner.

	£.
ST. PAUL'S	736752
Allhallows the Great	5641
----- Bread-street	3348
----- Lombard-str.	8058
St. Alban's, Wood-street	3165
St. Anne and Agnes	2448
St. Andrew's, Wardrobe	7060
----- Holborn	9000
St. Antholin's	5685
St. Austin's	3145
St. Benet, Graiſchurch	3583
----- Paul's Wharf	3328
----- Fink	4129
St. Bride's	11430
St. Bartholomew's	5077
Christ Church	11778
St. Clement, Eastcheap	4365
----- Danes	8786
St. Dionis Back Church	5737
St. Edmund the King	5207
St. George, Botolph-lane	4509
St. James, Garlick-hill	5357
----- Westminster	8500
St. Lawrence, Jewry	11870
St. Michael, Basinghall	2822
----- Royal	7455
----- Queenhithe	4354
----- Wood-street	2554
----- Crooked lane	4041
----- Cornhill	4686
St. Martin, Ludgate	5378
St. Matthew, Friday-str.	301

MR. URBAN,

AS your excellent publication abounds with anecdotes of eminent persons, I have inclosed an account of a learned foreigner (Dr. Antonio Nunes Ribeiro Sanchés) lately deceased, which is copied from the fifth Volume of THE LONDON MEDICAL JOURNAL.

A. F.

This learned physician was born on the 7th of March, 1699, at Penna-Macor, in Portugal. His father, who was an opulent merchant, and intended him for the bar, gave him a liberal education; but, being displeased at finding him at the age of eighteen obstinately bent on the profession of physic, withdrew his protection, and he was indebted, it seems, to Dr. Nunes Ribeiro, his mother's brother, who was a physician of considerable repute at Lisbon, for the means of prosecuting his medical studies, which he did first at Coimbra, and afterwards at Salamanca, where he took the degree of Doctor in Physic in 1724; and the year following he procured the appointment of physician to the town of Benevente in Portugal, for which, as is the custom of that country, he had a small pension. His stay at this place, however, was but short. He was desirous of seeing more of the world, and of improving himself in his profession. With this view he came and passed two years in London, and had even an intention of fixing there, but a bad state of health, which he attributed to the climate, induced him to return to the continent. Soon after, we find him prosecuting his medical studies at Leyden under the celebrated Boerhaave, and it will be a sufficient proof of his diligence and merit to observe, that in 1731, when the Empress of Russia (Anne) requested Boerhaave to recommend to her three physicians, the professor immediately fixed upon Dr. Sanchés to be one of the number. Just as he was setting out for Russia, he was informed that his father was lately dead; and that his mother, in an unsuccessful law-suit with the Portuguese admiralty, had lost the greater part of her fortune. He immediately assigned over his own little claims and expectations in Portugal for her support. Soon after his arrival at St. Petersburg, Dr. Bidloo (son of the famous physician of that name), who was at that time first physician to the Empress, gave him an appointment in the hospital at Moscow, where he remained till 1734, when he was employed as physician to the army, in which capacity he was present at the siege of Asoph, where he was attacked with a dangerous fever, and when he began to recover, found himself in a tent, abandoned by his attendants, and plundered of his papers and effects. In 1740 he was appointed one of the physicians to the court, and consulted by the Empress, who had for eight years been labouring under a disease, the cause of which had never been satisfactorily ascertained. Dr. Sanchés, in a conversation with the prime minister, gave it as his opinion that the complaint originated from a stone in one of the kidneys, and admitted only of palliation. At the end of six months the Empress died, and the truth of his opinion was confirmed by dissection. Soon after the death of the Empress, Dr. Sanchés was advanced by the regent to the office of first physician; but the revolution of 1742, which placed Elizabeth Petrowna on the throne, deprived him of all his appointments. Hardly a day passed that he did not hear of some of his friends perishing on the scaffold; and it was not without much difficulty that he obtained leave to retire from Russia. His library, which had cost him 1200 pounds sterling, he disposed of to the academy of St. Petersburg, of which he was an honorary member; and in return they agreed to give him a pension of forty pounds per annum. During his residence in Russia he had availed himself of his situation at court, to establish a correspondence with the Jesuits in China, who, in return for books of astronomy and other presents, sent him seeds and plants, together with other articles of natural history. It was from Dr. Sanchés that the late Mr. Peter Collinson first received the seeds of the true rhubarb, but the plants were destroyed by some accident; and it was not till several years afterwards that rhubarb was cultivated with success in this country from seeds sent over by the late Dr. Mounsey. In 1747, he went to reside at Paris, where he remained till his death. He enjoyed the friendship of the most celebrated physicians and philosophers of that capital, and at the institution of a Royal Medical Society he was chosen a foreign associate. He was likewise a member of the Royal Academy of Lisbon, to the establishment of which his advice had probably contributed, as he drew

drew up, at the desire of the court of Portugal, several memorials on the plans necessary to be adopted for the encouragement of science. Some of these papers, relative to the establishment of an university, were printed during his life-time in Portuguese, and the rest have been found among his manuscripts. His services in Russia remained for sixteen years unnoticed; but when the present Empress ascended the throne, Dr. Sanchés was not forgotten. He had attended her in a dangerous illness when she was very young, and she now rewarded him with a pension of a thousand roubles, which was punctually paid till his death. He likewise received a pension from the court of Portugal, and another from Prince Gallitzin. A great part of this income he employed in acts of benevolence. Of the liberality with which he administered to the wants of his relations and friends, several striking instances, which the limits of our Journal will not permit us to insert, have been related to us by Mr. de Magellan. He was naturally of an infirm habit of body, and, during the last 30 years of his life, frequently voided small stones with his urine. The disposition to this disease increased as he advanced in years, and for a considerable time before his death he was confined to his apartments. The last visit he made was, in 1782, to the Grand Duke of Russia, who was then at Paris. In September 1783, he perceived that his end was approaching, and he died on the 14th of October following. His library, which was considerable, he has bequeathed to his brother, Dr. Marcello Sanchés, who was likewise a pupil of Boerhaave, and who resided at Naples. His manuscripts (among which, besides a considerable number of papers on medical subjects, are letters written to him by Boerhaave, Van Swieten, Gaubius, Haller, Werlhof, Pringle, Fothergill, and other learned men) are in the possession of Dr. Andry. His printed works, on the origin of the venereal disease and other subjects, are well known to medical readers; but his knowledge, it seems, was not confined to his own profession; he possessed a fund of general learning, and is said to have been profoundly versed in politics.

MR. URBAN,

June 15.

I Send inclosed a copy of the Highland address to George I. at his accession, which was delivered to me last summer by a gentleman, who had it from the Earl of Mar at Antwerp, a little before his death, with an injunction to deliver it as a piece justificatif to such of his family as should seem most likely to make a proper use of it at a proper time.

Yours, &c. BUCHAN.

Address of one hundred and two chief heritors and heads of Clans in the Highlands of Scotland to King George I. on his accession to the throne, which, by Court intrigue, was prevented from being delivered to his Majesty. The consequence was, that the Clans, in resentment of this supposed neglect, raised a rebellion in the following year 1715. Faithfully copied from the original preserved in the Museum of the Antiquaries of Scotland.

May it please your Majesty,

WE of the chief heritors and others in the Highlands of Scotland under subscribing, beg leave to express the joy of our hearts at your Majesty's happy accession to the crown of Great Britain. Your Majesty has the blood of our ancient monarchs in your veins and in your family; may that royal race ever continue to reign over us! Your Majesty's princely virtues, and the happy prospect we have in your royal family, of an uninterrupted succession of Kings to sway the British scepter, must extinguish those divisions and contests which in former times too much prevailed, and unite all who have the happiness to live under your Majesty into a firm obedience and loyalty to your Majesty's person, family, and government; and as our predecessors have for many ages had the honour to distinguish themselves by their loyalty, so we do most humbly assure your Majesty, that we will reckon it our honour stedfastly to adhere to you, and with our lives and fortunes to support your crown and dignity against all opposers.

Permit us, great-Sir, to implore your royal protection against any who labour to misrepresent us, and who rather use their endeavours to create misunderstandings, than to engage the hearts of your subjects to that loyalty and cheerful affectionate obedience which we owe, and are ready to testify towards your Majesty. Under so excellent a King we are persuaded that we, and all your other peaceable faithful subjects, shall enjoy their just rights and liberties, and that our enemies shall not be able to hurt us with your Majesty, for whose royal favour we presume humbly to hope, as our forefathers were honoured with that of your Majesty's ancestors. Our mountains, though undervalued by some, are nevertheless acknowledged to have, in all times, been fruitful in producing hardy and gallant men, and such, we hope, shall never be wanting amongst us, who shall be ready to undergo all dangers in defence of your Majesty's, and your royal posterity's, only rightful title to the crown of Great Britain. Our behaviour shall always witness for us, that, with unalterable firmness and zeal, we are, may it please your Majesty, your Majesty's most loyal, most obedient, and most dutiful subjects and servants. Signed, Alex. M'Donnell of Glengarie, &c. &c.

MR. URBAN,

June 10.

YOUR Correspondent Antiquarius (p. 347) desires some account of the office filled in Ireland by Thomas Le Strange, Constabularius Regis in Hibernia; and I will gratify him as far as I can. The Chief Governors of Ireland were, in early times, distinguished by various appellations; as, "Custos or Keeper, Warden, Justiciary, Seneschall, Lord-Lieutenant, Deputy, Procurator, and Constable," and accordingly Alan de la Zouch, Justiciary in 1256, was commanded, "not to obey or give up his authority to any new Justiciary or Constable, who should come without letters patent." Such governors, in those days, seem to have taken one or other of the before-mentioned titles, according as their civil or military powers happened to predominate. However, one only of them assumed the title of Constabularius; and he was Sir Theobald de Vernon in 1314; and the name of Thomas Le Strange does not occur in the List of the Chief Governors of Ireland. He therefore seems to have been only Constable of some royal fortress; whereof there were then many of no small consequence: yet, of which in particular, no history, I know of, has recorded. But that it was not one of inferior note may be inferred from this: "That Sir Thomas Le Strange was in 1421 constituted Lord Treasurer of Ireland, in the place of John Swyft; and was, in the same year, succeeded by William Thinbegh; from your correspondent's account he appears to have died in about five years afterwards.

Many, however, of the name of Strange, yet remain in Ireland; and some of them, at this hour, Roman Catholics: whether descended from this Thomas Le Strange, I know not. A. M. T.

A Correspondent in Scotland informs us, they are now preparing for the press the first number of Transactions of the Scottish Society of Antiquaries; and there is established a branch of the Society at Perth for exploring Gaëlich antiquities, and making a parochial survey of the Highlands—the MSS. communications to be regularly transmitted to the Mother Society and to pass the review of the committee of Edinburgh for publication. A library for the classics, antiquities, and natural history, has been begun in that town, and it is proposed that all the clergy of the Synod and freeholders of Perthshire should give a small annual contribution for the purchase of books in those departments. The first meeting of the Society was held at Perth on the 12th of June, which day the gentlemen politely chose as being the birth-day of the founder of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland.

They have received lately from Mr. Thorkelin, Secretary of the Royal Society of the Danish Antiquaries, some very curious books relating to Danish and Icelandic antiquities, and expect the great publication of the Edda in August next. Mr. Johnstone, Chaplain of our Embassy, promises copies of several MSS. relating to Scotch connections with Norway and Denmark, and a copy of Coryneus by the next ships.

They are very lame in books relating to Northern antiquities, and the public libraries in Scotland do not buy many books in that line, which makes it of great consequence to them to receive communications of that sort, their funds being yet very inconsiderable.

The E. of Buchan's pursuits of late have, in the way of collecting, been confined to curious mistive letters elucidatory of Scottish biography, and in general characteristic letters of illustrious or learned persons; which we mention in hopes of facilitating his lordship's very laudable pursuits. His objects are, first, as leading to a Biographia Scotica; 2dly, Biography in general; and, 3dly, the printing of characteristic letters, by centuries, of the most eminent characters in the state or in literature, since the restoration of letters in Europe. X. Y.

MR.

MR. URBAN,

A Very judicious solution of Observer's query, in page 249, may be found in Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets, Vol. I. p. 179.

The ridiculous controversy concerning the true spelling of Shakespeare's name has, perhaps, already taken up more room in your valuable collections than the subject deserves; but I must beg leave to add a very few words. In some monumental inscriptions, given us by Sir W. Dugdale, relating to his family, the name occurs variously spelt, viz. Shakespeare, Shakespere, Shakspeare; and I think, after all, we may relinquish the hopes of ascertaining which of these was the true spelling, when it is considered how exceedingly inattentive our ancestors were in this respect. Fuller informs us, "that the best gentlemen anciently were not the best scholars, and (minding matters of more moment) were somewhat too incurious in their names. Besides, writers ingrossing deeds were not over-critical in spelling of names, knowing well that, where the person appeared the same, the simplicity of that age would not fall out about misnomers. Hence it is, that the same name hath been so often disguised, unto the staggering of many who have mistaken it for different.

Idem non idem quarunt in nomine nomen. Thus I am informed, that "the honourable name of Villiers is written fourteen several ways in their own evidences; and the like, tho' not so many, variations may be observed in others." Fuller's Worthies, p. 51. And, indeed, there is no end to the examples of this nature, that might be adduced from old writers.

Lilly, in his "History of his Life and Times," endeavours to shew that the executioner of Charles I. was Colonel Joyce. This short explanation may perhaps be satisfactory to W. N. p. 255. See Lilly's Life, p. 90. edit. 1715.

The coins enquired after in p. 259, by the author of the very curious communication from Settle, are some of those common ones struck during the reign of Constantine the Great, and, if attentively examined, will be found to read on one side VRBS. ROMA. with the head of the city of Rome; the letters upon the exergue of the other side, with the figures of Romulus and Remus sucking the wolf, I should suspect not to be as described in the letter, but others denoting the place where the coins were minted; and these were exceedingly numerous, almost to a degree of incredibility to those not versed in these matters. Their varieties may be seen in Banduri's Numism. Imperatorum, &c. It is most natural to suppose, that the quarry wherein these coins were found bore the marks of having been heretofore worked, although this gentleman has not expressly said so.

GENT. MAG. July 1784.

Your correspondent in p. 344, seems to think that the ancients represented Death only under the symbol of a withered rose; but, in Spence's Polymetis, pl. 41, he will find a figure of Mors under the character of a human skeleton. The Romans were accustomed, at their great entertainments, to introduce a skeleton, made of bronze, upon the table, in order to remind them of their mortality, that they might enjoy life whilst they could. Of this we have a curious instance in Petronius, in the Feast of Trimalchio: and here I cannot help giving the christianlike reflection made upon this subject by Heidfeldius, in his "Sphinx theologico-philosophica," a work full of curious information: "Nos etiam quibus et ipsa Mors, et Mortis causa, et hominis post mortem conditio, exploratix est, memoriam Mortis, præsertim inter epulas, nunquam deponemus." A remarkable personification of death among the Eleans may also be found in Natalis Comitum Mythologiae, p. 230.

It is with extreme pleasure, Mr. Urban, that I take this opportunity of apologising to the Rev. Mr. Bentham, for my unintentional error in ascribing his remarks upon Gothic architecture to Mr. Gray; and I term this apology a pleasure, inasmuch as I regard the cause of it to have been the means of calling forth hidden genius, and of tracing merit to a source which I could ever wish to flow.

Yours,

S. E.

MR. URBAN, Montrose, June 26.

AMONG many other impediments to the progress of science, one is the different names which the same thing passes under, not only in different kingdoms, but in different parts of the same kingdom. Your correspondent, R. B. p. 106, observes, that Mr. D. Barrington, in his Miscellanies, has said that the Mountain Ash is not indigenous in the Southern counties, which mistake he fell into, from not knowing, that that Quickbeam is the name commonly given to that tree in these parts. Many instances of similar mistakes have occurred to me. The writers of books on Natural History appear to me not to have been sufficiently careful to form a complete Nomenclature of the animals, birds, fishes, insects, plants, and trees, which they describe, so as to enable their readers, in different countries, to know what object in nature their descriptions refer to. To remedy these defects, and the perplexities which result from them, people in different parts of the country ought to furnish lists of the names of things in those parts where they reside. To excite some of your correspondents to do this, I shall subjoin a few articles, which have occurred to me, to shew the difference between names in Scotland and England.

The Mountain-Asb, or Quickbeam, is with us The Rantry, or Roddan Tree. The red berries it produces are called Roddans. Concerning this tree there are various superstitions.

The plant Sorrel we called Sourrichs. Buttermilk, called Bladda, from the Gaelic Bladdach.

The Lark is the Laverock or Larick.

The Linnet — the Lintwhite.

The Thrush — the Mavis, from the French Mauvis, a Thrush.

The Magpye — the Pyot.

The Chaffinch — the Sbillfa.

The Tom-tit — the Oxeeye.

The Kite — the Gledd, from the Saxon Glidan to glide, because this bird moves thro' long tracts of the air without shaking its wings.

The Great Turn, I suppose our Pic-larney.

The Arctic Gull, is the Dirty Aulin.

The Land-rail is the Corn-craik, from the noise it makes, by oropalo-porai.

The Fox is with us, the Tod.

The Toad — the Tedd.

The Frog — the Paddock.

The Weasel, I suppose the Whitterit.

The Mole — the Maudawart.

The Crab — the Parlon.

The Periwinkle — the Wilk.

The Hollibut — the Turbot.

The Turbot — the Bannock-Flook.

The Flounder — the Flook.

Small differences are easily got over, as the Wran for Wren, Pertrick for Partridge, &c. but I should be glad to see the English names corresponding to many other Scotch terms: thus of birds, the Blucheret, Clocheret, Col-bod, Sandy-larick, and Hazour Crows, Hoody Crows and Corbies, correspond with the English Crows, Ravens, Roy-ston Crows, &c. I do not know what animal answers to our *Fumart, and to several others. We have many droll names of insects, as the Cloc, King-Colin, Hornogolach, Maggy with the money feet, &c. Many of these names I conceive are derived from the northern languages, and from the Gaelic. The etymologies of some of them may be curious. Most of them are now used only by the vulgar, as the higher classes of people are daily adopting the language and manners of England.

P. S. We call the house spider Eiter-cap. In the Welsh, it is Atyr-Cop, i. e. the Top Insect, because it lodges near the roof.

T. C.

MR. URBAN,

June 18.

IN Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, are the following unnoticed monumental inscriptions, to characters which deserve to be perpetuated.

Yours, &c.

J. G.

On one of the pillars in the north aisle adjoining to the choir, round a bust on a medallion:

"Henricus Aldrich, S. T. P. Ædis Christi Decanus, et grande totius Academiæ ornamentum."

On a scroll underneath:

"Vixit Vir clarissimus annos LXIII.

Ne cineres defuncti

Sine nomine et titulo

Diutius neglecti jacerent,

Georgius Clarke, qui vivum coluit et amavit, A. M. B. M. fecit, A. D. MDCCXXXII."

[The above in Roman capitals.]

Underneath on a grave-stone: [In Roman capitals.]

"Hic jacet

Quod mortale fuit

Henrici Aldrich, S. T. P.

Hujus Ædis Decani,

Doctrinæ ac Ingenii Fama

Immortalis.

Ob. XIV Decemb,

A. D. M. DCCX."

On another pillar:

"FRANCISCUS GASTRELL, S. T. P.

Episcopus Cestrensis,

Vir ingenii vividi,

Animi integerrimi,

Cui nihil erat pius, quam libere sentire et fari.

Non aliorum secutus vestigia,

Sed suo, ut plurimum, pennis fretus,

* The weasel, we believe; tho' a learned friend suggests the polecat. EDIT.

† These have been put up since 1730, when Browne Willis published his "Survey" of this Cathedral. EDIT.

Omnes

Omnes vires, omnia sua studia, Christianam Religionem confirmandam et promovendam
Potissimum intendit.

In argumentis inveniendis sagax,
In disponendis aptus,
Quæ acute excogitavit
Verbis dilucide expressit,
Non huc vi quadam et vehementia
Quæ in scriptis sæpe, in congressu sæpius, emicit,

Facile ut intelligi possit
Nihil cum aliis suadere
Quod ipse non habeat persuasissimum.
Ob vindicata Academiarum jura,

Ab earum utraque,
Nec non a multis Cleri conventibus,
Gratias publicis literis testatas accepit.
E Collegio Westmonasteriensi evocatus, Hujus Aedis Alumnus,

Ejusdem deinde Canonicus fuit.
Obiit anno ætatis 60, Dom. 1725, 15 Nov.
In hoc etiam sacello,

Atque eodem tumulo, conduntur cineres
ELIZABETHÆ dilectissimæ uxoris:

Quæ obiit 31 Jan. 1761."

On the pavement in the same aisle:

"Hic jacent

FRANCISCUS GASTRELL, S. T. P.

Episcopus Cestrensis,

Et ELIZABETHA Uxor ejus.

Adi marmor sepulchrale in adverso hujus sacelli latere Positum."

"M. S.

Fælici, pique memoriz

ROBERTI GASTRELL

Admodum Reverendi FRANCISCI

Episcopi Cestrensis et hujus

Ecclesiæ Canonici,

Filii unici

Pueruli Deo, suisque merito perchari

Optimeque in optimis, Cæleste

Scilicet regnum spectantibus, spei,

Qui placide in Domino obdormivit,

Et ab Angelis in Abrahami gremium

Ablatus est 5to. Decembris,

An. D. 1716, Æt. suæ 13to currente.

Non perijt, sed præ vit.

Δοξα το Θεο.

Dilectissimo Nepoti Avus

Invicem dilectus posuit,

Gratulabundo quam

Mærenti propior."

On the pavement underneath,

H. S. E.

ROBERTUS GASTRELL,

Puer optimæ spei,

Obiit Dec. 5to, An. D. 1716.

Æt. decimo tertio

Currente.

MR. URBAN,

THE following account of the origin of the word Punch is in Dr. John Perry's Travels to the East Indies, p.
167. Query if it is a true one, or whether any of your correspondents can assign a better.

At Nerule (near Goa) is made the best Arach, or Nepa die Goa, with which the English on this coast make that enervating liquor called Punch (which is Indostan for five) from five ingredients; as the physicians name this composition diapente, or from four things diateffaron. THERON.

On the effects of close hot rooms, late hours,
&c. from D. A. Fothergill's Hints on ANIMATION.

THE following observations cannot but be interesting to those who pursue fashionable amusements in crowded rooms at the expence of their health.

"If a healthy man contaminates a complete gallon of air in a minute, merely by repeatedly respiring it, we may easily explain why the air of a parlour is so considerably injured by company sitting in it, and that of a bedchamber even by a person's only sleeping in it, agreeable to the observations of Dr. Priestley and Dr. White. Here too we may regret that this unhealthy tendency is not a little increased by modern refinement. The mathematical exactness with which the doors and windows of elegant houses are now contrived to shut, exclude the necessary ingress of fresh air. The diminutive size of the bed-chambers is another capital error, and this is generally aggravated by sleeping with the curtains close drawn. The air thus confined becomes replete with perspirable matter exhaling from the lungs, and all the invisible ducts of the skin, and in this contaminated state is respired for several hours: a circumstance strangely overlooked in health, and but too much neglected in sickness. In putrid and contagious fevers, it renders the room not only very offensive, but highly dangerous to the patient, the practitioner, and the attendants. In close crowded rooms deprived of ventilation, when the air becomes phlogisticated to a certain degree, the candles grow uncommonly dim, and we begin to feel a disagreeable sense of oppression, languor, and faintness, till fresh air is re-admitted, when these symptoms presently vanish. But should this be neglected till the air is completely contaminated, as in the dreadful scene of Calcutta, the same fatal catastrophe would naturally ensue.
Flame, and all burning bodies, con-tamine air in the same manner as respiration.

piration. If a lighted taper is placed under a large glass receiver, its light gradually dwindles 'till at length it expires, rendering the air highly noxious. This shews the absurdity of attempting to purify pestilential air by lighting up large fires, which, instead of correcting its contagious principle, serve but to injure its respirable quality*. Hence also appears the glaring impropriety of that profusion of superfluous fires and candles, which modern luxury has introduced into ball-rooms, assemblies, and all places of splendid entertainments; since these, by adding to the impurity of the air already contaminated by respiration, cannot but prove very unfriendly to health. This evidently conspires with other circumstances in rendering the night air much less rare than that of the day. It may therefore serve to point out the pernicious tendency of that rage for late hours, which so entirely possesses the polite world, and which begins to pervade even the inferior ranks of society. The votaries of fashion in this country seem to vie with each other in converting day into night, and night into day, by reversing all the sober rules of their wiser ancestors, and in setting even nature at defiance.

A large portion of the time destined for repose is now spent in long visits over the card-table, or, if it can be spared from gaming, it is devoted to midnight revels, or sometimes perchance to books and serious lucubrations. During this solemn period, the animal, and even vegetable tribes, yield to the powerful impulse of sleep*. The latter, instead of breathing forth dephlogisticated air, now shed a baleful influence over the creation. While the external atmosphere is overspread with nocturnal fogs and exhalations, the hot air of the room shares the unwholesome effluvia, now superadded to the other contaminating causes. The night being thus consumed in watching, the fragrant and refreshing hours of morning, intended for invigorating exercises, are spent in relaxing slumbers, and thus

* e. g. Large fires, during the plague in 1666, were lighted one night in every great street in London; but during that night more died than in any other. EDITOR.

* "The sleep of plants in the night season is evident from the collapsed state of their leaves, and a visible change of their whole external habit. Nor do they resume their natural function of emitting pure air, till the returning influence of the solar rays again enables them to perform it."

from day to day is the same unnatural retrograde course of life uniformly repeated; an inconsistency certainly unworthy the wisdom of the superior orders of the community, and particularly of those who preside over the commonweal, and consider themselves as complete connoisseurs in the art of savoir vivre. Not only statesmen, and senators, but divines and philosophers, unite in thus deliberately yielding up their reason, and in becoming the willing slaves to this tyrannical custom. Above all, it is to be lamented that so unnatural a habit is so much countenanced by the British ladies, those arbiters of taste and elegance, who controul even custom, and from whose decision there is no appeal! otherwise I would beg leave to admonish the fair delinquents, that it is not only extremely injurious to their health and vivacity, but also to their beauty and loveliness. For surely it is our duty earnestly to remind them, that whatsoever is subversive of the former must ultimately prove destructive of the latter. Their still persisting in so pernicious a habit, which their cooler reason cannot but condemn, will then be considered as an impeachment of their prudence, as well as a reproach to their understanding. On the other hand, could they be prevailed upon to unite in opposing it, they would take the most effectual step towards reforming the age, and establishing their own empire on the firmest basis. They might then safely rely on their natural complexion, without having recourse to the wretched substitutes of art. Their native charms would render them infinitely more amiable than the whole tribe of boasted cosmetics. We should then have much less reason to regret the rapid decay of genuine beauty, and the total inefficacy of art to repair those ravages which it unavoidably undergoes in thus daily sacrificing to this goddess of folly!

MR. URBAN, June 6.
THE impartial recital of Biographical Anecdotes of great Persons contributes in no small degree to the value of your Magazine. In addition to those which you gave us very lately of Abp. Secker and Bp. Hoadly, the two following are at your service. They respect the same persons, and are of unquestionable authority.

Yours, &c. SCRUTATOR,
I. Upon the accession of his present Majesty

Majesty to the throne, all the bishops paid their congratulations to him in person, except Bps. Hoadly and Sherlock, who, on account of their great age and infirmities, wrote humble letters to his Majesty, pleading the same in excuse for not personally attending at court. The King, in return, charged Secker with his message to Hoadly, and which he accordingly delivered, signifying that his Majesty accepted of the excuse, and had a just value and esteem for his character. Hoadly, somewhat surprised at his character being particularly mentioned, enquired of the Archbishop whether that was the King's express message; to which Secker replied in the affirmative, with the addition, that he could assure his Lordship the King did say so, and that his Majesty was no hypocrite. A certain Dignitary soon after called upon Hoadly; and the Bishop told him of his late visitor and message, with this remark, that he believed all that the Archbishop had told him; for no man, said he, understands hypocrisy better than Archbishop Secker.

II. There was a friend of Bp. Hoadly's, who, asking a frank of him for some particular occasion, received for answer, that if he would come and dine with him, he should have as many as he should chuse. After some interval of time, the Bishop meeting with his friend, handsomely reminded him that he had not been to dine with him, to accept his proposals. Indeed, my Lord, said the gentleman, I am ashamed of myself, but I was lately with the Bishop of Oxford (then Dr. Secker), and I got some franks from him. Sir, replied Hoadly, you were very much in the right of it; the Bishop of Oxford's hand will, at any time, go further than mine.

MR. URBAN, Lotbury, Feb. 13.
I HAVE lately turned over the new edition of the "Anecdotes of Painting in England," from the former perusing of which I had received much pleasure and information. I need not expatiate here on the merit of a work which hath been so well received by the public. It appears now with the advantage of some additions and improvements; and if it be perhaps too much to say, that upon the whole it is superior to the lives of the painters which have been published in Italy and France; yet one may venture to assert, that the reading of it is more agreeable, being equally free from the trifling particulars which disgust you so often in the works of Vasari, Malvasia, Ridolfi, and other Italian authors, and from the indiscriminate and exaggerated praises lavished with so liberal a hand by Felibien, Dargenville, and other French writers, upon many artists of no very great merit.

By this publication Mr. Walpole hath rendered us the same service which Vasari hath to Italy. He hath preserved sundry notices which in all probability would soon have been lost, and recorded many which would never have been known. The beginning of the history of the arts in Great Britain would have continued, without him, involved in darkness. We may hope, since the foundation of the Society of Artists, and of the Royal Academy, that those two bodies will be the means of transmitting the sequel of it to our posterity.

In my cursory reading of this useful and entertaining work, I took notice of some mistakes and some omissions; and, as I apprehended that rectifying the first, and supplying the others, might be of some service in a future edition, I wrote them down upon loose papers, with the intention of revising and improving the whole when more leisure should afford me the opportunity of doing it properly. But having by some accident mislaid those papers, and not having at present time to read over again the "Anecdotes of Painting," I shall transmit you two or three remarks which I have found, giving you the liberty to insert them in your useful Magazine, if you think them deserving the notice of the public, and worthy of a place in your valuable collection.

Mr. W. upon mentioning (vol. V. p. 40) a print of James I. with his arms supported by a lion and a griffin, makes this remark: "As Crispin Pass executed this abraqad, it is not extraordinary that he should have continued Q. Elizabeth's griffin, not knowing that James on his accession had assumed the Scottish supporter." This observation is true, generally speaking; but I believe that more instances might be given, where the griffin hath been used by James and his successors of the Stuart family. I shall only mention a remarkable one which may be seen at the hospital of St. Catherine by the Tower. There is, in the wall of that building which runs parallel to the church, a compartment in stone, wherein are carved the arms of King Charles II. impaled with those of his consort Queen Catherine of Portugal, tugal, supported by the lion and griffin. It is in very good preservation, well executed, and on account of its being placed in a public edifice it claims our particular attention.

In vol. V. p. 194. a print is mentioned of Ld Chancellor Jefferies by Isaac Oliver, where he is styled Earl of Flint; a title, says Mr. W. which none of our historians mention to have been given to or designed for him *. The sagacity of our author might have pointed out to him, that this print hath preserved us this very curious anecdote, that the title of Earl of Flint was the reward intended by James II. for the cruelties committed by the bloody and merciless Jefferies, who, upon the promise of this new dignity, very probably bespoke this print with his new title, intending that it should appear in public at the same time with the patent of his creation. The temper of the times very likely prevented this last being published as soon as was intended; and events crowding fast one upon another, brought on the flight of the king, and the death of the minister.

I wonder that these reflections should not have occurred to Mr. W. when something of the same kind had before, upon a similar occasion; for in p. 116, after mentioning a print of Henry Somerset, marquis of Worcester, by Wm. Fairborne, he says, this print bath the garter, though it never was given, and he adds very judiciously, probably it was promised, which, I think, is very likely the case, by reflecting upon the history of those times.

I cannot help remarking here, as a corroborating proof of what is said above, that very lately a print of a noble Duke with the insignia of the garter hath been published so soon after his receiving it, as to make it evident, that the print was begun, if not finished, before the creation was known to the public at large; so that had a revolution in politics or death prevented the bestowing this mark of the royal favour, still the print would have remained to perplex posterity. One may further observe, that the noble Duke appears in the print with the star upon his breast, although, if I be not mistaken, the knights do not wear it till after their installation, and previous to it are only entitled to wear the blue ribbon.

In Vol. IV. Mr. W. giving some account of Bellucci an Italian painter, who was employed at Cannons, the seat of the first Duke of Chandos, observes, that this palace was pulled down as soon as he was dead, and, as if in mockery of sublunary grandeur, the site and materials were purchased by Hallet the cabinet-maker. In the first edition this passage was expressed in a more contemptuous style, by using the expression of an Hallet, cabinet-maker. Ovid says somewhere, that literature emollit mores, sed finit esse seros. This is very true, but as there is no rule without exception, the author under our consideration affords us a very striking instance of the truth of this common proverb. I always wondered at the reason which could induce Mr. W. to speak in so familiar and disrespectful a manner of a gentleman, who by his ability, prudence, good management, oeconomy, and success in his business, had been placed in a situation which enabled him to purchase an estate from a family, who, in the care of its fortune, had followed a different line of conduct. If Mr. W. was so fond of morality, and of making reflections upon the changes of this world, he might have seen an instance of the instability of sublunary grandeur in his own family, an instance too which was connected with his work, and to which his subject ought to have naturally led him. Every body will perceive that I allude to the princely collection of pictures intended by the founder to be an everlasting useful ornament to England, and which in the lapse of a few years hath been sold by his successor, and removed to a country reputed not long ago unlettered and uncivilised*.

* Some have thought this a sarcasm, in allusion to the hardness of his heart. EDIT.

Yours, &c. ARISTARCHUS.

MR. URBAN,

June 14.

THE sheep depastured on certain lands in Shropshire are sometimes found to have their teeth incrustated with a yellow substance, which has the appearance of gold. These lands are perfectly sound and dry, and produce an abundance of wild thyme. The soil is

* Our correspondent should be informed, that it was not in the power of Mr. W. to prevent this unfortunate event, which would not have taken place had a certain lady of the family died a little sooner. How much is this calamity aggravated by the neglect of this noble collection ever since its arrival at St. Petersburg, where the pictures remain just as they were placed after unpacking, face to face, on a ground-floor liable to be, if not actually, flooded by the sudden rise of the river! EDIT.

a kind

prices have been exorbitant. The rich, it is true, may gratify their desires; but the industrious tradesman or labourer, the many of circumscribed incomes or fortunes, and particularly the poor, are debarred often or totally deprived of that plentiful store which Providence has laid up, and at proper seasons distributes all along the borders of the ocean which surrounds us, and in the many rivers which water this noble and delightful island. But those, who by arts best known to themselves, for their sole emolument and profit, keep up the prices of fish, say, that the poor will not live on such food; that when it has been given them they have refused it, and said, that the money which must buy sauce to the fish can be better laid out in a little meat which can make broth, and, with some roots, or thickened with meal or other ingredient, will feed a whole family. This is a plausible but not a valid excuse; it will only avail where fish cannot be eaten without sauce; but how many thousands never think of such addition, and either salted, or with salt when dressed, are contented. There is, moreover, a sort of fish which requires no addition, which are nourishing, strengthening, easily prepared where dressing is necessary, and to be multiplied and preserved all along the German ocean, and in the several channels; and this supply consists of all sorts of shell-fish. The encouragement of the oyster fishery is an object very well deserving the attention of legislature; and now that negotiations are on foot with the Dutch, the pernicious monopoly carried on with them on the Eastern coast should have an end, and never be suffered any more. Let them as neighbours buy oysters, but in the same manner they buy coals in the north, without prejudice to the natives, and depriving the very inhabitants of the neighbouring oyster-beds from having their share of the produce of their native country. Those whose concern this may be will easily understand the necessity of this observation, and will best know how to correct such an abuse, but as no malevolent intention to any individual, but merely an anxious wish to be useful to community, has suggested these remarks, it is needless to give offence by pointing out any place. It will be sufficient to remark, that through the monopoly of the contract with the Dutch, and that for supplying the Flemish oyster-pens at Ostend, both those foreign foreign countries are supplied with the best oysters, which are sold there fifty per cent. cheaper than in England; and the neighbouring towns in this country to the oyster beds are totally denied, or have a very scanty supply of that sort of shell-fish which an open market could supply them with.

The abuse of this monopoly being abolished, great advantage will accrue from following the example set by our industrious neighbours the Flemish. The oyster-pens at Ostend not only serve the country thereabouts, but supply many parts of Austrian, Dutch, and French Flanders, and several parts of Germany as far up as Vienna, with what are called in England Native Milton, Colchester, and Pyfleet oysters, carefully barreled up. The pens are divided in two parts, are paved, and the oysters brought in the smacks from England are laid in those pens, and removed from the outward to the inward in succession, where they lie a certain time to fatten. The pens are fed each tide by the sea filling them through the sluices well contrived for the purpose. The pens are situated at the upper part of the harbour, and at times are cleansed from the mud and slimy filth which collects there. The time for supplying these pens with oysters, and carrying on that trade, is from September the 15th to the 15th of May; and from May to September the persons who have the management of these pens are careful to have them and the sluices well repaired against the next winter season, and also in having a quantity of barrels of various sizes made in a large workshop built for that use next to the pens, and piled up in a very extensive warehouse in great quantities ready for packing up the oysters. Within the boundaries which contain the necessary buildings for this trade, are decent houses for the abode of the several persons concerned in the several branches of this lucrative trade. At Blanchenberg the fishermen chiefly bring lobsters, crabs, and the largest brown shrimps seen on the coast, and sell them to a great distance. The poor people, who are at no other expence than a penny for a bowlful which may hold two quarts, and the trouble of boiling them, are very desirous of shrimps, and also of crabs and lobsters when plenty. The fishermen say, that these shrimps have been in greater quantities on that coast since the memorable earthquake at Lisbon in 1755, and that they frequently shift their station on the coast, whether it be owing to the alteration in the sea-water, or to certain winds which may occasion a foulness in the sea-water, they do not pretend to determine. But they are of opinion, that on the shores, where similar ground is to be met with, at a proper spawning season, were a cargo of those large brown shrimps quickly deposited after taking up, the sort could be preserved and increased. Surely the coasts of the German Ocean and the Channel offer many places where the propagation of shell-fish may be encouraged, and different shores afford different produce calculated for their support; the ouzy slimy borders of the German Ocean may feed shrimps, while the chalky soil of the cliffs may furnish the sea with calcareous food for the lobsters, the crabs, the oreilles de mer, commonly called in the islands in the Channel the ormers; and as for pens or reservoirs to fatten oysters in season, or to preserve the constant increase of the lobsters and crabs, certainly the borders of the Isles of Shepey and Tbanet, of East Kent, and all along the Channel, and many others round the kingdom, are well conditioned, and could easily be adapted to such purposes, under the direction and management of intelligent and industrious persons. Nature has pointed out one port, which shall be mentioned, in the hope of attention with advantage, and of emulation in other places, should the effort to assist all ranks of persons succeed by this hint. It is the port of DOVER. Besides the harbour, as well known as it is useful, there are within the limits of that town and port two inclosed pieces of water, filled each tide by the sea, and lying at the upper end of the harbour, from which they are both divided by sluices; the larger, called emphatically the PEN, extends from the upper part of the haven northwards, is capable of admitting large vessels, and in it several have been and are both built and repaired; this piece of water is sheltered by the cliffs from the westerly and south west winds, bordered by the town, and surrounded with all the offices and magazines necessary for the supplying shipping, and probably could answer every requisite for the establishing a small dock-yard. But the lesser, called the Paradise Pen, lying at the top, and facing the mouth of the harbour close under the cliffs to the westward, is too small for the purposes just mentioned, and yet having the

the advantage as the Larger Pen, receiving every tide the sea in full, there seems every requisite for these suitable and useful pens, reservoirs for every sort of shell-fish, and even for every kind of sea-fish: small boats stand round this pen, as if already constructed for the fishermen and their families; nor are there more expert and industrious men than the seafaring men of DOVER, and, to their honour be it known, none more industrious and civil; indeed the same may be observed all along this coast.

As a small river empties itself in the larger pen at the north-west end of the town, it may not be an unworthy consideration, whether the reservoirs or flews could not also be constructed at that end of the town to keep fresh-water fish, which is excellent in that county.

Whether these thoughts come under the description of objects cognizable by the lord warden, the barons, and commissioners of the cinque ports, and particularly of the harbour; or by the mayor, justices, and common council of the town of DOVER, separately or collectively; they are submitted to the corporate body to whose department they may belong, with no other view but to lay before them well-meant and intended, though perhaps crude thoughts, and undeserving their notice. Yet should fortunately these gentlemen, whoever they may be, think their time not totally mis-spent in attending to these notions, and form such resolutions towards a plan for making them of public utility, it is most earnestly wished, that suitable persons may offer themselves to carry it into immediate execution, since, independently of their own emolument, they may have the unspeakable satisfaction of affording both food and raiment to many, and at least support a maintenance to some. And among other necessary articles to be provided for this undertaking, one among the rest may not be the least beneficial to the poor of both sexes and of different ages, the fishing-nets, making of which, it is well known, employs various hands. And here it may not be improper to add an observation lately made; that our neighbours the French are observed in the mackarel and berring fishery to take a greater number of large and sizeable fish than any other nation, and the reason assigned for this advantage is, that they make use of such nets the meshes of which are wider and more open than the other, whereby the small fish escape, and they only fill their nets with fish of such dimensions as they prefer. The great shoals of fish which appear regularly twice a year, and continue some months on our several coasts, afford another consideration, whether a number of hands could not be employed in catching, curing, packing, and conveying such fish to all parts of the kingdom, and also to foreign countries, where the cod, the berring, the mackarel, are mercantile commodities, and, like the Flemish, in the intermediate space of time in making the nets, the barrels, and repairing their vessels. Thus both sailors and soldiers, and their families, might get a constant livelihood; and now that many industrious American loyalists, well acquainted with what belong to fisheries, are seeking for a peaceable retirement to settle in, they may find out in Great Britain several eligible places, where they may quietly earn and eat their bread, under the best-constituted government on earth, which they know how to prize, and amidst their brethren and fellow-subjects, who are willing to assist and encourage them, as a due reward for their unshaken loyalty and attachment.

MR. URBAN,

June 30.

IN the short memoir of Dr. Robertson (see Magazine for September last, p. 748.), written by himself, and faithfully published from his own MS. he has stated "that the Earl of Ilay and other visitors, called Mr. Sterling, Principal of the College of Glasgow, to a severe account for the public money that he had embezzled, which amounted to so much as to erect many stately edifices for the use of the university."

I am glad to have cause to suspect the truth of this imputation, upon such good authority as that of Dr. Leechman, the present principal of the college there; and think it no more than justice to the character of Mr. Sterling to say, that Dr. Leechman, in a very handsome letter which I lately received from him, writes to me as follows:

"(1) That himself and the Professors there never heard that Principal Sterling was accused before the Visitors of having embezzled the public money, and there is no order for refunding it in the regulations which they delivered to the college subscribed by all their names.

"(2) That it appears from the college

lege

GENT. MAG. July, 1784.

“lege records, that in the year 1722
“ (four years before the visitation) cer“tain specified college funds were ap“propriated for building dwelling-“houses for the professors; and it fur“ther appears from subsequent college “accounts, that the funds, thus set a“part, were applied to the purpose of “building six dwelling-houses.

“(3) That, considering Principal Ster-“ling’s acknowledged character, even by “those who opposed his measures in “college politics, it is highly improba“ble that any such charge would be ex“hibited against him. I never saw “Principal Sterling, he was dead many “years before I was a member of the “college; but I have had opportunities “for many years since I came into the “college to converse with his contem“porary professors, and with those of “them who had been generally of op“posite sentiments to him as to national “and college politics, and therefore can“not be suspected of partiality to him.
“But I never heard any of them (though “they blamed particular steps of his “conduct) so much as insinuate that he “was a selfish interested man, who did “not scruple to enrich himself at the “expence of the public. On the con“trary, they acknowledged, that he was “a zealous friend of the society, accord“ing to his views; and that he was so “far from being disposed to embezzle
“the college revenue, that he was ex“tremely careful to save it, and to ap“ply the savings to the public purposes “of promoting literature, and such “things as might be useful or orna“mental. And, indeed, there still re“main incontestible proofs of this from “our college records; for, during the “time of his being Principal, partly by “savings of the revenue, and chiefly by “the interest of his great friends at “court, he obtained new grants from “the crown, by which he doubled the “number of professors with settled sa“laries.”

I profess to have equal esteem for the candour and probity both of Dr. Robertson and Dr. Leechman; and am satisfied that the one would not wilfully exculpate a guilty character, and that the other would not criminate an innocent one.
From this representation of Dr. Leechman’s, I am inclined to think that Dr.
Robertson has made a mistake in the general recollection of events so long ago as 1726, or that he may have been wrong informed as to the conclusion of those differences which, about that time, subsisted in the College of Glasgow: but I have not the least suspicion of his writing a wilful falsehood, which, I will venture to say, he was utterly incapable of; nor can I impute it to the operation of any resentment, notwithstanding the hard treatment he received, while I am persuaded he was a worthy man, of great candour and good temper, of much generosity and openness of mind. Nor is Dr. Leechman backward to bear the same testimony to the character of Dr.

Robertson.

As I communicated to the publick the account of Dr. Robertson, in which his own manuscript was literally adhered to;
so I wish not to suppress, as I have leave to publish, the counter evidence of Dr.
Leechman, in respect to Principal Ster-ling’s supposed embezzlement of any part of the revenues of the College of Glasgow.

JOHN DISNEY.

MR. URBAN, July 3.
THE internal government of nations has been in a state of progressive improvement for several ages past; and it is, perhaps, in the present arrived as near to perfection, in most respects, as the nature of things will permit. There is, however, one respect in which great room still remains for improvement: the method of punishing heinous offenders against the laws, so as most effectually to answer the end of punishment, does not seem to have been yet discovered. The number of capital punishments which occur in our own nation in particular, is a circumstance that alarms the feelings of humanity; we enjoy the protection, which the laws afford us, with an imperfect satisfaction, when we reflect, that it is purchased with the violent and premature death of so many of our fellow-creatures.
Did the cruelty of our laws give them additional force in deterring men from incurring the penalties of them, their cruelty might perhaps admit of defence; but this does not seem to be the case. In fact, their being in a legislative view too severe and indiscriminate, has occasioned a great relaxation in the execution of them; and this relaxation, though commendable with respect to the spirit it proceeds from, has been found to produce the most pernicious consequences. The threats of punishment, in order to have the full effect of which they are capable, must be rendered as little liable to evasion as possible.

The most profligate persons reason, in some

ed? Let houses be erected in different parts of the kingdom, to the number of two or three in each circuit, for the purposes of labour and confinement, under the name of Felons Workhouses. Let the first of these be put under a severer discipline than the second, and so on (if there be more than two to a circuit), that the kind, as well as the duration, of punishment may be suited to the offence. To a residence in these workhouses for the space of one, two, three, four, &c. years, according to the malignity of their crimes, I propose that convicts be sentenced; and that this punishment be the express penalty of the laws, and not a mitigation of that which they have appointed. None but the officers set over them should have access to them; as they ought to have no communication, not even by letter, with persons out of the house, and as little as possible with each other. Perhaps it may be necessary to let them labour together; but, if they are kept in small parties, the presence of overseers may prevent irregularities. At night they should be confined in separate cells. It would be advisable, if it could be managed, that their condition should be made to depend in some measure on their conduct, and to improve in proportion to the amendment of their behaviour. The degrees of punishment would by these means be greatly varied, and the mixture of solitude and social labour would tend to bring these unhappy creatures to a proper recollection. Confinement and an obligation to labour is, to those whose crimes arise from idleness and dissipation, a punishment as severe as can well be imagined; the dread of it therefore will have a powerful influence in deterring men from incurring it; and as to those who may incur it, the forced submission to a temperate and regular method of life will, no doubt, have a happy effect in bringing them to a voluntary sobriety. That difficulties would arise in the execution of such a plan, with respect to the nature of the employment, and to many other circumstances, the failure of a somewhat similar one gives us sufficient reason to apprehend; but, notwithstanding this, I doubt not, that by a proper exertion of skill and authority these difficulties might be surmounted. My purpose at present is only to give a hint of what appears to me a practicable scheme of great importance, and as such worthy the attention of the legislature.

But I despair of ever seeing the very desirable end of preventing crimes attained,

516 Farther Character of Mr. Davis.—Miscellaneous Observations.

tained, to the degree which I think possible, till some method for the better education of the children of the poor be universally adopted. Whether the general establishment of Houses of Industry would effect this I am not fully satisfied; but I think that, under proper regulation and with some improvements, they are more likely to do it than any other practicable plan that has yet been suggested,

Yours, &c. E. P.

MR. URBAN,

IT was with very great satisfaction that I saw in your last Magazine some particulars of the late Rev. Henry Edwards* Davis of Windsor, whose merit and abilities have been acknowledged by some of the first men in literature; and whose many amiable qualities in private life cannot be more strongly marked than by the regret with which his intimate friends look back upon those days, when his presence contributed to their comfort and happiness. I observe too, with infinite pleasure, in the circumstances of that account, the regard for his memory, and the friendly attention, of a gentleman highly eminent for character and abilities, and who was by Mr. Davis particularly esteemed and loved. There does not remain much for me to add. But I may observe that, before his publication of the "Examination of some Parts of Mr. Gibbon's History," he had given several proofs of an early genius; and as in this he resembled some eminent men, so he did also in another respect, being from his infancy of a very tender and delicate constitution. His apprehension was quick, and his judgement correct; and in his application he was indefatigable. Among other virtues may be reckoned his earnest desire of reconciliation, where any difference separated a person from him, and the greatest eagerness to assist by good offices even his severest opponents. At the university he was called forth to preach upon some public occasions. His destination for the church was followed by these happy consequences, a zeal for religion, and sufficient knowledge to defend it. Of this there remains a convincing proof in his "Examination," an attack ingenious, spirited, and successful, against a writer of great popularity, whose work, however deservedly admired for much valuable matter, was calculated to propagate some very dangerous and insidious notions in the reader. I know not what can give greater credit to Mr. Davis's publication, than the laboured and artful "Vindication" in answer to it; which, however, though powerfully recommended by the beauties of the style, leaves full conviction on the mind of the attentive and impartial reader of the necessity and utility of the "Examination." It should be remembered, that Mr. Davis's "Reply" to the "Vindication" exhibits a strong instance, as was mentioned in the other account, of his candour and firmness. The "Examination" attracted the notice of very many learned men, who expressed to the author the most flattering marks of approbation. And, moreover, a Great Personage was pleased to testify his sense of it by a very considerable present; which was given in a manner particularly honourable to Mr. Davis.

This account cannot be useless of a person, who by his studies and example contributed to the support of those principles, which alone could sustain him in some of the most afflicting and trying situations of life. Yours, &c. * * H.

MR. URBAN,

I WISH to know whether and when the little book printed by Mr. Raikes and given by him to the children of the Sunday schools at Gloucester (see p. 41) is to be had?

The Charter-house, p. 429, certainly is not an exception to the foundation of Guy's Hospital being a larger sum than ever was before left in this kingdom to one single person to charitable uses; for the endowment of the Charter-house, we take the present improved value to be 6000*l.* per ann. at 30 years purchase, will be 180,000*l.*, to which add 20,000*l.* at purchase, and the whole will make 200,000*l.*; whereas the erecting and endowment of Guy's Hospital amounted to the sum of 238,292*l.* 16*s.*

At the Commemoration of Handel, 1757, the archbishop and bishops were "in purple robes." Several tickets were bought the day before the performance. The first day's performance consisted of the Overture to Esther, Funeral Anthem "Gloria Patri" from the Jubilate, and them "O sing unto the Lord," and "The Lord shall reign," the Coronation Anthem, Dettingen Te Deum and Overture with the Dead March in Saul. The second day's performance in the abbey was the Messiah. Total receipt, 11,852 guineas. Total amount of the produce, also 13,500*l.*

B.

* Not Edward.

62. Memoirs of the Life of Voltaire. Written by Himself. Translated from the French. 8vo.

"THIS volume," says the Preface, "is a sort of malignant spirit, who came upon earth only to embitter the cup of life, and afterwards laugh at our wry faces." How "a volume" can be "a spirit," and "come upon earth," and "laugh," we do not well conceive. But that Voltaire was frequently "malignant," all will allow. This work might with as much (or more) propriety have been styled Memoirs of the Kings of Prussia, as of Voltaire.—Of that "Vandal" (as he styles him) Frederick-William, he says, p. 17,

"The monarch used to walk from his palace clothed in an old blue coat, with copper buttons, half way down his thighs, and when he bought a new one, these buttons were made to serve again. It was in this dress that his majesty, armed with a huge serjeant's cane, marched forth every day to review his regiment of giants. These giants were his greatest delight, and the things for which he went to the heaviest expence....

"After Frederick-William had reviewed his giants, he used to walk through the town, and every body fled before him full speed. If he happened to meet a woman, he demanded why she staid idling her time in the streets, and exclaim, 'Go, get home [with you] you lazy hussy; an honest woman has no business over the threshold of her own door;' which remonstrance he would accompany with a hearty box on the ear, a kick in the groin, or a few well-applied strokes on the shoulders with his cane.

"The holy ministers of the gospel were treated also exactly in the same style, if they happened to take a fancy to come on the parade."

We have then an account of the prince's intended escape in 1730; the arrest and imprisonment of him and his friend Kat; the execution of the latter; the whipping-bout of the prince's "lort of mistrels" (both these in his presence); and the kicking of his sister, "by which she received a contusion on her left breast, which remained with her during life, and which she did the author the honour to shew him."

Our poet's first interview with the present king, the "Solomon of the North," as he calls him, is thus described:

"I was conducted into his majesty's apartment, where I found nothing but four bare walls. By the light of a *baugie, I perceived a small truckle-bed, of two feet and a half wide, in a closet, upon which lay a little man, wrapped up in a morning gown of blue cloth. It was his majesty, who lay sweating and shaking beneath a beggarly coverlet, in a violent ague-fit. I made my bow, and began by feeling his pulse, as if I had been his first physician. The fit left him, and he rose, and sat down to table with Algarotti, Keiserling, Maupertuis, the Ambassador to the States General, and myself. While we were at supper, we treated most profoundly on the immortality of the soul, natural liberty, and the Androgines of Plato."

His invasion of Silesia, his first victory, but personal flight, at Molwitz, &c. are then recounted, intermixed with many bitter sarcasms, at which, the Preface says, "the king is highly irritated," and is "writing an answer." The first is very probable, the latter not.

The following was the manner of the king's life at Potsdam:

"He rose at five in summer, and six in winter. If you wish to know the royal ceremonies, what they were on great and what on common occasions, the functions of his high almoner, his great chamberlain, the first gentleman of his bed-chamber, and his gentlemen-ushers, I answer, a single lacquey came to light his fire, dress, and shave him, though he partly dressed himself alone. His chamber was rather beautiful; a rich balustrade of silver, ornamented with little Loves, of exceedingly good sculpture, seemed to form the alcove of the state-bed, the curtains of which were seen; but behind those curtains, instead of a bed, there was a library; and as to the real bed, it was a kind of folding-couch, of straw, with a slight mattress, and hidden from the view. Marcus Aurelius and Julian, the two greatest men among the Romans, and Apostles of the Stoic, lay not on a harder bed. About eleven o'clock, the king, booted, reviewed in his garden his regiment of guards. The prince his brothers, the general-officers, and one or two of his chamberlains, eat [ate] at his table. When dinner was over, he retired to his cabinet, and writ verses till five or six o'clock, when a young man, of the name of Darget*, came and read to him. At seven he had a little concert, at which he played the flute, and as well as the best performers. They supped in a little hall, the most singular ornament of which was a picture, the design of which he himself gave to Perie, his painter, and one of our best colourists. The subject was totally Priapian. Neither women nor priests ever entered the palace; and, in a word,

* This "Darget" was a Frenchman, and, in the "Works of the Philosopher of Sans-Souci," Epist. XIX, Apologie des Rois, is addressed to him. EDIT.

* Why not "wax-candle?"

Fr derick lived without religion, without a council, and without a court."

From the author's acquaintance with Lewis XV's mistress, Poisson, [afterwards Mad. Pompadour], in 1746, "I obtained (says he) rewards which had never been granted to my works or my services. I was deemed worthy to be one of the forty useless members of the Academy, was appointed historiographer of France, and created by the king one of the gentlemen-in ordinary of his chamber. From this I concluded it was better, in order to make the most trifling fortune, to speak four words to a king's mistress, than to write 100 volumes."

That the good old king, Stanislaus, had the Marchioness de Boufflers for his mistress, and his confessor, a Jesuit, for his pimp, who invited Mad. du Châtelet to his court to supply her place—credat Judæus! This aspersion is confuted, in a note, by "M. de St. Lambert, author of a poem on the Seasons."—Mad. du Châtelet died at Luneville, in 1749. After her death, our poet was again invited to Potzdam. "Who might [rather 'could'] resist a monarch, a hero, a poet, a musician, a philosopher, who pretended too to love me, and whom I also loved?—I sat out once more for Potzdam, in June 1750. Astolphus [Astolpho] did not meet a kinder reception in the palace of Alcina." [He afterwards calls him his 'Frederick-Alcina.'] "To be lodged in the same apartments that Marshal Saxe had occupied, to have the royal cooks at my command, when I chose to dine alone, and the royal coachmen, when I had an inclination to ride, were trifling favours. Our suppers were very agreeable. If I am not deceived, I think we had much wit. The king was witty, and gave occasion of wit to others" [like our Falstaff]; "and, what is still more extraordinary, I never found myself so much at my ease. I worked two hours a day with his majesty, corrected his works, and never failed highly to praise whatever was worthy of praise, though I rejected the dross. I gave him details of all that was necessary in rhetoric and criticism, for his use; he profited by my advice, and his genius assisted him more effectually than my lessons."

His leaving Potzdam he ascribes to this incident:—"One La Metrie, a physician, an atheist, and the king's reader, told his majesty, one day, after the lecture, that there were persons exceedingly jealous of my favour and fortune. 'Be quiet a while,' said Frederick, 'we squeeze the orange, and throw it away when we have swallowed the juice.' La Metrie did not forget to repeat to me this fine apophthegm, worthy Dionysius of Syracuse! From that time I determined to take all possible care of the orange-peel.—I had about 12,000 guineas [rather louis] to place out at interest, but was determined it should not be in the territories of my Alcina. I found an advantageous opportunity of lending them upon the estates which the Duke of Wirtemberg possessed in France." This, by the way, is a very different story from that, which has been told and believed, of Voltaire's saying that "he had been employed in washing and mending the king's foul linen."

"The king, who opened all my letters, did not doubt my intention to quit his service. The furor of rhyming, however, still possessing him, as it did Dionysius, I was obliged continually to pore, and again revise, his History of Brandenburg, and all the rest of his works. . . . Maupertuis, who knew the anecdote of the orange-peel, spread a report, that I had said 'the place of king's atheist was vacant' [by the death of La Metrie]. "This calumny did not succeed; but he afterwards added, I had also said, 'the king's poetry was bad' [see above]; and this answered his purpose. From this time forward, I found the king's suppers were no longer so merry; I had fewer verses to correct, and my disgrace was complete. . . . I once more, however, supped, at his desire, like Damocles; after which I parted, with a promise to return, but with a firm design never to see him more." True courtier! True Voltaire! . . . "All society," he adds, "has its laws, except that of the Lion and the Lamb." But this French "lamb" is not one that is dumb. . . . After his subsequent arrest at Franckfort by one Freitag, the king's agent (which, with other particulars of Voltaire's life, may be seen in our last Mag. p. 432), the king's poems, printed at his own expence, and given to our author, being at Leipzig, "Freitag signed the following curious quittance: 'Montseer, so
' soon

‘soon as shawl dey great pack come ouf ‘Leipfic, mit de vurks ouf poesly be ‘given mit me, you shawl go ouf vere
 ‘you do please. Given at Franckfort,
 ‘de vurst of June, 1753. — Freitag,
 ‘Resident, ouf de King mine Master.’
 At the bottom of which I signed :
 ‘Good, vor dey vurks ouf poesly ouf
 ‘de king your master;’ with which the Resident was well satisfied.” Qu. in what language was the original?
 After this, however, he and his niece
 “were held prisoners of war (he says)
 “twelve days,” at the expence of “17 “pounds ten shillings a day; four sol“diers, with fixed bayonets, served her “instead of curtains and chamber“maids,” &c. And so much for Dio-nyhus and Damocles, Astolpho, and Alcina.—A satire follows on Lewis the XVth, signed “Frederick,” another, in return, on Frederick, by the Duke de Choiseul.—After the above extracts, the authenticity of these Memoirs will scarcely be doubted. We can say nothing in praise of the translation.

63. The History of Ayder Ali Khan, Nabob-Babader: or, New Memoirs concerning The East Indies. With Historical Notes. By M. M. D. L. F. General of 10,000 Men in the Army of the Mogul Empire, and formerly Commander in Chief of the Artillery of Ayder Ali, and of a Body of European Troops in the Service of that Nabob. In Two Volumes.

THE author of these Memoirs, a Frenchman, professes to speak with certainty of the things which he had seen himself, but does not pretend to vouch for the facts which he could only learn from the information of others.

Certain it is, that many transactions are very differently told from what we have been accustomed to hear. We shall select, from the first volume, an event which, we believe, has never been publicly known in England, though it seems to have been the means of defeating the most important enterprize that was ever formed to accomplish the downfall of Ayder.—It may be necessary just to premise, that Ayder (as the writer is pleased to write his name) was in the height of conquest when he projected an expedition against Travancour.

“The English had no sooner heard of Ayder’s preparations than they grew jealous of them. In their uncertainty respecting his intentions, they resolved to dispatch his onagail, or resident, from Madras, with dispatches announcing a solemn embassy, composed of the chief men of the settlement.—

 Ayder, foreseeing that this embassy could only mean to divert him from his intended purpose, thought it necessary to elude receiving it, alledging, that Coilmoutour, where he was encamped, being only a military station, and by no means proper for the reception of ambassadors, he could not conveniently receive the embassy till he should arrive at Seringapatam, a royal city, to which he proposed to return in a short time.—Ayder (says the writer) was too well acquainted with English policy to suffer himself to be seduced by the pompous honours with which they hoped to dazzle his sight; and, far from being flattered with this embassy,
 he was determined no longer to defer his expedition against Travancour.

“There was at this time an Irish officer in his army, named Turner, who had been admitted into his service by the recommendation of Governor Boschier [Beacher], and who, possessing all the talents of a good officer, had in a very short time gained the affections of Ayder. To this gentleman Ayder had committed the execution of his most important operations, and had advanced him to the command of the first battalion of Topass Grenadiers; and in this quality he was regarded as General of that body, which forms a reconnoitring party of 5000 men.

“It must be allowed that an officer, recommended by an English Governor, ought to have been treated with less confidence;
 but this man had behaved so well in the war on the coast of Malabar, that, far from having any mistrust of him, he had acquired the full confidence of his Generals. Taking the advantage of the good opinion they had of him, he waited till the time of payment, which was every lunar month; and when he had received his appointments, and the pay of his men, he made his escape by the road that leads to Cochin.

“His quarters were a short league from Coilmoutour. His officers waited on him, as usual, to receive their pay; but, under the plausible pretence of the absence of his secretary, he begged them to wait till the next day. In the evening, to put his project in execution, he mounted his horse, accompanied only by a young Swedish officer, to whom he had communicated his design, and, telling his domestics that he was going to sup with the Commandant General at Coil-moutour, he disappeared, carrying every thing he had of value with him.

“The intensity [intenseness] of the heat in the day, and the beauty and coolness of the night in India, induce people of distinction to sit up sometimes very late, more especially as they have the custom of sleeping in the day from three till six. Some officers, who were in this habitude, happened to call upon Turner, and were astonished when they heard he was gone to Coilmoutour to supper, in the absence of his secretary; but, far from harbouring

harbouring any suspicion of his flight, they concluded he was gone somewhere to a gaming party, knowing him to be fond of play. The night being fine, they resolved to discover his haunt; and, thinking to surprise him agreeably, they hastily repaired to Coilmoutour, where they arrived about midnight. Their suspicions began to awake, when they found every body in bed and fast asleep, except the guards; and, upon enquiry, were told that no officer had been there since sun-set.

"They every where questioned the guards concerning the commandant of the Topass Grenadiers, and were every where answered that he had been seen in the morning, but not since. Finding no satisfactory intelligence, and consulting together what was best to be done, they concluded, at last, to call upon the Commandant General, and impart to him their suspicions, who instantly dispatched messengers to all the posts that guarded the passes, to enquire if any officer of distinction had passed them in the night. One of these messengers brought word back, that two European officers had passed some hours before, seemingly in great haste. The officer next in command in Turner's corps had already been sent for, and he, with great zeal and animation, proposed instantly, with a party of 50 men, to go in pursuit of them. His offer was accepted, and he departed about day-break, and about eight in the evening the horses of the deserters were discovered grazing on the frontiers of Cochin, where their riders had stopped to repose, and where they thought themselves safe out of the reach of the pursuers, whom they expected to follow them. The house where they lay was immediately surrounded, and they were found fast asleep. Their persons were secured, and they were reconducted to Coilmoutour.

"Ayder, being informed of the escape of Turner and the Swedish officer, and of their recapture, gave orders to judge them as in similar cases in Europe. The consequence was, a court-martial was called, at which the two criminals were tried and convicted, one for carrying off the public money, the other for departing without leave; and sentence was accordingly pronounced against them: Turner to be hanged and gibbeted, the other to be imprisoned till the sovereign's pleasure should be known. The Court, in compassion to the youth of the Swedish officer, and because there was reason to believe he was seduced by the other, thought proper to intercede with the Nabob in his favour, who was pleased to remit his sentence for the present, and afterwards to pardon him. As to Turner, he was conducted to the place of execution, where he confessed himself a spy, employed by the Government of Madras, begged pardon of his sovereign for having so long abused his confidence, and made a full discovery of all that was plotting against him. He told him, what he could scarcely believe, that the English, by means of the Diva (or chief ministers), had determined Nizam Dowla, Suba of Decan, to carry the war into the Mayssour; that all his friends had in vain endeavoured to dissuade him from it, but that, having given himself up entirely to the suggestions of his Diva, he had bestowed the command of his army on Gen. Smith, who had brought a considerable body of Europeans and Seapoys from Madras, and was already in the field to oppose his [Ayder's] progress. On the receipt of this advice, Ayder determined to defer his expedition against Travancour, and to march to Seringapatnam, the capital of Mayssour, to be in readiness to meet his enemies. All that the criminal requested, in reward for this discovery, was, to have his sentence changed from being ignominiously hanged, to that of being permitted to die the death of a soldier. Life he did not expect; and his request was granted him.

"Ayder proceeded to the capital with all the parade of Eastern magnificence, under little or no apprehension from the war that was likely to take place with the Suba of the Decan; but when he came to receive a confirmation of what Turner had confessed, and besides that the Mahrattas were in motion, and that they had joined Mirza Ali Khan, Ayder's brother-in-law and cousin (a young prince whom he had brought up from his infancy, had trained him to the art of war, and had entrusted him with a powerful army, and with a special commission to make peace with the Mahrattas); when he received these advices, and that the army on which he depended for succour was turned against him, he could not conceal his disquietude; his projects of conquest were all at once blasted, and he had now only to provide for his own safety.

"In the situation he then stood, his country being laid open by the treason of Mirza, he could neither venture to meet the Mahrattas nor the combined armies of the Suba and English. He was therefore of necessity obliged to fortify himself in his present post, and wait the formidable attack of the confederated armies, or abandon Seringapatnam and the kingdom of Mayssour to his enemies.

"The genius of Ayder, fertile in resources, and formed to shine on great occasions, suggested to him one expedient, and, though a desperate one, he caused it to be carried into execution with a degree of celerity that is hardly to be credited in an European country. His whole cavalry was divided into little parties, and dispersed every where to burn and lay waste the country, and the inhabitants were ordered either to retire, with their provisions and effects, beyond the mountains, or bring them to Seringapatnam, where they should find protection. This order was rigidly put in execution, and for for 26 leagues round Seringapatnam, the finest and most beautiful country in the whole world was converted into a desert, where hardly a house was to be seen standing.

"In the mean time, while the cavalry were employed on this service, the utmost diligence was used, by the rest of the army, in completing the fortifications, which were rendered almost impregnable, both by art and nature.

"All these preparations were made with such secrecy and dispatch, that the enemy were totally ignorant of what was doing; and Gen. Smith and the Suba of Decan being apprized of the defection of Mirza, and his junction with the Mahrattas, announced it to Mirza, as the certain presage of the ruin of Ayder. . . . Whether (says our historian) the hopes of the English were rational or not, certain it is, that when they learned that the Mahrattas had declared war against Ayder, and that Mirza, his brother-in-law, had joined them, their expectations were unbounded, and they devoured, by anticipation, the treasures of Ayder. The Council of Madras, who till then had envied the brilliant fortune of the Calcutta Government in the enjoyment of an immense territorial revenue, flattered themselves in a short time to realize their chimerical hopes, and to equal them in splendor and importance. Their letters to the Court of Directors were filled with brilliant projects, that promised no less than the possession of all the coast from Cape Roma to Cape Comorin. The Court of Directors were thrown into a kind of delirium by their admiration of the profound policy of their servants; and every one being anxious to possess a large share of the Company's stock, it rose to 275 per cent. in the year

"A treatise of this kind was therefore much wanted (he adds), in our language in particular."—In the ensuing work he traces the rise and progress of this study; shews, in various instances, its utility to ancient history, geography, to natural history, to the illustration of ancient writers, to architecture, and to the knowledge of a connoisseur; its connection with the fine arts of poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture; and the various sources of delight and amusement that it affords. He then treats on the metals used in the fabrication of coins and medals; the different sizes and former value of ancient coins; the conservation of medals; the portraits to be found on them, of which different serieses may be arranged; their reverses; the symbols observable on them; and their legends: on medallions; the medals called contorniatæ; the Greek, Roman, and other ancient medals; modern coins and medals, and particularly those of Great Britain and Ireland; with 'Observations on the progress of the British Coinage, the rarity of some ancient and modern coins, counterfeit medals, and the arts of distinguishing them from the true, directions for forming cabinets, and the present prices of medals.—In the Appendix, the more common abbreviations occurring on Roman medals are explained; English coins since William the Conqueror are valued; the Scottish acts of parliament which relate to the coins of that kingdom are briefly noticed; and an account given of the rarity of Scottish coins, an estimate of the rarity of all the coins of Roman emperors, and their prices.

From this brief abstract the medalist, or collector, will see that this Essay contains multum in parvo, the pith or marrow of many folios, and will therefore deem it a necessary Vade-mecum, hitherto much wanted in our language. As immediately relating to our own times and country, and therefore peculiarly interesting to readers of every class, we shall select some of our author's "Observations on the British Coinage," to which we should rejoice to see due attention paid.

"The whole coinage of Queen Anne, and part of George 1, which is of Mr. Croker's, chief engraver at the Mint (to whom we are

* "It is a pity that the works of this great artist, with some account of him, are not are indebted for many excellent medals and pattern-pieces, which rank his name next to that of Simon), is entitled to praise. It afterwards continued, in a tolerable condition, till the commencement of the present reign, when it fell into the deplorable state in which we now view it. In the first gold coinage of this reign, the face was quite a model, destitute of all feature and character: and another portrait has been given since 1770, or a year or two before or after, with such gross faults as to make our coinage a matter of laughter. For the head, being most sweetly and languishingly screwed about to the left, so that a great part of it should appear, yet, to our astonishment, no head is to be seen; so that the malicious joke of Foote might jump into any one's mouth.—Instead of the due proportion of head and hair, we only perceive the face cut off from the head, and a few rude lines scratched where the junction must have been, evidently put there that ladies might not be shocked with the study of anatomy.

“Our gold coin can only be rivalled by our copper. The first halfpence present such a face as human creature never wore, jutting out something in the likeness of a macaw. The latter ones are improved a little; and in this our copper coin has a preference over our gold.”

“The state of coinage in any kingdom is commonly a barometer of its power, always of the state of its arts. Hence it is matter of national glory, that the coin be well executed; and the decline of the money is justly esteemed a sure symptom of the decline of the state. Some grey-haired medallists, from this circumstance, foretold the loss of America, and all the calamities which, during this reign, have hastened the decline of Britain.—Jesting apart, whatever may be the case with our glory, our coin may rank with that of the lowest times of the Roman empire.

“It is not therefore surprising to hear that a noble lord has projected a wonderful improvement upon our money, and has actually got pattern pieces struck upon this new plan. The intent of this project is, that all our coin shall be in caméo, not intaglio; cut hollow, not in relief. Were it to take effect, what would be the nummi bractati, or all the efforts of the politer Goths of antiquity, to our currency? May the noble lord appear upon one of the first hollow coins, in all his glory!

“But surely the whole plan of coinage is yet susceptible of real and most important not given to the public in the same way with those of Simon. Dyes of medals, &c. engraved by Croker, to the amount of 150, with several of the punchcons, are now in the possession of Mr. Martin, of King Street, Covent Garden.”

* “The pattern shilling of 1778 exceeds all our coinage. It is perfection itself—in the parbos of art.”

improvements. A far higher relief might be given to the impression, so as to rival the ancient in this grand criterion of good coin*; and this relief might with ease be protected by a circle of equal height around the rim of the piece. This circle would not only serve to preserve the coin, but might, in the whole coinage, bear a legend upon the edge; an operation so simple as to appear upon the tin halfpence, when they were in use. This circular legend, now used only upon the crown and half-crown, ought to adorn and protect every coin, from the five-guinea piece down to the farthing; for there cannot be so easy and so effectual a guard against forgery. The legends ought to be placed within the circle, and that on the edge might extend over the whole surface, so as nothing could be taken from the coin without appearance. The copper coinage of 1717, and gold coinage of 1728, are something in the general style of this proposed, but not of sufficient relief, and without the circular legends. Such as they are, however, these coinages ought to be recommended, as of the very best form which has ever yet appeared.

“As to the obverse, the decorating a modern prince with a crown of laurel, an ornament never now used, is truly childish; as is the Roman armour, and every circumstance not belonging to real life. Want of genius is the only plea an artist can offer for the stupid practice of following models at the expence of nature.

“On the reverse, the poor presentation of the arms of a country may be considered as a proof that Europe wants yet some centuries of eloping from barbarism. Of all possible reverses this must be allowed the most Gothic, and empty of all thought or design. Room for the highest elegance ought to be given upon the reverses of coin, and objects of delight and instruction delineated.

“The legends ought always to be in the language of the country where the coin is struck; for the money is made for it, and not for foreign nations; and every inhabitant ought to be enabled to read the legends of the coin which is made for him, and every day passes through his hands. It is surprising that, when the scripture was given in English, the coin was not likewise translated; but the night of ignorance drops at once; while it is with many a long and arduous struggle that even the dawn of science appears.

“Supposing, for the sake of a reverie, an alteration in the British coin upon these principles, the obverse might throughout, at present, contain the king's portrait, but without armour or laurel crown, till he wears them.

* “To give more relief to our coinage would take more time, and employ more artists; but what are a few hundred pounds to a nation when its perpetual glory is interested?”

them. Around would run the illustrious title, GEORGE III. KING OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND; the other titles, of which the initials cut so awkward a figure upon the reverse of our gold and silver, might be left out of the coin without inconvenience.

"But the reverses, if historical events are not allowed, in imitation of the Roman, should be varied, in every species, something in this way. The guinea might present a figure of Liberty, as the most precious of our possessions, and worthy of the analogy of gold; the legend might be, THE GUARDIAN OF BRITAIN. On the half-guinea, suppose an image of Fortitude, THE GUARDIAN OF LIBERTY. The crown-piece might bear Liberty, Agriculture, and Commerce, UNITED TO BLESS: the half-crown, the king, a peer, and a commoner, emblematic of our happy constitution, with the legend, UNITED TO PROTECT. The shilling might be charged with a ship of warconvoying a merchant vessel, WEALTH AND POWER: the six-pence with an oak in a storm, STRONGER FROM THE TEMPEST. The halfpenny may remain as it is, with regard to the impression, only doubling the size of the coin; the Britannia should hold a trident in her right hand, and let the other recline upon the helm of a ship, instead of holding both aloft, with impertinent articles in each, a posture very Gothic, and unknown to the ancients. What is the meaning of her long spear? What of her olive branch, with which she sits, like an old lady in a Gothic picture with a flower in her hand? The farthing, of the size of the present halfpenny, might present an husbandman sowing, with this legend, BY INDUSTRY SMALL THINGS GROW GREAT.

"But any effectual improvement in our may plausibly allege, that his intention was not to deceive, but to excite his utmost power by an attempt to rival the ancient masters.— But no possible apology can be made for forging the rude money of former modern times. The crime is certainly greater than that which leads the common coiner to the gallows, inasmuch as it is committed with more ease, and the profit is incomparably larger. The person above hinted at may therefore rest assured that, when his death shall have rendered the mention of his name safe and free from cruelty, not all his good qualities will prevent its being delivered to posterity with perpetual contempt and obloquy."

65. Lord Melcombe's Diary.

(Continued from p. 364.)

BEFORE we give farther extracts from this work, it may be proper to mention the stages through which, the editor says, it came into his possession.

"Lord Melcombe died in the year 1762, and bequeathed his whole property (a few legacies excepted) to his cousin, the late Thomas Wyndham, of Hammersmith.

"Mr. Thomas Wyndham, who died in the year 1777, left, among other kind remembrances, a clause in his will, in the following words: 'I give to Henry Penruddocke Wyndham all my books, and all the late Lord Melcombe's political papers, letters, and poems, requesting of him not to print or publish any of them but those that are proper to be made public, and such only as may, in some degree, do honour to his memory.'

"The latter part of this clause has, hitherto, made me hesitate on the propriety of making his Lordship's Diary public; for, although it may reflect a considerable degree of honour on his Lordship's abilities, yet, in my opinion, it shews his political conduct (however palliated by the ingenuity of his own pen) to have been wholly directed by the base motives of avarice, vanity, and selfishness.

"But it is now time to answer a very natural question, How could I, with such sentiments of the Diary, venture to publish it, consistent with the clause in the will?

"To what I have said before, that the Diary was written by Lord Melcombe, I shall add, that every part of it was carefully copied from rough draughts, and that scarcely a blot or correction is to be seen through the whole. The month also, and each day of the week, is accurately inscribed on the margin, in printing characters.

"From these circumstances I conclude, that Lord Melcombe wrote for the publick, and that he intended his Diary should, in a future season, be produced to light. It is also manifest that his Lordship meant it as an apology for his political conduct, and that he could not write it merely for amusement, or solely for his retrospection, or for the private perusal only of his heirs.

"But, notwithstanding, if I thought that any part of the Diary would tend to make one worthy character unhappy, or cause the smallest injury to the common good, I should, without hesitation, suppress it. Nay, I would instantly commit it to the flames, lest it might hereafter be productive of those consequences.

"If, on the contrary, by unveiling the mysterious intrigues of the Court, and by exposing the latent causes of opposition, the Diary teaches us that both one and the other may act from the same interested and corrupt principle*, it may then make us cautiously diffident of the motives of either; and the country gentlemen, in particular, may learn from it, that they have as much to dread from those who are in pursuit of power as from those who are in actual possession of it; from those who are hopefully working in the cold climate of disappointment, as from those who are luxuriously basking in the sunshine of enjoyment."

Mr. Dodington had been long attached to the late King and Sir Robert Walpole, to whom he wrote, we remember, some adulatory verses; and for his courtly accomplishments he was more than once lashed by our great satirist, under the name of Bubo, his family name being Bub. But afterwards (in the words of the Editor) he "quitted the service of George II. and preferred the protection of Frederick prince of Wales to that of his old master;" and, "after the death of the prince, he courted the Pelhams with the most abject and fawning servility, and at the same time in opposition to his great patroness the princess dowager."

We will now resume the extracts.

"May 27. I was with the princess, by her order. We had much conversation, both in the morning and evening, in which, I think, all was said that my memory could suggest to me upon the present state of affairs—the weakness, meanness, cowardice, and baseness of the Duke of Newcastle—to all which she echoed in the strongest terms—the impossibility of his standing without a new system—of this too, she declared, she was fully convinced; and that she was so persuaded of his falseness and low cunning, that, if she designed to go into the next room, she would not trust him with it, if she meant it should not be known. I laid before her the necessity of a new system, for that I found people would not bear the present:—that I believe no new one was formed, but that I saw there was such a disposition as must end in one, of some sort or another:—that what retarded it most was, that people were guessing at her, and were tender of pushing any thing that she might be disoblged by, and resent another day:—that I myself had entered into no engagements with any body, and was not fond of doing it, but that I was upon such a foot with the most efficient, that they would scarcely come to any fixed plan without acquainting me with it:—that I thought it absolutely necessary to attempt a settlement, not only for the present, but which might, with small alterations, last, when a certain event took place; for it would be a melancholy thing if, under a young king, and the pressure of a war, when efficiency and immediate action was required, instead of consulting what was to be done, we must be struggling who should do it:—that, therefore, it was to be wished, that some system, so mixed as not to be disagreeable to her, should be conveyed to the Duke of Newcastle, with intimation that, if he would embrace it, he might not only be supported now, but find protection another day; if he refused it, he must be left to his enemies, and expect no support either now or then:—that my meaning was, to lead the king into it, without his knowing it, and make him consent under the idea of making his own affairs easy, and that he should not know from whence it arose, or the extent of it:—that I wished to avoid all disturbances; and it was that, and that alone, which made me think of any thing that was to continue such a creature as the Duke of Newcastle at the head of affairs, even for an hour, either now or then. She signified her entire approbation of all I had said by several short interruptions; and then said that she was, and long had been, much affected with the melancholy prospect of her own and her son's affairs:—that such a settlement as I mentioned was doubtless much to be desired; but how was it to be obtained? There were a hundred good reasons that tied her hands from interfering with the King; those of her children were obvious enough; and if she was to stir, it would make things worse; she saw no way to extricate herself. I replied, that the case was extremely delicate; that whenever I thought of it, I laid it down, that something must be done, and yet that she must neither be seen nor heard in it:—that, upon so delicate a foundation, such a sort of confidence was required to act that was above my capacity, and such a one that I did not aspire to:—that I thought men were wanting:—that, I was satisfied, the nation had still great resources, and that even parts were not wanting, but character and experience in business was:—that the Duke of Newcastle had the ball at his foot, when his brother died, and he might have made

* "Tout pour la Trippie" is Mr. Wyndham's emphatic motto.

made a lasting and advantageous settlement for himself and the country, but he had not endeavoured to oblige one efficient man, besides his known enemies:—that there was no violence, no oppression, no particular complaint, and yet the nation was sinking by degrees, and there was a general indisposition, proceeding from the weakness and worthlessness of the minister, who would embrace every thing, and was fit for nothing. She answered, that she was glad to hear me say that the nation had still great resources—for people told her it was undone—but she did not think so; yet, if there were both resources and parts too, and they could not both be exerted, what would they avail? She saw, and much lamented the consuming state of the nation, which I mentioned: it was of infinite consequence how a young reign began, and it made her very uneasy. She was highly sensible how necessary it was that the Prince should keep company with men: she well knew that women could not inform him; but if it was in her power absolutely, to whom could she address him? What company could she wish him to keep? What friendships desire he should contract? Such was the universal profligacy, such the character and conduct of the young people of distinction, that she was really afraid to have them near her children. She should even be in more pain for her daughters than for her sons, if they were private persons; for the behaviour of the women was indecent, low, and much against their own interest, by making themselves so very cheap. This and much more (with no very high opinion of the King) took up above two hours. About six, after drinking coffee with Lady Charlotte Edwin, we were sent for, to walk. The ceremony of the day seemed to be, to leave the Princess to me, for the young princesses and the company always kept before or behind us. Having made the tour of the ground, and being shewn the improvements, she proposed going into the King's gardens; there she again renewed the same subjects. We talked of several private characters; the general indisposition; the danger of the war; and then of the inability of the Duke of Newcastle; her dislike and contempt, of him; the impossibility of his standing, as he was now circumstanced. Something should be thought of, and soon—the summer was the time; the winter was not so proper for concerting measures. I replied that, indeed, in summer, people's steps were not so much observed, and particularly in this summer, as the King was abroad. She again expressed her astonishment at the Duke of Newcastle's conduct, and said she could not conceive who were, really and truly, the persons whose advice he chiefly depended upon. I replied, I had never heard of any body, but those whom public fame had made notorious, who were Mess. Murray and Stone. She said, if it was so, they were very bad politicians, unless it was true that they were at bottom the Jacobites they were so strongly represented to be, and gave their advice to carry on the consuming system. I said, it was impossible; for their understanding, their actions, and, above all, their interest, made it so. She answered, that nobody but God could judge of the heart; and that, for her part, she did not give any credit to those reports. She spoke in favour of Murray's abilities, but nothing, one way or the other, of Stone. She mentioned two things, which were remarkable from the inferences: the first, talking of what the Duke of Newcastle ought to do; but then, says she, he will say, the party will not come into it; the party this; and the party that; but I could never understand what the party was. I have endeavoured to learn, and I could never find, that the party was any thing else but the Duke of Devonshire and his son, and old Horace Walpole. The Duke of Devonshire was the cause of the Duke of Cumberland's being in the regency this time; and he insisted upon his being left sole regent at a meeting where were the Duke of Newcastle, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Grafton, Lord Waldegrave, and old Horace Walpole. The second was, on my commending the Prince's figure, and saying he was much taller than the King; she replied, yes, he was taller than his uncle. I said, in height it might be so; but if they measured round, the Duke had the advantage of him. She answered, it was true; but she hoped it was the only advantage he ever would have of him."

66. BIBLIOTHECA TOPOGRAPHICA BRITANNICA. N^o XXII. Containing Mr. Essex's Observations on Croyland Abbey and Bridge; and other Additions to the History of that Abbey. 4^{to}. (See vol. LIII. p. 772.)

MR. ESSEX describes the famous triangular bridge (which he supposes to have been built in the beginning of Edward the First's reign) scientifically, and compares it with one of the same kind, but much superior, built in France in 1752, between St. Omer's and Calais, and justly called the Pont sans pareil. He has also given a short extract from the history of the fabrick of the church from the time of Ethelbald, its founder, to the dissolution of the abbey by Henry VIII, and the final desolation of the church under the usurpation of Cromwell. And, by comparing this account with what remains of the building itself, he has not only formed some judgment of its extent, but has also traced very nearly the original form, in a plan and section annexed, affirming it to have been, "when reduced

“duced to its simple state, the finest specimen of the early Norman architecture in England.” He has also drawn, from the history of the abbey, a general plan of the situations of its principal apartments and offices; and recommends the taking like “plans of other great monasteries, where any considerable ruins remain, before they are quite destroyed,” particularly of the convent of Christ Church, and the monastery of St. Augustin, Canterbury, “there being considerable remains in both, of great antiquity, though intermixed with others of various ages.”

We have only to regret that Mr. Effex has not had the same opportunities of surveying and planning every monastic ruin in this kingdom.

67. Plays of Three Acts, written for a private Theatre. By William Hayley, Esq. 4to.

(Continued from p. 355.)

HAVING given a short extract from one of the comedies, we shall now lay before our readers the following affecting scene from the tragedy of Lord Ruffel, in the last interview of Lady Ruffel with her unhappy Lord.

Lady Ruffel. Dear Ruffel, I renounce illusive hope!

And now must teach my weakness to sustain
The heaviest load of misery that ever
Fell on the bleeding heart of helpless woman!
The king denies thee, what the basest felon
Asks not in vain, the respite of a day.
Could'st thou believe it? he and savage York
Are now, like blood-hounds, come to hunt thee hence,
And drive thee to thy death!—they but allow me

A few short minutes, in a last embrace
To clasp, to bless, and part with thee for ever!

Ruffel. Then may we part as we have liv'd, my Rachel,

In the pure dignity of perfect love,
Unstain'd by weakness!

L. Ruffel. Do not dread my tears;
They cannot fall to melt thy manly firmness,
For heaven has steel'd me for this awful hour.

Ruffel. Thou dear angelic spirit! 'tis from thee

That I have learnt the truest fortitude;
A courage built upon a heavenly basis.—
O gracious Being, who has guided us
Thro' fourteen years of pure domestic bliss,
The best and rarest of thy gifts to man;
Accept, as tribute for thy blessings past,
Our meek submission in this trying hour
Of thy more dreadful pleasure!—at thy call
I yield my guiltless life, nor would decline
To die for having struggled to preserve

Thy purest worship in my native land.
O that my blood might quench that fatal torch
Of barbarous Superstition, which begins
To shed once more its sanguinary glare
Over this frightened isle! Might Ruffel prove
The last to perish by oppressive power,
And the base sentence of perverted law!—
Fall not my blood on the misguided men
Whose fury sheds it!—As I truly pardon
My ruthless enemies, so, Heaven, mayst thou Take to the charge of thy heart-healing mercy

This my chief care, this dearest, last concern
Of my departing soul, this spotless woman!

L. Ruffel. Let not thy fears for me, my generous Ruffel!

Too fondly agitate thy feeling mind;
The gracious Power who blest us in each other,

Will not, I know, abandon utterly
An unoffending, weak, afflicted woman;
Dear to so pure a spirit, sanctified
By the kind prayers of an expiring martyr!

Ruffel. My love! I will not to thy care commend

Thy little orphans; for an angel's sight
Cannot in tender vigilance surpass
The anxious mother, who survives to shield
The infant pledges of our chaste affection!
No, let me press a charge upon thy memory,
Where I most fear thy failure, thy dear self:
Regard thy precious health, as the possession
That I enjoin thee to preserve and cherish.

L. Ruffel. Thou guide and guardian of thy Rachel's life!

Though the dark grave must hide thee from
my eyes,

Thy gentleness, thy love, thy truth, thy virtues,

Will still, like faithful and protecting spirits,
Be ever present to my thought, and give
My grief-dejected mind new power to rear
The little idols of my widow'd heart.

Ruffel. They will have all, that youth requires, in thee;

The gentle friend, the fond, yet firm director,
Whose steady kindness and rever'd perfection Makes discipline delight; their minds from thine

May copy all the virtues; chiefly too,
Of prime distinction, Truth and Fortitude,
The pillars of all human excellence!—
I bless thee now for many years of fondness;
But most for that sublimity of love
Which has disdain'd to make my fate more bitter

By abject, vain complaints, and weakening tears.

L. Ruffel. Refrain, I pray you, from this tender praise;

It will o'erthrow the firmness you commend,
And 'waken all the woman in my bosom.

Ruffel. Dear Rachel! as my boy approaches manhood,

Teach him to look upon his father's death
Rather as noble than unfortunate!

Tell him, that, dying by no just decree,

I deem'd

I deem'd it still a happiness that Heaven
Made me a native of this generous isle;
Which, though now darken'd by a transient cloud,
Is doom'd, I trust, to be the radiant throne
Of settled Liberty and steadfast Faith.
Early infuse into his youthful spirit,
As the sure ground-work of all manly virtue,
A sense of civil and religious freedom;
Give to his pliant mind true English temper;
Teach him to fear no being but his God,
And to love nothing earthly more than England.

Enter an Attendant.

Attend. My Lord, the officers!

Ruffel. They shall not wait.

L. Ruffel. Inhuman haste! — Do thou, great God! proportion

The patience of thy servants in distress
To the infernal malice of their foes!
Since thy unquestionable will permits
Such innocence to perish on the scaffold,
Send the most soothing of thy heavenly spirits
To wait unseen upon the dying martyr!
Take from this hideous form of violent death
His horrible attendants, Pain and Anguish!

Ruffel. O my kind love! that quick un-dreaded stroke,

So soon to sever this frail mortal frame,
Is but a feather's printless touch, compar'd
To this my deepest wound, which now I feel
In searing thus my faithful heart from thine!
Each moment that we linger but increases
Our mutual pangs; then take, in this embrace,

My latest benediction!

L. Ruffel. O, farewell!

Ruffel. Yet a last kiss! — and for our little ones

Bear thou to each this legacy of love!

Now we must part! Farewell!

L. Ruffel. Farewell for ever! [Exit.]

68. RUNNAMED. A Tragedy.

By the Rev. Mr. Logan. 8vo.

THIS tragedy has never appeared on the stage, though by no means unfit for it. — The principal subject, the grant of Magna Charta, must necessarily be highly interesting; but there are also other situations which are more peculiarly affecting, and more generally attractive. The play opens with the reconciliation, or rather coalition, of the Norman and Saxon Lords, who are addressed as “ — — — — high Lords of parliament,

“ Hereditary guardians of the kingdom.”

The price of this coalition is Elvina, the daughter of a Saxon, already betrothed to Elvine. He is at that time in the camp of the Dauphin, who is represented, perhaps with truth, as designing, under the appearance of an ally, to take advantage of the domestic feuds, and become the conqueror of England. Elvina writes to her lover, requesting him to return; and the Ambassador, by whom the letter is to be conveyed, addresses it to the Dauphin.

The letter is intercepted, and Elvina condemned to die as a traitress. Hence the principal business and distress of the scene. It is only necessary to add, that she is rescued by Elvine, who assumes the character of her champion, and kills his rival.

The following scene may serve as a specimen.

Edgar, Elvina, Emma.

Edgar. Unhappy maid! she comes from death. She looks

As she indeed were risen from the grave
A saint in glory! let me kneel before her.

Most noble Lady! graciously permit
An old domestic of your father's house
To kiss your garment, at your feet to fall
With flowing tears. I hope your goodness still Remembers me.

Elvina. I've not forgot you, Edgar;
Nor will I e'er forget you. Rise, my friend.

Edgar. Lovely and gentle! you ~~was~~ [were] ever thus.

Your face still shone upon your father's house,
The face of a good angel. O what men,
What murderers could doom that beauteous form

To such a death! —

Elvina. I have forgiven them, Edgar.

Edgar. But Heaven will not forgive them —

Elvina. Where is Elvine?

Where has my father with the barons gone?
Thy colour changes. Ah! my heart forebodes
The fear'd event. Is this the appointed hour
For mortal combat? —

Edgar. 'Tis indeed the time.

Elvina. [Trumpets heard] The trumpets sound. The dreadful signal's given.
Now life or death. Help, help me, powers of Heaven!

Support me, Emma! —

Emma. Angels hover o'er him,
And guard the hero with the shield of heaven!

Elvina. Run, Edgar, to the lists, and bring us tidings.

Fain would I look — I dare not look that way.
Hush! hark! O Emma! didst thou hear a groan?

Emma. 'Tis midnight silence!

Elvina. Let me look again.

Yonder they meet. Behold the flash of arms!
And lo the sword that shall be dyed in blood!
Whose blood? O heavens! turn, Emma, to the field;

I'll look no more.

Emma. Heavens! how I tremble! ha!
A mortal stroke! there rose the shriek of death!

Elvina.

Elvina. Now all is over, and my fate is fix'd.

I'm destin'd now to rapture or despair,
For ever and for ever! [A loud shout heard.]

O my heart!

The army triumphs in their General's joy.
My hero's fallen. I'm gone again.

My God! twice in one day!—

Edmund. I hear the sound
Of feet approaching fast.

Elvina. Let us begone. [As they go out.]

Enter Elvina.

Elvina. Where is my love? my life?

Where dost thou fly,

Thou first of women? fairer to my sight
Than e'er thou wast, and dearer to my soul!
Return and bless my arms, that stretch to strain thee—

Elvina. Alive! O God!—

Elvina. Thou hast no foe. Thy cause,
The cause of beauty, innocence, and love,
Has made thy knight victorious in the field.

Elvina. How shall I thank the favour of my life?—

'Tis thus! 'tis thus! my Elvina!—

[Running from the side scene into his arms.]

Elvina. My Elvina!

At last we meet in joy.

Elvina. To part no more.

Oh, Elvina! but for thee, my love, for thee,
Alas! this day—O how shall I repay Thy matchless truth, thy tenderness, thy love!

Elvina. In this embrace 'tis more than all repaid.

The following speech of the father of Elvina is a faithful picture of the human heart; and, though the determination be Roman, it by no means partakes of the stoical apathy, which was the pride of that stern nation.

Albemarle. [On the front.] Am I the judge? my country, at thy voice,

This old grey head shall wear the helm again.
Bare in the field these scars shall bleed anew.
O powerful Nature! I'm a father still—Thou bleeding innocence! ah! should the sword

Just aim to touch that tender trembling bosom,

'Tis mine to ward the blow.—Shall I direct
The dagger to the bosom of my child,
And stop the dearest current of my blood?

But justice, truth, imperious honour, call...
Forgive me, O my country, if I stain
A Roman's virtue with unmanly drops!

'Tis done. The irrevocable doom is seal'd.

Where am I? ha! the shades of death surround me,

And graves, and monuments, and ghastly forms—

That path leads down to blood—Thou fainted shade,

Who gav'st a blooming cherub to my arms,
O turn thy tender eyes from this sad scene,

Nor look upon the deed!—ah! piteous sight!
Stretch'd on the block the trembling victim's laid;

The pale hand waves that should have clos'd
my eyes.

That was the sign of death!—What do I see!
A headless trunk; a mangled corpse—oh! oh!

Barons, the dreadful sacrifice is made:

But spare me! spare a father the sad sight!

—Yet ah! before I go let me behold her,

To take a long, last look of my Elvina,

Before she dies—before we part for ever!

—I hear her step. The trembler comes.

She looks

As she were innocent. Her face is woeful;
Yet it is lovely; I could look for ever.

My daughter—thou art doom'd—these tears will tell thee—

My child! my child!—

[Looking earnestly upon her as he goes out.]

69. *A concise History of Knighthood. Containing the Religious and Military Orders which have been instituted in Europe. With Descriptions of their Mantles, Caps, Collars, Stars, Ribbons, and Mottoes. Also Accounts of the Installations of the Garter, Bath, Tibstle, and St. Patrick; and correct Lists of the Knights of each. To which is added, the ancient Ceremonies used at Duels, Combats, Jousts, and Tournaments. The Whole embellished with 82 Copper-plates, accurately drawn and neatly engraved. Being the completest Collection ever published in Great Britain.
In Two Volumes. Collected from the best and most approved Prints and Manuscripts. With a correct Index to the Whole. By Hugh Clark, Heraldic Engraver. 8vo.*

THIS work is the production of an ingenious engraver, who, having met with great success in two former attempts to introduce a more general knowledge of the heraldic science, by “The short and easy introduction to “Heraldry,” and “The Pocket Peer“age of England, Scotland, and Ire“land,” is now induced to offer to the publick a third, on the different Orders of Knighthood, extracted from manuscripts and printed books of the best authority.

“This work,” to use the author's own words, “contains, beside articles of entertainment to the historian, much information to all lovers of antiquities; many ancient monuments may from hence be explained (if the person was of any old or extinct Order of Knighthood), by comparing the ornaments with the engraved plates of collars and badges. It may likewise afford assistance to the connoisseur, in ascertaining the persons represented in old portraits or historical pieces, when decorated with any of the above badges.—This collection will be a great advantage to many artists, viz. historical, portrait,

AR

and heraldic painters, statuary, medals, engravers, chasers, enamellers, jewellers, embroiderers, &c. who have frequent occasion to refer to works on this subject for collars, stars, badges, and mottoes, which are here collected and accurately represented, being the most extensive collection of the Orders of Knighthood ever engraved or published in Great Britain."

We have selected, in one of our plates for the present month, the very beautiful star and collar of St. Patrick, as a specimen of the execution of the work, which we recommend to the attention of the curious.

70. Mr. Coxe's Travels through Poland, Russia, &c. (Continued from p. 452.)

WE have already conducted our agreeable traveller to the gardens of Prince Poniatowski, the King of Poland's brother.

"We were scarcely assembled in this delightful spot," says Mr. Coxe, "when the king made his appearance. We rose up to meet him; the usual compliments being passed, we attended his majesty about the grounds, and then returned to the grotto, round which we ranged ourselves, upon a bank covered with moss. The moon was now risen, and added greatly to the beauty of the scene. I happened to be seated next to the king (for all form and ceremony were banished), who talked with me as usual, in English, on the arts and sciences, literature and history. In the course of this conversation I ventured to ask, whether there was any good poetry in the Polish language. His majesty told me, 'We have some lighter pieces of poetry, by no means contemptible, and an indifferent epic poem; but the work of chief poetical excellence in our tongue is a fine translation of the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, far superior to any translations of that admirable poem in other languages: some Italians of taste and judgment have esteemed it not much inferior to the original performance.'—I then took the liberty of enquiring about the historical productions of Poland; when the king informed me, that they had no good history of their country in Polish, which he looked upon as a national reflection, though he flattered himself it would soon be removed, as a person of genius and erudition, admirably calculated for the undertaking, was now employed in that work. Upon expressing my surprize at a circumstance almost peculiar to Poland, that they had no history in their native tongue, his majesty condescended to acquaint me, that they had several excellent historians, all of whom, however, had written in Latin. 'The knowledge of this language,' his majesty remarked, 'is very general among the Poles'; the earliest laws are all drawn up in Latin, until the reign of Sigismund Augustus, when they began to be composed in the vernacular language; the older Polish Constitutions are all in Latin; those of Ladislaus IV. being the first that appeared in Polish.' This conversation, in which I was at a loss whether to admire most the knowledge or condescension of the king, was interrupted by the prince, who proposed a turn in the garden before supper. His highness led the way, and the company followed. We passed through a subterraneous passage, long and winding, with here and there a single lamp, which shed a glimmering light. We came at length to a wooden door, which seemed the entrance into some hovel. It opened, and we found ourselves, to our great astonishment, in a superb saloon, illuminated with innumerable lamps. It was a rotunda, with an elegant dome, of the most beautiful symmetry: in the circumference were four open recesses, between pillars of artificial marble†: in the recesses were sofas, with paintings in fresco, representing the triumphs of Bacchus, Silenus, Love, and the victory of the Empress of Russia over the Turks. As we were all admiring the beauty and elegance of the rotunda, our ears were on a sudden regaled with a concert of exquisite music from an invisible band. While we were listening to this agreeable performance, and conjecturing from what quarter it came, a magnificent table was suddenly spread in the midst of the saloon, with such expedition as to resemble the effects of enchantment. We immediately sat down to supper, with the king, the prince, and a chosen company. Our spirits were elevated by the beauty of the saloon, by the hospitality of the prince, and by the affability of the king, who, so far from being a constraint to the society, greatly enlivened it by his vivacity, and seemed the soul of the party. I never passed a more agreeable evening. The conversation was animated and rational; while the social ease and freedom, which diffused itself through every part of the company, realized this beautiful convivial picture:

GRANT. M.A. July, 1784.

'La Liberté convive aimable

'Met les deux coudes sur la table ‡.'

Even without the lustre of a crown, which is

* "I had several opportunities of remarking the prevalence of the Latin tongue in Poland. When I visited the prisons, I conversed in that language with a common soldier, who stood guard at the entrance. He spoke it with great fluency."

† "These pillars are of the same composition and colour with those of the Pantheon in Oxford Street."

‡ "Voltaire."

apt

apt to dazzle our judgements, the king of Poland could not fail of being esteemed one of the most agreeable and polite gentlemen in Europe. He has a surprising fund of interesting conversation; and I never yet had the honour of access to his company without being both informed and delighted. His majesty did not retire until one o'clock, when the company separated, and we returned to Warsaw, highly pleased with our evening's entertainment."

Mr. Coxe next speaks, in the highest terms, of the hospitality and politeness of the Polish nobility; "of which," he says, "we every day experienced the agreeable effects; but by none were so elegantly regaled as by the princess Zatoriska." This delightful entertainment continued till past two in the morning.

"We seemed," adds Mr. Coxe, "as if we could stay for ever; but, as there must be an end of all sublunary joys, we took our leave, expressing our thanks and gratitude in language far unequal to our feelings. I can scarce form to myself a fête champêtre so elegant; and I am satisfied that it will seldom fall to the lot of the same person to partake of such a pleasing entertainment twice in his life.

"The day before our departure from this town [Warsaw] we dined with the bishop of Płotsko, the king's brother, at his palace of Jabloniska, about eight miles from hence.—In the evening we accompanied prince Stanislaus to his majesty's villa, secure of passing an interesting evening; but it was now embittered with the idea that it would never again be repeated, and that this was the last time of our being admitted to the company of so amiable a monarch. In the following conversation I had an additional proof of his humanity and condescension: 'You have been to the prisons, and I am afraid you found them in a wretched condition.' To have mentioned all their abuses, when I knew that his majesty could not alter them, would only have been an insult. I endeavoured therefore to palliate my answer, by remarking, what is but too true, that, in several instances, they were not so badly regulated as in England. 'I am surprised,' returned the king, 'that a nation, who so justly piques itself for its humanity, should be deficient in so essential an article of police.' I then ventured, with as much delicacy as possible, to point out one material abuse in the prisons of Warsaw, which I thought might probably be in his majesty's power to alleviate at least, if not to remedy. The circumstance which I alluded to was, that there is no separate room for the accommodation of sick prisoners; at the same time I begged pardon for this instance of presumption, which nothing but my compassion for the unfortunate could have extorted from me. 'He who pleads the cause of the unhappy,' replied his majesty, 'is always listened to with pleasure; an expression I shall never forget, and which convinced me, by the pathetic manner in which it was uttered, that it was the real sentiments of his heart. The turn of the conversation led the king to enlarge upon the code of laws preparing for the inspection of the approaching diet; when his majesty expatiated, with peculiar satisfaction, upon several beneficial regulations calculated to promote the impartial administration of justice. 'Happy Englishmen!' exclaimed the king, 'your house is raised, and mine is yet to build.' Every part of this conference impressed me with the highest opinion of the king's benevolence, patriotism, and legislative abilities. After supper, which passed off no less agreeably than the preceding entertainments, we were presented to take leave, when the king condescended to enquire of us the route we intended to take, and to point out what was most likely to occur worthy of observation. 'Your majesty,' I ventured to observe, 'has omitted the manufactures which you have established at Grodno.' 'An Englishman,' replied the king, 'after having seen the manufactures of his own country, will find little deserving his curiosity in any other, and particularly in this kingdom, where there is such a settled aversion to commerce. The establishment at Grodno is but a beginning. I consider it only as a pledge of my future intentions.' I then mentioned the new regulations in the university of Vilna, and the foundation of a physic-garden at Grodno. 'You are deceived by the similarity of names. An English university is as much superior to foreign seminaries as your nation excels all others in the cultivation of literature, and the encouragement given to genius and abilities. The academy at Vilna is more the image of what it was, and of what it ought to be, than an object of a traveller's curiosity.' He then graciously expressed his regret at our departing so soon from Warsaw, and, wishing us a good journey, retired."

We will venture to pronounce, that our intelligent traveller will not be thought too minute in relating these interesting circumstances.

"The familiar incidents of domestic life," as he judiciously observes, "place the character of a sovereign in a truer point of view than the more splendid occurrences of public grandeur, where the real disposition is often disguised by form, or sacrificed to policy."

In a future number, we shall introduce Mr. Coxe to other honours by accompanying him in his visits to other sovereigns.

71. A Letter from Lieut. Gen. Sir Henry Clinton, K. B. to the Commissioners of Public Accounts, relative to some Observations in their Second Report, which may be judged to imply Censure on the late Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Army in North America. 8vo.

TO exculpate himself from a censure conveyed in this report, after having in vain solicited to be examined before the Commissioners on oath, in regard to the extraordinary expences of the army late under his command, Sir Henry Clinton here lays his letter to them before the publick; and, after complaining of their opinion being seemingly given on ex parte evidence, endeavours to account for "the expences increasing, though the number of the forces decreased every year from 1778" (as alleged in the Report), and to shew, by original documents, that the order relative to the commissary-general's department, and the appointment of commissaries of captures, originated not with Earl Cornwallis (as they suppose) but with him. If these gentlemen have been mistaken, and are convinced by what is here alleged, their candour and impartiality will, we doubt not, induce them to retract their opinion, Tros, Rotasus suat.

72. Interesting Historical Events relative to the Province of Bengal and the Empire of Indostan. By J. Z. Holwell, Esq.

THOUGH this book has been published several years, and in our 35th and 36th volumes the reader will find an interesting account of it, yet, on a casual perusal, we cannot forbear laying before the publick the following short remark:

"Notwithstanding," says this writer, "the plausible face of success our officers in Bengal may wear at present, it is as demonstrable as any problem in Euclid, that they cannot produce the great and essential end aimed at, viz. a lasting peace and settled government, without which the Company must sink under the pressure of a long expensive war, which not only swallows up their newly-acquired revenues, but impedes and shackles their trade in every instance, shape, and form. In the prosecution of war, the heads of their servants abroad are turned and bewildered, and their mercantile business, which only can supply the Company in the end, must suffer unavoidable neglects and abuses. The gentlemen at home, in the direction of affairs, must labour under heavy embarrassments in conducting the two branches of war and trade, either of which would fully employ their whole time and attention."

"A trading and a fighting Company is a two-headed monster in nature, that cannot exist long, as the expence and inexperience of the latter must exceed, confound, and destroy every profit or advantage gained by the former. Now, temporary victories stimulate and push us on to grasp at new acquisitions of territory; these call for a large increase of military force to defend them; and thus we shall go on grasping and expending until we cram our hands so full that they become vamp'd and numb'd, and we shall be obliged to quit and relinquish even that part which we might have held fast, if bounds had been set to our progress, which, upon the present system, we see now utterly impossible; therefore a total change in our politics becomes indispensably necessary."

Such was the prediction of an intelligent observer 18 years ago, by whose advice, had it been attended to in proper time, the Company's territorial acquisitions, instead of embarrassing the hands of Government, might have been so managed as, before now, to have nearly discharged the national debt.—Mr. Holwell computed the revenues of the two provinces of Bengal and Orissa only at £. 13,000,000 sterling annually.

73. The Royal Rake, or, The Cabinet of Wit and Humour. 8vo.

THE very trite name of Florizel is here made subservient to the publication of such gross ribaldry as would disgrace even a Joe Miller.

THEATRICAL REGISTER.

HAY-MARKET.

- July 1. Spanish Barber—Son-in-Law.
2. The Fox—Agreeable Surprise.
3. Young Quaker—Ditto.
5. Spanish Barber—Ditto.
6. Fatal Curiosity—A Mogul Tale.
7. Love in a Village—Ditto.
8. Two to One—The Citizen.
9. English Merchant—A Mogul Tale.
10. Two to One—Who's the Dupe?
12. Tancred and Sigismunda—The Guardian
13. Spanish Barber—A Mogul Tale.
14. Tancred and Sigismunda—The Guardian
15. Two to One—Son-in-Law.
16. Young Quaker—A Mogul Tale.
17. Two to One—Son-in-Law.
19. Tancred and Sigismunda—Genius of Nonsense.
20. Chapt. of Accidents—A Mogul Tale.
21. Two to One—Ditto.
22. Spanish Barber—Son-in-Law.
23. Two to One—A Mogul Tale.
24. Tancred and Sigismunda—Midas.
26. Two to One—Midas.
27. Young Quaker—Flitch of Bacon.
28. Manag. in Distress—Span. Barb.—Comus
29. The Fox—Son-in-Law.
30. Summer Amusement—Genius of Nonsense.

To Miss HELEN MARIA WILLIAMS:

On her Poem of PERU*.

ACCEPT, fair Helen, from a grateful heart,

The willing praise which sympathy bestows;
And let my feeble pen those thanks impart,
With which delighted fancy warmly glows.

While others waste their smiling youthful hours

In dissipation's light fantastic maze,
You in a bright display of mental powers
Burst on our reason, and command our praise.

Your polish'd verse with ev'ry beauty shines
Which just design and harmony can give;

While brilliant fancy decorates your lines,
And in your sentiment doth feeling live.

A country ravag'd yields a theme of woe
For all that can affect the human soul,
Where each fond tie must force the tear to flow,
And griefs to rise, which cannot bear controul.

Your hoary fires our veneration claim;
Your youthful heroes with their ardor charm;

Your nymphs on virtue build a lasting name;
Your matrons with the tenderest feelings warm!

When soft description at your call draws nigh,

For love you can command what dress you please;

While ardent hope, and ev'ry trembling sigh,

Aided by you, full on our passions seize.

And when Alzira mourns a father slain,
Or frantic gazes on a slaughter'd lord,
With her we feel each agonising pain,
With her we snatch the ready-reeking sword.

Or when the priest before the altar falls,
And pity in a child's despair would plead;
How loud the impious deed for vengeance calls,
And Ziba's misery makes our bosom's bleed!

But as a mother when thy Cora mourns,
When on her breast the languid babe reclines,

What various passions seize the heart by turns!

What tender sympathy the soul refines!

You, who so well sharp misery can paint;
You, who so sweetly can the passions lead;
May all your hours be kept from keen complaint,

And from love's griefs your gentle breast be freed!

But should misfortune, that intrusive guest,
E'er cloud so fair, so bright a morning sun;

Should you with sad affliction be oppress'd,
Ere yet you finish life, so well begun;

May some Las Casas, child of heaven, be near,

To sooth with piety thy soul refin'd;
To blend with thine the sympathetic tear,
And pour soft consolation o'er thy mind!

Woolwich, June 25.

ELIZA.

SONNET to a FRIEND.

By T. WARWICK, LL.B.

FILL high the glass, nor lose in vain debate

(Alike to us whatever party sway)

The few, the fleeting hours, assign'd by fate
To love and wine with social freedom gay:

Let Fox or Shelburne rule their little day;
Not ours, thank heaven! to mend a crazy state,

Doom'd, like ourselves, to perish soon or late,

But when, dear Charles, let older statesmen say.

Thee sprightly Chloe's artless smiles provoke,
Whole from the spur, unconscious of the yoke,

And skittish still to every touch but thine.
Me three long months in silken bonds ensnare

The starry tresses of Emilia's hair,
And snowy limbs of symmetry divine.

AN HORATIAN EPISTLE:

Being an Answer from one Friend to another, who desired him to recommend a worthy Clergyman as Successor to a vacant Benefice. From the Praxis.

Imitated from Vol. LIII. p. 784.

OFT have you, Lælius, importun'd your friend,

A worthy parish-priest to recommend:

One now I trust to your peculiar care;

A man of sense and piety sincere:

One whom you'll find most worthy your regard:

'Tis yours, my friend, his merit to reward:
His manner pleasing, and his taste refin'd,
His heart for friendship form'd, for converse sweet his mind;

The powers of eloquence he well displays,
Whene'er he speaks in his Creator's praise:

A man so good can scarcely fail to please;

In him politeness joins with artless ease.

When circling years the festal day bring round,

When nought but mirth and jollity is found,
On such occasions he his soul unbends,

And by his sweet complacence charms his friends.

* The OTHER valuable Poem to Miss W. is unluckily mislaid. May we beg another copy?

* Nondum subacta, &c.

HOR.

In disputation quick,—to him 'tis one
Which side th' opponent takes, or pro or con.
Oft have I seen him at a Christening fir,
And charm the listening rustics with his wit;
Oft have I seen him take a sober glass,
Oft in a bumper toast some favourite lass;
No blab, when mellow; wine can never wrest
"A secret, once intrusted, from his breast:"
Besides, well knowing in th' historic page,
He tells what happen'd in each former age;
How many various climes he travell'd thro',
And that he kiss'd his Holiness's toe.
A wife he has most exquisitely fair,
And three sweet girls, the objects of their care;
Another yet unborn, and, what is worse,
My friend is not o'erloaded in the purse:
'Tis true three churches are his constant care;
And what his pay?—scarce forty pounds a year:

His worth entitles him to fill a stall,
But your fat rectory contents them all.
I've said enough; not one word more I send:
Live, and be happy, and esteem my friend.
Herne, Kent, June 24, 1784. T. W.

MR. URBAN,
THE following lines relate to a circumstance which happened at the Pantheon during the concert in memory of Handel:
they have been handed about at Bath and the Hot-well with some approbation. If you think proper to rescue them from oblivion, by inserting them in your Magazine, they are at your service. Z.

ETERNAL prater! R—TH—Y, say,
What demon hurried thee away,
(Foe to thy peace and quiet)
Ambitious to enroll thy name,
To add a wreath to Handel's fame,
And join th' harmonic riot?

Whilst ev'ry ear in rapture hung
On Handel's notes, on Mara's tongue,
Melodious, soft, and swelling;
Whilst ev'ry eye was charm'd to view
Bevies of beauties, didst thou sp—w,
To d—n our sense of smelling.

Methinks I see Duncannon fair;
And, beauteous Devon! thou wast there;
And Derby—how they titter!
—Otto of roses for her grace—
A filthy Levite from Duke's-place
Has made this horrid litter.

In wonder fix'd, Sir William * swore,
When first he heard thy stomach roar,
And saw the filth come from it,
'Twas like the lava that ran down
When old Vesuvius from his crown
Discharg'd a fiery vomit.

Hadst thou no sense of shame or fear?
Why was not Master Shepen there?
He might have sav'd thy credit;

* Sir W. Hamilton, who sat near him.

Cough'd, and cried hem—or held his hat,
Or lent his pocket, and all that,
Or swore 'twas he that did it.

Couldst thou not decently retire?—
Sit like a pig in thy own mire,
In spite of all decorum;
When Majesty itself was nigh,
And lords and ladies hurried by
With handkerchiefs before 'em.

Why thrust that Israelitish face
Betwixt his lordship and her grace?
Why counteract thy nature?
Form'd of a coarser kind of clay,
Thy very looks thy soul display,
A Jew in ev'ry feature.

By the Pantheon's gods I swear,
Had I my will, aloft in air
From blanket thou shouldst caper.
But what I can, I will,—thy name
Shall, by the Muse held up to fame,
Be gibbeted on paper. Z.

MR. URBAN, Harborough, July.
THE following little poem is the production of a poor weaver, who wrote it twelve or fourteen years ago. About three months since, I was accidentally at the place where he then lived (a few miles from hence), and it was put into my hands by a neighbour, who assured me the author never had had a school education, or received any advantages for improvement, but what he himself had acquired from his own natural genius, and an intense application to reading, study, &c.
Yours, &c. H. Y. CHARBONNIER.

A SUMMER'S DAY.

WHEN fair Aurora, daughter of the dawn, [morn,
Draws back the curtain, and lets down the
The soaring lark attunes her warbling lyre, Whose thrilling accents wake the sleeping choir;
The feather'd tribes resume the tender spray,
And songs harmonious usher in the day:
While the blue vault repeats the cheerful strains, [plains.
And list'ning hills rehearse them o'er the Thus earth and skies with gen'ral joy abound, [sound;
While nature leaps, and echoes back the
Now golden Phoebus from his burning throne Darts forth his rays to warm the northern zone;
Now more intense the fervor of his rays;
Now, panting under the meridian blaze,
The bleating flocks traverse the fruitful mead,
And seek retirement in each cooling shade;
There rest supinely 'midst the blaze of day,
Or sportive gambols pass the time away.
Now groves and gardens glow with living scenes,
And nought of winter's barrenness remains;
Here

Here twining woodbines amorous branches spread,
And blushing roses fragrant odours shed:
There sumptuous pride in cloves and tulips glow,
Whose beautiful tints from nature's pencil flow.

O'er thirsty plains the cloudy cistern pours
Its liquid treasures in descending showers;
The verdant plains a pleasing prospect yield,
The waving corn adorns the fertile field;
The hills bring forth, the barren deserts
smile,

And yield a produce without human toil.
Now shouting rustics, in promiscuous throngs,
Shake the vast concave with their jovial songs,

With arduous toil collect the ripen'd store
Which bounteous heaven spontaneously does pour.

But see! with speed the radiant orb retires,
Abates his fervor, languid grow his fires;
The fiery couriers lash the yielding air,
And down the western steep the chariot bears:
Thus lovely Phœbus speeds his downward
flight,

And yields his empire to revolving night.
Now tepid breezes, and soft balmy gales,
Sport thro' the trees, and fan the blooming vales;

While dews distilling, like ambrosial showers,
With pearly drops refresh the drooping
flowers;

Now Philomela warbles thro' the grove,
And airs melodious undulated rove;
Officious zephyrs aid the languid song,
And echoing vales the pleasing sound prolong:

Now humid mists and noxious damps arise;
Now silence reigns, and clouds obscure the skies,

The sportive lambs their wanton gambols
cease,

And nature's hush'd in universal peace.
W. W.

V E R S E S

upon the BIRTH-DAY of LUCINDA, who was soon about to be married.

YE spirits unseen, that oft range round
the grove;

Ye Muses that erst tun'd Anacreon's lyre,
And whisper'd uncall'd the soft language of
love,

And fill'd his gay verse with the force of your fire;

Though for ever ye fly me, attend this blest morn,

And breathe but a wish for the health of my maid,

O smile on the day that Lucinda was born,
And do not, O do not! deny me your aid.

Sad affliction and sorrow I give to the gale,
They but folly the joys that enliven the soul:—

Bring the light voice of music, of mirth
bring the tale,
And 'wake the brisk demon that lurks in the bowl.

See, my fair, a fresh wreath from young Hy-men's hand,

As lasting as verdant, ye powers, may it prove,

Of mutual affection and virtue the band,
Nor care ever wither the flowrets of love!

May old time, in his annual course as he flies,
And ripens the beauties that bud in your face,

Touch the bloom of your cheek, and the glance of your eyes,

But to soften with smiles, or to deck them with grace!

May remembrance hereafter, with gratitude's
eye,

View a long list of years that for ever are past;

Nor your heart prompt a murmur, your breast heave a sigh,

At the mandate of fate, when it ushers the last!
JUVENIS.

O D E

*For the ANNIVERSARY DINNER of the QUINTUPLE ALLIANCE, June 17, 1784.
To F R E E D O M.*

OF every higher joy the queen,
Parent of firm resolve, and thought elate,
FREEDOM! by our undaunted fathers seen,
Their leader 'mid the storms of fate!
Deign thou to beam on this convivial hour
The milder radiance of thy social power!

Led by thee, fair Hope advances;
Distrust, and cares, and fears are fled!
In every eye thy splendor glances;
Elysium round thy band is spread!
Nor with the fleeting day thy transports die,
The never-fading banquet—heart-ennobling joy!

To crown with lighter mirth the board,
Or soothe with pleasure's languid lyre,
When on the soul thy rays are pour'd,
And every bosom beats with patriot fire:—
What were it but to bid the heavenly guest
To Circe's frantic cup, and dire unmanly feast!

Sweetest then the festive bowl,
When with thy breath the nectar glows:
Sweet is music to the soul,
When in the rapturous note thy spirit flows.
Thine, loveliest daughter of the sky!
Thine, sublimest harmony!
Thine the blest power the living chords to move

To sacred ardour and to social love!

Thine be the boast of EQUAL LAWS:

O now revive them by the PUBLIC VOICE!
Thine the fix'd, self-govern'd state!

Un-

Unscorch'd by fell corruption's wand,
Fearless of tyranny's gigantic hand!
Thine all that makes our blifs, and stamps a NATION great!

ON THE OPENING OF THE NEW ORGAN
IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL,
JULY 8, 1784*.

Majors canamus. VIZO.

A WAKE, awake, once more awake, my
lyre,
From earthly themes to heav'nly strains aspire!
For oh! what Muse would earthly themes rehearse,
When strains seraphic animate her verse?
In gilded pride behold yon organ rise,
And captivate at once our ears and eyes!
How nobly great, how graceful every part;
Where White† displays each charm of Gothic art,
And Green‡ has finished with a master's hand, What taste directed, and what Olive§ plann'd!
Olive, alike in grave and gay you shine,
Musician, painter, poet, and divine.
Hayes¶ now, in order due, demands my song;
To Hayes no vulgar meeds of Fame belong;
Phœbus' and Isis' fav'rite son, whose name Strains, like his own, celestial should proclaim.
My Muse in vain would celebrate his praise,
Too high he soars, and spurns her feeble lays.
What notes of melody divine I hear!
What powers of harmony enchant my ear?
Hark! how in pious hymns the tuneful choir
Sing loud Hosannas to th' Almighty Sire!
Hark! how again their full-voic'd anthems rise,
Joyful to man, and grateful to the skies!
But now they close;—ceas'd are those heav'nly strains,
And through the choir a death-like silence reigns;
While letter'd Horne§, Religion's son, displays
The powers of eloquence in musick's praise.
Rapt in attention see the list'ning throng,
Fix'd is each eye, and mute is every tongue.
What graceful action! what persuasive art!
He charms, he wins, he captivates each heart!
His heav'n-taught doctrine soothes each woe-worn soul,
In speechless rapture we admire the whole;
And well may all in his encomiums join,
Whose soul is musick, and whose strains divine!

T. W.

Horne, Kent, July 10, 1784.

* See p. 553.

† The carpenter.

‡ The organ-builder.

§ The draughtsman, vicar of Mocking in Essex.

¶ Professor of musick at Oxford.

 Dean of Canterbury.

ELEGIAC EPISTLE

ON THE DEATH OF A BROTHER AND SISTER.

PRIDE of my soul, and mistress of my care, [cheer,
Whose pity soothes, whose smiles so often Whose future joy my ardent hope shall prove,
Source of those hopes—acceptor of my love!
Blest be those tears that o'er this page shall flow; [to know
Thou knew their worth—this was thy boast
Absent from thee, these early woes I bear,
And make thee partner of a brother's tear?
Full-swoll'n with grief, as o'er the beach
I stray'd,
Resign'd to woe, for new afflictions pray'd;
Ev'n woe to thee had then, alas! been dear,
For, well thou know'st, thy woes I love to share!
Deep howl'd the winds, the forly billows roar,
The surge beat roughly on the desert shore;
The genial sun reluctantly declin'd,
For summer wain'd—the sea-birds mutual pin'd!
No grove luxuriant spread its foliage near,
No port indulgent to receive a tear;
Fond Echo, banish'd, gave not sigh for sigh,
Nor gentle flocks bleat forth their soft reply;
Full on the mind th' intemperate ocean roll'd
Its tide tremendous, and the heart controll'd:
Lost to the scene, and lost to earthly joy,
Night grow apace, my sighs these thoughts ploy.
“Furl ye full sails, you steersman stay thy course, [born force;
Hush ye rude winds, break waves your stub-
Bear my deep sorrow, and forgive my woe,
For brothers' tears involuntary flow;
The loss I mourn befits a nightly tale,
The stars give ear, yon listening moon grows pale!
Lost by affliction's poisonous draught they fell!
Two lovely orphans live their loss to tell;
As yet untaught their fondest friends to know, [flow!
Their little hearts with general love o'er-
Their parents' virtues be their portion here;
So rich a portion may they joy to share!
Th' unpassion'd glow of ever-generous youth,
The sigh of pity, and the charm of truth,
The heart ingenuous, and affection's zeal,
The social bliss that friendship knows to feel;
Warm from his heart impulsive ardor flew,
In freedom's danger when hot foes pursue;
Keen indignation burst in accents warm,
When venom'd slavery rais'd her glosing
form!
Fond to recount, till dawn I scarce should
cease,
Yet thus the tale his merits would decrease:
Still mark a few faint traits I fondly drew,
When first my sister's gentle heart I knew;
A form all beauteous as the vernal rose,
A pitying heart that sighs for alien woes;
Whose

Whose kindly animated heart displays
Of tender sympathy the heart-felt rays;
All graceful, gay, enliven'd, and serene,
A friend in sorrow, yet in smiles a queen!
Such, and far more, the praise I fondly paid, [pray'd,
When at their nuptial shrine devout I
Join'd each dear hand, to bosom bosom prest,
And fondly thought that heaven the ardor blest!

His sorrows were but for a moment spar'd,
His cup was full!—the draught she bravely
share'd;

Affection, scornful of a danger near,
Adds force to love, and braves each hostile fear,

Breaks through the gloom that veils all human smiles,

And, by participation, care beguiles!
Fond dear delusion! thy fleet charm once o'er,

Thy pleasures vanish, to return no more!
To feed new hopes, and flattering health restore,

In other climes they seek a fancy'd power;
While vengeful war rang'd wide her mad career,

No dangers fright them, nor appall'd by fear;
Not tears of friendship or affection move,
Unbent their purpose, and their firm resolve;

While the soft infant to its mother clung,
Saw our deep sighs, nor knew from whence they sprung.

In other climes they tend life's lambent flame,
Still adverse stars the fruitless toil proclaim;
Life crept apace; unthankful sunk each day;
The charm of health now bent in quick decay;

Till on the trackless flood, in hopes to blend
Their various sorrows with each pitying friend,

Once more to feel a parent's fond embrace,
And taste a sister's and a brother's grace,
Vent'rous they strove—till heaven, relenting, gave

A calm retreat!—but lent a wat'ry grave!
Ah, pitying heaven! forgive my heart-felt tear,

Forgive the sigh weak mortals cherish here!"

Scarce had these words escap'd my wandering sense, [condense,
The surf rose high, dark clouds the night
Full roll'd the waves; high dash'd the show'ry spray, [say:—

And from the forge a voice was heard to "Cease thy fond tears, and quell that big-
"swoln sigh,

"Recall no more faint echo's weak reply;

"Ah why to night, to nature sigh in vain?

"Of heaven's decree, presumptuous, why "complain?

"Near yon bright orb, that rules this fullen
"tide,

"Smiling at woe, rebuking human pride,

"See where, enfolded in each circling hand,

"A constellation yet unknown they stand!

"Didst thou not joy at moments of their "peace?

"Now joy aloft at their eternal bliss.

"Death calm'd their woe, and heal'd each
"anxious pain: [complain;

"Then cease, weak fool, thy sorrows to

"Hence learn 'from grief thy passions to "control!

"Afflictions ripen and correct the soul!"

All was now hush'd—the voice was heard no more—

Now murmur winds, again the billows roar;
Full of the past, reflection urg'd my way,

And gave me council by the dawn of day.
H.

PROLOGUE to the Comedy of "Two to One."

Written by Mr. COLMAN.

Spoken by Mr. PALMER.

TO-Night, as heralds tell, a virgin Muse,
An untrain'd youth, a new adventurer,
sues;

Green in his one-and-twenty, scarce of age, Takes his first flight, half-fledg'd, upon the stage.

Within this little round the parent bird
Hath warbled oft; oft patiently you heard;
And as he strove to raise his eager throat,
Your kind applause made music of his note.
But now, with beating heart, and anxious
eye,

He sees his vent'rous youngling strive to fly;
Like Dædalus, a father's fears he brings,
A father's hopes, and fain would plume his wings.

How vain, alas! his hopes! his fears how vain! [strain.

'Tis you must hear, and hearing judge the
Your equal justice sinks or lifts his name;
Your frown's a sentence, your applause is fame.

If humour warms his scenes with genial fire,
They'll e'en redeem the errors of his fire;
Nor shall his lead—dead! to the bottom drop, [top.

By youth's enlivening cork buoy'd up at
If characters are mark'd with ease and truth, Pleas'd with his spirit, you'll forgive his youth.

Should fire and son be both with dulness curst,
"And Dunc the second follow Dunc the first,"

The shallow stripling's vain attempt you'll mock,

And damn him for a chip of the old block.

A N A G R A M.

IF you transpose what ladies wear, VEIL.

'Twill plainly shew what harlots are: VILE.

Again if you transpose the same,

You'll see an ancient Hebrew name: LEVI.

Change it again, and it will shew

What all on earth desire to do: LIVE.

Transpose these letters yet once more,

What bad men do, you'll then explore. EVIL.

Par.

Parliamentary Debates, continued from p. 467.

MR. Fox, in his speech mentioned in p. 467; animadverted on the evidence that had been heard at the bar, and desired the House to take notice, that tho' it had been attempted to be proved, that a large number of persons had polled for him, who either could not be found, or, if found, had no votes, yet it had not been established that any one bad vote had been received for him. He combated every other part of the evidence, particularly the right of lodgers to vote, which, as it implied a question of law, ought not, he said, to have been pronounced against him, and having omitted not one remark that was made in his favour, he concluded this head with maintaining, that nothing that had appeared amounted to the least shadow of proof, that the High Bailiff, as a conscientious man, had any reasonable grounds for acting as he had done.

The second head he chose to discuss, was, How far the statutes in being went in justification of the conduct of the High Bailiff. Under this head he examined all the statutes that had been cited for and against him, and candidly owned that he had been wrong in supposing that a popular action would lie against the High Bailiff upon the acts of William and George, though he still had his doubts as to the act of Henry VI. which he insisted went incontrovertibly in support of his cause, and in proof that the High Bailiff had acted in direct defiance of the law of the land.

Under the 3d head, he examined the Journals of the House, and quoted most of the cases that had any reference or similitude to his own, and declared, upon the whole, that there was no case directly in point. The nearest to it was the case of the Oxfordshire election; where the sheriff being a friend of the candidates, had made a double return. The use he made of this was to remark, that even the most avowedly partial returning-officer had not ventured to extend his power beyond the day when the writ was returnable.

The 4th head of his enquiry respected the legality of the High Bailiff's conduct. How far it was consistent with the laws, or came under the cognizance of common law? but not, he said, being bred to the profession, he confessed himself not sufficiently competent.

The last head he took into his consideration was, the expediency of the House's ordering the scrutiny to be continued; and such conduct, he endeavoured to shew, would be a direct subversion of the rights of electors, as it would take away those rights from the people; and vest them in that House. This proposition he illustrated, by a variety of arguments; and at length came to this conclusion, that there had been nothing advanced in evidence to justify the High Bailiff in granting a scrutiny; that his having appointed a scrutiny to commence ten days after the writ was extinct, was neither warranted by statute, by the practice and usage of Parliament, nor by any precedent whatsoever. He declared, therefore, that in his opinion the H. Bailiff ought, as the motion stated, to be directed to make his return in like manner as he was bound to have made it on the 18th day of May. If the House should think otherwise, he contended, that they ought to direct a new writ to be issued, and by no means to order the High Bailiff to continue the scrutiny. He deprecated such an order. It would cost at least 18,000*l.* and he confessed himself ill able to bear such an expence or any part of it.

After having with all the powers of elocution, of which he is so amply possessed, impressed the above arguments on the minds of his hearers, he then proceeded to reply to some remarks that had been made by gentlemen in opposition to him.

To what Ld Mulgrave had said, that the election for Westminster was now almost considered as a naval honour; he did not believe the electors of Westminster would think themselves much beholden to his Lordship for his remark, as it implied an indifference in them whether they were represented or not, which was far otherwise.

He adverted likewise to what his Lordship had said of virtual representation; that every member who was chosen was chosen not for any one place only; but for the whole kingdom. This, Mr. Fox said, shewed the great necessity there was for a parliamentary reform. For his own part, he had not changed his principles. He never would change his principles: and he hoped ere long to see the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer strenuously urging the same necessity whenever the subject should be brought forward. He took notice of several other remarks that fell from Ld Mulgrave, whom he remembered, he said, to have been of another mind. His next subject of remark was, on what fell personally from the late Ld Adv. of Scotland, and observed that the borough of Kirkwall, the borough which had done him the honour to chose him for their representative, was the only borough in the kingdom that he could have had a chance for, because, if the event of that day was, as he feared it would be, an order for the High Bailiff to open a scrutiny; it would open a door to a perpetual repetition of such practices as had now prevailed against him.

He then gave a loose to a very pointed declamation against Ministers, and endeavoured to make it appear, that the hand of government was in the whole of the business; and that all that he had suffered, and all that he had yet to suffer, was owing to the unmanly, unrelenting malice of some men in power, who were evidently determined to push their

rapacious

rancorous spirit of revenge to his utter ruin. When he considered, he said, that the military had been called out in a most unconstitutional manner, that the civil power, under a magistrate of Westminster, had not only been the cause of riot to give colour to that iniquitous measure, but the chief instrument of perpetrating the foul crime of murder; and when he considered likewise that, in consequence of that murder, honest and innocent men, friends of his, eminent for their amiable qualities, and dear to him in every respect, had been put to the bar of the Old Bailey and their lives endangered, notwithstanding their innocence; there could not, he said, remain a doubt in the mind of any man that heard him, but that the strong hand of government was stretched forth against him; and that it was the wicked intention of his enemies to stop at nothing that was likely to effect his political annihilation. He did not, he said, mean to charge the Rt. Hon. Gent. over against him as being intentionally his persecutor; he would do him the justice to say, that he did not believe he was the willing instrument in so base a cause; but he would advise him to beware of too servile a compliance with those who were his implacable enemies; and to consider well the lengths to which he was proceeding. He adverted to what had fallen from an hon. gent. in the course of the debate, of a new law; and added, that, if the House in the present case should determine that the scrutiny should go on, and then by way of preventing a repetition of a similar injury to any other in future, should proceed immediately to make a new law, they would by such conduct be guilty of the most gross and unexampled injustice. He concluded with insisting, that the House ought either to adopt the motion, or to order a writ for a new election.

Mr. Pitt rose the instant that Mr. Fox sat down, and begged leave, tho' so late, to make some short observations on the infamous assertions with which the Right Hon. Gent. had thought fit to load a speech of some hours continuance. Before the House suffered itself to receive any impression from violent and gross accusations, and from charges of the blackest nature urged directly against government, he trusted the candour of every impartial man would expect some proof of the truth of any one of them, without good and sufficient instances of which it would, he believed, be difficult for the Right Hon. Gent. to rescue his own character from the imputation of foul slander. It was not his endeavours to excite popular clamour, and to challenge the compassion of the public, by appearing to be the object of ministerial persecution, that would answer his ends, unless that charge and those endeavours were fully substantiated. Accusations, such as the Right Hon. Gent. had thrown out at random, and with a degree of wantonness not less wicked than injurious, were not light accusations; they were of a deep and serious nature, amounting to no less than an unqualified charge of having employed a Westminster Magistrate and the civil power acting under him, first in breaking the peace and encouraging riots, next in perpetrating murder, and, last of all, in the subornation of perjury, to prove that murder on innocent men and respectable individuals. [Mr. Fox cried out across the House, I never said so.] The Right Hon. Gent. had also said, that the strong hand of government was obvious throughout the business—if it were true, let the charge be brought, and the fact established; he trusted the hand of government would never be so strong as to enable it to avert any accusation of guilt that was founded, nor so weak as to be shaken by assertions without proof, and charges unsubstantiated by evidence.

The Right Hon. Gent. had been profuse of his advice to government not to be his persecutor. Such advice was neither necessary nor asked for. Ministers knew too well that the only way to debase themselves and exalt the hon. gent. was to render him the object of their persecution. He did not doubt but the hon. gent. would be content to suffer even martyrdom to be that object, as the only means to restore him to that rank in the estimation of the public, which he had lost by his detestable conduct in politics.

Mr. Pitt reminded the House how much more eligible it would have been for government to have let Mr. Fox take his seat quietly for Westminster, than to have at all expressed any concern about it, had not the just rights of the legal electors of Westminster been notoriously violated; but it was the hon. gentleman's known characteristic to let no rights, however sacred, stand in the way of the accomplishment of his views.

Mr. Pitt entered next into an examination of the several heads into which Mr. Fox had divided his speech. He argued from the questions put to the witnesses, as on their cross examination, how necessary it was for the High Bailiff to act as he had done. He examined the arguments that had been grounded by the counsel on the Statutes and Journals of Parliament relative to the case, and contended that the conclusions which had been drawn from the premises were not warranted. He ridiculed the idea of danger arising from the precedent, if the House should direct the High Bailiff to proceed with the scrutiny, because whenever a returning officer should make such a return, the House would call upon him for his reasons, and if he could not shew cause he would be severely punished for it. He then stated a case hypothetically, that a candidate should arise, who at the beginning should cram the poll so as to put it out of the power of the returning officer to know who were good or who were bad votes, and when he thought he had gained a majority, then to feed the poll from from day to day just to delay the time, till it was impossible to have a scrutiny before the return of the writ: he asked if such a candidate might not procure his return against the real sense of the legal electors? Here then would be a manifest abuse of the rights of election. And as such a case might happen, it was evident a new law was necessary to be so framed as to prevent any such abuse; and when could such a law be more properly introduced, than on the heel of an election that bore some resemblance to that which he had now described? When were new laws to be made, but when the want of them was recently felt?

Mr. Pitt, with astonishing penetration, attention, and memory, combated every argument of weight that had been urged by Mr. Fox in his speech of three hours, and concluded with giving his negative to the motion.

Mr. Fox rose to explain. He did not urge the charge so home against the Westminster magistrate as the Right Hon. Chancellor had misrepresented. What he had said was no more than what the judge delivered to the jury in his charge, that the civil powers employed under a Westminster magistrate, whose duty it was to preserve the peace, had commenced a riot, and in that riot a man had lost his life, and innocent men had been put upon their trial for the murder.

Mr. Sheridan complained of the Rt. Hon. Chancellor's abuse. If his hon. friend's political conduct was so detestable, he wondered he should have courted an union with him a short time ago.

Mr. Pitt said, it was true, and he had courted it sincerely; but it was with a view of counteracting those principles which had rendered him obnoxious to the people, and had excited their detestation.

At half after four in the morning the question being loudly called for, the House divided,

For the motion 117. Against it 195. Majority in favour of the Minister 78.

Ld Mulgrave then rose, and after a short introductory speech moved, That the High Bailiff do proceed with the scrutiny with all possible dispatch.

This was strongly opposed by Mr. Fox and his friends, as a measure that by no means followed, and which ought not to pass without the fullest investigation. And

Mr. Lee rose, and spoke spiritedly against it. He concluded with moving the question of adjournment.

This brought on a fresh debate.

Mr. Fox called upon his friends to support him in opposing the original motion.

Secretary General insisted, that the original motion meant nothing more than an instruction from the chair to expedite the business of the scrutiny.

Sir Thomas Davenport was of the same opinion, and insisted, that either the High Bailiff was or was not in possession of legal authority for what he had done. If he was, he ought to be supported.

Some altercation took place among the Members. And the question being vociferously called for, the House divided on the question of adjournment. When the numbers were, Noes 178. Ayes 90. Ld Mulgrave's motion was then put and agreed to.

The High Bailiff was then called in, and the Speaker acquainted him with the above resolution.

Mr. Fox again rose, and begged the House to consider the tendency of the resolution; for if the High Bailiff should, on a retrospective view of his conduct, find the ground on which he might have thought he stood so firmly cut from under him, and might be inclined to do justice and make his return, this resolution, being in its nature mandatory, might stand in his way; and moreover, this resolution would have another effect, either to compel him to plead before a tribunal, against the legality of which he had protested, or subject him to the resentment of the House for being contumacious and disregarding their privileges.

Mr. H. Dundas replied, that no man would be more ready to vote against the motion than himself, if it laid any such restraint on the conscience of the High Bailiff, but it certainly did not.

Mr. Sheridan then begged leave to put another question to the learned gentleman—Suppose his hon. friend should send a formal protest to the High Bailiff, signed by himself and other electors, signifying their disregard to his power, as acting under an usurped authority, and that they did not mean to trouble themselves about the scrutiny; whether, in that case, such notice would subject his hon. friend to the resentment of the House for contumacy?

Mr. H. Dundas in reply said, that nothing in the motion now before the House would have that effect. He might protest; but, if in that protest he should proceed to censure the proceedings of the House, he could not say how far the House might or might not think itself bound to take notice of it.

Lord Geo. Cavendish begged to say a word or two by way of protest against the proceedings of this night, as contrary to every thing he had seen practised before, and to every thing he had heard had ever been the practice of the House of Commons in former times. He was proceeding, when the House expressed their impatience for rising, and at half after six on Wednesday morning adjourned to

Thursday 10.

When the Speaker waited till four o'clock, but could not make a House.

Friday 11.

Capt. James Luttrell, as surveyor-general of the ordnance, moved in committee, that 810,699l. be granted to his Majesty for the ordnance—ordnance-service of the present year. He complained of the heavy debt which obliged the office to go to market for every article at a discount of 28 per cent. which, if ready money could be had, might be saved to the public, and other advantages obtained.

Mr. Hoffy was of the same opinion, that the discount was not only burdensome, but injurious to public credit; he therefore expressed his disapprobation in very strong terms of the new and pernicious system of defending the different dock-yards with bulwarks of stone instead of ships of war.

Mr. Pitt said, that when the ordnance estimates were before the House last session, he thought with the hon. gent. that the fortifications might be spared; but owned that he had since changed his mind, because, should a future war be necessary, the ships might be much more usefully employed in carrying on spirited and offensive operations abroad, than by lying inactive at home, to the great detriment of the service. He was certain the noble Duke now at the head of the ordnance would not expend a shilling more than was absolutely necessary.

Capt. Masbride insisted, that every shilling of the immense sums that have already been expended, and are now expending, on the extensive works on the Portsmouth side was thrown away. A sea-officer who should attempt a descent on that side ought to be hung in chains with Jack the Painter. Till the enemy can be transported in air-balloons they must be contented to come covered with ships of war; and it must be a capacious harbour indeed that could receive a large fleet of line of battle ships with troops and transports sufficient to make an attack upon Portsmouth. As no such harbour existed in the British channel, gentlemen might rest easy with respect to any sudden attack on that quarter.

Capt. J. Latrell defended fortifying the docks, not only on the ground of leaving our large ships at liberty to annoy the enemy abroad, but to secure to our fleets every material for fitting and refitting, and a safe retreat in case of necessity. Fortifying a dock-yard, he said, was not the same as fortifying an ordinary town; many of those might be burnt without material injury, but the loss of our great naval arsenals might be the ruin of our navy.

After some farther debate, the question was called for, the money voted, and the House being resumed, adjourned to

Monday 14.

The report from the committee of supply was brought up and confirmed. And the House afterwards resolved itself into a committee on the army estimates.

Sec. at War moved, That 17,483 effective men, commissioned and non-commissioned officers, including 2036 invalids, be employed as land forces for the year 1784.

That 636,190*l.* be granted for maintaining them.

That 284,213*l.* be granted for maintaining the forces in the plantations, Gibraltar, &c. and for clothing the officers and men in 1784.

Mr. Rose, Secretary of the Treasury, then moved for certain specific sums for deficiencies, amounting to about 800,000*l.* which being agreed to, the House was resumed. And

Mr. Burke rose to make his promised motion relative to the King's speech. To some people, he said, it might seem of no great consequence; but to him it appeared of such magnitude, that he was not ashamed to say his soul was full of it. A Parliament had been sentenced, condemned, and executed, and no notice had yet been taken of it. If the meanest subject had died by violent means, an inquest would have taken cognizance of his decease; but the Parliament of Great Britain had been put to a violent death, and no enquiry had been made whether it had been felo de se or juri casu. Much had been said of the sense of the people, as the ground on which Ministers might rest their defence of the late dissolution. The plea, he confessed, might on some occasions be admitted, but how was that sense to be collected? The people, he observed, might be divided into three distinct classes, which for brevity may be called monarchy-men, rank republicans, and moderate men. The two first classes were equally sworn enemies to the House of Commons, tho' from the most opposite views. The one from principle, as lovers of monarchy; the other from hatred, because the House of Commons supported it. Of the third class, he would not hesitate to say that full three fourths went heart and hand with the late House of Commons; the other fourth he believed to be led from misrepresentation to join the two first classes. Tho' he trusted that many of them were already undeceived, yet it was the duty of the House of Commons to warn the remainder of the danger to which they exposed their liberties thro' the delusion under which they acted. Doctrines big with danger to the constitution had been broached within the two last years, first by a noble Lord (E. of Shelburne) and now by the Minister, who had received his political instruction at the foot of that Gamaliel. By the speech the King was made to say, "That the people expected unanimous exertions on the part of the House." Thus the people were taught to pass by the door of the House, where their complaints ought naturally to be lodged, and to supplicate the throne for the protection of their liberties. Hence the dissolution of the late Parliament, pretendedly in obedience to the sense of the people. He warned the people to beware of this double House of Commons; a House of Commons in Parliament assembled, and a House of Commons collected from corporations and county meetings; an artful Minister would not fail to play one against the other. Such a one would would make use of a pliant House of Commons to oppress the people; and of a deluded people, to awe a refractory Parliament.

The E. India bill had been made a specious pretext for the dissolution. It was represented as a violent attack upon the franchises of the people, an invasion of the royal prerogative, and a medium by which the late Ministers intended to have secured themselves in power, paramount to every other power in the kingdom. But the reverse of all this was the truth. The India bill was intended to take the power out of the hands of men who had grossly abused it; who had plundered and made miserable millions of people; who had involved themselves in ruinous, unjust, and expensive wars, and of course had brought infamy and disgrace upon their country; and to place it in the hands of men of probity and honour; and as to the patronage so much dreaded, he could assure the House, that the persons who were to have been at the head of the Company's affairs had been busied in devising means by which they might put it most effectually out of their own or any other's power to derive any emolument or parliamentary support from their situation. But, had it been otherwise, Ministers could not constitutionally assign that as a reason for the dissolution. In the first place, the King ought not to have known that such a bill was in existence; and, in the next, the House had a right to entertain whatever bills they pleased, even to the lopping off a branch of the royal prerogative; and if ever the day should come that any individual Member, or the House itself, should be made responsible for a part taken in any bill, on that day would the liberties of England expire. This, he said, was the time to oppose doctrines which seemed to be gaining ground. A noble Earl (Shelburne) had often talked of the balance of the different branches of the constitution. He reprobated the idea. A noble Duke [Richmond], in his letter to the volunteers of Ireland, had rejected it. He would not allow the King a negative on the acts of both Houses of Parliament, as it would be strange indeed that one man should be entrusted with the power of counteracting the collective wisdom of the whole kingdom.

He concluded a long and animated speech with insisting, that if the measures of the late Parliament were unconstitutional, they ought to be condemned and censured; if, on the other hand, they were strictly constitutional, they ought to be maintained and defended by the present Parliament, as the last Parliament was said to have been put to death for supporting them. He then handed to the chair several sheets of paper, by way of motion, containing a kind of manifesto to the King, of which no doubt our readers will be curious to learn the purport.

"They, the Commons, humbly represent that, in the speech from the throne, his Majesty's Ministers had thought proper to use a language of a very alarming import. They have thought proper by admonition from the throne, implying distrust and reproach, to convey the expectations of the people to us their sole representatives, and to caution us, the natural guardians of the constitution, against any infringement of it on our parts. This would destroy the whole spirit of the constitution, if his Majesty's Commons were to receive the sense of his people from the Ministers of the Crown, or to admit them to be a proper or regular channel for conveying it. They in the speech declare, "that his Majesty has a just and confident reliance that his faithful Commons are animated with the same sentiments of loyalty, &c. which he had the happiness to see manifested in every part of the kingdom."—His faithful Commons having never failed in loyalty, it is new to them to be reminded of it; and it is no small source of jealousy that Ministers have reference to some other measures of loyalty than the laws require, or the practice of Parliament will admit. If the loyalty alluded to, and held forth as an example, consists in addressing, promising support, and thanking his Majesty for removing certain of his Ministers, then his faithful Commons beg leave to express their serious concern for the impression which has been made on their fellow subjects by misrepresentations, which have seduced them to approve of measures subversive of their own freedom, not being competent to judge of those proceedings in Parliament which they had been led to censure.

"Other unusual expressions of Ministers, declaratory of "a resolution to support in "their just balance the rights and privileges "of every branch of the legislature," give us great cause of uneasiness. His Majesty's faithful Commons are sufficiently instructed in their own rights and privileges; and do not think it safe to admit of hazardous theories of balances of rights and privileges, and prerogatives, which can have no tendency but to stir up discussions equally improper and unnecessary.—Fearing, from these extraordinary admonitions, that his Majesty has been abused by false representations, the Commons think it their duty to inform his Majesty, that no attempt has been made against his lawful prerogatives, or against the rights and privileges of the Peers; either by speeches, addresses, votes, or resolutions; but admitting any such had existed, they protest against all such acts, speeches, and addresses, from any other persons whatsoever, as have a tendency to consider as just objects of censure or punishment from the throne, members in any wise concerned in them. They [the House of Commons] humbly conceive, that besides the share the House has in its legislative and criminating capacity, it has other powers and capacities to maintain; and trust, that its humble advice will be heard with the same attention, and regarded with the same weight, and followed by the same effects, as formerly, during the happy happy and glorious reigns of his Majesty's royal progenitors; and that the personal favour of any Minister, or set of Ministers, will not be more dear to his Majesty than the credit and character of the House of Commons. It is an experiment full of peril, to suppose the representative wisdom and justice of his Majesty's people in the wrong. And it is a contrivance full of danger, to set up the representative and constitutional bodies as two distinct powers, formed to counterpoise each other. In such a situation, by exciting an emulation and contest between the two bodies as parties contending for credit and influence with the throne, sacrifices will be made by both, and the whole end in nothing else than the destruction of the dearest rights and liberties of the nation.

"To dissolve Parliament, is the undoubted prerogative of the Crown; but at the same time it is certainly the most critical and delicate, and that in which the Commons have most reason to require the good faith and favour of the Crown. They are not on a par with Ministers, and cannot go to their election at the moment most favourable to their interest. Ministers may chuse a time when matters of state and legislation are depending, which may easily be misunderstood, and cannot be explained before that misunderstanding has had its fatal effect. With his Majesty are the favours and graces of the Crown, and the duties with which he is trusted are those that are most popular and pleasing. With the Commons the duties are of a different kind; they are harsh and invidious. The whole body of the public impositions originate with them, and the hand of the House of Commons is seen and felt in every burthen that presses on the people. It would be hard indeed, that while the Commons are thus employed in serving his Majesty and the nation, their zeal and fidelity should be misrepresented, and their dutiful endeavours for the security and greatness of the throne, made the means of fomenting those popular discontents which secret advisers have found it their interest to excite. No other consequence can result from this example, but that in future the House of Commons will either shrink from every disagreeable service, or, to secure the means of performing it, will exchange independence for protection, and court a subservient existence from those who ought themselves to stand in awe of their power. If the authority of the House of Commons is only to be held up when it shall coincide with the opinion of the secret advisers of the Crown, the House will then sink into a mere appendage of Administration, and will lose that independent character which alone can afford real, effective, and substantial support to Government. A House of Commons of which Ministers were known to stand in awe, and with which they were believed to co-operate, gave confidence to foreign powers, and made them desirous of a connection with

G. Britain in preference to an alliance with any other state; but, if faith with the House of Commons (the grand security for the national faith) can be broken with impunity, a wound is given to the political importance of G. Britain, which will not be easily healed.

"That the late House of Commons did not confide in those secret advisers, and in those Ministers in whom his Majesty puts trust, is notorious to all the world; and they withheld their confidence for reasons for which posterity will honour and respect their names. They could not confide in persons who had shewn a disposition for dark and dangerous intrigues; intrigues by which the assurance which all nations ought to have of the real and substantial acts of Government has been weakened, if not destroyed.

"That Ministers may continue in office without any signification of his Majesty's displeasure, while persons who are known to have access to his Majesty's sacred person are employed to counteract their measures, is a new mode of conducting the national business, which can produce nothing but anarchy and confusion. This the Commons with humility and concern lay before his Majesty, as the inevitable effect of a spirit of intrigue in his executive government, which, during the last session, broke out in a manner the most alarming. This evil was infinitely aggravated by the unauthorised but not disavowed use of his Majesty's name, for the purpose of corruption and intimidation. Several Peers were obliged to retract their declarations and to recall their proxies. This corrupt proceeding appeared to the Commons, who are the natural guardians of the purity of Parliament, a practice so dangerous and reprehensible, that they branded it as such by a resolution. They did more, they advised his Majesty against employing the authors. But his Majesty was advised to keep his Ministers, who, notwithstanding the royal faith was pledged for its continuance, were daring enough to dissolve that Parliament, and that at a time too, when the British interests in India were in the utmost danger, and when Parliament was engaged in the most critical deliberations on the subject. At this time it was that the most industrious endeavours were made use of to calumniate those whom it was found impracticable to corrupt. The reputation of the House, and the reputation of the Members, were in every part of the kingdom undermined.

We are cautioned in his Majesty's late speech from the throne, relative to India, "not to lose sight of the effect any measure may have on the constitution of our country." We are apprehensive that a calumnious report of an attack upon the royal prerogative may have made an impression on the royal mind. This attack is charged to the account of "the bill for the preservation of the commerce, and for the amendment

“ of the government of this nation in the East India.” To remove effectually any such unfavourable impression, the House beg leave to acquaint his Majesty, that, far from making any infringement on the royal prerogative, the bill in question did, for a limited time, give to his Majesty certain powers never before possessed by the Crown—The territorial possessions in India are an acquisition of a new description, which never have been UNITED or ANNEXED TO THE CROWN; nor could his Majesty's patronage be at all affected by it, because it is notorious that his Majesty never had originally the appointment of a single officer, civil or military, in the Company's establishments in India.”

To enforce and illustrate this proposition, the manifesto enters into a detail of the Company's institution and government from the beginning, and concludes with remarking, “ that if this is setting up a fourth Order “ in the commonwealth, this order has long “ existed, and from the beginning has been “ enjoyed by the Company in the fullest extent, “ under no other controul than that of acts of “ parliament.” It was the ill condition and mal-administration of the Company's affairs that induced the House to vest the powers, which the Company did before possess, in proper hands, until those affairs could be restored. This was no creation of any new power, but the removal of an old power from the management of those who had abused it, to trustees, who were to hold it for a limited time, for the safety of the State. The powers of government, and of peace and war, are parts of prerogative of the highest order. Of our competence to restrain all your Majesty's subjects by act of parliament, and to vest those high and eminent prerogatives even in a particular company of merchants, there has hitherto been no question; nor has our claim to frame such bills for the regulation of that commerce and of those territories, and every thing relating to them, as to our discretion shall seem meet, ever been disputed.

“ That his Majesty's Ministers, misled by their ambition, have endeavoured, by slanderous insinuations, to raise fears and jealousies among the corporate bodies of the kingdom for their charters in general, is notorious; and, to give colour to these insinuations, have not scrupled to assert, that the late precipitate change in the administration, and the dissolution of parliament, were measures calculated to rescue the people out of the hands of their late representatives. But we trust his Majesty's subjects are not yet so far deluded as to believe that their charters can be any where so safely placed as where they have always found security, viz. in the H. of Commons. The H. of Commons, in passing the India Bill, made no attack upon any powers or privileges, except such as they have always attacked, and will attack, namely those which are corruptly and oppressively administered. Those who have been most industrious in propagating calumnies against the late parliament for suspending the authorities by which the East India Company, in every instance, had abused their trust, have, at the same time, been careful to conceal the weighty reasons on which the House had proceeded. They have asserted that parliament had confiscated the property of the E. I. Company. The very reverse is the truth. And it is necessary that his Majesty's people should know, that the H. of C. have proceeded, with regard to the E. I. C. with a degree of care, circumspection, and deliberation, which has not been equalled in the history of parliamentary proceedings. For 16 years the state and condition of that body has never been wholly out of view.”

Here the manifesto enters into a detail of proceedings from the year 1767 to the present time; the result of which is, “ That the whole Company was found totally corrupt; that the oppressions and abuses in India have all that time rather increased than diminished; that many millions of innocent and deserving men, who ought to be protected, are oppressed by a most despotic and rapacious tyranny; that wars have been kindled, and hostilities commenced, in almost every quarter, for the purposes of rapine; and that all the treaties that have been made with the natives have ended only in so many breaches of public faith. His Majesty, sensible of these disorders, recommended the consideration of them no less than six times, in speeches from the throne. And the late House, discovering the reversed situation of the Company, that the nominal servants were the masters, and the offenders become the judges, thought fit to examine into the state of their commercial affairs, and discovered that their debts had accumulated beyond any present or obvious future means of payment; that, by owing a million and more to the customs, they had begun to affect the Sinking Fund, and of course to endanger public credit. In this situation the then H. of Commons, whose intentions have been so grossly misrepresented, instead of confiscating their property, as had been industriously propagated, assisted them with a large sum of the public money, by which they were rescued from inevitable ruin; an event which the enemies of that House endeavoured to bring on; well knowing, that if, for want of proper relief, the Company should become insolvent, and the national credit and commerce sustain a heavy blow, this disagreeable consequence would follow, that either the odium would be charged to the account of parliament, if they should, after so many repeated admonitions from the throne, neglect their duty; or, that by wresting from the Company, for a time, a trust which they had abused, a cry would be raised against parliament, for depriving British subjects of their legal privileges and franchises.

“ Your Commons have not been able to devise a method by which the redress of grie-

grievances could be effected through the authors of those grievances. And when they had selected certain principal delinquents whom they declared it the duty of the Company to recall, the Company, instead of obeying, held out their legal privileges, and supported those very persons, with new marks of favour and approbation, whom they ought to have delivered up to the justice of their country.

"Your Commons feel, with a just resentment, the inadequate estimate which your Ministers have formed of the importance of this great concern. They profess to act upon the principles of those who have not enquired into the subject, and to condemn those who have scrutinised every part of it. We are cautioned against infringing the Constitution, and it is impossible to know what the secret advisers of the throne will consider as infringement. If, therefore, in the arduous affairs recommended to us, our proceedings should be ill adapted, feeble, and ineffectual; if no delinquency should be prevented, and no delinquent should be called to account; if every person should be caressed, promoted, and raised in power, in proportion to the enormity of his offences; if no relief should be given to any of the natives unjustly dispossessed of their rights, jurisdictions, and properties; if no cruel and unjust exactions should be forborne; if the source of no peculation, or oppressive gain, should be cut off; if, by the omission of the opportunities that were in our hands, our Indian empire should fall into ruin irretrievable, and in its fall crush the credit, and overwhelm the revenues, of this country, we stand acquitted to our honour, and to our conscience, who have reluctantly seen the weightiest interests of our country, at times the most critical to its dignity and safety, rendered the sport of the inconsiderate and unmeasured ambition of individuals, and by that means the wisdom of his Majesty's government degraded in the public estimation, and the policy and character of this renowned nation rendered contemptible in the eyes of all Europe."—The above is the substance of this extraordinary motion, which passed in the negative without another word.

Wednesday 16.

Mr. Sawbridge, after some debate on the propriety of bringing forward his promised motion at this critical time, when the Minister, who had pledged himself to give it support, was deeply engaged in the more important business of the nation, being himself persuaded that, if the Right Hon. Chancellor was in earnest, there could not be a more favourable moment, moved, "That a Committee, be appointed to take into consideration the present state of the representation of the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled."

Ald. Newnham seconded the motion.

Mr. Grosvenor opposed it for the present; but pledged himself, whenever a plan of reform should be proposed, that met his ideas, to support it to the utmost of his power.

Sir Richard Hill began, in his usual shrewd sarcastical scripture style, with citing the words of Solomon, there is a time for all things. He would submit, he said, to the worthy Alderman [Sawbridge], whom he understood to be superior to Hoyle at whist: if a company of his friends were to come in the middle of the night, and rouse him from his sleep to make a party, whether, in spite of all his predilection, he would not say, "My friends, you have chosen a very unseasonable time: come to-morrow, and I am your man." In the like predicament stood the Minister at present; for his part, he was a friend to the subject in general; but, conceiving the country to be in a state of atrophy of late, he thought a hot regimen would rather tend to inflame than to restore the constitution. He did not, he said, perfectly know what the Speaker's sentiments might be with respect to the representation and the short duration of Parliament; but he believed he would very readily agree to a proposition for moderating of motions, and shortening the duration of debates. After several other pointed allusions to a late proceeding, he concluded with another saying of Solomon: The word of the angry man provoketh strife, and the language of the meek man turneth away anger.

Lord Surrey was sorry the motion of the worthy Alderman had not originated from the Treasury-bench. Had the Right Hon. Chancellor pledged himself to bring forward any bill of the same tendency, he should have been for withdrawing the motion for the present. He, however, agreed so far with the proposition, as to prefer a select committee rather than a committee of the whole House.

Mr. M. A. Taylor declared he had consulted his constituents on the subject, and they were very cool upon it. They recommended to him, as the chief object of his attention, those measures that appeared best calculated to encourage trade, and extend the commerce of the nation. He was therefore professedly against the motion.

Lord North declared himself alike hostile to that and every other motion of the like tendency, and wished never to hear another word said about any of them in Parliament. Motions of this kind were very gravely ushered into Parliament under pretence of rendering some very essential service to the state, while at the same time they had a tendency to endanger its fundamental principles. Some gentlemen talk of a renovation of the constitution, and give as a reason the unequal distribution of power, one man perhaps, or a few men, having the power of sending as many members to Parliament as a great and opulent city. It may be so; but was it prudent for any man to endanger his life for the sake of removing one one little wart? Others thought a reform necessary for increasing the liberty of the subject. Of liberty he might, for what he knew, entertain very singular notions. In his mind, it consisted not in being delivered from the power of the laws, but of being governed by equal laws. If the greatest subject held his privileges upon no better tenure than himself, and the meanest held them upon as good, then, he would affirm, the country in which we lived was free. Some severe strokes had been thrown out in the course of the debate, as if the American war had brought the nation into a galloping consumption, and he had supported that war. He justified his conduct, and, with a manly spirit, defied his enemies to substantiate a single charge against him. Now was the time, he said, when they had the whole evidence in their power. If they were silent now, there could not be a stronger proof of his innocence.

Mr. Martin supported the motion with his usual urbanity. Every man, he said, who was not a statesman, and who wanted not a venal majority to carry his ruinous measures into effect, must feel the necessity of a recourse to first principles. Was it, he said, any part of the system of those with whom the great plan of representation originated, that the proprietor of a borough, which by the casual vicissitudes of fire, famine, or war, should be erased from the ground, and nothing but the bare name left, should have the power of sending two representatives to Parliament, to support the ideal interest of such a visionary borough? If it be true, that great and opulent towns flourish more, and are happier, without representatives, than those towns who have representatives, it will follow, that local representation is a mere farce, and that the county of Cornwall, which now sends more members to Parliament than half the island of Great Britain besides, divided by a line from north to south, may as well send the rest. That county, though of little other consequence at present, may still preserve its former dignity, by giving law to Britain, to which in ancient times it gave renown. The noble Lord's notions of freedom, which he thinks so singular, are perhaps the most universal that ever were adopted. There is hardly a nation upon earth that does not boast of the same privilege; and there is no nation, the most despotic, in which it is more abused than in Great Britain—witness the tyrants of the East. Are there any where a set of men who are more generally execrated, or more powerfully protected? He warmly recommended to the patriotic Alderman never to quit his hobby-horse, as an Hon. member [Sir Richard Hill] was pleased to call his motion. Hobbies were generally the best-tanned and the safest. He never knew one that hurt the master who trusted in him.

Mr. Beaufoy strongly supported the motion. With whatever spirit some of the abettors of the American war may affect to defend it, the deplorable state of the nation could not but open men's eyes to the horrors of it. An additional debt of near one hundred and fifty millions, an empire divested of the far greater part of its territorial dominions, and of at least one third of its most loyal subjects; a company, the most opulent and flourishing of any in the known world, reduced to the verge of ruin; the national character and the national credit wantonly sacrificed to the motives of enmity and revenge; these were serious and notorious facts, not to be effaced nor palliated by bold speeches or animated turns of wit, and will one day be brought to light, whatever may be the cause of the present concealment. Could all this have happened, he said, had the nation been properly represented?—No man of common sense will venture to assert it. For which reason he expressed his ardent wish for a renovation, however lightly the noble Lord was pleased to play upon the term.
GENT. MAG. July, 1784.

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, to combat the arguments of the noble Lord in the blue ribband. Whatever might be the fate of the present question, he was happy, he said, in having an opportunity of delivering his sentiments upon it. It had been rumoured without doors, that, now he was become a Minister, he had changed his opinion. He denied it. He was fully convinced that a Parliamentary reform was highly necessary, and called aloud for the support of every friend to the liberties of the people. So far from having changed his sentiments, that he declared, "it was his firm intention to renew this question early next session of Parliament." He saw every day more and more the necessity of it. The British constitution had been considered as the pride of its people, and the envy of all the world besides; and he joined in wishing, with the noble Lord in the blue ribband, that it may descend undiminished to posterity. But surely the noble Lord will not say, that it is now as it was in the beginning. He will not say, that it has suffered no diminution, no change, no derangement, from a lapse of more than a thousand years; that the state of the kingdom now, with respect to its local opulence and populousness, is the same as in the days of the great Alfred. The noble Lord had expressed his fears for the principles of the constitution. He [Mr. Pitt] was glad his Lordship was such a friend to the principles of the constitution, because the people need not be afraid of losing their privileges while his Lordship acted as guardian of their rights. But his Lordship was an enemy to innovation. If a grievous complaint subsists, is frequently felt, and found to be increasing, must it not be removed, if possible, for fear of innovation? Surely so weak an argument can never require an answer. The noble Lord had dwelt upon the influence influence of the crown, as if he thought the present influence of the crown was arrived at a very dangerous height. Though he [Mr. Pitt] was not of the same opinion, yet he wished always for a maintenance of that just equilibrium of power which alone constituted the glory of our envied constitution; and he hoped that every man who was zealous in the cause of freedom would agree with him in that opinion. He was afraid, he said, of mixing the present question with the politics of the day, lest such a mode of proceeding should inflame the minds of members, and prove inimical to the cause he was endeavouring to support. He wished every man to give his voice on this great question uninfluenced by any other motive than the importance of the subject. He hoped the House would not proceed timidly; but, if they acted at all, they would act vigorously; that they would probe the sore to the bottom, and remove those radical defects which are the just cause of complaint. The noble Lord in the blue ribband had used many subtle arguments against a Parliamentary reform; but, he confessed, they had made no impression on his mind. His Lordship had sagaciously remarked, that in this island we enjoy a plenitude of freedom; but how could that be the case, if the different classes of mankind who resided in it did not possess it in the same degree? He wished that all were linked in the same bondage, and that all enjoyed the same degree of liberty in proportion to their respective stations. This could no otherwise be obtained than by an equal representation of the people. Much had been said about the American war; and that war had been said to be the war of the people. But how did that appear? It was true, it had for a continuance the sanction of Parliament; but will any one say that the Parliament who sanctioned it was a just representation of the people? With regard to the criminality of those who supported it, he believed, the Right Hon. friend of the noble Lord in the blue ribband, when in office, could certainly have been able to have spoken decisively on that subject, as there were many papers then open to his inspection which would have illustrated the subject. For his part, he confessed, he did not like to recur to those unhappy times when, by the strange enthusiastic conduct of some men, we had lost the dominion of thirteen colonies, the pride and strength of Great Britain. It was an unhappy retrospect, to think of our public revenue being wantonly squandered—our blood lavishly poured forth in an inglorious cause—our forces disgraced in almost every quarter of the globe. He was struck with horror at the idea, and could not even think of it without heartfelt sorrow. He therefore again reverted to the subject in debate. He exhorted every friend to the liberties of the people to be active and earnest in their exertions for a Parliamentary reform, a measure which called aloud for the warm support of those men who, to their honour, were zealous for the salvation of our glorious constitution. He concluded with these emphatical words—With regard to a reform of Parliament, I am happy in having this opportunity to declare my fixed and cordial testimony of my unalterable opinion.

Mr. Dundas made a miscellaneous speech. In one part he endeavoured to defend his old friend Lord North's insisting on the American war, though unfortunate, being a just and justifiable war; in another part, he glanced at the India bill; and in a third at the danger of exposing the constitution, and exhibiting discouraging representations of the debilitated state of the nation. He declared himself a true friend to the constitution, as established at the Revolution; and thought pointing out defects, without having the means in readiness to repair them, bad policy. He begged leave to differ from his Right Hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the present occasion, for he could see no necessity for those vigorous exertions so warmly recommended by the minister.

Mr. Fox rose in support of the motion, which, he strongly contended, had received new motives from the political occurrences that had passed during the course of the last four months. Notwithstanding what had been urged against recurring to the history of past times, he could not help adverting, he said, to the brilliant state of the nation from the period of the accession of the Brunswick family to that of his present Majesty, and comparing it with the melancholy disasters of the present reign. During this last period a new and destructive system of policy had been adopted. He begged that gentlemen might not be alarmed at the idea of innovation; for what was the history of our constitution, during the above period, but a history of innovation? He referred to what had been advanced by Mr. Burke on a former occasion, of a combination between the crown and the people against that House. He combated the dangerous doctrine, that had lately been introduced, of dividing the commons of England into two distinct bodies, those without doors, and those within. Respecting innovations in general, he observed, that no reformation could ever be made of old laws or old customs, however contrary to modern practice or modern habits, without innovation. The old law and the old custom are naturally done away by the new law and the new custom, insensibly insinuating themselves into the constitution. What are the laws of excise and of customs but innovations? Are they constitutional? Do they not militate strongly against the first principles of the constitution, where in matters of life and of property every man is to be tried by his neighbours? He owned he had formerly his doubts as to the duration

F O R E I G N I N T E L L I G E N C E.

THE Emperor's ultimate demand from the Minister of the States General at the court of Brussels, is contained in the following fourteen articles.

I. Agreeable to the repeated declarations of the late Empress Queen, and of his Majesty the Emperor now gloriously reigning, the limits of Flanders ought to remain on the footing of the Convention in the year 1664; and in such places as they have been lost, by the time that has elapsed since that period; or where they are now falling into oblivion, his Majesty expects that their High Mightinesses will appoint Commissioners, to act in conjunction with those whom he has named, for the purpose of restoring them according to the said convention, that being the only basis which his Majesty acknowledgeth.

II. His Majesty likewise expects that their High Mightinesses will cause part of the works of Fort Liefkenshoek to be demolished, it extending farther than the 6th article of the said convention of 1664 states to be the property of the Republic; and also, that they will put an end to all the encroachments which have been permitted, particularly that in the extensive district of Polder den Doel.

III. His Majesty requires that the forts of Kruischans and of Frederic Henly be demolished and evacuated immediately, the treaty of 1648 being perfectly clear on that head.

IV. His Majesty demands that the works of Fort Lillo, which extend on the territory usurped from him, be put in all respects into the same state as they were when in possession of the States General at the time of the said treaty.

V. His Majesty, who believes himself to possess, in conformity to the treaties, the absolute and independent sovereignty of every part of the Escaut, from Antwerp to the farther extremity of Saffingen, requires that the guard-ship which was placed before Fort Lillo, and which their High Mightinesses have only removed for the present, be taken away for ever, as he cannot think of permitting, throughout the whole of his sovereignty on the Escaut, any vessel or foreign authority whatever.

VI. His Majesty requires that the Republic shall surrender to him the villages of Bladel and Theusel, which were seized upon by the Republic under pretence of their having formerly belonged to the mayoralty of Bille-Duc; whereas, on the contrary, it is evident that the King of Spain was in possession of them at the time of the treaty of Munster, and that they have always been considered as belonging to Antwerp.

VII. His Majesty requires that the States General, in renouncing their pretensions to the village of Postel, of which they are at present in possession, restore to the abbey of that name the property which they hold on that territory, and which was seized upon by them, in direct contradiction to the 13th article of the treaty of Munster.

VIII. His Majesty requires that the States General put a stop to all encroachments on his evident sovereignty with respect to, the lands of Konigsherm, Telogne or Voolen, Grootloon, Heer and Keer, Hoppertingen, Moppertingen, Nederen, Paur, Ruffen or Rutten, Sluylen, Sepperen, Falais, Argentreau, and Hermaol; and that all exactions may be refrained from, on the part of their High Mightinesses, whether under the name of subsidy, or any other title, which they have hitherto extorted in those districts, against all law and justice, and contrary to the rights and sovereignty of the emperor.

IX. His Majesty requires that the States General, fulfilling the engagements which they entered into by the treaty of the 30th of August, 1673, finally surrender to him the town of Maestricht, and the Comte of Vroerhaave, with all its appurtenances in the country beyond the Meuse, which they at present retain unjustly and contrary to the tenor of the above-mentioned treaty.

X. His Majesty requires the indemnity and restitution of all the revenues, profits, and fruits whatever, which the Republic, or those employed by them, have received under any name or title, on account of the articles mentioned in this detail.

XI. His Majesty demands that the States General indemnify him for all the immense losses which he has sustained by the duties of entry and going out; by continuing during a long course of years, on the express promise of a treaty of commerce formed by the Republic, but always eluded, the imposition of those duties upon a very unfavourable and prejudicial footing.

XII. His Majesty demands that the States General render to him the amount of every thing that comes under the title of, or as any way belonging to, the town and marquisate of Bergen-op-Zoom, the town and barony of Breda, and the other parts of Dutch Brabant; that they pay their quota of the arrears due on the former aids of the province of Brabant; and that, exclusive of the entire restitution of the capital from the moment when they came into the possession of the Republic, the States General shall in future pay their share upon a footing that shall be agreed upon.

XIII. His Majesty demands the restitution of, or payment for, all the artillery and warlike stores which were left under their care when their troops went into garrison in several parts of the country. His Majesty at the same time demands the payment of two millions of livres, which was to have been paid by France to the Republic by virtue of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, under the title of warlike stores brought from those places during the war.

XIV. His Majesty demands, that the States General

General pay to all corporations and individuals, mentioned in the annexed note, the capital sums there stated, with the interest due upon them.

32. "The States of Namur delivered, by virtue of an arrangement with the Dutch Governor of Namur, and with the consent of their High Mightinesses, on the 11th of July, 1746, cattle to the amount of Fl. 8236:1 for the maintenance of the garrison, for which they have hitherto solicited payment in vain.

33. "The Magistracy of Namur delivered, in the year 1746, cattle to the amount of Fl. 5268:6 for the support of the garrison, which they have never been paid.

34. "The following individuals, Honnoux, Oubert, Oeterlande, and Manesse, delivered, by order of the Governor of Namur, for the service of the garrison during the siege in 1746, beds and bedding to the amount of Fl. 37862:21, which they have not been paid for, though these goods were taxed by the Dutch hostages at the reduction of the place.

35. "The Regency of Tournay is to be satisfied for all the debts contracted on the part of the States General, by General Dorth, during the siege of 1745, making the sum of Fl. 8224 7:1, and the further sum of Fl. 14889:9, due to several private persons in that district. The above General gave in the same year a formal acknowledgment, in the name of the States General, for the above debts; but all attempts for obtaining the payment of them have been hitherto fruitless.

36. "The following individuals, Martin Robins, Pierre Languet, Henry Heyman, and N. Castro, supplied the troops of the Republic, in 1709, 1710, 1711, and 1715, with provisions and forage to the amount of Fl. 263:362:15 Dutch money, no part of which has been paid, though several decrees in their favour have been passed by the State Council, particularly in 1721 and 1729."

The answer of their H. M. M. to the above demands is not yet made public; but shall be properly noticed.

Minutes of Advice from the East Indies.

From the Gov. Gen. and Council at Fort William in Bengal, to the Court of Directors; dated Feb. 7, 1784.

"Honourable Sirs,

"THE Neptune packet being under dispatch to Bussorah for the conveyance of our ed to you purpose of that may from Eng-of sending etc which his depart-lar, Atlas;

23, 1784. age, dated tion with

Tippoo; arrival and proposal of Tippoo's vakeels, and minute of the Select Committee on them; advice received about the same time from Mr. Anderson, communicating the proposals made by Tippoo to Nana Farnavale for peace with the English—little difference between these and those made at Madras; Sindia's letter to Tippoo, complaining of his not having yet complied with the 9th article of the treaty of Salbey—positively requiring it, and threatening, if he did not, that the English and Mahrattas would unite against him; our instructions of November 14 to the Select Committee at Fort St. George, prescribing the terms of peace, and authorising them to conclude one accordingly.—before these were finished, a letter arrived from Mr. Anderson, with a copy of an agreement made by him on October 28 with Sindia, for an alliance between the Company and the Mahrattas against Tippoo, if he did not accede to the 9th article of the treaty of Salbey; letter received by the Governor General from Nizam Ali Cawn, expressing a wish to unite with the Company and the Mahrattas against Tippoo, on the terms proposed three years ago, and repeating his demand of payment of the Peshcush—acquainted him, in answer, with Tippoo's declared desire to conclude a peace, and that a negotiation is on foot for this purpose; but that, if hostilities should be renewed, we shall apply to him for advice and assistance in bringing that chief to terms; repeated our solemn declaration of the justice of his demand, and promise to answer it as soon as we are able.

General Letter per Worcester, Nov. 30, 1783.

Advice from Goa, October 4, with copies of letters from officers at Onore and Canwar; distressed condition of those garrisons; commission and instruction to Messrs. Sadler and Staunton, deputed to Tippoo; letter from the Council at Fort St. George, October 1, against surrendering the assignment at this time; scarcity of grain; sufferings on this account in the upper provinces; measures taken to relieve the country from this calamity; grounds of them; vindication against the complaints which these measures are likely to produce against us at Fort. St. George—will give every encouragement to ships going to the coast of Arracan, Pegu, Siam, and other eastern ports, to procure grain for the relief of that presidency; various instances of the disrespect and inattention shown us by your servants there: they did all they could do, by their indiscreet instructions to Mr. Anderson, to precipitate the conclusion of the Mahratta treaty; and after generally approving it in the strongest terms, they censured it for not containing an indemnification for the expenses of the war with Hyder, and losses in the Carnatic; and, notwithstanding the obligation imposed upon Hyder in the 9th article, they have abusively depreciated it, by avoiding even the slightest use of it in the negotiation with Tippoo.

(To be continued.)

Ad-

ADVICES FROM AMERICA.

Philadelphia, May 15. This day was held in this city a meeting of the Cincinnati Society, composed of naval and military officers of the United States and of France (who served in America); when, after a variety of regulations, the following order was agreed upon; General Washington in the chair, &c.

The society shall have an order, which shall be a bald eagle of gold, bearing on its breast the emblem hereafter described, suspended by a deep blue ribbon edged with white, descriptive of the union of America and France:

The principal figure,

Cincinnatus: the senator presenting him with a sword and other military ensigns;—on a field, in the back ground, his wife standing at the door of their cottage; near it a plough, and other instruments of husbandry:

Omnia relinquit servare Republicam.

On the reverse:

Sun rising—city with open gates, and vessels entering the port: Fame crowning Cincinnatus with a wreath, inscribed,

Virtutis premium:

Hands joining, supporting a heart—with the motto

Esto perpetua.

Round the whole,

Societas Cincinnatiarum, instituta

A. D. M, DCC, LXXXIII.

A silver medal, representing the emblem, to be given to each member of the society; together with a diploma on parchment, wherein shall be impressed the figures of the order and medal, as above-mentioned.

IRISH AFFAIRS.

Dublin, June 21. Saturday se'nnight a number of persons, about seven o'clock in the morning, assembled in a riotous manner before the house of Mr. Alex. Clarke, maiter-taylor; and eight or nine of them having forcibly entered, they stripped him quite naked, and with a brush besmeared him with tar, assigning, as their reason, that he was an importer of English cloth.—A proclamation has since been issued, for apprehending the ringleaders.

Dublin, July 6. The High Sheriffs waited on his Grace the Lord Lieutenant with the petition of the aggregate body of the inhabitants of the city of Dublin to his Majesty, requesting his Excellency that he would be pleased to transmit the same. He returned the following answer:

“Gentleman, at the same time that I comply with your request, I shall not fail to convey my entire disapprobation of the contentions as casting unjust reflections on the laws and Parliament of Ireland, and tending to weaken the authority of both.”

Dublin, July 6. The play of Douglas being ordered by his Grace the Lord Lieutenant, on the rising of the curtain the audience cried out for the volunteers' march, which on his Excellency's entrance was played accordingly.

The play, or more properly the clamour, now began, and choruses of groaning, hissing, and shouting, with whistles, cat-calls, horse-legs, and geld-horns, all kept in tune by the trunk-maker, thundered through the house, and made the drama a complete farce. The manager was called upon: “I am,” said he, “the servant of the public, and wish to know “whether it is your will the performance “should continue.” The propriety of this speech was universally approved, and the play was suffered to go on, but with frequent interruptions. A few scenes were acted, and the catastrophe introduced. The entertainment concluded a few minutes after eight, when the Viceroy withdrew, but not unnoticed, the former music attending him to the castle. Among those who were most noticed on this occasion was the Adjutant of the Goldsmiths' corps. Him the sheriff trepanned out of the house by a tap on the shoulder. On passing the door, he was hurried to the guard-room, and his pockets searched; but he had not been there long before the multitude assembled, to the number of 4000, before the castle gate, and were continually increasing, so that it was thought necessary to release him. It has since been reported, that his Grace has solicited his recall.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, June 26. In consequence of a proclamation for preventing tumults and disorderly meetings in Scotland; and for &c., one of the principal ringleaders of the mobs at Cannon-mills was brought from Peebles on Thursday last, and committed to prison for trial. A gentleman's servant was likewise apprehended, and imprisoned, for being concerned in the same outrages. (See p. 470.)

PORT and COUNTRY NEWS.

Portsmouth, July 9. An artist lately arrived here from London in his own sloop, and employs himself in visiting the Royal George. His vessel lies constantly along-side the wreck; he has four assistants, and by means of leather tubes often spends hours on board the unfortunate ship. He is supplied with fresh air by, and gives his orders to, his people. On board his vessel is an iron machine of great purchase, whereby he is enabled to hoist up the guns and other valuables, and occasionally to rip up the ship's decks, &c. The ingenuity and enterprise of this man is astonishingly great; and whatever is recovered becomes his sole property. [Doubtful]

On the 15th instant, the Orestes sloop of war seized two smuggling luggers, in Christ Church Harbour, of great value; but unfortunately lost the maiter in the attack, who was shot dead by the smugglers from the shore. They had landed and carried off a large cargo of tea and spirits, with which they had loaded forty waggons and more than one hundred horses.

COUNTRY NEWS.

At Plymouth, on the 7th instant, there was an alarming storm of thunder, lightning, and rain, that never has been equalled in this country in the memory of man. The river Dart suddenly overflowed its banks, carrying away cottages, ricks of hay, sheep, and every thing moveable. The devastation was truly deplorable; the corn and hay on the meadows and fields adjacent were utterly spoilt. The storm was universal there, and while it lasted terrible.

It began at Bridgend, in Glamorganshire, about six in the evening; and from 8 to 10, the thunder was tremendous, and the lightning incessant, insomuch that the atmosphere appeared in one continued blaze; fortunately the rain fell in proportion, so as to abate the intenseness of the lightning, or the devastation must have been dreadful. The rain fell in torrents, and swelled the river Ogmore that runs through the town so suddenly, that people had not time to remove their goods before they were overflowed. Many people are totally ruined by it.

It appears to have extended from one end of the kingdom to the other westward; for at Leeds and its neighbourhood it did a great deal of damage on the Thursday morning. At Fryston three oxen were struck dead by lightning; and at Doncaster several dwelling-houses were much shattered, trees shivered, and the corn every where laid flat.

At Oxford and its neighbourhood the storm of thunder, lightning, and rain, lasted from nine in the evening till three next morning. The rain was so remarkably heavy, that upwards of a perpendicular inch of water fell in six hours; a quantity equal to a 20th part of what falls generally in a whole year.

At Reading the storm was attended with a kind of hurricane, which extended about a mile in breadth, beat down the corn, killed the birds in the trees, and nearly destroyed a house at Thatcham, the window frames of which were burnt to cinders. Providentially no person was hurt in the house; except a child, who received a slight bruise by the falling of a brick.

It began about half past two at Norwich, and continued near four hours, attended with heavy falls of rain, that overflowed several parts of that city: the lightning was incessant, and many of the peals of thunder very loud and awful. Between five and six o'clock the country house of John Gurney, Esq; at Bramerton, was struck by the lightning, which divided into two branches, the one by the bell wire across the hall, the other across the window and through the floor into the nursery chamber; where several of the children and a servant were in bed, but received no hurt. At North Burlingham, the dwelling-house of Mr. John Skinner was entirely consumed by the lightning.

The eastern limit of the above tempest appears to have been about two miles on this side of Basingstoke; from hence upwards beyond Hook the rain was from nine until after ten o'clock almost a volume of water; and the thunder and lightning the most tremendous that imagination can conceive, being incessant, and extremely loud and vivid. Many houses were flooded. Great injury has been done to the grain, and many cattle killed.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

June 25.

A bill was this day brought into parliament for enabling the E. India Company to make a dividend of 4. per cent. on their capital stock for the half year now due only.

June 29.

The negotiation for the New Loan was concluded. The minister appointed a competition, and conducted it with firmness. The one set of money-lenders were Mr. Harley, Mr. Drummond, and those who are in habits of intimacy with Mr. Pitt; the other party consisted of 20 bankers of eminence. Both parties desired to know, as a preliminary, whether the minister would close with the offer that should be lowest? His answer was, Most certainly: but, at the same time, he must reserve to himself a negative; otherwise, should he close with the lowest, an understanding might take place between the parties, which might render the competition useless; with this reserve, he frankly and honestly declared, that the lowest bonâ fide offers should be accepted.—Thus settled, Messrs. Harley and his party offered to take the loan at six shillings; and Messrs. Boldero and their party at sixpence less. The minister closed with the latter. It was previously stipulated, that which-ever party had the loan should have the sole distribution of it, with the usual reserve for the public offices. As soon therefore as the matter was settled, Mr. Pitt ordered circular letters to be sent to his friends, to prevent fruitless applications.

June 30.

A General Court of Proprietors of East India stock was held at the East India House. The chair was taken soon after twelve, when the chairman informed the proprietors, that, in consequence of a late Act of Parliament, the affairs of the Company were in that particular situation, as not to admit of any dividend this half year; but that, having made application to the First Lord of the Treasury, a short bill of accommodation had been brought into parliament, and passed, which enabled the company to make a dividend. A motion was therefore made, that a dividend of 4l. per cent. on the whole company's stock be made for the half year, from Christmas 1783, to Midsummer-day last, which passed unanimously.

This day Prince Caramanico; envoy extraordinary from the King of Naples, was at court, and had a private audience of leave of his Majesty.

As the Prince of Wales was going on a visit on horseback, a few miles from town,

two

two carriages passing the road together, his horse got between them, by which his Highness was much bruised, and narrowly escaped with life.

The gold medals, bequeathed by the late Sir William Browne, were this year adjudged to the following gentlemen: For the Greek Ode, to Mr. Ramsden, of Trinity College, Cambridge; for the Latin Odes, to Mr. Wollaston, of St. John's, and Mr. Reeves, of King's; for the Greek Epigram, to Mr. Stephenson, of King's.

Thursday, July 1.

There was a Court of Common Council for the transaction of the city business, when Mr. John Withers moved for that honourable court to give a sum for the relief of the six children of the late much lamented Sir Barnard Turner; but, as it is not customary for the members of that court to grant any sum till previous notice given, Friday next is fixed for that purpose, when there is not the least doubt but the business will be taken up, and a sum granted in the liberal manner which has always particularized that honourable court on similar occasions. We understand that five trustees are to be appointed to take the care of the children, and all monies subscribed are to be placed in the funds for their education, maintenance, &c.

Friday 2.

By the 'KING, a PROCLAMATION.
GEORGE R.

Whereas Definitive Treaties of Peace and Friendship between us, the States General of the United Provinces, and the United States of America, have been concluded at Paris, and the ratifications thereof duly exchanged: In conformity thereunto we have thought fit hereby to command, that the same be published throughout all our dominions: And we do declare to all our loving subjects our will and pleasure, that the said Treaties of Peace and Friendship be observed inviolably, as well by sea as land, and in all places whatsoever; strictly charging and commanding all our loving subjects to take notice hereof, and conform themselves thereunto accordingly. Given at our Court at St. James's, the 2d of July, 1784, in the 24th year of our Reign. GOD save the KING.

The above was followed by a Royal Proclamation, appointing and commanding, that a General Thanksgiving to Almighty God for these his mercies be observed throughout England, Wales, and the Town of Berwick upon Tweed, on Thursday the 29th instant July. Also a similar Proclamation for a publick Thanksgiving to be observed in Scotland the same day.

Mr. Pitt made a motion "for leave to bring in a bill for granting relief to the East India Company, by respiting the payment of the duties due to Government, by permitting the company at home to accept bills drawn from India, and by establishing regulations respecting their dividends," which was agreed to.

Saturday 3.

Two gentlemen, lately arrived from India, came in two coaches, with several trunks in them, to a gentleman's house in Fenchurch Street; but he not being at home, they left the trunks, and went to his mother's, in Marlborough Street, Oxford Road, when two men, dressed like porters, went to the above house, in Fenchurch Street, in about two hours afterwards, there being only the coachman and maid in the house, and said they came from the gentlemen for the two smallest trunks, which the coachman gave them, when they immediately decamped with them. The contents were very considerable.

Tuesday 6.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer called the attention of the House to his new bill for the establishment of a permanent government in India. In the course of a long speech, he proposed several regulations respecting the affairs of the East India Company, of which he entered into a full discussion. These regulations respected, in the first place, the government of India at home; in the second place, its administration abroad; and, lastly, they regarded the establishment of a court of judicature, the object of which was the punishment of those who by misdemeanor or otherwise had rendered themselves subjects of judicial inflictions, and concluded with the following motion, viz. "That leave be given to bring in a bill for the better regulation and management of the East India Company, and of the possessions in India," which was agreed to.

Wednesday 7.

The Sessions began at the Old Bailey, when the trial of Robert Moore came on, for robbing Mrs. Jeffries, of Devonshire Square, of a diamond pin value 500*l.* on the evening of the King's birth-day. The lady was escorted to her coach by Count Dillon, when Lord Townshend stopped her, and at the same time the prisoner passed her, with "How beautiful! how elegant!" and in a moment made a snatch at the pin, which, being well fixed, did not give way till the hair came with it; and notwithstanding this check, and that the prisoner was surrounded on every side, he ran off with the jewel, pursued by the Count; who at length secured him, but not till he had got rid of his booty, by conveying it to an accomplice. After a trial, in which the greatest lenity was shewn, he was found guilty: but recommended by the lady to mercy.

At the anniversary meeting of the Society for the relief of Widows and Orphans of Clergymen in the Diocese of Canterbury, the sum of £.289. 16*s.* was distributed among ten widows and seventeen orphans.

Thursday 8.

The new organ, built by Mr. Samuel Green, and which figured at Handel's jubilee (see p. 458), was opened in Canterbury Cathedral, by Dr. Hayes, professor of music at Oxford. The placing of it over the stalls at the entrance of the choir (instead of the North side) has produced that happy effect so long withed by every admirer of that ancient and magnificent structure. The ornamental parts of the case and loft, all in true Gothic taste, surmounted with spires, embellished with pointed arches, and occupying almost the whole of the grand arch under Bell Harry Steeple, gave satisfaction, on the first view, to every eye; but, when the musical powers of the instrument were displayed, the auditors, who, it is supposed, were about 2000, were struck with astonishment, as well by its superior excellence, as the known and acknowledged abilities of the performer. In the morning service were introduced the Te Deum and Jubilate of Messieurs Hall and Hine, and a Thanksgiving Anthem (Psalm cvi), composed by Mr. Henry Purcell. And a Sermon, suitable to the occasion (which we hope will appear in print), was preached by the Reverend the Dean (Dr. Horne), from Psalm lviii. 8: Awake up, my glory, awake, lute and harp, (the motto of the organ); in which he gave an historical deduction of sacred music from the earliest times, exemplified by scripture; observed, that organs were mentioned in the fourth century (by Julian, we suppose, see p. 447), and were first introduced into churches in the seventh; elegantly panegyriced those great masters, Purcell, Blow, Greene, and Handel, whom he justly styled "the classics of that art;" appositely introduced the late jubilee at Westminster, &c.—Conate Domino and Deus miseratur, by (the late) Dr. William Hayes, and a Thanksgiving Anthem (Psalm xxxiii) by Dr. Philip Hayes, made part of the evening service, with several voluntaries, to shew the various stops and powers of that noble piece of mechanism, which has (it is said) 2500 pipes. See p. 535.

The annual prizes at Winchester College were spoken for to a numerous and most respectable audience, and the medals adjudged to the following young gentlemen. The gold medal, given by the Earl of Aylesbury for Latin verse, to Mr. Woolcombe. The two silver medals, given by the same nobleman, for the best Latin oration, to Mr. Wool; for the best English oration, to Mr. Glynn. The prizes given by Lord Rivers for the best English essay, to Mr. Broughton; and for the best copy of English verses, to Mr. Wells.

Between the hours of one and two in the morning, as Mr. Charles Linton, musician, was returning home from a friend's house, he was stopped in St. Martin's Lane by a villain, who demanded his money, and the demand was instantly complied with, and he was going on, when the villain who had robbed him of his money, being joined by an accomplice, came up to him again, and demanded his watch, which Mr. Linton refused to deliver, and twisted the chain round his hand; on which the first villain threw his arms round him, while the other struggled with him for it, and, finding him resolute, gave him a mortal stab in the abdomen, and snatching the watch with violence, the chain broke, and the villains made off. Mr. Linton's cries were so piercing, that they were heard by Mr. Jarvis, a surgeon, who followed him, and found him clung round a watchman, having followed the murderers till quite exhausted. Mr. Jarvis questioned him as to the fact, but the only answer he received was, "My poor wife and children!" All possible assistance was given him; but he died in a quarter of an hour after he had reached Mr. Jarvis's house in May's Buildings. The interposition of Providence was remarkable in the discovery of the murderers. An intimate friend of Mr. Linton's passing Hedge-row, heard two women discoursing about a murder, and, without farther notice, applied to a magistrate, who granted a warrant to search, and one Nixon was apprehended at the house where the women were overheard. Being committed to Tothill-Fields Bridewell, he was there visited by his accomplice Morgan, and their conversation being listened to, what passed strengthened the suspicion that they were the actual murderers; and Morgan being charged home made a full discovery, as he said, to ease his conscience, which had never been at rest since the fact was committed.

Friday 9.

Mr. Pitt's long expected India Bill was brought in, and has met with strenuous opposition.

Saturday 10.

A remarkable cause, which was to have been tried at Guildhall, was made up by compromise. It appeared that the late Mr. Byrne, the Irish giant (see vol. LIII. p. 431) had been robbed of two bank notes, one of 700l. the other of 70l. That of 700l. was traced to Mr. Atkinson, who insisted that he had given value for it, viz. 400l. in cash, and 300l. in goods; but the executor to Byrne proving that notice had been given of the theft previous to his exchanging the notes, a compromise of 500l. was proposed and accepted, and each party paid their own costs.

Monday 11.

At the General Sessions of the peace held at Canterbury, for that city and county, Mary Davis, for stealing 10 louis d'ors and five guineas from David Thompson, at the Star in that city, (see p. 377) was acquitted, the prosecutor not appearing, and his recognizance was ordered to be estreated. She was dressed in a purple coat, green shag waistcoat, buckskin breeches, and round hat, all entirely new, and her hair powdered and curled.

Tuesday 12.

The Sessions at the Old Bailey ended, when 18 convicts received sentence of death;

two

two of whom were found guilty at the former sessions, but the third left special: one was James Napier, for assaulting the Hon. Albion Hobart, near the Opera-house, and taking from her person a diamond ear-ring, which he forcibly tore from her ladyship's ear, but slipping from his fingers, fell into her handkerchief. The doubt seemed to be whether this was a taking from her person.

Wednesday 14.

A cause was tried before Mr. Justice Buller and a special jury, in which Mr. Edmund Burke was plaintiff, and the Printer of the Public Advertiser defendant. The action was brought for a libel against Mr. Burke, and the damages laid at 5000l. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with 100l. damages.

Friday 16.

This day the following bills received the royal assent by commission, viz. The Lottery Bill—The Bill to enable disbanded Soldiers to exercise Trades—The Scotch Bank Bill—The Irish Postage Bill; and a great number of local and private Bills.

Monday 19.

The Lascelles Indiaman arrived from St. Helena. She parted with the Norfolk the 3d of June.

The General Elliot Indiaman is likewise arrived.

Tuesday 20.

The Stormont and Mars Indiamen arrived safe in Margate Roads.

The royal assent was given by commission to the Candle Duty, and to the Bill for continuing the Commissioners of Accounts.

At a meeting of the Medical Society of London, Dr. Latham was unanimously chosen their president.

Wednesday 21.

The Morse and Stormont Indiamen arrived safe at Gravesend.—By a letter from Madras, Tippoo Saib is said to have caused the Killidar of Mangalore and his principal officers, who surrendered that fort to the English, to as, and in the sight of his the mouths of his great were reproach: "I, with aged the place for eight not take it: How then y souls suffer it to be taken men, when you had 4000 [This wants confirmation.]

Friday 22.

as the Prince of Wales Majesties, and instantly elmsloe, to bathe for the his health, being advised Scians.

Sunday 24.

General Coote Indiamen at Dover.

Monday 27.

vice was received of the Norfolk Indiaman from

This morning a terrible fire broke out in Abchurch-Lane, and by the falling-in of the front wall of the house where the fire began, eight spectators in the street were hurled in the ruins, only one of whom is likely to survive.

This day John Branton, for house-breaking, Thomas White, for robbing the house of Lady Forrester John Richards, for a like offence in the house of George Dodgson, in St. Martin's-le Grand, William Thompson, for counterfeiting an indorsement on a bill of exchange, and George Dunc, for stealing a coat, and breaking out of a house in Butcher-Row, East-Smithfield, convicts who received sentence of death in May last, were executed on the scaffold erected for that purpose before Newgate. Thompson, it appears, found means to send a threatening letter to the Recorder, and another to his Lady.

Tuesday 29.

Being the day appointed for a General Thanksgiving, the Bishop of St. David's preached before the House of Peers, at Westminster Abbey; and the Rev. Dr. Prettyman before the House of Commons, at St. Margaret's church.

Recapitulation of the new taxes.

Hair	—	—	£150,000
Linens, &c.	—	—	220,000
Ribbons, &c.	—	—	120,000
Candles	—	—	100,000
Additional Tax on Letters, &c.	—	—	120,000
Licences	—	—	80,000
Qualifications	—	—	10,000
Bricks and Tiles	—	—	50,000
Plate	—	—	25,000
Game keepers	—	—	30,000
Ale Licences	—	—	30,000
Paper	—	—	18,000
Lead	—	—	15,000
Horses	—	—	100,000
Hackney Coaches	—	—	12,000

Besides the above, with other taxes not yet settled, a tax upon race-horses is to take place.

The thunder storm of the 7th instant, which we have already remarked was chiefly felt in the western parts of this kingdom, we now find to have been still more dreadful on the western coasts of France. From Harfleur to Nanta houses were thrown down, and trees torn up by the roots. At St. Maloes the inhabitants for seven hours were kept in continual dread of the town being set on fire, and the King's arsenal blown up; wet sails were applied, and the engines kept continually playing. The elementary fluid was so powerful as to blast the timbers of a man of war upon the stocks in such a manner as to render them totally unfit for use.

Accounts from Hudson's Bay mention the return of Governor Hearne, who was taken prisoner in the late war by the French, (see Vol. LIII.) to his government of Fort Prince of Wales.—Of this gentleman we shall take occasion to make honorable mention in some future magazine.

The

The late Sir Tho. Sewell, master of the Rolls (see pp. 237, 238.), was bred up under an attorney, afterwards engaged in the laborious business of a draughtsman in chancery, and was called to the bar, where his diligence and attention were such as to procure him very considerable practice. He was an unsuccessful candidate for Exeter in the parliament 1761 *. On the death of Sir Tho. Clarke, he was appointed master of the Rolls, Dec. 4, 1764. In the latter part of his life his infirmities made his resignation desirable; but the terms he required for enjoyment of otium cum dignitate, are supposed to have been so high as to prevent any thing being settled, and he died in possession of his office, Mar. 6, 1784, and was buried in the Rolls chapel. He married, first, one of the two daughters of Tho. Heath, esq; of Stansted Mountchetch, in Essex, who was one of the sons of Tho. H. esq; of Mile-End, co. Middlesex. She died Jan. 17, 1769. He had issue by her 3 sons; 1. Thomas, who married Lady Betty Birmingham, only dau. of the E. of Louth in Ireland. He has been divorced from her. He had by her a son, born Feb. 2, 1774, who died an infant. 2. An officer in the army. 3. Now rector of Byfleet, in Surrey, to which he was presented by the chancellor in 178. He had also two daughters; 1. Married, first, to Mr. Shelton, of Doctors Commons; and, 2dly, to Nehemiah Winter, esq; one of the six clerks in chancery; from whom she is separated. 2. Married, in 1773, to Matth. Lewis, esq; of the war-office; from whom she is separated. Sir Thomas married to his 2d wife, Mar. 20, 1773, Miss Sibthorpe, dau. of Dr. S. of Oxford (professor of botany there), a lady of the most amiable character. She survived him. By her he had a daughter, born Aug. 4, 1774, who died soon after. Before he was appointed to the Rolls, he built and lived in one of the high houses in Lincoln's-inn fields, on the side next Portugal-row. He also bought of Mr. Woodford a house called Ottershaw, a little south of Chertsey, in Surrey, where he laid out considerable sums of money in building a new house, making plantations, and otherwise improving the grounds.

S. H.

Sir James Brown, who died lately (see p. 318), had long been in pursuit of a large estate which he supposed to belong to him; Lord Mansfield was of a different opinion, and drew on himself the heavy resentment of Mr. Burtenshaw (Sir James's attorney), who wrote a book to prove that Ld M's opinion was wrong, and opened a subscription to support a new trial, which however has not taken place. We believe Sir James was one of the partners in a lottery-office in King-st. Guildhall, in the year of the guinea lottery, but the office shut up before the lottery was over.

The dowager Countess of Harrington, who was daughter of Charles D. of Grafton, and died at 5 o'clock on Monday morning, June 28 (see p. 478), was in perfect health, and spent the evening with Lord and Lady Lincoln, her daughter, till nine o'clock on Sunday. At her taking leave she drank a glass of water in her carriage, then went home, and is supposed to have been seized with some convulsive disorder, which increased to such an height as to cause her death, notwithstanding every assistance of the faculty.

BIRTHS.

May 7. LADY of Philip Yorke, esq; a son and heir.

July 15. Lady of Jerem. Milles, esq; a son and heir.

21. Lady Frances Alicia Benyon, a son.

MARRIAGES.

LATELY, at Lymington, Hants, Capt. Ambr. Reddall, of the navy, to Miss Scott, of Poole, co. Dorset.

At Aberdeen, Abra. Bonbury, esq; capt. in 62d reg. of foot, to Miss Christy Innes.

Wm. Gibbon, esq; of Cowbridge, to Miss Price.

At St. Alban's, Geo. Bradshaw, esq; of 56th reg. to Miss Cotton, dau. of the late Dr. C.

John White, esq. of Hendon, to Miss Lyna. M. Geo. Chandler, surgeon to St. Thomas's Hospital, to Miss Lyde.

At Worcester, Fra. Townsend, esq; Windsor herald, to Miss Protheroe.

Cha. Brown, esq; of 15th reg. to Miss Lake.

Capt. Rodney, 2d son to Lord R. to Lady Cath. Nugent, dau. of the E. of Westmeath.

June 14 After due publication of banns on three several Sundays, by the rev. Dr. Trevor, in the Protestant chapel at Ostend, rev. — Lambert, to Miss Bowles, of Shaftesbury, Dorset.

26. Mr. Morell, late purser of the Fortitude, to Miss Triquet.

Lieut. Col. Ironside, in E. India service, to Miss Neil.

28. By special licence at her mother's house in Pall-Mall, Miss Keppell, daughter of the late Bp. of Exeter, to the hon. Col. Fitzroy, eldest son of Ld Southampton.

By special licence, at Lambeth Chapel, by the Abp. of Canterbury, Evan Law, esq; son of the Bp. of Carlisle, to Miss Markham, dau. of the Abp. of York.

By special licence, hon. and rev. Jacob Marsham, 2d son of Ld Romney, to Miss Bullock, only dau. of Jos. B. esq; of Caversfield, Bucks.

29. By special licence, right hon. Ld Visc. Falmouth, to Miss Crewe, only dau. of John C. esq;

July 3. Dan. Adey, esq; of Bath, to Miss Vines.

5. Mr. Jackson, an ingenious letter-founder in Salisbury court, to Mrs. Pasham, relict of the late Mr. P. printer, in Blackfriars.

7. Rev. Cha. Westerne, of Hertford Coll. Oxford, to Miss Gostrey.

8. Jo. Farhill, esq; to Miss Wilson, young dau. of the late Sir Tho. W. of West Wickham, Kent.

9. Geo.

* Query, if not chosen elsewhere.

9. Geo. Ward, esq; to Miss Woodfall, of Peter-noster-row.

12. By special licence, at Cambridge, by the Bp. of Carlisle, Geo. Law, esq; fellow of Queen's College, his lordship's youngest son, to Miss Adeane, dau. of Gen. Adeane, M. P. for Cambridge.

Abel Chapman, esq; to Miss Rebecca Bell.

14. Geo. Cure, esq; of Eversley, Hants, to Miss Willis.

Geo. Vaughan, esq; to Mrs. Tibbs.

By a special licence, rev. John Clotworthy Skeffington, nephew to the late E. of Massareene, to Miss Martha Carter, of Kennington, Kent.

At Edmonton, rev. — Scott, to Miss Sheldon, school-mistress of the same place.

— Cumberland, esq; to Miss Hobart, dau. of the hon. Mr. H.

15. Brooke Boothby, esq; eldest son of B. B. esq; of Ashbourne-Place, co. Derby, to Miss Bristow.

At Sudbury, rev. John Pretyma, fellow of Pembroke hall, Cambr. and rector of Shotley, Suffolk, to Miss Kedington.

16. Mr. Holmes, timber-merch. in Blackman-street, Southwark, aged upwards of 70, to the Widow Davies, a wealthy cowkeeper in St. George's-fields.

Col. Lum, of Ireland, to Mrs. Anna Maria Donaldson.

18. Mr. Gen. Hooper, linen-draper, to Mrs. Hancock, relict of the late resident at Naples.

19. At Uley, Gloucestersh John Holbrow, esq; to Miss Phillimore, dau. of Sam. P. esq;

21. By special licence, hon. Wm. Wyndham, brother to the E. of Egremont, to Miss Harford, of Russel-place, late Mrs. Morris. See p. 383.

22. Edw. Barner, esq; to Miss Pete, dau. of the rev. Dr. P.

Edw. Barnard, esq; son of the late Provost of Eton College, to Miss Beadon, dau. of the rev. Mr. Beadon, of North Stoneham, Hants, and one of his Majesty's chaplains in ordinary.

25. At Bath, Mrs. Thrale, relict of the late Henry Thrale, esq; to Gabriel Piozzi, of Venice.

28. Rev. John Collier, of Whitchurch, Shropshire, to Miss Sandland.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at Brookhill, in Ireland, Lovelace Love, esq; This gentleman was noted for his extraordinary bulk; weighing upwards of 40 stone; his coffin measured seven feet in length, four across, and three and a half deep. His death was occasioned by his immense corpulency.

At Brussels, where he went for the recovery of his health, hon. Redmond Morris, brother to the late Ld Mountmorres, and M. P. for the city of Dublin.

At Caen, in Normandy, Mrs. Goreham, wife of Col. G. now on service in the Eng. army.

In Wapping, Capt. Cornelius Walton.

Suddenly, at Fairford, Bucks, rev. Tho. a dissenting minister.

At Aberdeen, Mr. Rob. Sandby, youngest son of Mr. S. banker in London.

At Liverpool, aged 104, Walter Warson. He enlisted for a soldier in 1702.

Mr. Tho. Norton, formerly a haberdasher in Fleet-street.

At St. Alban's, Tho. Kitchen, esq; hydrographer to his Majesty.

Mr. Digges, late of the Haymarket theatre. His disorder was a violent fever, attended with a frenzy.

June... At Low-Leyton, the relict of the late Rob Dingley, esq;

At her house at Chestnut, the relict of Mr. Gwilt, and sister of the late Mr. Shaw, of Chestnut house.

Mr. John Wynde, an eminent apothecary in Warwick-court, Holborn, formerly belonging to the Small-pox hospital.

10. In Argyleshire, Col. Donald Campbell, formerly high in command on the Coast of Coromandel.

15. At Edinburgh, rev. Wm. Falconer. He had the honour of holding the highest office in the episcopal church of Scotland for 43 years.

At Calvert, Major Cha. Cameron, captain in the 76th reg. of foot.

16. Mr. Allen, coal-merchant and wharfinger, at Limehouse.

21. At Shrewsbury, Cheney Hart, M. D. in the commission of the peace for the co. of Salop. The greatest professional merit and abilities were manifested by this gentleman during a long and very extensive practice in that place. His constant, faithful, and disinterested attendance as physician to the public infirmary of the town for upwards of 33 years; and his anxiety to provide and secure for such who were there under his care every possible accommodation and relief, gave the most decisive proofs of the humanity and benevolence of his disposition. He had long laboured under an internal complaint, of the nature and fatal tendency of which he was fully apprized. After having in vain tried every remedy which either his own knowledge and experience, or the advice of others his medical friends, could suggest, he resigned himself to the dispensations of Providence with the most decent calmness and a truly Christian composure, in the 58th year of his age.

O worthy longer days! for thee shall often flow
The pious solitary tear,

And thoughtful friendship sadden o'er thy urn.

23. Jn. Currer, of Kildwick, near Skipton, esq; aged 63. F. A. S. son of the late Rich. Richardson, of N. Bierley, esq; of whose Collections for the History of the Archdeaconry of Craven, see Brit. Topog. II. 398. 401. The bulk of Mr. C's fortune, which is very considerable, goes to his nephew, Mr. Richardson. Mr. C. was bred an attorney; but on a good estate devolving to him, for which he changed his name, being naturally of a shy and reserved disposition, he indulged his taste for retirement, and the pursuit of the history and antiquities antiquities of his native county. He was possessed of all the materials for an history of Yorkshire, collected by Mr John Hopkinson, of Loft-house, in that county.

At Oporto, Mr. Steph. Thompson, merch.

26. At Brompton, rev. — Atkinson, prebendary of Chichester, and rector of Brompton, co. Suffex.

27. In Gr. Peter Street, Westminster. aged 102, George Sims.

28 Suddenly, in the afternoon, after perfectly recovering from a slight paralytic stroke, which she received in the morning, Mrs Ann Philips, of Astley, near Bridgnorth, a maiden lady, aged 64. In her conduct during this long course of life, she invariably proved herself the real christian and the sincere friend; pious without ostentation, charitable, humane; always ready to relieve the distresses of the poor, and reward the labour of the industrious. Being of a lively cheerful disposition, she was a good companion, equally communicating and receiving pleasure from the conversation of respectable company, in which only she took any delight. Her friends and acquaintances were numerous, and by them, and all who had the pleasure of knowing her, her death will be long lamented. The poor have lost a liberal benefactress, and society a good friend.

In Benhill-row, Moorfield. rev. Dav. Wilson.

At Warrington, Mr. Thos Lee, sen. merch.

At Bath, John Fallett, esq; in the commission of the peace for Surrey.

29. In Red Lion-square Mr. Crane, one of the senior surgeons of St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

30. At Edinburgh, Mr. John Welsh, goldsmith, and late captain of the tolbooth there.

Rev. Wm. Cayley, M. A. one of the residentiaries, and a prebendary of York cathedral; also one of the prebendaries of Southwell, and vicar of Agnes-Burton and Rudston.

July 1. Mr. Thos. Brewman, printer, New-Square, Shoe-lane.

In Portland-place, Sir Patr. Blake, bart. late M. P. for Sudbury.

3. Hawkeithworth, esq; one of the clerks belonging to Chelsea Hospital.

2. At sea, on board the Jamaica, Capt. Barry, off Cape Cornwall, Mr. John Highmore, formerly of the Royal Exchange assurance-office. His wife died on board the same Wyatt, esq; formerly an eminent attorney in the city.

5. In the bloom of life, at Enfield, where she had just moved into the rectory-house, Mrs. Hand, dau. of the late — Dickensson, esq; of Tottenham, who died in 1783, and wife of the rev. O. Watson Hand, R. of Enfield, V. of St. Giles Cripplegate, archdeacon of Dorset, and son of the late Br. Newton's 14 wife.

Of a violent fever, Mr. Grosvenor, son of Mr. G. perfumer, in Holborn.

In Bedford-square Mrs. Jurn, relict of Dr. J.

6. At Middleham, Yorkshire, Sir Robt. Keyt, bart.

7. Mrs. Nicoll, wife of Mr. William N. bookseller in St. Paul's Church-yard.

9. At his house at Winstead, in Essex, far advanced in years, Matthew Buckle, esq; admiral of the blue, a brave and experienced officer. He commanded the Ruffel of 30 guns in the war of 1741, when he took the Glorioso of 74.

At York, Hen. Goodricke, esq; only son of the right hon. Sir John G. bart.

10. At Brussels, Robert Biggin, esq;

At his house at Lancaster, rev. Dan. Wilson; to whom and his three brother, the late Sir Wm. Lowther, of Holker, in that county, left by his will a considerable estate in Yorkshire, Mr. W. having been school-fellow with that beneficent gentleman.

11. At Enfield, aged 79, Mr. Wm. Capstick, attorney, of Furnival's-Inn; formerly one of the solicitors of the Marshalsea court, and partner with Mr. Cannon. He was buried in Enfield church-yard on the 26th, his only son and his son's servant walking as chief mourners, followed by his partner. The bell tolled an hour after the funeral.

At Bristol, in a deep decline, Geo. Bell, esq; professor in Doctors commons, and son of the late deputy Geo. B. of famous memory.

Mrs. Camden, wife of Mr. C. of Baynton-stone, Essex.

14. At Ilford, in Essex, Mrs. Mary Dodd, relict of the late unfortunate Dr. D. to whom she was married in 1751.

15. At Rein-Hall, Essex, after a lingering illness of ten years, Jos. Swin, esq;

16. At Gloucester, Jos. Losh, esq; an officer in 7th reg. of light dragoons. His death was occasioned by a violent fever, brought on by excessive exercise in walking.

At Chesham, Bucks, Mrs. Anne Skottowe, relict of Coullson S. esq;

18. At Tottenham, rev. Berwerth Liptratt, minister of that place.

At Ramsgate, in an advanced age, Mrs. Lafroy, of Canterbury.

At Packington, the seat of the E. of Aylesford, his lordship's only son, Lt Quarsey.

19. Mr. Isaac Lawrence, mayor of Oxford.

20. Mr. Wm. Gray, an alderman of Canterbury, aged 80.

Hen. Hammond, esq; of Stothons, near Canterbury.

23. Mrs. Wombwell, wife of — W, esq;
At Falflead, Essex, in her 105th year, Abigail Sewell.

25. At Wandsworth, Mr. Sheers, formerly a turpentine merchant.

At Newington, Mr. Rich. Day, formerly a merchant in London.

28. Advanced in years, Mr. Edm. Allen, printer, in Bolt-court, Fleet-street,

GAZETTE PROMOTIONS.

July 3. SIR James Harris, K. B. appointed his Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the States General of the United Provinces.

Alexander Duke of Gordon, a baron and earl of Gr. Britain, by the title of Baron Gordon, of Huntley, in Gloucestershire, and Earl of Norwich, in Norfolk.

John Lord Talbot, a viscount and earl of G. Britain, by the title of Viscount of Ingeltrie, in Staffordshire, and Earl Talbot, of Hensol, in Glamorganshire.

Richard Lord Grosvenor, a viscount and earl of G. Britain, by the title of Viscount Belgrave, in Cheshire, and Earl Grosvenor.

Edward Lord Beaulieu, an earl of G. Britain, by the title of Earl Beaulieu, of Beaulieu, in Hants.

Hugh Blair, D.D. and Wm. Greenfield, joint professors of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the university of Edinburgh.

6. Cha. Logie, esq; agent and consul-general at Algiers.

Fownes Luttrell, esq; one of his Majesty's commissioners of taxes, vice Mr. Topham.

10. Geo. Mordon, esq; his Majesty's consul in the Islands of Majorca and Minorca.

17. Right hon. Sir John Blaquiére, K. B. and Robt. Warren, of Crookstown, co. Cork, esq; baronets of Ireland.

24. Rt. hon. Lloyd Kenyon, master of the rolls, a baronet of Gr. Britain.

27. James Visc. Cliefden, and Wm. Brabazon Ponsonby, esq; his Majesty's postmasters-general of Ireland; John Lees, esq; secretary; Lodge Morris, esq; treasurer, or receiver-general; John Armit, esq; accountant-general; Wm. Fortescue, esq; resident-surveyor; and Rob. Shaw, esq; comptroller of the sorting-office.

CIVIL PROMOTIONS.

MR. Crothers, under-sheriff to Mr. Ald. Hopkins; and Mr. Midford, under-sheriff to Mr. Ald. Bates.

Rev. Wm. Lucas, chapl. to Ald. Hopkins; and rev. Mr. Clark, minor canon of St. Paul's cathedral, chaplain to Ald. Bates.

Mr. John Burbank, elected senior bridge-master, vice Buffar, dec.

Mr. Barton, son of the late Dean of Bristol, one of the riding purveyors to his Majesty, vice Capt. Swiney, dec.

Mr. Cooper, organist, St. Sepulchre's Ch. London.

Rear-admiral Innes, commander in chief at Jamaica, vice Adm. Gambier, recalled.

Henry Tomkins, esq; receiver-general of the land-tax for co. Bucks.

Geo. Atwood, esq; a searcher in the customs, vice Sir O. Vandeput, dec.

Lieut. Gen. Boyd, governor of the Bahama Islands.

Sir Brook Bridges, bart. receiver-general of the land-tax for the co. of Kent.

ECCLESIASTICAL PREFERMENTS.

REV. Geo. Berkeley, LL.D. Inning V. co. Suff. [Given up before institution.]

Rev. Jn. Gosling, M.A. Alkham V. with Ferne Ch. Kent.

Rev. Geo. Gipps, B.A. Ringwould R. Kent.

Rev. John Howton, Hope Mansell R. co. Hereford.

Rev. Dav. Davies, Landough; Cogan, and Leckwith RR. near Caerdiff.

Rev. Lewis Jones, M.A. prebendary of Hill-Deverel, within the chu. of Heytesbury, Wilts.

Rev. Edw. Wilson, M. A. Moulton R. co. Suffolk, worth 300l. per annum.

Rev. Rob. Nares, Doddington V. co. Northa.

Rev. Fra. Metcalf, M. A. Rudston V. co. York.

Rev. Wm. Dade, M. A. Agnes Burton V. co. York.

Rev. Edw. Beckingham Benyon, M.A. one of the six preachers in Canterbury cathedral.

Rev. Wm. Ayerst, M.A. Eastbridge R. Kent.

DISPENSATIONS.

REV. John Andr. Clerk, M. A. Powderham and Milton Damerell RR. both co. Devon.

Rev. Edw. Jones, Loddington with Ludborough RR. co. Northampton.

B—NKR—PTS.

WILLIAM Stringer, of Elgham, Kent, butcher.

Cha. Fisher, of Bristol; dealer in earthen-ware.

Benj. Mee, of Fenchurch-str. merchant.

Wm. Bailey, of Birmingham, bookseller.

Henry Bromley, of Holborn, dealer.

Jas. Dunbar Innes, Brewer-street, druggist.

Tho. Douglass, of Holborn, mariner.

Wm. Jos. Rotton, Swansea, Glamorganshire, merchant.

Tim. De Souza Pinto, of Moorfields, merch.

Tho. Gibbs, Alcester, Warwicksh. butcher.

Edw. Hunt, of Portsmouth, dealer in liquors.

Sam. Davis, Church-court, St. Martin in the Fields, chinaman.

John Jackson, Tottenham-str. Middl. brandy-merchant.

Wm. Bell, Huby, Yorkshire, butcher.

Jas. Grocot, of Liverpool, woollen-draper.

Jas. Crompton, of Manchester, dyer.

John Branch, of Norwich, wine-merchant.

John Hen. Gentil, of Lawrence Poultney-hill, merchant.

Henry Ladler, of Durham, money-scrivener.

Rob. Donard, of Margaret-str. Cavendish-sq. upholsterer.

John Tasker, of the Minorics, linen-draper.

Fra. Daniell, of Bristol, merchant.

Tho. Bradford, Doncaster, Yorksh. upholsterer.

Pat.

Pat. Curtis and John Lloyd, of Tottenham-court-road, saddlers.
 Geo. Waller, Hoxham, Suffex, mercer.
 Dan. Beale, Prescot-street, Goodman's-fields, flour-factor.
 John Burnell the Younger, of Aldersgate-st. grocer.
 Rob. Nich. Dalton, Upper Moorfields, taylor.
 Wm. Sturdy, Leeds. Yorkshire, butcher.
 Rich. Councell, of Bristol, hooper.
 Geo. Ridpath the Younger, of Berwick upon Tweed, vintner.
 John Lamport, West Pennard, Somers. dealer.
 Rob. Scaman, of Norwich, woolcomber.
 Benjamin, Nathaniel, and Nath. Merriman, jun. of Marlborough, cheese-factors.
 Cha. Willingham, Bury St. Edmund's, Suff. can-chandler.
 Tho. Bram ill, Reddish, Lancsh. corn-factor.
 Sam. Seaman, Diss, Norfolk, woolcomber.
 Henry Crow, of Bristol, baker.
 Tho. Newstead, of Charing-cr. tavern-keeper.
 Geo. Dean Sanders, Leatherhead, Surr. tanner.
 Geo. Cartwright, of St. Ann, Soho, merchant.
 Wm. Young, Queen-st. Cheap-side, linen-draper.
 John Habbijam, of St. Katherine's-st. Tower, butcher.
 Hen. Mac Donald, of the Strand, hosier.
 Wm. Mowatt, Doncaster, Yorkshire, tallow-chandler.
 Tho. Coxhead, Reading, Berks, timber-merch.
 Jos. Johnson, of Liverpool, tallow-chandler.
 John Bowker, of Leadenhall-street, upholder.
 Rob. Walters, Watford, Herts, victualler.
 Rob. Clark, St. Martin's-co. St. Martin's-la. case-merchant.
 Tho. Antrum, Maple Durham, Oxf. miller.
 Edward Davis, of Bristol, hooper.
 James Carruthers, Deptford, Kent, shop-seller.
 Jos. Gettey and Wm. Walker, Wandsworth, Surrey, druggists.
 Wm. Briffow, Ullenhall, Warw. cordwainer.
 Rich. Roston, Cheshire, Staffordsh. cooper.
 Eliz. Smith, of Tavistock-street, milliner.
 Jona. Rose, of L. Titchfield-street, plaisterer.
 John Ashby, of Bungay, Suffolk.
 John Griffin, Lambeth, Surr. dealer in horses.
 Benj. and Nath. Merriman, of Marlborough, brewers.
 Wm. Turner and Wm. Toye, of Bristol, corn-factors.
 Wm. Bennett, of Gloucester, corn-factor.
 Wm. Savage, of St. Peter, Worcester-sh. glover.
 Rob. West, jun. of Forncett St. Peter, Norfolk, grocer.
 Providence Hansard, of Bristol, corn-factor.
 Simon Pougher, of Swallow-st. Piccadilly, dealer in liquors.
 John Casler, of Wolverhampton, carpenter.

Rob. Hoakley, of Nottingham-st. St. Mary-le-bone, merchant.
 Abram Haim Franco, of America-sq. Lond. merchant.
 John Munts, Crayford, Kent, callico-printer.
 Jas. Shaw, Southgate, Middl. dealer.
 Nich. Perry, of Bristol, currier.
 Jos. Fincher, St. John-st. Clerkenwell, grocer.
 John Dexter, of Desborough, Northamptonsh. money-scrivener.
 John Otaham, of Leeds, Yorkshire.
 Jos. Bowen, of New Band-st. bookseller.
 Jas. Hickman, of Birmingham, button-maker.
 Geo. Lowe, of the K. B. Prison, merchant.
 Alex. Smith, Hoxton, Middl. saddler.
 Wm. Atkinson, jun. of Kingston upon Hull, hatter.
 Tho. Rushton, of Liverpool, beer-brewer.
 Wm. Pratt, Wantage, Berks, scrivener.
 John Stokes, Walsall, Staffordsh. saddlers-ironmonger.
 Wm. Slocombe, of Bristol, linen-draper.
 Jas. Sutton and Jas. Bolt, Cheap-side, goldsmiths.
 John Hughes and Dan. Taylor, New London-street, grocers.
 John Weldon, of Bristol, merchant.
 Jas. Myatt, Stoney-st. Southwark, brewer.
 John Chr. Thomas, Gerard-street, Soho.
 Tho. Headland, Norton Folgate, corn-chandler.
 John Cock, of Pitcomb, Somersetshire.
 John Knareborough, Simpson, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, shopkeeper.
 Geo. Gibbons, Black Raven-co. Seething-lane, merchant.
 Dan. Campbell, of Cleveland-row, St. James's, merchant.
 Wm. Hornby Parker, Andover, Southa. hosier.
 Wm. Glover, Ledbury, Heref. clock-maker.
 Isaac Hinckley, of Birmingham, plater.
 John Davies, Northfield, Worc. apothecary.
 Wm. Anderson, Queen-st. Lond. merchant.
 Cater Rand, Lewes, Suffex, book-seller.
 John Haydock, of Liverpool, cooper.
 Wm. Milbourn, Newcastle upon Tyne, plumber.
 Wm. Thomson, Woodford, Essex, apothecary.
 Rob. Mitford, Cornhill, Lond. woollen-draper.
 John Dunn, of Bath, brewer.
 John Streeton, of Bath, haberdasher.
 Tho. Griffin, Hoxton, Middlesex, carter.
 John Sanders, Henley in Arden, Warwicksh. money-scrivener.

Commissions of Bankruptcy superseded.

John Bullock, Gr. Marlow, Bucks, stationer.
 John Brown, of Oxford, dealer in liquors.
 Rich. Moorey, Buxted, Suffex, corn-chandler.
 Wm. Clarke, and Wm. Clarke the Younger, of Luston, Herts, dealers.
 Dan. Beale, Prescot-street, Goodman's-fields, flour-factor.

Bill of Mortality from June 29, to July 20, 1784.

Christened.	Buried.
Males 688	Males 585
Females 649	Females 548
Whereof have died under two years old 318

Peck Loaf 2s. 6d.

Between	2 and 5	115	50 and 60	95
	5 and 10	46	60 and 70	83
	10 and 20	55	70 and 80	69
	20 and 30	107	80 and 90	17
	30 and 40	103	90 and 100	2
	40 and 50	224	100

EACH DAY'S PRICE OF STOCKS IN JULY, 1784.

Bank Stock.	3 per Cent. rednc.	3 per Cent. confels.	Ditt. 1726	4 per Cent. Confol.	Long Ann	Shore 1777.	Ditto 1778.	Ditt. 1779	India Stock.	India Ann.	India Bonds.	South Sea Stock.	Old Ann.	New Ann.	Navy Bills.	3 per Cent. Scrip.	4 per Cent. Scrip.	Excheq. Bills.	Lottery Tickets.
30 116	58 1/2	59 2/3	—	74 1/2	—	—	—	—	122 1/2	—	21 s.	—	—	—	14 1/2	58	—	—	16 0 0
29 115 1/2	58 1/4	58 3/4	—	74 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	19	—	—	—	14 1/4	57 1/4	—	—	15 0 0
28 115	58 1/8	58 1/2	—	74 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	18	—	—	—	15	57 1/8	—	—	15 14 0
27 Sunday	57 3/4	58 1/4	—	73 3/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	16	—	—	—	17 1/2	57 1/2	—	—	15 14 0
26 113 1/2	57 1/4	57 1/2	—	73 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	17	57	—	—	15 13 0
25 114	57 1/8	56 1/2	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	—	56 1/2	—	—	15 11 0
24 113 1/2	57 1/4	56 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	15	—	—	—	—	57	74	—	15 10 0
23 114	57 1/8	56 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	20	—	—	—	—	57 1/8	—	—	15 9 0
22 114 1/2	57 1/2	56 1/2	—	73 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	16	57 1/2	—	—	15 9 0
21 Sunday	57 1/4	56 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	11	—	—	—	16	57 1/4	74 1/2	—	15 8 0
20 114 1/2	57 1/8	56 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	7	—	—	—	16 1/4	57 1/8	74 1/8	—	15 7 0
19 114 1/2	57 1/4	56 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	8	—	—	—	16 1/2	57 1/4	74 1/4	—	15 7 0
18 Sunday	57 1/8	56 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	7	—	—	—	15 1/2	57 1/8	74 1/8	—	15 7 0
17 114 1/2	57 1/2	56 1/2	—	73 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	5	—	—	—	15 1/4	57 1/2	74 1/2	—	15 9 0
16 114 1/2	57 1/4	56 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	7	—	—	—	15 3/4	57 1/4	74 1/4	—	15 9 0
15 114 1/2	57 1/8	56 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	8	—	—	—	16	57 1/8	74 1/8	—	15 7 0
14 114 1/2	57 1/2	56 1/2	—	73 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	7	—	—	—	16 1/4	57 1/2	74 1/2	—	15 7 0
13 114 1/2	57 1/4	56 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	11	—	—	—	16 1/2	57 1/4	74 1/2	—	15 7 0
12 114 1/2	57 1/8	56 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	7	—	—	—	16	57 1/8	74 1/8	—	15 7 0
11 Sunday	57 1/2	56 1/2	—	73 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	16	57 1/2	74 1/2	—	15 9 0
10 114 1/2	57 1/4	56 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	20	—	—	—	17	57 1/4	74	—	15 9 0
9 114 1/2	57 1/8	56 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	15	—	—	—	—	56 1/2	—	—	15 10 0
8 113 1/2	57	55 1/2	—	73	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	—	56 1/8	—	—	15 10 0
7 113 1/2	57 1/4	55 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	15	—	—	—	—	57	—	—	15 10 0
6 114	57 1/8	55 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	20	—	—	—	—	57 1/8	—	—	15 10 0
5 114	57 1/2	55 1/2	—	73 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	—	57 1/2	—	—	15 10 0
4 Sunday	57 1/4	55 1/4	—	73 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	15	—	—	—	—	57 1/4	—	—	15 10 0
3 113 1/2	57 1/8	55 1/8	—	73 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	12	—	—	—	—	56 1/8	—	—	15 10 0
2 115	58 1/4	58 1/4	—	74 1/4	—	—	—	—	—	—	18	—	—	—	14 1/2	57 1/4	—	—	15 14 0
1 115 1/2	58 1/8	58 1/8	—	74 1/8	—	—	—	—	—	—	16	—	—	—	15	57 1/8	—	—	15 14 0
30 116	58 1/2	59 2/3	—	74 1/2	—	—	—	—	—	—	19	—	—	—	14 1/4	58	—	—	16 0 0

M. B. In the 3 per Cent. Confels. the highest and lowest Price of each Day is given; in the other Stocks the highest Price only.

NEW ZEALAND WARRIOR

The Gentleman's Magazine;

London Gazette
Daily Advertiser
Public Advertiser
Gazetteer
Morning Chron.
Morning Herald
Morning Post
Public Ledger
Daily Courant
Gener. Advertiser
St. James's Chron.
General Evening
Whitehall Even.
London Evening
London Chron.
Lloyd's Evening
English Chron.
Oxford
Cambridge
Bristol 3 papers
Bath 2
Birmingham 2
Derby
Coventry 2
Hereford 2
Chester 2
Manchester 2
Canterbury 2

ST. JOHN'S Gate

Edinburgh 5
Dublin 3
Newcastle 3
York 2
Leeds 2
Norwich 2
Nottingham 2
Exeter 2
Liverpool 2
Gloucester 2
Bury St. Edmund's
Lewes
Sheffield
Shrewsbury
Winchester
Ipswich
Salisbury
Leicester
Worcester
Stamford
Chelmsford
Southampton
Northampton
Reading
Whitehaven
Dumfries
Aberdeen
Glasgow

for AUGUST, 1784.
CONTAINING

various and greater Variety than any Book of the kind and Price.

Diary for August, 1783,	562	Whimsical Letter to Mr. Wm. Woodfall	50
of Corn and Grain	563	Parliamentary Reform no Subject of Rule	50
er of Volcanos in the Moon	563	Biographical Anecdotes of the late Dr. Gifford	51 spectable Writers in G. Mag	565	Witty Epigram on Bp. Atterbury by Prior	59
on Mr. Bowle's Don Quixote	566	REVIEW OF NEW PUBLICATIONS, viz. Rammbalming recommended	566	say on African Slavery—Cook's Voyage—Ju-and useful Informations	567	lian's Works—Parkinson's Voyage to S. Sea of France, and St. Martin	568	—Sheridan's Life of Swift—Owen's Critical
Wilks the Comedian	569	Disquisitions—Natural Rights of British Sub-pin—Queries answered	570	jects—Hume's Essays on Suicide—Letters o
de Winkelman's Letters	572	Infidelity—White's Enquiry, &c. —Knox'
he Non-residence of Clergy	576	View of the British Empire—Peckard's Ser-
ie Titles of some Peers	576	mons, Greene's Odes, &c. &c.	597—61
an African Slave,	579	SELECT POETRY, viz. Sonnet, by M. Seward celebrated Rousseau	580	to Miss Williams—Song by Major Waller—he Tax on Baptisms, &c.	582	Elegiac Ballad—Elogy on Bungy—Classical itt, occasioned by that Tax	583	Characters—Ode at the Royal Chapel Feast—
Antiquities in London	584	Curious Latin Epitaph, &c. &c.	613—61
ers of Lord Bolingbroke, E. of		Proceedings in Parliament continued	617—62
Robinson, Lord Bingley, Lord		Foreign Affairs—Sir Wm. Jones's CHARGE a d Lexington, Sir W. Wyndham,		Calcutta—East India, American, Irish, Scotch
, and Mr. Bromley,	585—589	Port, Country, and Domestic News—Birth
ley's Letter to Priestley	59	Marriages, Deaths, Promotions, &c.	625—64

h an exact Representation of a NEW ZEALAND Warrior, and of a Native o as faithfully delineated by PARKINSON; with a Portrait of FRANCIS I.
MEX; and a Representation of SAINT MARTIN and the BFGAR

YLVANUS URBAN. Gent.

ed by J. NICHOLS, for D. HENRY, late of ST. JOHN'S GATE

562 Meteorological Diary for August, 1783.—Average Prices of Corn.

Augst. Days.	Thermom.	Barometer. Inch. 20ths	Wind.	Rain. 100ths of inch.	Weather.
1	68	30 4	E		fair.
2	72		E		bright, excessive hot.
3	70	29 16	SW		fair.
4	64	29 14	S		heavy clouds.
5	62	30	S		clouds.
6	60	30	S	.16	clouds.
7	60	29 18	W		fair.
8	61	29 18	SW		fair.
9	61	30	W		clouds.
10	63	29 19	W	.17	small rain, showers.
11	54	29 14	W	.19	rain.
12	55	29 18	W	.22	fair, storm.
13	54	30 2	NW		fair.
14	52	30 4	W		fair.
15	54	30 4	N		overcast.
16	63		W		fair.
17	63	30 4	SW		fair.
18	64	30 4	W		fair.
19	60	30 4	S	.57	fog, fair, rain.
20	60	30 1	E		fog, fair.
21	63	30	E	.6	fog, fair, shower.
22	58	30	E		fog, fair.
23	63	29 17	W		fair.
24	63	29 15	W		rain, none to measure.
25	58	29 14	W	.17	fair, showers.
26	50	29 16	W	.17	mist, still, shower.
27	55	29 18	W		fair.
28	56	29 18	S	.25	mist, fair, rain.
29	63	29 12	S
30	56	29 18	SW		overcast.
31	56	30 30	E		mist, fair, still.

OBSERVATIONS. 1 This was the hottest day in the year; the thermometer, at 12 at noon, being 86, at 11 at night 71.—2 Thunder within three miles.—3 Meteor.—4 Distant thunder.—5 Distant thunder.—6 Distant thunder.—7 Thunder near, not loud.—8 Distant thunder.—9 Distant thunder, sultry.

AVERAGE PRICES of CORN, from August 16, to August 21, 1784.

	Wheat Rye Barley Oats Beans								COUNTIES upon the COAST.
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
London	6	0	3	3	11	2	4	3	2		Essex	5	9	0	0	3	11	2	5	3	6
COUNTIES INLAND.											Suffolk	5	9	3	1	2	9	2	5	3	3
Middlesex	5	6	3	4	3	7	2	8	3	9	Norfolk	6	1	3	4	2	10	2	5	0	0
Surry	6	4	3	1	0	0	2	8	4	4	Lincoln	6	1	3	1	3	5	2	2	2	11
Hertford	6	2	0	0	4	3	2	8	4	2	York	6	3	4	2	0	0	2	5	4	2
Bedford	6	2	4	1	0	0	2	5	3	10	Durham	7	0	4	6	0	0	2	8	4	6
Cambridge	5	11	3	5	0	1	2	1	3	2	Northumberland	6	2	4	0	3	4	2	6	4	1
Huntingdon	5	7	0	0	0	0	2	1	3	6	Cumberland	6	2	4	9	4	1	3	1	5	2
Northampton	6	9	4	9	4	0	2	5	3	9	Westmorland	7	0	5	1	4	0	1	10	0	0
Rutland	7	0	0	0	4	4	0	0	4	1	Lancashire	7	1	0	0	0	0	2	11	4	9
Leicester	6	9	5	1	4	1	2	3	3	10	Cheshire	6	10	4	8	3	10	2	3	0	0
Nottingham	6	3	4	0	3	9	2	4	3	11	Monmouth	6	6	0	0	3	7	2	2	0	0
Derby	6	8	0	0	0	0	1	6	4	6	Somerset	6	1	4	0	3	9	2	7	3	10
Stafford	6	10	0	0	0	0	2	8	4	6	Devon	6	9	0	0	3	2	2	0	0	0
Salop	6	7	4	1	1	4	1	2	3	4	Cornwall	7	0	0	0	3	8	1	12	0	0
Hereford	5	8	0	0	0	0	1	7	0	0	Dorset	6	2	0	0	2	9	2	6	4	3
Worcester	6	5	0	0	0	0	2	5	3	5	Hampshire	5	10	0	0	3	1	2	1	3	7
Warwick	6	5	0	0	0	0	2	11	3	7	Suffex	5	11	0	0	3	4	2	5	0	0
Gloucester	6	1	0	0	2	11	2	1	3	11	Kent	6	2	0	0	3	1	1	1	3	5
Wilts	6	0	0	0	3	4	2	9	4	3	WALES, Aug. 9, to Aug. 14, 1784.
Be s	6	0	4	0	3	8	2	6	3	5	North Wales	7	5	5	4	4	8	2	5	5	7
Ox d	6	5	0	0	3	7	2	4	4	1	South Wales	6	9	4	10	4	3	1	10	5	7
Bucks	6	4	0	0	3	1	2	4	3	8

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For AUGUST, 1784.

BEING THE SECOND NUMBER OF VOL. LIV. PART II.

* * * The ADDITIONAL DUTY on Postage, and Abolition of FRANKS, render it necessary to request our Correspondents to pay the Postage of their Favours; which they will please to address to the PRINTER, in Red Lion Passage, Fleet Street.

Letter from Mr. ÆPINUS, Counsellor of State in Russia, to Mr. PALLAS, Counsellor of the Imperial Colleges at St. Petersburg, in Consequence of a Communication made to the Imperial Academy of Sciences by Mr. DE MAGELLAN, Member of the same Academy, concerning a Volcano discovered in the Moon, on the 4th of May, 1783, by Mr. HERSCHEL, F. R. S.

SIR,

NOTHING could have given me greater pleasure than the communication I received from you respecting Mr. Herschel's discovery of a volcano which he saw burning in the Moon. However interesting this observation may be to every lover of natural philosophy, it affects me still more particularly, as the fact, when confirmed, will demonstrate the truth of my conjectures concerning the volcanic origin of the inequalities in the Moon's surface; which conjectures were formed in the year 1778, and published in a memoir printed at Berlin in 1781. This memoir is written, as you know, in the German language, which doubtless is the reason why it is yet unknown in other countries; though I have forwarded a French translation of the same manuscript to Sir William Hamilton at Naples, at the time that his Imperial Highness made the tour of Italy in 1784.

It is with much pleasure I perceive that ideas on this subject, perfectly analogous to mine, have occurred to Professor Beccaria of Turin nearly at the same time*. Thus it appears that three inquirers into natural phenomena have met together; for you well know, Sir, that the celebrated Professor Lichtenberg of Gottingen has made the same conjectures. Though it may appear singular that three men, so distant from each other, should have the same idea at no considerable interval of time†; yet the thing is not so strange as

* Mr. de Magellan does not recollect the time in which the late Professor Beccaria wrote to him his thoughts on the subject, having already sent all the letters he had received from him to Turin, at the request of Count Prospero Balbo, for the intended publication of all the Professor's writings: but it will appear, by the following note, that Professor Beccaria certainly had these thoughts so long ago as the year 1772 at least, if not earlier.

† It was October 11, 1772, when the nephew of Professor Beccaria discovered a luminous spot on the Moon during its total eclipse of that night; the Professor having left him with his sister at his electrical observatory at Garagna, where he intended to observe it, but was prevented by receiving notice of the arrival of M. de Saurure at Mondovi, where the Professor went immediately to meet that philosopher, leaving his nephew, with a small acquaintance of Doland, instructed to make the observation. Both the nephew and his sister did clea as may seem at first, after the particular descriptions, and exact delineations, which different philosophers have given within these ten years of the configurations of those inequalities on the earth's surface that have been produced by the eruptions of subterraneous fires. The opinion respecting the volcanic origin of the lunar inequalities might be compared to a fruit perfectly ripe, that could not but fall into the hands of him who might accidentally shake the tree.

However, the honour of having first formed this opinion belongs neither to Professor Beccaria, nor Professor Lichtenberg, nor myself. We have been anticipated in this respect, more than a whole century, by a man whose works are little known or read at present; a man who possessed from nature the distinguish the said luminous spot, in or near the place marked Copernicus; and henceforward the Professor mentioned this observation in his public lectures on natural philosophy, to shew that the round cavities on the surface of the Moon, were so many craters of extinct volcanos; adding, that those straight radiations, or bright paths, which are observed particularly on the place of the Moon marked Tiebo, were considered by him as so many torrents of the lava, which spouted off in some former conflagration of a volcano. The reader may see this account given by the Professor himself in a letter directed to the princess Josephine de Savoie-Carignan, where he delivers his opinion concerning the luminous appearance observed by Don Ulloa on the Moon during the total eclipse of the Sun, June 24, 1778, contending, that such a luminous spot was an actual burning volcano, and not a real hole through the mass of the Moon, as Don Ulloa had asserted it to be. This letter of Professor Beccaria is inserted in the Journal de Physique for the month of June, 1781, where the reader may see it at his leisure: but it deserves to be remarked, that the two volcanos observed by Don Ulloa, and by the nephew of Professor Beccaria, must be of an amazing bulk and size, both being such as to be discernible by small telescopes, and particularly that of Professor Beccaria's nephew, which was only about eighteen inches long, whilst the observation of Mr. Herschel was made with an excellent Newtonian telescope of his own make, whose focal length is ten feet, with an aperture of nine inches; and, on applying an excellent achromatic refractor of $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet focus, made by Dollond, the volcano could not be at all discerned by any of the by-standers, except Mr. Herschel himself.

most wonderful talents for discovery; but whose powerful imagination continually led him towards new objects, and prevented him from dwelling on them sufficient time to bring them to perfection: in a word, it is the famous Robert Hooke of whom I speak. When I composed my memoir on the inequalities of the lunar surface, I carefully examined whether any had fallen into the same thought before me. My enquiries were then ineffectual; and it was not till long after the publication of my memoir that I accidentally discovered the same ideas in this author. In fact, the observation might well have escaped me, as no one would have sought for intelligence of this nature in the place where I found it, that is to say, in his "Micrographia," printed at London in 1655, in the 20th chapter of which work he speaks at large concerning this opinion.

It is with pleasure, Sir, that I communicate to you this circumstance in the history of the progress of the human knowledge, because in so doing I render justice to a man whom I am tempted to regard as the first genius, in point of invention, that has ever existed—redit ad Dominum.—And in reality, if justice were done to this extraordinary man, it would shew that many very remarkable and ingenious discoveries, which pass for new at present, belong of right to him.—Would it not be equitable, Sir, to call the two new volcanic mountains, that Mr. Herschel has discovered afterwards in that part of the Moon*, by the name of him who first affirmed the existence of volcanos in that planet?

I have the honour to be, &c.

ÆPINUS.

* It was on the 13th following of the same month [May, 1783], that Mr. Herschel discovered two small conical mountains in the very same spot where he had observed, on the 4th of the same month, that volcano: these are situated in the mons porphyrites of Hevelius, just by a third mountain, much larger, which Mr. Herschel had often observed before; but these two small ones were never before perceived in that place, nor were they represented in the drawing which he had made of that spot of the Moon before that observation. This particularity I have received in a letter with which I was favoured from Mr. Herschel himself, dated the 8th of May of this present year 1784. J. H. DE MAGELLAN.

MR. URBAN, July 30.
H A V I N G been greatly pleased with the honourable testimony borne to your work in p. 437 of the last Magazine, let me intreat your admission of another from p. 29 of a spirited performance, lately published by George Travis, M. A. intituled, "Letters to Edward Gibbon, Esq. in defence of the authenticity of 1 John v. 7."

"I do not regret the circumstance of having originally introduced myself to you in the miscellany to which the name of Urban is prefixed*. It is, in its humble sphere, of eminent advantage to the present age. It has, in some instances, encouraged modest merit to give to the world pleasing or profitable communications, which might otherwise have perished unknown, by holding forth to its bashful efforts that concealment which it covers. In minds more adventurous and more assured it may, in some sense, be said to have created excellence by exciting emulation. It has advanced the cause of truth in general, by promoting liberal enquiry; and it facilitates the progress of knowledge by the frequency, as well as variety, of its communications, and the extensiveness of its circulation."

This respectable writer has, with just indignation, exposed the Historian's shameless misrepresentation of Gennadius, first noticed in p. 181 of your volume for 1782, and referred to in p. 419 of the Magazine for June last: and, after some striking remarks on the general design of Mr. Gibbon's several publications, he freely and pointedly addresses him in the following words:

"You conceived a decent modicum of infidelity (no matter how prepared) to be necessary to give fashion to a work, pompous, yet not substantial; specious, yet not satisfactory; laboured, yet not accurate."

The following passage, relative also to your Magazine, has just appeared in Dr. Horsley's masterly "Letters in reply to Dr. Priestley," p. 19:

"Give me leave to refer you to a letter, which was published in the Gentleman's Magazine for November last, under the signature of PERHAPS. You will find it in my appendix, and I now declare myself the writer of it."

That such writers as Travis and Horsley, supported by argument, and having truth alone in their view, may long reflect honour on your truly valuable miscellany, is the sincere wish of VINDEK.

P. S. Your correspondent B. C. is strangely mistaken, in p. 27, as to Abp. Secker, and is properly animadverted on in p. 327. In the Supplement to "Biographia Britannica," London, 1766, is the following passage, p. 23: "Dr. Secker, I can assure the reader, never took (as some have imagined) Presbyterian orders, or offered himself to be a Dissenting minister, nor ever received the communion in any other than the Established Church."

The invocation of candour, p. 288, col. 2, reminds me of a similar display of it in "A Plan of Lectures on the principles of Non-conformity," reprobated in pp. 19, 20, of your volume for 1779. These sons of candour deal in epithets by which the calmness and moderation of their own temper are rather too glaringly exhibited to the public view.

MR. URBAN, Aug. 17.
A S I have within a few days past discovered some very unfair practices respecting the admission of an account of my edition of Don Quixote into two periodical publications, to which I had some reason to think I was entitled, and have found the perpetrators of them to have been a false friend, and another, whose encomium I should regard as an affront and real slander; the one as fond of the grossest flattery, as the other ready to give it, and both alike wholesale dealers in abuse and detraction; I beg leave, in justice to myself, to request of you to insert the following extract from a letter, which I received last month, dated "Madrid, y Junio 21 de 1784." The writer is personally unknown to me, but stands foremost among the literati of his own countrymen, and is at present engaged in a work somewhat similar to that of our "Biographia." I cannot but acknowledge my thanks to him for his candid representation. To the original I will annex a translation. 'Lle-
' garon con efecto á esta Corte los seis
' volumenes de que consta la Historia
' de D. Quixote reimpressa por voud.
' Como aca hon Uegado pocos exem' plares, un amigo me hizo el favor de
' prestarme la obra, que reconocí con
' gusto, especialmente el tomo de las
' Notas. Vuelvo á repetir que la em-
' presa

* See Gent. Mag. vol. LII. p. 65-68.
1782-3. 330-332. 522-24.

‘ prefá de anotar esta celebre Novela de ‘ Cervantes, no solo era nueva, sino
 ‘ mas digna de admiracion en un Estran‘ gero. De ciertas Notas diran los ‘ Espanoles que para ellos eran escu-
 ‘ sadas; pero vni dira con razon que no ‘ solo escribe para ellos, sino para los ‘ lectores de toda la Europa, para
 ‘ quienes son utiles. Pero los mismos
 ‘ Espanoles no podran negar que no
 ‘ pocas de las Notas no solo les dan luz
 ‘ para la inteligencia de esta famosa No-
 ‘ vela, sino que son enteramente nue‘ vas.’ In English: “The six volumes, of which the History of Don Quixote reprinted by you consists, are arrived at this capital. As few copies are as yet arrived here, a friend did me the favour to lend me the work, which I acknowledge with pleasure, especially the volume of the notes. I repeat anew, that the undertaking to comment this celebrated Novel of Cervantes was not only new, but more worthy of admiration in a stranger. The Spaniards will say of certain Notes, that as to them they might have been spared;
 but you will tell them with reason, that you do not write for them, but for the readers of all Europe, for whom they are useful. But the same Spaniards will not be able to deny that not a few of the Notes not only give them light for the understanding of this famous Novel, but that they are entirely new.”

Such are the sentiments of my unknown friend. A desire to impart that pleasure to others, which I almost solely possessed, impelled me to the hazardous work of printing, in which if I have erred once, I may be readily credited, I shall never be guilty of a like offence again.

Yours, &c. JOHN BOWLE.

URBANUS, Mortlake, July 30.

AS the Gentleman's Magazine was the first of the kind, so I think it may with justice be reckoned one of the best of the periodical publications to this day. The late improvements in the plan are, I believe, agreeable to most readers, and particularly so to me;
 for I am equally pleased with the conservator of our antiquities, as with the promulgator of all the new discoveries in arts and sciences. You will excuse my having likewise made a little alteration in your title, and I think with propriety.

In p. 406, one of your correspondents, from Mr. Barrington's "Observations on the ancient Statutes," I think, gives us the following note: "It " is believed, that there is not, by the " laws of any other country, so early

 " an attention to the promotion of ana" tomical knowledge as by the 31st of " Henry VIII. which empowers the " united companies of barbours and " surgeons to dissect yearly four of the " bodies of condemned criminals ex" ecuted at Tyburn."

It is probably in consequence of this statute, that a part of the sentence pronounced on certain malefactors is,
 "that their body shall be dissected."

Now, Sir, though I am as well convinced as the learned Observator, that the intention of the statute was, to promote anatomical knowledge; yet I verily believe that at this time it has a very different effect, as it makes it disgraceful, in the opinion of most people, to be dissected or opened after death;
 and the method of embalming is now
 out of fashion.

I would therefore, with all due submission, propose, that the law be repealed, and that the bodies of atrocious criminals be hung in chains, as some of them for murder, &c. now are; or, if buried, that it be upon the side of the high-way, with an inscription upon a stone, declaring their crime; that the bodies of thieves, &c. be sunk in some muddy water or pond, and that the art of embalming should be revived.

The consequence would then be,
 that all the rich and great must be embalmed; that the supposed disgrace of being opened would wear off; and the faculty would then in part perform that operation upon all their patients, in order to satisfy the friends of the deceased that their opinion of the malady was well founded.

The general anatomy of the human body has been so fully scrutinized by the ablest masters, that few discoveries are now to be expected in common subjects; but the causes of disease are not so well ascertained, and therefore such lights as are yet wanting must be looked for, either in what is called the comparative anatomy, or in the diseased subjects: but, if every person after decease was either embalmed, or at least opened, the causes of disease, and probably the method of cure, must soon be better known; which is, and ought to be, the principal aim of all our anatomical researches.

I have only to add, that I assure you
 I am not now

A DISSECTOR.

Ma.

MR. URBAN, Aug. 13.
IN the picture gallery at Penthurst is a long picture of the virgin and child, a Greek altar-piece, on which is written:

"A copy of the Madonna of Cimabue, the only perfect figure of his remaining. He revived painting, 1300; and was buried at Florence, where he was born." [1240.]

The colours are still glowing; but the drawing as stiff as anything done by the modern Greeks.

It was brought over by the late Dr. Perry, who travelled over the Levant, and was brother to the late William Perry, Esq. owner of Penthurst in right of his lady, and is preserved there among other curiosities and Egyptian antiquities collected by the same traveller.

The account of the inscription over the Emperor Julian's library at Constantinople, mentioned by Mr. Asle, and enquired after by your correspondent Querist, p. 424, seems to be taken from Gallois' "Traité des plus belles Bibliothèques d'Europe, Paris, 1685," 12mo. p. 20, with this difference, that Gallois says, Julian built two libraries, one at Constantinople, the other at Antioch, and put the inscription over the entrance of both; not over the entrance of "his predecessor Constantine's" library, which, Gallois says, he did all he could to destroy. Upon this slight assertion the story rests, for Gallois refers to no authority, nor does my reading furnish me at present with any.

P. 496, col. 2, l. 32, read pariete.

Your nameless correspondent, p. 485, who refers every thing to the Celtic except the farlois of beef, has so very happily elucidated that also, that it only remains for me to wish that all writers who eat of it would in future observe his spelling of the French, affix sur, and not to write surnames, as too many of our best writers do.

I suspect we should read SANE BORO instead of SANCTE BORO, on the inscription at Dynemore Preceptory, co. Hereford, given in your vol. XXV. p. 347, which then drew such a profusion of quotations from your correspondent R. R.

Between Klagenfurth and St. Viet in Carinthia were lately discovered ruins of an ancient city. The archduchess Mary Anne ordered men to dig among them, and found, among many other pieces of antiquity, two stones, inscribed,

VICTORIAE AVG. PRO SALUTE L. LYDACEI HONORATI L. LYD. INGENVA II. VIR. I. D. & C. RUSIA SEVERA PARENTES V. S. L. M.

QUIETVS PR. SABINAE SER. V. P. SIBI ET CRESCENTIAE VXORI ET SATVRNINVS FRATER.

The churches of which you gave a list, p. 499, were not the fifty new ones (for hardly any of those were built so early), but of churches rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren after the fire. I think it is to be found in the Parentalia. Q.

MR. URBAN, Sherborn, July 28.
IN your Mag. vol. LIII. p. 393, is a fictitious Greek inscription (English I suppose) said to be composed by Mr. Wray, which has greatly puzzled many of your readers. Several ingenious persons (in whose names I write) would be greatly obliged by an explanation of it.

Yours, &c. A. X.

* * * The inscription is conceived in the form of the most ancient Greek ones, and to be read thus: Αντίφω Θίω Μ. θ. α. Κλεισδρος Ηρωιδου, Ερσεως βασιλειας μιν λου δολος [δουλος] τι- λαρανς η ορειναδο φοκινς ιπαιι. EDIT.

MR. URBAN, July 20.
I SHOULD be glad if any of your correspondents, who is more deeply versed in genealogical knowledge than myself, will favour the public with a little pedigree, sufficient to explain the claim of Sir John Griffin Griffin, K. B. to the barony of Howard of Walden? Is he the heir and representative of Edward Lord Griffin, who married, and had a daughter named Essex, but is said to have died, without surviving issue, in 1742? He was grandson of Edward Lord Griffin of Braybrook and Lady Essex Howard, only daughter, by the first wife, to James third Earl of Suffolk, and Baron Howard of Walden: And farther, what relation is the present Earl of Suffolk to Thomas late Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire? and is he Earl of Berkshire?

P. S. Aug. 18. Upon farther enquiry as to the descent of Sir J. G. Griffin, now summoned to Parliament as Lord Howard of Walden, though contrary to the opinion of the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Suffolk, I find reason to believe that he is the son of Whitfield, of Oundle, co. Northampton, Esq. and his wife Elizabeth, eldest of of the two daughters of James 1st Ld Griffin, and sister (and, I suppose, at length, co-heiress) of Edward, the 3d and last Lord: the other daughter was Anne, married first to Henry Grey, of Billingbear, co. Berks, Esq: (Qu. if Richard Aldworth Neville, now of that place, Esq. be her lineal descendant?) and secondly to John, late Earl of Portsmouth, by whom she had no issue. Farther and more certain information would undoubtedly be acceptable.

Yours, &c.

E.

* In answer to the first part of our correspondent's letter, an ingenious friend observes,

1. It appears by the debate, that Ld Thomas (not George) Howard (afterwards created Earl of Suffolk *, son of the second D. of Norfolk by his second wife, the only daughter of Thomas Lord Audley of Walden,) having been called up by writ (39 Eliz. 1596) as Lord Howard of Walden, a barony in fee was thereby created, which Sir John G. Griffin now claims as his heir-general. His descent is properly traced above. Mr. Nevile's we cannot ascertain.

2. John, the present and 15th Earl of Suffolk, (Colonel of a company in the 1st regiment of foot-guards) is also the 8th E. of Berkshire, being descended, we presume, from the Hon. Philip Howard, the 7th son of Thomas the 1st Earl of Berks, as Collins says he "had issue." The four last Earls of Suffolk and Berkshire, viz. Thomas, Henry (an infant), Henry, and Henry-Bowes, were descendants of William the 4th son. The 5th left no issue, and that of the 6th son (Sir Robert Howard) has been long extinct. There were also two other younger sons, James and Algernon.

CRITO.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 4.

THE portrait of Francis I. of France, which you herewith receive †, was taken from a bust in that kingdom. This monarch was contemporary with Henry VIII. of England, and was remarkable as being the sovereign with whom Henry had the famous interview at the Champ du drap d'Or, where the nobles of both kingdoms, who were present, ruined themselves in the magnificence of their equipage for that occasion. Francis I. conferred the order of St. Michael on Henry VIII. in 1521; and his arms were put up in the abbey of Cisteaux in France, next to those of Charles V. on the left hand side of the Prior's seat; but these are now destroyed.

* He built the magnificent fabrick near Walden called Audley-End, in memory of his grandfather, Lord Audley. This the present Lord Howard, as his heir-general, has long possessed, and also the right of nominating the Master of Magdalen College, Cambridge, as descended from its founder, Lord Audley. The present and late Masters were of his appointment.

† See the Plate annexed.

T.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 31

THE inclosed fac simile of an ancient painting at Oxford may be no improper appendage to the curious tapestry you gave us last year from Vintners' Hall. The original is on a circular piece of very thick glass, of which the ground and outline are of a reddish brown: a slight tinge of yellow upon the hair, arms, and part of the vest of St. Martin; on the girth of his saddle; and on the beard of the poor man. (See the Plate annexed.)

In Hirsch's "Bibliotheca Nummaria, Norinburgi, 1763," fol. mention is made of "A critical essay on modern medals by Mr. Addison, London, 1704," 8vo. A correspondent would be happy to be informed by any one who has seen that work, (which upon diligent search in many public and private libraries is nowhere to be found,) what is the nature of it; and if it is not merely a previous publication of Mr. Addison's third Dialogue upon Medals?

It would oblige more than one of Mr. Urban's very old correspondents, if any gentleman could favour him with a copy of a curious Dialogue between Queen Elizabeth and Serjeant Lambard. It was known to have been in MS. a few years ago, in the possession of Sir Joseph Ayloffe, in the handwriting of Dr. Thorpe.

Query whether, in any one of the many valuable public or private libraries in this kingdom, there are any account-books of any Treasurer of the Chambers during the last ten years of Queen Elizabeth, or during the beginning of King James's reign?

The first line in the plate, vol. LIII. p. 811, is Eluner Bankar; and the family seems to have continued at Leicester till now, as Mrs. Bankart dies there, in your Obituary, p. 895. The third line is plainly añabus, i. e. animabus; but I can make nothing of the second.

Yours, &c.

N. J.

MR. URBAN,
THE following description of Mr. Wilks, in the Character of Hamlet, is transcribed from THE PROMPTER, N^o C. Oct. 24, 1735, as a proper companion to what is printed in p. 486.

"HAMLET is the play, of all their dramattick circulation, which may be ofteneft seen without satiety. Here are touches of nature, so numerous, and marked with so expreffive a force, that every heart confesses their energy; and, in spite of errors and absurdities, self-contradictory and indefensible, this play has always pleased, still pleases, and will for ever continue to please, while apprehension and humanity have power in English audiences.

To what excess then would it not move, were Hamlet's character as strongly represented as written!—The poet has adorned him with a succession of the most opposite beauties, which are varied, like colours on theameleon, according to the different lights in which we behold him. But the player, unequal to his precedent, is for ever his unvaried self. We hear him, indeed, called Hamlet; but we see him Mr. Such-a-one; the actor. The man who would act any stage character to perfection must borrow the serpent's dexterity, to slip out of his skin, and leave his old form behind him.

What Cæsar meant of Terence, when he said he was half a Menander, suits exactly to the truth, that ought to be spoken of any the best player who, within my remembrance, has taken upon him the representation of this character. The utmost praise he has been able to deserve was, to have been half a Prince Hamlet. Mr. Wilks, for example, was his gay half; and Mr. Booth might have been his solemn, had he appeared in the part. But it was in the power of neither to do right to that half which suited the manner of the other. They were, therefore, though very strong, yet but half-finished actors: Men, who had their graces and capacities specifick, and to whom Nature seems to have set limits, as GOD did to the ocean—Hilberto sbalt thou go, and no farther.

The characteristick distinction that marks the temper of Hamlet is a pensive yet genteel humanity. He is by nature of a melancholy cast; but his polite education has illuminated the wet May morning, mixed a gleam with his sadness. When he grieves, he is never sullen; when he trifles, he is never light; when alone, he is seriously solid; when in company, designedly flexible. He assumes what he pleases; but he is, what he ought to be, the lamentor of his murdered father, the discernor of his mother's levity, and the suspecter of his uncle's baseness.

GENT. MAG. August, 1784.

How weighed then, and significant should he be found in his looks and his actions! When he counterfeits distraction with Ophelia, and perceives that she is observing him, all his air is as light, and as empty of purpose, as if really as mad as he designs she should think him. But, no sooner has he declined himself from the glances of her eye, than his own gives us marks of his pity and prudence. The wildness he affects quits his air in a moment, and a touching sensation of sorrow paints his soul in his gesture; which again, the next moment, he transforms into wantonness, in the very instant of time while he returns toward the lady.

In this, then, the double capacity of Mr. Wilks and Mr. Booth should unite in one actor. The first could be wanton, but he was wanton without weight. The second could be weighty; but he was weighty without easiness. Mr. Wilks had a spirit that ran away with his body. Mr. Booth had a body that dragged too heavy on his spirit. When the one was most delightful, he seemed animated without purpose: when the other was most strong, he gave impression without briskness.

I will make still more evident the justice of my remark, by producing two instances, in one of which Mr. Wilks must be remembered to have been unpardonably deficient; and in the other whereof Mr. Booth will be supposed incapable to have succeeded, by any judicious reflecter, who considers his qualities.

While Horatio and Marcellus, in the solemn stillness of midnight, on the platform, are discoursing with Hamlet concerning the carousals at court, the Ghost of his father appears; and, upon Horatio's sudden crying out, "Look, my Lord, where it comes!" the prince is supposed to turn eagerly toward the spirit, with an unbelieving curiosity rather than a terrified apprehension. But, upon the discovered reality of the form, he starts back a step or two, and expresses presses his amazement as follows, in a low pitch of voice, still fixing his eyes, with a kind of riveted doubt in their steadiness,

"Angels and Ministers of Grace defend
"me!" —

Here, no doubt, he should stop; and, after a significant pause, under silent horror, strive for strength of resolution, to attempt an approach; which he accompanies with these broken sentences, and one short, slow step at each of them, delivering the whole (till the word questionable) with a voice faint and trembling, as if it struggled, and found a difficulty in forcing its way, against the oppression of his terror:

"Be thou — a spirit of light, — or goblin
"damn'd!" —

"Bring with thee — airs from heaven — or
"blasts from hell!" —

"Be thy intents — wicked or charitable!
"Thou com'st — in such a questionable
"shape" —

Mark the burst upon the word questionable! It explains the author's design, and supports and justifies the necessity of such a gradual advance as I have described. It is as if Hamlet, after an utterance, breaking (faintly and tremblingly low) through the fear-frozen organs of speech; after labouring (in what he had been saying before) against the weight of his blood, half congealed by his terror, now drew comfort and encouragement from the reflection that this form of his father was a questionable shape; that is, a shape to which he might speak boldly. And accordingly, in the very next line, he assumes a stronger and positive emphasis, and cries out, kneeling, at the word father, for the more earnest effect of his application,

"I will — speak to thee — I'll call thee —
"Hamlet!" —

"King! — Father! — Royal Dane!" —

Stopping, anxious and expectant, after creeping a little onward with his knee, upon the two last of these appellations; examining, with his own eye still fixed upon that of the Ghost, the withed effect of them separately: but, when neither of them procures him an answer, he grows desperate, and, forcing warmth from his impatience, strains his voice into exclamation:

" — — — — — Oh! — answer me! —
"Let me not burst — in ignorance, — but — "tell me —
"Why" — &c.

And, from this place to the end of the speech, all his action is earnest; all his looks are distracted; all his body is convulsed; and his whole soul poured out in the pathetick delivery of his accents.

But, whoever remembers Mr. Wilks in this part of the character, need not be put in mind with what a lightness, quite improper to the occasion, he anticipated the place in which it would have been the duty of his friends to restrain him; causing them (immediately, at his first sight of the apparition,) to struggle against his unseasonable endeavours to break away, and advance upon the Ghost, forgetful how little necessity a man's half-curdled blood would leave him under of being held back from such an appearance, supposing it real.

With the same ill-judged vivacity of error, he threw out, from the beginning, all the sharps of a precipitate clamour, without pause, without terror, without rub, rest, or marking. Hurrying on the whole smartness and alacrity of his own temper, in such an unnatural misapplication of its spirit, that I never saw him, in this place, without thinking on Oedipus prescribing Noise as a midwife to the moon in eclipse:

"Beat, beat a thousand drams to ease her "labour."

Nay, to such excess of ill-timed defiance did he carry his rapidity, that, when he came to this following menace,

"By heaven I'll make a ghost of him that "holds me!"

"I say, away! — Go on — I'll follow thee," instead of directing the three first words in the second line against Horatio and Marcellus, he addressed them, in high rage, and with a flourish of his drawn sword, against the Ghost of his father; toward whom, on the contrary, after the highest rage of an elevated voice against his with-holders, he ought to have inclined his transported breast, with an air of obedience, and pronounced, in the most soft and gentle delivery, this part of the sentence only,

"Go on! — I'll follow thee:"

dropping, at the same time, his tone and sword (the drawing whereof would be ridiculous, upon any supposition but to prevent a renewal of his restraint, after having forced himself away); for, against any ghost at all a sword is a silly defence, but quite horrible, and the most shocking indecorum, against the ghost of his father.

In all this foregoing scene, where Mr. Wilks was, by nature (not negligence) deficient, Mr. Booth would, by nature (not care) have been admirable. Each had his half, and no more, of the form, turn, and spirit, that must, as I said, be joined, to complete this character.

But, would we see, on the other hand, where the first of these two celebrated actors reached an easy and a graceful excellence, which in the last must have been constrained and heavy, had he gone about to imitate it, we need but recollect the gaiety, the unforced, soft, becoming negligence with which, reclining at the feet of Ophelia, and roving with her fan, as if genteelly insignificant, he kept a guard upon his uncle's eye, and watched (unnoticed) the effect of his play's influence.

In short, the province of an actor is too copiously extensive for the limits of these narrow papers. To comprehend it in one general idea, his skill should be like that of a pilot; the rudder may be supposed his judgement; the ship his voice, or person; the sea may be the character; and the winds, which his course is steered by, should be the passions, in their powers and changes."

To these extracts permit me, Mr. Urban, to add, from the same paper, No. 92, the following slight sketch of Mr. QUIN, an actor whom our fathers greatly admired, but in whose excellence, I confess, I have no great faith.

Shakspere is introduced instructing the players. After having censured two of them, he thus proceeds:—"And as to you, Mr. ALL-WEIGHT," [addressing himself to a third] "you lose the advantages of your deliberate articulation, distinct use of pausing, solemn significance, and that composed air and gravity of your motion; for though there arises from all these good qualities an esteem that will continue and increase the number of your friends, yet those among them who wish best to your interest will be always uneasy at observing perfection so nearly within your reach, and your spirits not disposed to stretch out, and take possession.—To be always deliberate and solemn is an error, as certainly, though not as unpardonably, as never to be so.—To pause where no pauses are necessary, is the way to destroy their effect, where the sense stands in need of their assistance. And, though dignity is finely maintained by the weight of majestic composure, yet are there scenes in your parts where the voice should be sharp and impatient, the look disordered and agitated, the action precipitate and turbulent;—for the sake of such difference as we see in some smooth canal, where the stream is scarce visible, compared with the other end of the same canal, rushing rapidly down a cascade, and breaking beauties which give their attraction to their violence."

N. T. A.

P. 245, b. l. 7. r. Robert; and in Latin quotation, r. re tam.

P. 246. a. l. 18. r. paradoxes.

MR. URBAN,

July 15.

IN answer to the Querist in your Magazine for last month, p. 424; I take the trouble of informing him, that in a curious work, intitled, "A critical and historical Account of all the celebrated Libraries in foreign Countries, by a Gentleman of the Temple," (printed at London in 1739, 8vo), I find that the Emperor Julian founded two great libraries, one at Constantinople, the other at Antioch, with the inscription mentioned by Mr. Astle in the Frontispieces; "which inscription," adds the ingenious author of this work, "some have been so well pleased with, that they have made use of it on like occasions*." Whether Mr. Astle received his information from this work or not, I will not pretend to decide. But it is manifestly a translation of the beginning of his IXth Epistle; and, as Constantinople was then the capital of the Roman empire, the inscription might with propriety be written in Latin.

R.

P. S. The inscription is noticed by Possévin, in his "Miscellanea Sacra."

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 6.

IN Gent. Mag. p. 444, it is mentioned, as seeming remarkable, that four prelates, now living, are, or have been, bishops of Lichfield and Coventry; and that, in the time of the late archbishop of Canterbury, there were five. There are at present five prelates, who are, or have been, successively, bishops of St. Davids; viz. Doctors Lowth, nominated in 1766, Moss the same year, Yorke in 1774, Warren in 1779, and Smallwell in 1783.

Yours, &c.

D.

* The Chriſm will be properly used.

Our correspondent, we suppose, wished to know by what original writer this is mentioned.

P. 112.

20-

BIOGRAPHICAL ANECDOTES OF THE
LATE LEARNED ABBÉ WINKELMAN.

(Continued from p. 494.)

"THE Prince of Mecklenburg will not stir out without me. The reigning Prince of Anhalt Dessau, who is here with his brother, will have me attend him two days in a week. He is one of the greatest princes I know, and born for the good of many nations. He came upon me the first time without notice, his cane, in his hand, and accosted me with, "Dear W. I am Dessau, and come to Rome for instruction." He staid with me till midnight. I could not help shedding tears for joy. After six months stay at Rome, he went to Florence, and intends a second visit to England, and one to Ireland, to see the manufactories.

"Walther wishes to reprint the French translation of my History of Art, which I consent to if he will suppress three leaves. An English translation of it has also appeared. I hope my "Essay on Allegory" will be as fortunate. I flatter myself that my "Remarks on the History of Art" will be my best work, for I have been four years about it.

"The celebrated W. Montagu is returned from Egypt and Syria, and preparing to set out for Pisa, where he is at present, on a second voyage to the Levant. He is now 56 *.

1766. "I have refused a canonry in the Rotonda to retain my independence. I may possibly renounce the Vatican also.

"I spent a fortnight with the Achilles of Brunswick, the hereditary prince, in the closest intimacy; and, as he loved to walk about the city, we lost no time, and I improved it, to tell my mind to the sons of kings. My great Italian work [Monumenti Inediti] will pay for printing; and I am indifferent about more profit. In my narrowest circumstances at Dresden I printed my first work at my own expence, merely for presents. I wish now to print only 10 copies of a little work of all the ancient monuments drawn with a pen.

1767. "I expected to find every one against me at Naples, for the freedom I used in my account of the discoveries and publications of Herculaneum, and I raised myself a new enemy by my criticisms on the Marquis Galiani's translation of Vitruvius. I spent a night on Vesuvius with the Baron Riedesel, and the celebrated adventurer Hancarville †: we roasted pigeons on the bank of a river of fire, and Winkelman supped naked as a Cyclops. When every one took to their heels, we were drinking bumpers in the court of the castle at Portici, with the houses shaking and tottering round us. The fifth volume of the Antiquities contains the bronze heads and busts, full and in profile; the sixth is to contain the bronze statues and figures; and as every thing is copied that can be collected, the work will last long enough. I have inserted my criticism on the fifth volume in my History of Art, of which the French translation, by myself, will appear in two volumes, 4to, with many large plates, in order to make it more difficult to counterfeit. I have been 20 times to Portici, and four times to Pompeii, which might have been avoided if one was allowed to write notes on the spot.

"My favourite residence is at Porto d'Anzio, where I walk by the side of the calm sea, on a bold shore covered with myrtles, or behold the foamy billows safe under an arcade of the ancient temple of Fortune. At Naples I lodge with one of the greatest adventurers. My room is furnished with Etruscan vases my own property, whose number is continually increasing by my landlord, the Chev. d'Hancarville †, author and editor of the magnificent Collection of Etruscan, Greek, and Roman Antiquities, in four large folio volumes of painted vases, collected by Mr. [now Sir William] Hamilton, the British minister, and others, in 468 plates, 117 in each volume, containing at least 600 engravings. The first volume was published in 1767 ‡.

1768. "I leave Rome the beginning of April, and, if no accident happens to my health during the long journey, hope to be at Nothenitz about May 15. The celebrated Roman statuary, Cavaceppi, will be of the party.

"I devote two days in every week to two persons of great genius, Mr. Hamilton and Lord Stormont, ambassador from the Court of Great Britain to Vienna, who is now at Rome for the second time.

* Those who wish to see any curious anecdotes about this singular man will find them in "Memoires d'un Homme Mondain, par le Comte de Lambourg," p. 10, & seq. and M. Grouley's "Londres," l. 137, 138, English translation.

† See some more anecdotes of him in "Memorial d'un Mondain," before cited, p. 117, 118.

‡ The second followed it at Naples, the third at Paris, 1775.

He is the most informed man [le plus instruit] for his rank that I ever saw, and well versed in the Greek language. He married a countess of Bunau, whose death, and a melancholy habit consequent on it, have induced him to undertake this journey. He has recovered in this happy climate, and by the sight of many curious and instructive articles to be found here."

In a letter to Professor Heyne, 1764, he enumerates the MSS. of Apollonius Rhodius, of whom the Professor was preparing an edition, viz. two in the old Vatican, three in the Heidelbergh Library, and one in the Urbino Library. He was surprised not to find it in Magliabecchi's Library, for, though he was not able to comprehend a line of it, he should have had it. He communicated a Greek and Latin inscription on the urn of Sextus Valerius Marcellus, the husband of Julia Scemias Bassiana, and father of Heliogabalus, found three miles beyond Veletri, and faultily printed in the Gazetta Literaria di Firenze. The Latin inscription being a translation of the Greek, we shall insert it alone.

SEX. VARIO MARCELLO.

PROC. AQAR. C. PROC. PROV. PRT.* CC.
PROC. RATIONIS PRIVAT. C. CC. VICE. PRAEF.
PR. ET URBI FUNCTO C. V. PRAEF. AERARII MILITARIS LEG. LEG. AUG. PRAESIDI PROV.
HUMIDIAE. IULIA SAEOMIAS BASSIANA C. P.
CUM FILIS MARITO ET PATRI AMANTISSIMO.

"The owner of the villa near Veletri, where the urn was found, took up a great plate of lead, as large as the doors of the upper rooms of the palace Ginetti, full of inscriptions in relief, which he melted and sold †, for fear the town should take it from him."

Speaking, in the same letter, of the so much talked of mission sent by the King of Denmark into Arabia, which miscarried by the death of all the parties concerned except one, he observes, they were not judiciously chosen, particularly the leader.

Of the three volumes of the Museum Capitolinum he observes, "that the drawings are made with taste and understanding, a few slight faults excepted. Bottari was employed on the fourth volume of the bas reliefs, the explication of which will shew his talents.

* To the Greek it is ΕΠΙΤΡΟΝΕΥΣΑΝ ΕΠΑΡΧΕΙΟΥ ΒΡΙΤΑΝΝΕΙΑΣ, whereby we get a new Praefect in Britain, unnoticed before. EDIT.

† "Et en avoit vendu sept cens livres."

"I know nothing of Civita Turchino; but believe M. Ritter is mistaken. The Etruscan tombs are near Corneto, four miles from Civita Vecchia, near the sea*. As the Philosophical Transactions are not to be found in any library at Rome, I know nothing about them but what he says.

"The splendid edition of Virgil, in three volumes folio, 1763, 4, 5, is a miserable thing. Bandini has published Callimachus at Florence, 1763, 8vo, and Nicander, 1764, 8vo, without being able to read Greek.

"I could have been glad to have found a MS. of Athenæus, an author whom we ought to value. All that I have seen are modern, and the oldest, which was formerly in the Farnese Library at Rome, and removed to Parma, has been since taken away, for it is not now in that library at Naples.

"I have formed an acquaintance with the famous Wilkes, and as he was here during the carnival (1765), I had time to be with him; but he staid scarce eight days. He had with him a pretty woman, called Corradini, of Parma; only it is pity she turned dancer. He brought her from Paris, and, as she has an equipage kept for her at the expence of her admirer, she is a dear bit. They set off in a post chaise and four for Naples, where he writes me he has hired a handsome house, on a pleasant eminence, out of the noise of the city, to finish his History of England from the Revolution, and prepare a new edition of Churchill's works. He offered me an apartment in it, and I may possibly make him a visit next autumn. He has printed in English at Paris "A Letter to the worthy electors of the Borough of Aylesbury, in the County of Bucks. London, 1764," 8vo; which is not perhaps known in Germany, being very scarce in England.

"About the middle of October, 1765, were found, in the villa Verolpi, near the Porta Salara, two statues, exactly alike except the heads, well preserved, of half the natural size, of two young women; half recumbent, in light drapery, consisting, like most of the upper garments of the ancient statues, of two long square pieces, sewn together lengthwise, and fastened by three buttons on the shoulders. This buttoned part, in these statues, falls from the shoulder half way down the upper part of the arm, leaving the breasts bare. Their left arm rests on an oval socket, which serve as a pedestal, and the right hand stretched out, as if playing at dice or cockles, perfectly like a young female statue of the same size, habit, and attitude, and playing at the same game, formerly in the collection of Cardinal Polignac. Under each is a little bow, having a griffin's head carved on the outer edge, but no quiver or arrows. If the heads could be found, it would determine whether they were Amazons, whose heads are uniformly alike in all the galleries, without helmets, and in the style of virago; a circumstance which escaped those who fitted an helmeted head to the Amazon in the Capitol, where there are two fine Amazonian heads unappropriated. I communicated this discovery, which is kept secret, to the Prince of Mecklenburg Strelitz the day it happened, and shewed him the place where they were found side by side. It may have been a room, but the ruins do not admit of a clear idea. This villa made part of the Sa'lustian, afterwards the Imperial Gardens; an inexhaustible field, as appears by former discoveries, for here were found, under Clement XI, the 4 finest and oldest Egyptian statues of the Capitol.

* See our vol. XXXIV. p. 475, and vol. XLIX. p. 288.

"My friend and master has given me a little head of Pallas, on ivory, in relief, which formerly served as a handle to a vale. It was sent him by the Cathusians, who are obliged to sift over again in their convent all the earth that comes from the catacombs in and out of Rome, after it has been examined on the spot, to see if it contains any more portions of holy bodies. By this process they found a fine unfinished cameo of brown agate, representing, in white relief, a centaur throwing a stone at a naked figure sitting, over whom hovers the soul, under the figure of Psyche. These catacombs are an inexhaustible source, and here were found all the large medals in the Vatican Library, both those bequeathed to it by Card. Carpegna, described by the senator Buonarroti, and those given to it by Card. Alexander Albani. The cardinal has this moment called me to examine a head of Matidia, Trajan's sister's daughter, sent him from thence. The head of an infant, representing M. Aurelius, or Aur. Verus, has been found and bought in one of the principal houses of Rome, by Cavaceppi, and is one of the finest I ever saw, particularly as to the hair, of which the most points of the curls are preserved.

The most curious monument found in the neighbourhood of Vesuvius since my last journey is the temple of Isis at Pompeii. It is of the kind called vxaiβes, or without roof, inclosed on one side by a wall, and on the two others by columns, two of which are of the Doric order, of masonry plastered over. Within this was a small chapel, adorned with pilasters, and having a brick roof, in which Isis was placed, and on one side was a square altar. The temple communicated with two rooms, built close to each other, and covered with paintings. Over the gate is an inscription concerning its repair after an earthquake by Popidius M. F. Celsinus, to whom the decuriones of the place erected it*.

"I want to engage the Duke de Rochefoucauld to go from Pestum to Velia, in search after antiquities. He having with him a very ingenious young painter from Lyons. But he has convinced me, on the authority of a very credible person, who had been at Pestum, that nothing but a few walls are left at Velia, now called Agropoli, and that, for want of practicable roads, it would take five days at least to go by water.

"A most curious discovery has lately been made at Rome of a Greek medal in bronze, struck in honour of Cicero, by the city of Magnesia, or Sipylum, found by a labourer in the Agro Romano, and bought, covered in dirt, by F. Sarri, a great connoisseur in these things, for a medal of Augustus, struck in the Greek colonies, which coins are very rare. He discovered under the head M. TR. K. the rest not distinct. He has sent it to be drawn, but shewed me two passages in Cicero's Letters to his brother, relating to Magnesia†. It is the second medal of the kind that we know of: the other is in the Farnese cabinet at Capo di Monte at Naples. It is cited by Pedrusi, but, as his reverse differs from this, which has grapes and a vine leaf, it is supposed to have been ill drawn. The Farnese medal is mentioned in a MS. letter of Fulvius Ursinus, to whom it belonged, and the

* See Archæologia IV. 165—168.

† Besides the two medals struck in honour of Cicero, abovementioned, a third, in gold, bearing his head, and behind it, M. T. CICCERO. reverse, under a figure sitting, MINERVE, was in the possession of the late James West, Esq. P. R. S. engraved by C. Hall in a gold plate, whence we shall copy it in a plate for next month, and shall be glad of the sentiments of our medallist correspondents on it. The original plate was left blank, we suppose, for writing. EDIT.

passage is cited in the account, in the Museum Capitolinum, of a statue supposed of Cicero.

"W. Montagu is at last returned to Italy from his voyage to Alexandria and Mount Sinai, and is now at Pisa. I have his journal, which he has sent to the Royal Society at London, and shewed in MS. to the Prince of Mecklenburg.—His principal object was the inscription on Mount Sinai*, which he has faithfully copied, being well versed in the Eastern languages, but nobody has yet been able to explain it. He believes it Hebrew, and of the earliest time; and I am of his opinion.

"I have been imposed upon by false ancient paintings, of which two have been engraved in my History of Art. The expence prevents my publishing a second edition; but I wish to correct it in the translation, which I hear is now [1765] making at Paris, and to get it stopped till I can forward the necessary instructions, and not to have it published, as my Letter on Herculaneum was, without my knowledge. Mr. W at Dresden intends, this winter, to counterfeit the French translation made at Paris by one M. Sellius†, and God knows how. I have offered this bookseller considerable additions and alterations, as I did for my Essay on Allegory. Those who, after a public essay in a science, have applied themselves to it several years, will judge of the improvements I have made in this work in four years, for that is the time since my MS. of the History of Art was sent from hence to Dresden." In 1767-8 he proposed printing the translation at Berlin, in two volumes, with new plates. He thought afterwards of doing it at Rome, translated by himself, with many large plates.

"You must not expect a catalogue of the Greek MSS. in the Vatican. Assemani does not understand the language, and nobody but he will undertake this business, which is not paid for. It is my place, as professor of Greek in the Library, but I have never thought seriously about it. They permitted the Syrian to appear with his nonsense about Mount Lebanon‡, because we are rich in such trifles; but they will not easily suffer him to announce his Greek MSS. They are so careful of these treasures here, that only we of the library are allowed to see the catalogue; but they give out of these MSS. as well as others here, all that you ask. The Jesuits gave a Zurichier leave to transcribe from the private letters of the Protestants on the council of Trent.—Since the death of Card. Passionei, who gave too much liberty, the books are not allowed to go out of the Vatican. Assemani died in 1767, aged 82. His nephew, Archbp. Edovio Assemani, a Syrian writer, got his place.

"I have received a long letter from the Dean of the German Academy at B. It would take some years to answer this man, who is so desirous of information. Judge if I am wrong in wishing to get rid of my German correspondence, and to avoid it in part.

1767. "I have begun a third volume of my Monumenti Inediti. One of the last pieces is a stone representing Hypsipile receiving Jason. It will exceed the two first, both in subjects, drawings, and engravings. I am surprised at the rare pieces, mostly difficult to explain, found every day. I have just discovered the history of Battus, founder of Cyrene, and of Demosthenes taking refuge at the temple of Neptune, in the island of Calauria‡. After Easter I go to Naples, to talk with Mr. Hamilton about the description of his collection of vases, which will appear in 4 months time, in 4 great volumes, but without explanations. The editor, who is a certain adventurer, known at present by the name of Hancarville§, a man of good talents, gets, as Mr. Hamilton tells me, 20,000l. sterling by it."

(To be continued.)

* In answer to P. Q. p. 486, A plan of London, by Overton, 1676, is mentioned, from Mr. Oldys's MS. in Brit. Top. I. 956. Another about that time, by Morden and Lea, is in the library of the Society of Antiquaries; where may be seen a list of plans, ten years and more before and after our correspondent's date.

† Commonly called "The Written Mountains."

‡ This man undertook, in concert with Mr. Mills, an English gentleman, the translation of Chambers's Cyclopaedia. It is well known this gave birth to the Encyclopedie, that does so much honour to France. It is also well known, that Mills and Sellius were robbed of a work of which the idea, progress, and first execution were their own. Mills was obliged to return to England, and his partner Sellius, an old professor at Halle, died at the Hotel Dieu in Paris.

§ Ravanderies du Mont Liban.

|| Dr. Mead had a beautiful little bas relief, not quite a foot high, engraved by C. Paderni, representing this. It was prefixed to Barton's edition of Plutarch's Lives of Demosthenes and Cicero, Ox. 1744, engraved by Pine, from a drawing by Gravelot. The inscription is ΔΗΜΟΣΘΕΝΗΣ ΕΠΙΒΛΗΜΙΟΝ, § See above, p. 572.

MR. URBAN,

June 15.

I Perfectly agree with your correspondents Agricola, p. 26, and Rusticus, p. 255, respecting the injury which religion receives from the non-residence of the clergy.

Much certainly depends upon that intercourse which ought to be kept up between the parishioner and his spiritual guide. The best lessons of instruction, and the most salutary and persuasive admonitions from the pulpit, will lose much of their influence and effect, if he does not live among his parishioners, to give them in his own life an example of the virtues that he teaches; or if he lives among them, and does not in his life as well as doctrines enforce the duties of religion.

The insufficiency of the clergy is another of the causes to which the decline of religion is ascribed. But I fear your correspondent overlooks a more general and pernicious source of the evil he laments; not in the want of abilities, but the want of zeal in those who ought to be earnest and active in diffusing the influence of religion. Much may be done by a teacher of moderate attainments, if his diligence and zeal do but supply the want of more shining endowments. The labours of others have left abundant materials to supply their want of learning; but nothing can make amends for the want of zeal and example; without which the brightest talents and attainments will be of use only to themselves. It is not to their greater abilities, but to their greater zeal, that the growing sect of methodists owe the numerous proselytes which they make.

The clergy, whatever discredit the insufficiency of some among them may bring upon the order, have surely much the advantage in point of learning: they want but equal diligence and zeal to put an effectual stop to the encroachments of those whose strongest and most successful pretext for intruding into the sacred office is, the negligence and indifference of the established clergy.

But, after all, the laity themselves are not without their share in the cause of their declining virtue. They neglect the means of becoming better, and lose the only opportunity which they have of hearing the persuasions that are likely to affect them.

"The shameful neglect and contempt of the sabbath in the higher ranks of life, which has been long a subject of serious alarm, has," as a writer on the subject with great reason laments, "been hastened of late with accelerated steps to destroy the few remains of its design, and pervert it from the sacred uses to which it was set apart, to the purposes of sensual pleasure and profane amusement. With other fashions and follies of the nations near us, they have brought home this; and, instead of appealing to the design of the day, they appeal to the practice of a people more corrupt than themselves, and claim as a privilege what a moment's reflection would teach them to condemn as a gross violation of the law of God, and the perversion of an ordinance that might be made most useful to themselves*." This great and growing evil he earnestly calls upon his brethren of the clergy to oppose with all their powers; convinced that if it be not soon and effectually resisted, it will very shortly defeat their best exertions, render all their labours ineffectual, and leave their churches, already too much deserted, without any to hear their persuasions, or be told of the consequence of their sins.

Strictness in keeping the Lord's day (as you very justly observe in your remark upon the Sunday schools at Leeds, p. 377.) gives an early bias in the mind to virtue, and establishes an abhorrence to vice. "Numbers would be taught and disposed to think and live better than they do, if they observed the sabbath as they ought. Not only the hardened sinner, who too late laments the neglect of those means which would have saved him from his untimely end, but every other professor of our religion, whose practice is inconsistent with his profession, would lead a very different life, if he were constantly to embrace the opportunities of improvement which it gives him†."

Yours, &c.

S. T.

MR. URBAN,

July 8.

HEREWITH you receive a list of peers of the three kingdoms, created at different periods, whom I believe to have very little or no property in, or connection with, the respective kingdoms from whence they derive their honours. Some additions might perhaps be made to this list, but I wished not to exaggerate, "nor set down aught in malice," and therefore chose to err on the safe side, rather than insert any names without reason. I shall make no strictures on this absurd practice—a practice disgraceful to both giver and receiver of such honours, and tending to alienate the affections of, and give disgust to, the respective kingdoms, especially Ireland, where the absurdity is frequently rendered more glaring and ridiculous than in England or Scotland, by creating peers of that kingdom with titles taken from places in Scotland or England, for instance, Fife, Melbourne, Waltham, Mulgrave, &c. &c. * and where the temper of some persons seems at present such as would induce a government to avoid every thing that might give just cause of discontent or uneasiness.

* A little tract lately published, intitled, "Enquiry into the Design of the Christian Sabbath. By J. Symons, B. D."

† Enquiry, &c. p. 124.

I am sorry to see the dignity of peerage made so cheap by such a multitude of new creations, and one of them unconnected with this kingdom: the last six months have produced a dozen new English peers †; and for some years past, English and Irish Peers have sprung up at so prodigious a rate, as almost literally to verify what the late Duchess of Queensberry ‡ used pettishly to say, “There are so many new Lords made, that I can hardly spit out of my coach without spitting upon a Lord.” The ex-minister, whose abilities I revere, though I am perfectly sensible that those great abilities, uncontrouled by the least grain of principle, and spurred on by a boundless ambition, make him a very dangerous person in the state, may with great reason complain of duplicity in a quarter where nothing but the most inviolable truth in all its native dignity ought ever to be found, when peerages are so lavishly bestowed by the present administration; whereas, if he asked but for one, the most perfect chastity in that respect was always boasted, and a determined resolution not to increase the peerage: and, if he should be able by any means to force himself again into administration, one of his preliminaries will undoubtedly be the promise of raising another legion to counter-balance the weight of the last.

As to the question, “Whether Scots peers, created peers of Great Britain since the Union, have a right to sit in the House of Peers” which, till lately, the public opinion seems uniformly to have determined in the negative, grounded probably on the resolution of the House of Dec. 20, 1711, I think much may be said on either side. James Duke of Queensberry was created Duke of Dover, &c. in England, by patent dated May 26, 1708, and upon the day of the next meeting of parliament he was introduced into the House between the Dukes of Somerset and Ormond, took his seat, and continued to sit and vote as long as he lived, which was during two parliaments, without any question or debate: but afterwards, James Duke of Hamilton being created Duke of Brandon, &c. in England, by patent dated September 10, 1711, a caveat was entered against it, and, upon claiming his seat in the House, he was opposed, upon apprehension of danger to the constitution from admitting a greater number of Scots peers than were agreed to by the Act of Union. On December 20, by order of the House, counsel were heard at the bar in support of the patent, and the judges were ordered to attend; but, after long debate, upon the question being put, “Whether the twelve judges should be consulted with?” it was carried in the negative by a majority of fourteen, including proxies: and then the main question being put, it was also carried in the negative, contents fifty-two, non-contents fifty-seven: this was followed by a very strong protest against the resolution, signed by nineteen Lords, giving reasons for their dissent under six heads, of which the fourth was the above-mentioned example of the Duke of Queensberry and Dover, and the fifth, “Because, by this resolution, the peers of Scotland are reduced to a worse condition, in some respects, than the meanest or most criminal subjects.” In consequence of this resolution, Charles Earl of Solway, who succeeded his father as Duke of Queensberry and Dover, was never admitted to sit in the House; and at his death, October 22, 1778, without surviving issue, his English titles became extinct. Upon the same ground James Duke of Hamilton and Brandon was also excluded; as were his son, his grandson, and his two great-grandsons, successively Dukes of Hamilton and Brandon, till the month of

* Add “Kensington,” given as an Irish title to a Welsh gentleman in 1776. EDIT.

† Are not some of these only advanced to higher titles? EDIT.

‡ Qu. Lady Townshend? EDIT.

GENT. MAG. August, 1784.

of June, 1782, when, the House having thought proper to rescind their resolution, the present Duke received a writ of summons to Parliament, as a peer of Great Britain. However, Queen Anne took ample vengeance for this resolution of the House, of Peers, by the exercise of what is indeed an undoubted part of the prerogative, namely, by making twelve peers at once, which was done on December 31, 1711, by calling up by writ two Earls' eldest sons, and creating by patent ten new peers; an example which I am sorry to see followed in the present day, and, like most bad examples, improved upon, as the peerage would not ultimately be increased by those who were only called up by writ. I could wish to recommend to the consideration of these right noble personages the conduct of Sir Miles Wharton upon that occasion, who refused to accept a peerage, alleging, "that he thought it looked like serving a turn, and that, whereas peers used to be made for services which they had done, he should be made for services to be done by him:" but I know full well the insignificance of cool, sober argument, when it has nothing but reason to support it, and should like to have seen another Earl of Wharton start up in the House, and ask them, as he did those illustrious XII viri upon the day of their introduction, "Whether they voted by their foreman?" Yours, &c. E.

A List of Peers of England, Scotland, and Ireland, who have little or no Property in, or Connection with, the respective Kingdoms from whence they derive their Honours.

ENGLAND.

Created.

- 1711. Hamilton, Duke of Brandon, (Duke of Hamilton in Scotland.)
- 1722. Graham, Earl Graham, (Duke of Montrose in Scotland.)
- 1722. Ker, Earl Ker, (Duke of Roxburgh in Scotland.)
- 1784. Gordon, Earl of Norwich, (Duke of Gordon in Scotland.)
- 1746. Fitzgerald, Viscount Leinster, (Duke of Leinster in Ireland.)
- 1766. Campbell, Lord Sundridge, (Duke of Argyle in Scotland.)

IRELAND.

- 1446. Talbot, Earl of Wexford and Waterford, (Earl of Shrewsbury in England.)
- 1622. Fielding, Earl of Desmond, (Earl of Denbigh in England.)
- 1759. Duffie, Earl of Fife.
- 1761. Carpenter, Earl of Tyrconnel.

Created.

- 1766. Saville, Earl Mexborough.
- 1766. Turnour, Earl of Wintertoun.
- 1625. Needham, Viscount Kilmorey.
- 1628. Lumley, Viscount Lumley, (Earl of Scarborough in England.)
- 1628. Wenman, Viscount Wenman.
- 1642. Tracy, Viscount Tracy.
- 1643. Bulkeley, Viscount Bulkeley, (Lord Bulkeley in England.)
- 1661. Cholmondeley, Visc. Cholmondeley, (Earl Cholmondeley in England.)
- 1681. Downay, Viscount Downe.
- 1700. Howe, Viscount Howe, (Viscount Howe in England.)
- 1717. Chetwynd, Viscount Chetwynd.
- 1719. Grimston, Viscount Grimston.
- 1720. Barrington, Viscount Barrington.
- 1720. Gage, Viscount Gage, (Lord Gage in England.)
- 1725. Bateman, Viscount Bateman.
- 1727. Monckton, Viscount Galway.
- 1780. Lambe, Viscount Melbourne.
- 1627. Sherrard, Lord Sherrard of Leitrim, (Earl of Harborough in England.)
- 1762. Hanger, Lord Coleraine.
- 1766. Olmuis, Lord Waltham.
- 1768. Phipps, Lord Mulgrave.
- 1776. Philipps, Lord Milford.
- 1776. Wynne, Lord Newborough.
- 1776. Macdonald, Lord Macdonald.
- 1776. Lyttelton, Lord Westcote.
- 1776. Henley Ongley, Lord Ongley.
- 1776. Shuldham, Lord Shuldham.
- 1782. Hood, Lord Hood.
- 1783. Delaval, Lord Delaval.
- 1783. Pennington, Lord Muncafter.
- 1783. Pennant, Lord Penryhn.

SCOTLAND.

- 1646. Tollemache, Earl of Dysart.
- 1703. Collier, Earl of Portmore.
- 1620. Carey, Viscount Falkland.
- 1662. Osborne, Viscount Dumblain, (Duke of Leeds in England.)
- 1627. Fairfax, Lord Fairfax.
- 1628. Aston, Lord Aston.

P. 437. Does Dr. K. from an excess of candour incline to doubt if there have been any Magazines which have only a view to idle and frivolous amusement? We know the generosity of Mr. Urban's mind disdains invidious comparisons; but it is a melancholy fact, that there are actually Magazines existing of the above completion, as well as others of an immoral tendency; as if it were not enough to play the plagiarist, but the mind must also be corrupted.

P. 421. The critic on the "Essay on Medals" has given an account of the book with his usual candour, but seems to have mistaken the intent of it. Though the professed collector may doubtless find in it some useful hints, the work is certainly rather calculated for the publick at large.

The Story of QUASHI, an African Slave.

(From RAMSAY'S Essay on the Treatment of African Slaves, See p. 597).

MR. Ramsay in general represents the African character in a very contemptible light. The depth of their understanding, he says, is displayed in craft and low cunning, which they cultivate from their infancy, and of which they avail themselves through life. Some, indeed, he allows to have high notions of honour, and to be inviolably faithful to their trust.

Quashi was brought up in the family with his master as his play-fellow from his childhood. Being a lad of towardly parts, he rose to be driver, or black-observer under his master, when the plantation fell to him by succession. He retained for his master the tenderness that he had felt in childhood for his play-mate; and the respect with which the relation of master inspired him was softened by the affection which the remembrance of their boyish intimacy kept alive in his breast. He had no separate interests of his own, and when his master was from home, he redoubled his diligence, that his affairs might receive no injury in his absence. In short, here was the most delicate, yet most strong, and seemingly indissoluble tie that could bind master and slave together.

Though the master had judgement to know when he was well served, and policy to reward good behaviour, he was inexorable when a fault was committed; and when there was but an apparent cause of suspicion, he was too apt to suffer prejudice to usurp the place of proof. Quashi could not exculpate himself to his satisfaction for something done concerning the discipline of the plantation, and was threatened with the ignominious punishment of the cart-whip; and he knew his master too well to doubt of the performance of his promise.

A negroe, who was grown up to manhood without undergoing a solemn cart-whipping, as some by good chance will, especially if distinguished by any accomplishment among his fellows, takes pride in what he calls the smoothness of his skin, it being unrailed by the whip, and he would be at more pains, and use more diligence, to escape such cart-whipping, than many of our lower sort would use to escape the gallows. It is not uncommon for a sober good negroe to stab himself mortally because some boy-overseer has flogged him for what he reckoned a trifle, or for his caprice, or threatened him with a flogging when he thought he did not deserve it. Quashi dreaded this mortal wound to his honour, and slipped away unnoticed with a view to avoid it.

It is usual for slaves who expect to be punished for their own fault, or their master's caprice, to go to some friend of their master's, and beg him to carry them home and mediate for them. This is found to be so useful, that many masters are glad of the pretence of such mediation, and will secretly procure it to avoid the necessity of punishing for trifles, it otherwise not being prudent to pass over without correction a fault once taken notice of, while by this method an appearance of authority and punishment is kept up without the severity of it. Quashi therefore withdrew, resolved to shelter himself and save the glossy honours of his skin, under favour of this custom, till he had an opportunity of applying to an advocate. He lurked among his master's negroe-huts, and his fellow-slaves had too much honour, and too great a regard for him, to betray to their master the place of his retreat. Indeed, it is hardly possible, in any case, to get one slave to inform against another, so much more honour have they than Europeans of low condition.

The following day a feast was kept on account of his master's nephew then coming of age, amidst the good-humour of which Quashi hoped to succeed in his application; but before he could execute his design, perhaps just as he was setting out to go and solicit this mediation, his master, while walking about his fields, fell in with him. Quashi, on discovering him, ran off; and the master, who was a robust man, pursued him. A stone or a clod tript Quashi up just as the other reached out his hand to seize him. They fell together, and wrestled for the mastery, for Quashi also was a stout man, and the elevation of his mind added vigour to his arm. At last, after a severe struggle, in which each had been several times uppermost, Quashi got fairly seated on his master's breast, now panting and out of breath; and with his weight, his thighs, and one hand, secured him motionless. He then drew out a sharp knife, and while the other lay in dreadful expectation, helpless, and sinking into himself, he thus addressed him: "Master, I was bred "up with you from a child. I was "your play-mate when a boy. I have "loved you as myself. Your interest has "been

"been my study. I am innocent of the "cause of your suspicion. Had I been "guilty, my attachment to you might "have pleaded for me; yet you have "condemned me to a punishment of "which I must ever have borne the "disgraceful marks." With these words he drew the knife with all his strength across his own throat, and fell down dead without a groan on his master, bathing him with his blood.—Such greatness of mind is rare to be found in low life in any country.

ANECDOTES of the unfortunate ROUS-SEAU. From Observations on the Present State of Denmark, Russia, and Switzerland, lately published.

THIS entertaining writer, after describing the little town of Bienné in Switzerland, and the picturesque passage from Cerlier to that republic, in which, from a hill called Joliment, the prospect presents on every side the most enchanting scenery, comes next to speak of the bold and fertile island of St. Peter, where the unfortunate Rousseau had fixed his last retreat, sequestered from his friends, and wholly given up to music and botany, forgetting and forgiving his enemies. But, unhappily for him, Les Lettres de la Compagne were ushered into the world with all the pride and support of aristocratical insolence.
 Several answers appeared, which served only to confirm the superior talents of
 M. Tronchin, the author. "It was now," says our Traveller, "that M.
 Rousseau found himself mistaken in his passion for peace and oblivion. The insults and injuries he had experienced had left an animosity in his heart that he could not vanquish. * * * * His Lettres de la Montagne, in which he seems to have exhausted every resource of his astonishing genius, immediately gave new spirits to the popular party.
 They triumphed in their turn, and saw the pen they so much dreaded effectually consigned to neglect, by the manly eloquence of their forgotten and abandoned Rousseau. Thus entered into this political contest, the anathemas pronounced from the pulpit against him leading him into doubts about the purity of their doctrine, he drew on himself the resentment of those who had protected him. He was summoned before the consistory, to give an account of his articles of faith: the doctrines he established were deemed dangerous; the clergy of Neufchatel applied to the council; and the council to the king.

 The following was the answer of his Prussian majesty:

"Friends and trusty subjects,

"It is with satisfaction we behold in the humble report to us of the 4th instant, relative to the work of M. Roufseau, entitled, Letters from the Mountain, the attention you pay to objects you think interesting to the cause of religion.
 We cannot but approve the zeal of your holy pastors, in wishing to prevent the promulgation of sentiments contrary to the established and received doctrines of your country. And disposed, as we are, to second them in their laudable views,
 after examining the means most conducive to that purpose, we readily permit you to take what measures you think most necessary to the public good, with regard to the new edition and sale of the said Letters in question; leaving it to your prudence and discretion to reject every thing that, after mature deliberation, may appear likely to open a future source of discord and division. Our intention, however, is, that the said work should meet with no mark of public infamy; which, besides being adverse to the spirit of moderation that ought ever to accompany the defenders of truth, frequently gives a greater publicity to the writings it proscribes, and loses, by the act of condemnation, the very end it proposes to obtain. For the rest, we make no doubt, but as you are the first to do justice to the exemplary life and conduct of M. Rousseau, you are, at the same time, inclined to permit him peaceably to enjoy the protection of your laws in the retreat he has chosen; where our will is, likewise, that he should remain in perfect repose. With this we pray
 God to keep you in his holy protection.
 By order of the king.

FINCKENSTEIN HERSBERG."

March 30, 1765.

"There was now only one way left to render this noble lesson of toleration useless. The country was alarmed. He was every day exposed to insults and danger, and thought it best, by a precipitate flight, to avoid the rage of an incensed and misguided populace. After a few months residence on this charming and sequestered island, he was once more ordered, by the council of Berne, to quit their territories. His misfortunes now overwhelmed him. He abandoned all hopes of happiness. The following singular letter to his friend, F. de Gra-fomed, is at once a proof of his feelings,
 and

and a reproach on the cruel inveteracy of his enemies.

Island of St. Peter, Oct. 20, 1765.

"SIR,

"The wretched situation in which I now am, and the confidence I have in your goodness, have determined me to intreat you to propose one condition to their excellencies: which, whilst it releases me, once for all, from the troubles of a turbulent life, will, at the same time, more completely fulfil, in my opinion, the intentions of those who persecute me. I have consulted my age, my temper, and my strength; none of them are capable of supporting the fatigue of a long and a dangerous journey, or of combating the inclemencies of the season in a foreign country, at a moment when my infirmities hardly allow me to quit my chamber. After what has passed, I dare not enter the territories of Neuchâtel, where even the protection of the sovereign and the government cannot secure me against the fury of a deluded people. You cannot but be sensible, likewise, that thus inhumanly driven from this, I can have no hopes of protection from the smaller and neighbouring states. Reduced, therefore, to this cruel extremity, there appears to me but one resource; and, however dreadful it may appear, I embrace it, not only without reluctance, but with an eagerness to see it accomplished. If their excellencies will but permit me to pass the rest of my days in prison in any part of their state they shall judge proper, I will live there at my own cost, and give security for my future subsistence. They may debar me, if they please, from pen and paper, and from every worldly communication but those immediately necessary, and which shall be carried on by the person to whose care I am entrusted. All I request is, the use of a few books, and the permission, now and then, of taking a few turns in the garden. Do not imagine from the apparent violence of the expedient, that it is only the result of despair. My mind is at this moment perfectly calm, and my determination proceeds from the most cautious and profound consideration. If the resolution I have formed is an extraordinary one, you will allow my situation to be no less so. My calamities are without example; the forms of life I have for many years been exposed to were enough to have ruined the health of the strongest man; what then must be their effects on a poor invalid like me, worn out with cares and vexations, and whose only ambition is to die in peace! The passions of my heart are all extinct; I feel only the desire of retreat and repose; and those will accompany me to the habitation of my choice. There, delivered from the idle importunities of the curious, and secured from the fatal contingency of any new event, I shall await the last with patience; and, having no communication with the world, have nothing to increase my sorrows. I love liberty, I confess; but mine is beyond the reach of man, and bolts and bars cannot deprive me of it. This captivity appears to me armed with so little terror, and I am so firmly persuaded that it will afford me all the happiness I can expect in this life, that, upon that very account, though it would free my enemies from every alarm, I dare not hope to obtain it. But I am willing to acquit myself of every public as well as private reproach, and to try every honest means of insuring my own peace and quiet, and preventing any new dangers my enemies may force me to brave. I am well acquainted, Sir, with those sentiments of justice and humanity with which your generous heart abounds, and feel how much it will cost it to demand a favour of this nature in my behalf. But I trust that when you have considered every thing, the request I make will appear as a blessing; and the same sentiments which occasion your reluctance is the surest voucher I can have of your being able to surmount it. I wait the honour of an answer before I take any decisive step, and begging you, to accept at once my excuses and respect, I remain, &c."

M. Rousseau was not so ignorant of the laws, as not to know that the magistrates could not imprison a man for life, and debar him from pen and ink, and the society of his friends, without a legal process; yet he affected to be much hurt by their refusal. His pride was, to be thought the object of persecution in whatever country he chose to reside. To keep up the farce, he wrote to his friend the following pathetic letter.

Island of St. Peter, Oct. 22, 1765.

"SIR,

"I shall be able to quit the island of St. Peter next Saturday, and can so far conform to the order of their excellencies. But the extent of their territories, and the ill-state of my health, will not permit me the same day to pass the limits

mits of their power. If they are inclined to punish this mark of disobedience, my life and person are perfectly at their disposal. I have learnt to expect every thing from mankind, and my soul is ever prepared for the worst.—Receive, just and generous man, the assurance of my respectful gratitude, and of a remembrance that will for ever be dear to my heart.”

MR. URBAN,

July 8.

THE writer of this is not one who is apt to repine at burdens which he sees must be borne, or to take any step that may tend to lessen the resources of a government already sufficiently embarrassed. He has never joined in any clamours or petitions against the receipt, or any other tax; nor would he now point out the inconveniences of the tax in his consideration, if he were not persuaded that they might easily be removed, and the tax made at once less grievous and more productive.

The tax he alludes to is that on Marriages, Baptisms, and Burials. As it now stands, it falls hard on the labouring poor, who contribute as much towards it as the man of the amplest fortune in the kingdom. In this circumstance, it is perhaps singular. The cottager is married as often as the peer, his marriage is probably more prolific, and, from the greater number of his children, as many funerals may go out of his house; and this tax comes to add to his expences at a time when they must otherwise be not a little felt by him. Now suppose the same tax to be continued, and even increased, only collected in a different mode. Let a certain sum be paid (a shilling, if necessary, to compensate for what now arises from stamps) on Marriage, Baptism, and Burial: let the minister, or whoever keeps the register of each parish, be obliged yearly to deliver in a list of these, with a certificate that these, and no more, have occurred within the year: let a prescribed sum for each be paid into the hands of the collector of the land tax; and let the amount be placed with the poor-rate, or the county rate, and raised upon the parish at large as they are. By this means government will receive a greater revenue than it does at present; and the labouring poor will be wholly exempted from the burden, which will be thrown on persons of substance and property, and ~~that~~ in proportion to their substance.

But I should not have troubled you on this subject, if I had not often been witness to a greater grievance, which admits of easier remedy. Give me leave, through your publication, to address myself to those who have it in their power to redress it.

To the Lords Bishops of the several Dioceses in England and Wales.

MY LORDS,

Permit an obscure individual to approach you with that respect, which he knows to be your due. If he did not respect you, he would think this address useless: his only motives for making it are the feelings of humanity; and a regard to the credit of that church of which you (under the crown) are supreme governors, and he is a member. He entertains a true respect for the clergy of that church: there are several amongst them, within his own neighbourhood and observation, curates as well as incumbents, whose recollections are not wounded with the consciousness of having ever retained a fee wrung from the scanty earnings of the day-labourer. But, my Lords, from the circumstances of things, it cannot be that all the clergy of the church should be gentlemen: many worthy characters amongst them, from their early education and habits, cannot be expected to have the nicer feelings of honour and liberality, and these stand in need of the direction and controul of your Lordships. Some of these have been ill-informed of the nature of surplice-fees and Easter-offerings, and have considered them as claims, which they might vary at their pleasure. In some parishes, on the introduction of the late duty on Marriages, Births, and Burials, the minister has required sixpence for each entry in the register, accounting to government for three-pence only. In others, demands have been made, and complied with, of fees beyond the ancient and justifiable claim:—instead of two-pence for each communicant, six-pence or a shilling;—instead of a shilling (where that has been the ancient fee) for a burial, half a crown, or five shillings. In a great number of parishes in that part of the kingdom from whence this is written, when the marriage-act of 26 Geo. II. took place, the clergy raised the wedding-fee from half a crown to five shillings, on the plea of their increase of trouble in registering. —Tithes, my Lords, are collected from persons persons of substance and of property, and have this to be said in their favour, that they fall ultimately on the owners of the lands of England. But surplice-fees and Easter-offerings are taken from the labouring poor; who (supposing both husband and wife to exert their utmost industry) cannot, at the time when they are ofteneft called upon for fees, spare more than nine-pence a day to feed, perhaps, five or six mouths, after rent and cloaths are paid for. The voice of distress, my Lords, is heard in the cottage of the poor; but from the lowly situation in which it is uttered, it cannot reach the eminence on which your Lordships are placed. Would to God these lines might catch the eye of the benevolent prelate in whose diocese they are written! They surely would engage his attention; and perhaps he would think it deserving his care to apply a remedy to the grievance they complain of. Enquiries might be sent to the incumbent and church-wardens of each parish, and an answer to them required, "What were the Easter-offerings, and the fees for surplice-duty, at the time of the incumbent's institution to the cure; and what the fees for a wedding previous to the late marriage-act?" The answer might be framed in these, or some such terms:

"We — — —, rector (or vicar), and — — —, church-wardens of the parish of — — —, do solemnly declare, that to the best of our knowledge and belief, the following fees and obventions have been for time immemorial customarily paid in the said parish of — — —; namely,

"Easter-offerings for each person above the age of sixteen years — — — £0 0 0 Fee to the minister at a wedding prior to the marriage-act of Geo. H. 0 0 0
To the clerk at ditto 0 0 0
To the sexton at ditto 0 0 0 Ancient fee for a burial to the minister — 0 0 0
To the clerk for ditto 0 0 0
To the sexton for ditto 0 0 0 Ancient fee for a church-

ing — — — 0 0 0"

Duplicates might be sent and filled up of these certificates, one to be returned to the bishop of the diocese, the other to be framed and fixed up in some conspicuous part of each parish church.

MY LORDS,

This address to your Lordships is dictated by the good opinion sincerely entertained of your order, and of your Lordships, by your very respectful servant, AGRICOLA.

To the Right Hon. WILLIAM PITT,
First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR,

Wisebech, May 15.

THE noble stand you have made in defence of the regal and constitutional rights of this country, against the exorbitant claim of the House of Commons, to compel his Majesty, as it were, to remove from his councils those of whom he most approved, convinces me, that you have hitherto been supported by a power superior to your own distinguished abilities, and most eminent virtues. I therefore address you with more boldness, and crave your attention for a few minutes, while I state to you the heavy burdens and hardships laid upon the industrious poor throughout this kingdom, by the two late oppressive taxes on baptisms and funerals.

These acts took place on the 1st of October last; soon after which I became an eye witness of their severity in two particular instances:

The first was of a private baptism on the 6th day of the same month. The circumstances attending this first instance affected me much; when on demanding the three-pence for the tax, after performing my office, the child-bed woman, who had been delivered but a few days, drew back a kind of curtain, fastened to the bed, and raising up her languishing head, cried out in a pitiful tone of voice, "Indeed, Sir, I have not three-pence in the world, nor scarce a morsel of bread to eat." In this case government ought to have lost its right; notwithstanding, as the officiating minister, I am answerable, from having given bond for 100l. to account for all fees of this kind when called upon by proper authority. At the same time, with rather more propriety, I might have demanded my own customary fee of six-pence for registering the name of the infant: but I must have lost all feeling for the distressed, if I had; nay, further, should have been destitute of humanity, had I not put my hand into my pocket and given her a shilling for present comfort and support. Indeed, since these rigorous acts have taken place, I usually drop my own fee, and have taken very few from the commencement of this act.

The

The second instance is what happened in the same parish on the 4th of November following, at the funeral of a poor labourer, who left behind him a wife with five or six children. The poor woman to whom I was to apply for the payment of this tax (I cannot say, whether or no she was the wife of the deceased), was obliged to borrow one penny of a poor neighbour, who attended the funeral, to make up this small pittance of three-pence. Is not this a hard case likewise? I could produce several more instances, similar to the aforementioned, in the village where I stand in the place of curate. But surely these are sufficient to evince the peculiar severity of these most offensive taxes; offensive certainly; they are on another account, if we advert a little to the shameful partiality attending them. Most taxes bear some proportion to the different qualities of the subject; witness the land, the window, the wheel, and many other taxes; but these bring all to a level, the duke and the peasant. For example, a duke, whose income may amount to 50,000*l.* per ann. and a labourer, who, upon an average, after the rate of 7*s.* per week, may earn by the sweat of his brow 18*l.* 14*s.* per ann. both pay alike for their funeral: whereas, in equal proportion to the difference of income, the one ought to pay 34*l.* 14*s.* to the other's three-pence.

For the sake of common justice, therefore, for the sake of humanity, let facts plead for the repeal of these two oppressive acts. And it is to be hoped they will open the eyes of the present representatives of the people; when they consider how hard the laborious poor earn their bread, and that the price of labour hath not risen in proportion to the dearness of all kinds of provisions for some years past. In short, of all the taxes that have ever been thought of, talked of, or passed into acts, these are the most odious, and will prove most ineffectual. And I am thoroughly persuaded, it never once occurred to the noble Lord, who moved for and proposed these taxes, that the paying of them, insignificant as they may appear, would be so distressing to the poor. And if the poor in so small a village as Walsoken*, in the county of Norfolk, have so early experienced the severity of them; it is much to be feared, that the far more numerous poor in cities, and large manufacturing towns, must feel them still heavier.

RICHARD OSWIN,
Curate of Walsoken.

MR. URBAN,

I Am one of your old correspondents; and, from a wish to continue my mite to your ingenious Miscellany, I should be glad to see a GALLERY OF ANTIQUES to correspond with your PICTURE GALLERY. I entirely agree with your correspondent the London Antiquary, (see vol. LIII. p. 23) that London is quite unknown. I beg leave, in my turn, to offer a few subjects worth observation. It is certain, that there are many of our first and greatest people buried in churches in London, that are utterly unknown; and many fine tombs raised over them are as much buried as the ashes they cover.

In Great St. Helen's Church, Bishopsgate-Street, there are several very fine tombs, particularly one belonging to the Spencer family*: a man and a woman at full length, and a woman kneeling at their feet in the dress of the times; the date 1594. Another to Martin Bond, a soldier; he is represented in his tent, with a servant and a horse; the date 1643. Another very ancient one to a man and a woman; the date 1475. This is a fine old church, and was built before the fire of London, which it escaped.

In St. James's church, Clerkenwell, a Gothic tomb, to Sir William Weston, represents his corpse, finely carved, in a winding-sheet. He was the last prior of St. John of Jerusalem. In the same church, a fine tomb to Lady Berkeley, bed-chamber woman to Queen Elizabeth; she is in her old dress; date 1585.

In St. Andrew's, Undershaft, in or near Leadenhall-Street, is a fine tomb to John Stowe, our famous antiquary, sitting in his study†.

In St. Mary Overy's [or St. Saviour's] church, at the foot of London-Bridge, lies Gower, one of our first poets; his three books are under his head; and the three figures painted upon the wall, with ducal coronets, represent Pity, Mercy, and Charity‡.

* Some account of this family may be found in Winwood's Memoirs, vol. III. p. 136.

† This has been engraved by Vertue.

‡ The head of this figure, and the monument below, have been engraved. EDITOR.

* In this parish Archbishop Herring was born 1693, his father being then rector of it.

In the Temple Church, in Fleet Street, are nine Knights Templars worth notice; these particularly, as you have obliged the world with views and anecdotes of the Temple; vol. LIII. pp. 284. 549.

In St. Botolph's Church, Bishopsgate-Street, is a fine picture of King Charles the First at his devotions: the text quoted in the book before the king, in this picture is this, "Of whom the world was not worthy."

In all these churches are several fine tombs, too numerous to be here pointed out. Now, Sir, this letter comes in hopes that some of your ingenious correspondents will favour you with a drawing of some of the tombs here pointed out; and, I give you my word, no one need be afraid of meeting with the disappointment Palæologus complains of in vol. LIII. p. 189; for these are all extant, and in fine preservation; at least I saw them so a few months ago; and they are a feast for an antiquary.

I will just add a few more to this list; but, observe, I cannot certify their being there now. In the fine old collegiate church of St. Katharine, near the Tower, is a tomb to a duke of Exeter* and his two ladies; date 1447.

In St. Bartholomew's Church the Less, very near Smithfield, is or was a large grave-stone, with the effigies, in brass, of a pilgrim and his wife; he holds a bag, and she a bottle; he died in 1465. Perhaps, as the Society of Antiquaries has obliged the world with the fine tomb of Raherus, in St. Bartholomew's the Great; it might be worth while to enquire after this, which would be a sort of companion to it.

Should any of your numerous and ingenious correspondents wish to oblige the world with these drawings, and should find (as is, I believe, the case with some) the inscriptions obliterated, they will meet with them very plain and exact in "A New View of London," 1708, 8vo. But should that book not be at hand, if they will send you any of the drawings, I will undertake to furnish the inscriptions.

In Croydon Church, in Surrey, is Abp. Sheldon's beautiful tomb, allowed to be of most exquisite workmanship†.

* Our correspondent does not seem to know that this tomb has been engraved in a capital style, in the History of St. Katharine's, reviewed in our vol. LII. p. 300. EDIT.

† Of this see the History of that town, reviewed in our vol. LIII. p. 774. EDIT.

In Cartmell Church, in Lancashire, is a fine tomb to the Harringtons; but the finest standing in England, or perhaps in the world, is the church of Nine Stowe Churches in Northamptonshire, to Elizabeth, 4th daughter of John Lord Latimer.

I never saw either of the three last mentioned tombs, but can give some account of them if required. I should think some of your correspondents might obtain for you a few drawings from some of the antiques, or pictures, &c. in the British Museum, and other public repositories; and hope these hints will lead some artist's attention to others equally worth notice. ANTIQUARIUS.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 3.

THE Editor of the "Supplement to Swift" has inserted in that work some of the Dean's MS notes on Macky's Characters, which you have yourself pronounced (Vol. XLIX. p. 255) to be both "curious and authentic." Several copies of that book, with the above-mentioned notes, transcribed at different times, are to be found in the hands of the curious. But in one now before me (which was bought at Mr. Leigh's in 1778) are six MS leaves, intituled, "Some additional Characters of the Chief of the last Ministry," and superscribed "Aug. 16, 1715, MS." These have clearly been transcribed by some ignorant person from a MS written on a larger page; they fill eleven pages in 8vo; and the copy they were taken from began at p. 85. and ended at p. 94. The present possessor of the book (by whose permission they are now sent to Mr. Urban) supposes, with great probability, that they were transcribed from a complete MS copy of Macky's Characters, and that those contained in the 84 preceding pages of the larger volume were what have been printed.

Yours, &c.

N. J.

LORD BOLINGBROKE

IS son to old Sir Henry St. John, of Wandsworth [Battersea] in Surrey. He was bred a Presbyterian; but as soon

* If any of our readers should happen to be possessed of the original MS. from which these extracts were made, an account of its size, and a sketch of what it contains, transmitted to the printer, will be considered as a favour by the gentleman to whom we are indebted for this literary curiosity.

as he came to years of discretion, he changed his religion, and entered into the communion of the Church of England *.

The advantage of a liberal education, and his own good natural parts, together with his having improved himself by travel, soon made him conspicuous; and being chosen a member of parliament, he was not long in that house before he became one of the leaders of it; in which he never spoke but with eloquence, and seldom without success. He is a zealous assertor of monarchy and episcopacy.

After Dr. Sacheverell's trial, he was, by the interest of the Earl of Oxford (then Mr. Harley), made secretary of state (a post, at that juncture of time, of no small danger and difficulty). He heartily joined with that minister in concerting the measures, whereby to ease the nation of a long and burthensome war; and, with more industry than honour, so carried that matter on, as to bring it to a conclusion not altogether so beneficial to England, as, from our great conquests, and the miserable circumstances of France, we might with reason expect.

Some time before the peace was proclaimed, he was created Lord Bolingbroke; and, that he might take place of all the other lords made some little time before him (because he could not well be spared out of the House of Commons), he had also the title of Viscount.

How he increased in the queen's favour is very visible, from a difference which happened between him and my lord treasurer, in which each used their utmost efforts to disgrace the other. But her majesty so far listened to my Lord Bolingbroke, as to take away the treasurer's staff, and would in a few days have given it to his lordship, had not death intercepted it.

Upon the arrival of the first courier from Hanover after her majesty's death, his lordship was, by the king's sign manual, turned out of his office; and the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Duke of Somerset, and my Lord Cowper, (three of the then lords regent) by the authority of the same sign manual, seized all his papers, and sealed up the office.

In the meeting of the first parliament after the king's accession to the throne, a committee of secrecy was appointed to examine into the whole transactions of the former ministry, especially in relation to the peace, which his lordship, as secretary, must of consequence have the greatest hand in. Upon this, fearing either the malice of his enemies, or being conscious of some guilt, and perhaps both, he thought fit to fly into France, and avoid a trial.

He is a tall, well-shaped, fair man, something pitted with the small-pox; has abundance of vivacity and life; is very witty, and loves repartees; a judge of learning, and a great encourager of it. Is indefatigable in any business he undertakes, and dispatches a great deal with little or no trouble. He mightily admires, and is much admired by, the ladies, which by degrees has rendered him so great a debauchee, that he is almost a libertine. Never did the rake and the statesman so effectually unite, as in this person. He is a hearty friend, but a bitter enemy; passionate, yet good humoured; ambitious, but generous; very hard to be reconciled to an offender, but harder to be offended. He speaks all the modern languages perfectly well, and understands most of the ancient; is nicely well-bred, but hates ceremony; drinks hard, sleeps little, and whores much. About thirty-five years old.

EARL OF STRAFFORD.

I Refer you to p. 46. for the knowledge of the family and first rise of this gentleman *, and shall only carry on his character from where it left off.

Soon after Dr. Sacheverell's trial, he was sent ambassador to Holland, and for some time lived in a real, or at least in a seeming, friendship with that Republic; but no sooner did the States affront her Majesty, by advising her in the choice of her own servants, and, by way of an imperious petition, insolently desiring her not to change her ministry, but he thought it high time, as he represented the person of her Majesty of Great Britain, to use the States more haughtily, and to let them see that they were much mistaken, if they thought that England was any longer to be governed by Holland.

* He was born about the year 1678, married his first wife in 1700, and was chosen a member of parliament in the same year. He was appointed secretary of state, Sept. 27, 1710, at the age of thirty-two, and created Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, July 7, 1712.— See two other characters of him, in Swift's Works, and in Lord Chesterfield's Letters, &c.

* This answers to p. 145 of Macky's printed book. The MS erroneously calls him Strafford. Some

Some time before the opening of the Congress at Utrecht, as his lordship was designed for one of the Plenipotentiaries, it was thought convenient, that he should first come over in person, and receive his instructions, and know the secret resolutions of the Queen and council. He was not long before he entirely entered into the measures of the ministry, jointly agreeing that the States must be kept in the dark as much as possible, lest they give so much light to the enemies of peace of the measures then taking for it, as to render it very difficult, if not impossible, to bring it to a conclusion. He exactly followed his orders, kept them in ignorance as much as possible, always answered their particular questions in general terms; and, whenever they began to grumble, he certainly roared. At the opening of the Congress at Utrecht, his lordship was named plenipotentiary with the Bishop of Bristol*; and as it did not suit with that gentleman's gown to quarrel and domineer, that difficult and disagreeable task lay wholly on this lord, who, when he found it impossible to persuade or entice the States into any measures for peace, as long as they had the least hopes of our continuing the war, did not scruple to assure them that her Majesty was now resolved to conclude the peace, and she hoped in conjunction with, but, if they would not, without the Allies.

The Dutch still continuing resolutely obstinate against signing, so nettled and provoked his lordship, that, it may be believed, he did not so heartily espouse their cause as he would otherwise have done. And whatever advantage the enemy might get by that treaty, cannot be so properly attributed to his love for the French, as to his hatred to the Dutch, who, though they are generally a stubborn self-conceited people, very jealous of the honour of their Republic; yet they thought fit to bear with this gentleman's ill usage, and to be hector'd into a peace.

He is a person of a sweet majestick presence, of a courteous, but an awful countenance, which renders him at the same time both feared and beloved; speaks most languages to perfection; is skilled in all the arts of rhetorick, and never wants words to persuade as long as he finds men willing to be persuaded; he has a great deal of ambition, and loves flattery; lives very generously, and takes a pleasure in doing good, more for the vanity of its being talked of, than the satisfaction of its being done; is very well bred, but too proud; always stretches his instructions as far as he can with safety, but is too cunning to exceed them.

King George, in his voyage to England, honoured him with a visit at the Hague, condescended to sup with him one night, and suffered his son to dance with his lady; and yet, notwithstanding these marks of esteem, he was, on the King's accession to the throne, dismissed of all his employments, and is now mentioned as one to be impeached for the making so bad a peace. He is about thirty eight years old.

BISHOP OF LONDON.

BEING returned from Sweden, where he was resident for many years, upon the death of the Bishop of Bristol, he was preferred to that bishoprick. And as he is an excellent statesman, as well as a divine, he was not a little consulted by the Earl of Oxford, who, finding his capacity so great, and his knowledge so general, resolved to have him of the privy council; to which end he was first made lord privy seal, and afterwards took his place at the council board, where he was of so much service, and made such a venerable figure, that her majesty made choice of him as one of her plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht. And as he has followed his instructions, and obeyed his mistress's orders, it is some surprise to the considering part of the world, how this gentleman can be called to an account for the doing that, which, had he not done it, would have more endangered both his life and reputation. If to be dutiful and obedient is treason, they have a good article against him; but if not, it is to be hoped this gentleman will escape their fury.

He was, on the death of the Bishop of London, soon after his return from signing the peace at Utrecht, advanced to that bishoprick, and in great favour with her Majesty; who had so great an esteem for him, that, had she outlived the Archbishop of Canterbury, she would certainly have made this gentleman archbishop.

He is a little, brown man; of a grave and venerable countenance; very charitable and good-humoured; strictly religious himself, and takes what care he can to make others so; is very careful in whatever he undertakes. Divinity and policy have pretty equally divided his time; and as few, if any, have made a better progress in either of them, so he cannot but be always an ornament as well as an advantage to his country. About sixty years old.

* Dr. John Robinson, afterwards Bp. of London; of whom see the next article. E.

LORD BINGLEY.

OF the name and family of Benson, in Yorkshire. A plentiful fortune, a good education, and his own admirable parts, soon recommended this gentleman to the city of York. After his father's death, he was chosen a member of parliament for that city, and always made a very good figure in the House of Commons. He was one of the gentlemen that voted for the impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell; but cunningly guessing how matters would go, not only refused being a manager, but immediately withdrew, and lived retired till that trial was over.

On the turning out my Lord Godolphin, this gentleman was appointed one of the lords of the treasury; where he discovered such a capacity and genius for business, that my Lord of Oxford (then Mr. Harley, and first commissioner of the treasury) entered into a strict friendship and familiarity with him.

On Mr. Harley's being made Earl of Oxford and lord high treasurer, Mr. Benson was made chancellor of the exchequer; and after the conclusion of the peace, this gentleman was appointed to go ambassador to Spain, was accordingly created Lord Bingley, and was so near going, that part of his equipage was gone. Why his departure was so often put off, is yet a secret; but it is thought some difference happened between him and the chief ministers of state after he was named ambassador. Whether he entirely entered into their measures, is a question; but it is a general belief, that, had the queen lived, he would nevertheless not have made that embassy.

He is a very jolly, fair, handsome man; has an agreeable cast of the eye, and dresses very genteelly; lives in great splendour, and yet is very covetous; is a great epicure, and too much an atheist; has abundance of sense and learning, and understands the constitution of his country as well as any one; and had he but less pride, and more good humour, he would be extremely valued by every body. About forty years old.

LORD LEXINGTON.

AT the time of the treaty of Utrecht, this gentleman was sent ambassador, or rather plenipotentiary, to Spain, and was a witness of the renunciation made by King Philip to the crown of France. He was the person that signed, but not made, the Spanish peace; and however small its advantages may be, he has the advantage of so good a reputation, and always appeared so hearty in his country's cause, that it would be very uncharitable to believe that he has been guilty of any wilful neglect, or basely sold his nation's interest.

He is a very handsome agreeable man, of a brown complexion, and a smiling countenance; has very good parts, is happy in his expressions, and still happier in his actions; values honour and preferment more for the opportunity it gives him of serving his friends, than of enriching himself; is one of the pleasantest companions in the world; an enemy to affected gravity, and one of the greatest promoters of mirth; a great favourite of the ladies, and a great admirer of them. About fifty-five years old.

LORD HARCOURT.

HE is of a very ancient and good family in Berkshire [Oxfordshire], always remarkable for its loyalty to the crown, and its aversion to presbytery. After some years study at Oxford, this gentleman went to the Temple, and made so great a progress in the law, that he was scarce sooner admitted to plead than admired for his pleading.

He was one of Dr. Sacheverell's counsel, and so distinguished himself in his admirable defence of that gentleman, that even his enemies must own, that he is not only one of the best lawyers, but one of the best orators also of this age.

Her Majesty being present at this trial, could not but be extremely pleased with one, who, with so much zeal and strength, vindicated her prerogative, and asserted the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, at a time when the House of Commons judged neither of them lawful or necessary.

On the turning out of my Lord Cowper, this gentleman was made lord chancellor and lord keeper; and though his predecessor was scarce to be exceeded in a discharge of that trust, yet we may not unjustly say, that he was at least equalled by the successor. He was creand a peer by Queen Anne, and continued chancellor during that princess's reign.

On the accession of King George to the British throne, this gentleman was dismissed from all his employments, and they were restored to my Lord Cowper.

He is a fair lusty man; has been handsome; he has so much learning and eloquence, and so sweet a delivery, that he may not improperly be styled a second Cicero; is extremely generous and good humoured; has been extravagant, but is now grave, and lives within bounds; hard study, and too much fatiguing himself in his business, have both spoiled his eyes and his constitution. He is about sixty years old.

SIR WILLIAM WYNDHAM.

HE is of a very ancient family, and one of the richest baronets in England; was bred up at Eton School, and was there looked on as a lad of very good and quick parts; and his father dying when he was but very young, he came into the world something sooner than usual. He was no sooner of age, but chosen a member of parliament, and has for the last four or five years made a very considerable figure in that house; Always professes himself an enemy to presbytery, and a lover of episcopacy. He was, on the turning out the whig ministry; made secretary at war, and soon after chancellor of the exchequer, which place King George took from him quickly after his accession to the throne. He was the gentleman who brought in, and helped to pass, the Schism bill; and has since had the courage to vindicate the rights of his countrymen in a matter no less dangerous and remarkable, that of calling the King's proclamation in question, which he asserted to be an infringement on the liberties of the people, and unprecedented, and that even in such an House of Commons as he knew was entirely in the court interest.

He is a middle sized, fair man; very handsome, and extremely good-humoured; has a very good estate, and spends it generously; a frequent speaker in the House of Commons; and not so much a courtier as to wink at the errors of a prince, and hide or smooth, the baseness of his ministry; does not want eloquence; and has so much steadfastness, resolution, and courage, as render him at this time very necessary; he makes a very kind and obliging husband, but has not altogether the gravity of a married man; he affects lewdness more than he practises it; is a hearty friend, a man of much honour, and would injure nobody. About twenty-eight years old.

SIR THOMAS HAMMER.

HE is a gentleman of an excellent family, and an ancient baronet; hath no great estate, yet makes a great figure, and does not run out. A good education, a diligent application: his own natural parts, and some years travel and experience, have rendered this gentleman a complete statesman.

He was the person that was entrusted with the Duke of Ormond's private orders; and that delivered them to him in Flanders, when he was disappointed from ruining the whole French army. It was owing to Sir Thomas that the Commerce bill was thrown out of the House of Commons; for which service, his knowledge in the civil law, his eloquence, and general ingenuity, the next parliament thought fit to choose him for their Speaker. Very few ever filled that chair so well, and none better.

He is a tall, well-shaped, brown man; very good humoured and courteous; takes a pleasure in obliging every body, and scarce has an enemy; will not entirely confine himself to any party, but always opposes whatsoever he thinks wrong, though proposed by his best friends; is so far from being either covetous or ambitious, that he has more than once refused a place, when it has been offered him as a bribe. About forty years old.

MR. BROMLEY

IS of a good family in Warwickshire, and born to a considerable fortune; was bred up at Oxford, where, finishing his studies something sooner than usual, he travelled very young, and afterwards printed such an account of his travels as he has long since been ashamed of.

The University of Oxford have for many years chosen him for their member, and have received no small credit from such a representative. He is a zealous assertor of monarchy, a staunch church man, and a violent opposer of any measures which either encourage or favour Presbytery. Has for several years had the best interest in the House of Commons of any single person in it. No one is more listened to when he speaks, nor more deserves it. His orations sions are not light and superficial, but strong and persuasive.

The first parliament after Dr. Sacheverell's trial chose him for their Speaker; and, having with a great deal of honour and fidelity served them and his country, her Majesty thought fit to make him secretary of state in the room of my Lord Dartmouth, who was made privy seal.

He is a lusty gentleman, of a comely venerable countenance; has wisdom and good nature in his looks, and is reckoned one of the honestest men in the world; is punctual in paying his debts, very charitable, and a great encourager of learning; is not hard to be spoken with, gives his advice freely, hates flattery, and never promises but with a real intention to perform; has always a great regard to merit, and seldom or never would promote a person, though ever so well recommended, without first trying his abilities. About fifty-five years old.

MR. URBAN, Chichester, July 25.

AS the lately-published "Letters from the Archdeacon of St. Albans, in reply to Dr. Priestley," will probably be very generally read and admired; allow me, through the channel of your Magazine, a few remarks and queries, hasty indeed, and such only as the first reading of these Letters has suggested. To every remark will be prefixed the page of the Archdeacon's Letters to which it refers.

P. 21.] The phrase "coming in the flesh" is a very natural, expressive, and decisive one, if supposed to refer to the phantomist doctrine of the Gnostics. In any other sense, or for any other purpose, it must be esteemed harsh and unusual; peculiarly so, and quite insufficient, if applied to prove the doctrine of the incarnation of the Logos, as for this purpose we want an explication not of our blessed Saviour's state and condition on earth, but of his præ-existent state in heaven.

P. 27.] contains a specimen of admirable reasoning much in the style of Bishop Hall. If Dr. Priestley thinks it worth while to give particular attention to it, he will shew what degree of attention is due to it from others.

Pp. 29, 30.] This argument is of nearly the same complexion as the former. The ancient reading of κατὰ τὴν αἰώνιον is entirely in favour of

Dr. Priestley's interpretation. Photius [Bibl. cod. 126] abuses this epistle of Clemens, and the candid Lardner seems disposed to commend it for one and the same reason, that is, for being (as the latter terms it) a Socinian epistle *.

P. 34.] Is it quite fair in the Archdeacon to cite Dr. Lardner's opinion in favour of the genuineness of the shorter epistles of Ignatius, and at the same time to conceal that the very passage referred to by the Archdeacon in his Charge [p. 19] is suspected by that learned and candid writer to be an interpolation †? Many passages much less figurative, and more direct to the Archdeacon's purpose, might have been produced from these epistles of Ignatius, so that it may be difficult to assign a reason for his choice of the above unfortunate one, which has exercised the critics Vossius and Cotelierius in a way more creditable to their ingenuity than satisfactory as to the authenticity of the passage in question, or perhaps the greatest part of the work from which it is taken.

P. 38.] In what part of his writings does Grotius maintain the high orthodoxy of the proper Nazarenes in the article of our Lord's divinity? I ask this question in formâ pauperis, for I find that Grotius is not at all of the Archdeacon's opinion on the subject of the late origin of these ancient Christians ‡.

P. 66.] Though this has some force considered as an argumentum ad hominem, yet as the Archdeacon confesses that the late learned Jeremiah Jones is in this controversy introduced to him for the first time, it would have been only a piece of respect due to a stranger to have taken some notice of what that eminent person has said concerning the epistle of Barnabas, particularly of the improbability of its having had for its author one who was once a Jew §. But waving this piece of ceremony, which, as Jeremiah Jones was a dissenter, and "very much unknown among the Archdeacon's brethren of the establishment," the Archdeacon may think altogether unnecessary, some attention should have been paid to the difference between the old

* "Credibility," part ii. vol. I. p. 49, 2d edition.

† Idem, p. 160.

‡ Annotat. in Matth. c. 1. sub init.

§ Jones on the Canon, vol. II. p. 523, seq.

Latin version and the Greek text of one of the passages cited from the epistle of Barnabas, which difference materially affects the argument: not to say that Mr. Lindsey's remarks on all these passages from Barnabas deserve our consideration*; but I beg pardon, Mr. Lindsey is an apostate, and probably in the Archdeacon's idea worse than an infidel or a dissenter.

Pp. 90, 91.] Allowing Dr. Priestley's translations of the expressions ἐκ τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ and οὐκ ἐστὶν to be somewhat incorrect, it is an inaccuracy by which the main argument is little affected. The passage from Athanasius proves that in the opinion of this father the apostles did not openly and explicitly teach the doctrine of Christ's divinity. Their private instructions [p. 94] to the catechumens, and such of their notions as it was policy to conceal [p. 101], Athanasius certainly well knew, and it cannot be doubted that the Archdeacon of St. Albans is as intimately acquainted with them.

P. 101.] The Archdeacon's commentary on Acts ii. 24. 32. 33. affords an excellent specimen of his method of interpreting scriptures; it is after the best manner of Bishop Bull, from whose storehouse (as Dr. Priestley observed) the Archdeacon, and his valuable ally the Monthly Reviewer, have drawn all their heaviest weapons. These operations of the Archdeacon on a very plain passage of holy writ will lead many persons to think that some qualifications besides that of "being at home in the Greek language," and in the Platonic philosophy, are requisite to form an able and successful expositor and defender of the doctrines of the gospel. An evangelical spirit is not one of the least of these qualifications, though some of our master builders seem to think they may do very well without it.

Yours, &c.

A. B.

MR. URBAN,

June 13.

I HAVE for a long time been extremely pleased with your biographical anecdotes of, and enquiries after, great and illustrious persons: but am much offended at your various correspondents who have spoken with such partiality, not to say in commendation, of that infamous and worst of wretches Bradshaw. I entirely agree with your correspondent W. N. vol. LIII. p. 566, that an anecdote of him is all that was required; but this ought to be done with decency; and that, I cannot say, your correspondent B. R. vol. LIII. p. 1028, has quite observed. Certainly all minute enquiries after such a man are better for charity's sake dropped, as the name of him must shock his surviving relations. But I now particularly address myself to your correspondent A. G. in vol. LIII. p. 750. Pray, Sir, who gave you, or any one else, an authority to find fault with any service ordered to be read in the church of England? I do not, however, wonder at it, after what you have said before in commendation of his bringing King Charles I. of blessed memory, to the block, for they who forsake their King first, will their God and religion next, and that King as good a Christian, and as fine a gentleman, as ever sat upon any throne.

Yours, &c.

A. JACOB.

MR. URBAN,

AS you profess from every field to transplant some rare production, I believe you will not think the following Exotic from the MORNING CHRONICLE unworthy notice. It seems to have sprung up under the influence of a warm sun.

Yours, &c.

Y. D.

Moorfields, the 39th Day of the Month Arcan.

Αναξίφορημίτης Μουσας,

Τίνα θεῶν, τίς ηγεμῶν,

Τίνα δ' ἀνδρῶν καλαδότημον;

Why! whom better can ye celebrate than that glorious circulator of intelligence, Billy Woodfall, whose sapient logographic brow a peruke brown adorns! A-propos, I took a walk on Sunday morning last to Jerusalem, having received a pressing invitation from my friend Sharp, the razor-maker, who has lately established a manufactory there. We played at tectotum for an hour or two before breakfast, and, after discoursing for some time on the immateriality of plumb-pudding, devoured three leviathans and a philanthropist in less time than I am writing this "hasty sketch" of the business.—

I have every respect for the memory of Dr. Priestley the world gives me credit for; I have read his verses on his wife's bosom; we frequently play at skittles together on a Sunday evening, and blow our noses on the same handkerchief; but I will never sacrifice public good to private friendship, nor betray the confidence you are graciously pleased to place in your obliged and devoted humble servant,

* Sequel to the Apology, p. 428, & seq.

JOHN HIGGINSON, Esquire.

P. S. I have purchased, by your recommendation, the folio edition of Jack the Giant-Killer, with notes by Gronovius, which I much approve of, and upon the whole prefer to Plutarch's Life of Hogarth; the observations on the immoderate use of cantharides are very judicious, notwithstanding what Johnson says.

The Emperor had his head shaved last Tuesday by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and, being one of the curious in wigs, spent the evening very jovially with a tobacconist in East Smithfield, where, it is said, he ate so heartily of asparagus that a diabetes is unavoidable.

I command you, under the inevitable penalty of annihilation, to inform me, by return of post, whether there is any analogy between Dunstable chalk hill and a wet newspaper, and whether they are not to be seen every morning at a quarter past five at the Chapter coffee-house, in a white waistcoat and breeches, exclaiming with the prophet Jeremiah, "waiter! give me the Public—where's the Chronicle—not come in yet?—Herald for a Daily!"

D—n order, d—n matter of fact, d—n every thing, I am above ye all—I am governed, as the sea is, by our noble and chaste mistress the moon, under whose countenance I never cease to sing—I shall be very happy to see you next Wednesday, as the moon will then be at the full: Monro has promised to favour me with his company, and I have ordered a leg of mutton and turnips and one of the hedgehogs Capt. Cook brought with him from Otaheite as a present to her Majesty.

I take my degree of LL. D. this day se'nnight, and have been reading Kent's Directory and Aristotle's Master-piece to qualify me for the examination. I have ordered a blue satin waistcoat and a pair of green velvet breeches to be ready at three, and have some idea of being circumcised, as my sister tells me I shall never be able to translate the Song of Moses into High Dutch till that operation is performed on your most faithful and devoted humble servant.

By the bye, I send you a specimen of my translation of the first Iliad into elegiac verse, which I mean to bind up with Sherlock upon Death and Harris's List of Covent Garden Ladies, and send in a post chaise and four as a present to Sir Ashton. Sam House has very kindly accepted the dedication, which I mean to write in hexameter measure, but wish you would take Dunning's opinion.—I am sorry to trouble my friends, but necessity, you know, has no law.—Do send me Wingate's Arithmetic, and desire Jones to let me have my umbrella—that fellow seems to consider every thing as his vade mecum—he stole my tobacco-box a few days ago, and gave it to Mrs. Robinson in exchange for an old memorandum book of great use to every body but the owner.—But I'll give it the dog! he shall be consecrated in Paul's Wharf by six gingerbread bakers without thumbs, and afterwards eat hot apple dumplin out of a pail with his hands tied behind him, while nineteen hermaphrodites in blue jerkins p— upon his grave, and both Houses of Parliament sing the third ode of Anacreon at the Saracen's Head in Friday-street, accompanied by George Gost—g, Esq. one of the Deputy Registers of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. I must now, Mr. Woodfall, intreat your pardon for intruding upon you at dinner-time, but

When a lady's in the case

All other things, you know (Billy), give place;

for, being die Veneris, I have promised to meet Poll Basket at the Pig and Beehive in Honey-lane Market, to breakfast upon hot hasty-pudding and mushroom sauce.

Yours to eternity and three days,

JOHN HIGGINSON.

Don't let my father see this on any account.

To the Right Rev. Father in God
William Woodfall, Logographer and Fire Eater to her Majesty the Empress of all the Russias, John Higginson sends Grace and Health.

MR. URBAN,

July 16.

I BEG leave, through your most useful compilation, to make some observations on Mr. Soame Jenyns's ridiculous rule of the attempts to restore the constitution of Great Britain. Hæ nuga seria ducunt in mala. This merry genius takes the scheme, probably the most exceptionable; then determines it the most feasible; and by laughing at its consequences, when placed in the most absurd light, endeavours to stigmatise every attempt at political improvement; I had almost said, at our national security. But this gentleman might as well argue, that the pure principles of the Christian religion are as little compatible with the interest of society and the improvement of human morals, as those of a fair, uncorrupt, and equal government. If men, as mortals, individually or collectively, cannot be made perfect, it does not surely follow, that they ought to stagnate in the grossest imperfection. I humbly apprehend Mr. Jenyns to have viewed the people of this country with fixed prejudice: in his pocket and his person he may in his election campaigns have felt the weight of a British mob; and, soured by the treatment, chafes now to represent every evil as the necessary consequence of their natural profligacy, while this very profligacy, if not entirely occasioned, is much promoted, by our present mode of representation, and the interest their corrupt superiors have in its support and encouragement. Does Mr. Jenyns find, in the returns of any county, at any period, any members of that stamp, which are presumed a disgrace to the representative? Are they not always, or with the fewest exceptions possible, men of large landed property, plain sense, old descent, and disinterested views, even where united with brilliant talents? Can that set of men, who thrive on the misfortunes of their country, gain a seat any where but in the boroughs? and is not the sale of those the more notorious and easy, as the number of electors is fewer, or the dependence of them, as the valuable appendage of some estate; the more certain? Did not Cromwell summon parliaments on this plan of equal representation? and did not they, under the certainty of an instant dissolution, begin by questioning the legality of the very authority by which they were summoned? One scarcely knows which most to admire, the man who called such parliaments, or the parliaments that thus dared to oppose the title of such a man. These being incontro-vertible facts, the argument is shifted into the bold assertion, that the whole is an absolute innovation, and a desperate alteration of the forms, under a specious pretence of complying with the spirit, of our free government, and is therefore both illegal and inexpedient. The reply to this must necessarily, as I wish not to argue speculatively or hypothetically, lead me into a little historical epitome of the progressive state of our representation, which has never for any long period continued in this supposed permanency, but, agreeably to the very essence of a free government, has gradually, to the last century, altered, as the increase of commerce, the state of property, the degree of population, and the manners of the people, required. For I most submissively allow, that there is an indecorum at least in the people's petitioning parliament, unless on some grievance so notorious as to be nearly self-evident, and the relief of which consequently must be both legal and expedient. In this case, the progressive improvement of our representation formerly will prove the legality, the present state of it the expediency, of the people's claim. The first legal summonses under our present form were about the year 1300, in the reign of Edward I, when knights of the shire were elected by only freeholders; power to a certain degree having always attended property in Britain, and none but free-tenants being capable of suit and service at a county-court, in which these knights were elected. This privilege in the reign of Henry VI. was restrained to the possessors of forty shillings a year; after the Revolution to such, paying the land-tax, but with this horrible absurdity, that the necessity of being rated to the land-tax having not been even yet added to the oath, many are encouraged to swear to the possession of forty shillings a year, over and above all reprises, while, from the not being at all assessed to the land-tax, the vote given on such oath is perfectly illegal. All lease and copyholders, however easy their tenure and large their income, were, from feudal customs most unjustly now adhered to, always excluded; and, on some base practices at the last contested Oxfordshire election, were restrained by act of parliament. The writs for burgesses not originally specifying the towns to send them, and the burden of their main-maintenance, (four shillings a day for a knight, and two shillings for a burgess) being at an early period very heavy, the sheriffs, from interested motives, frequently dispersed the writs in a partial manner, without due regard to the opulence or size of towns; and thus, to our disgrace, converted into boroughs many of the smallest. But the towns which belonged to, or the inhabitants which held their property under, the king or great barons, were compelled by tenure to bear this burden of sending members to parliament, which seems the origin of burgage tenure. In other places, such inhabitants as were willing to bear the expence of their members wages were allowed the sole right of electing them, which seems the origin of votes by scot and lot. On the alienation of feudal and monastic property under the Tudor family, manufactures, commerce, personal property, and population increasing, the towns felt their own importance, and began petitioning to have restored, or granted, the right of sending members to parliament, which gradually produced the following astonishing change:—that to about 170 representatives of the people in the fourteenth, and 300 in the fifteenth century, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries 215 members were, for the benefit of representation, added to parliament, by the Crown; Wales, Monmouthshire, and Cheshire, being incorporated with our legislature by act of parliament under Henry VIII.—the account therefore stands thus: Henry VIII. restored two boroughs; Edward VI. twenty; Mary, four; Elizabeth, twelve; James, sixteen; Charles II. eighteen. Henry VIII. created thirty-three; Edward VI. twenty-eight; Mary, seventeen; Elizabeth, forty-eight; James, eleven; Charles II. six. The whole addition, two hundred and fifteen members within the course of about one hundred and fifty years, ending little more than one hundred years ago. In 1706, by the union with Scotland, forty-five members from that Kingdom were added. But though from that period representation hath not varied, the rights of election have at every petition, at the will of the House, according to the ruling interest of the day, till the late act for determining contested elections by a balloted jury; under which, by the disfranchisement of some corrupt voters in a few venal boroughs, and the addition of other voters, cases in point have been established of the power, mode, and usage of the House to remedy where proof of criminality could be brought. Now surely the incontrovertible notoriety of the present state of many of the boroughs is a most legal truism, and for the necessity of legislative interposition of all strong proofs the very strongest. From hence, then, unless it be thought better to let our government gradually moulder away into a moderate despotism or to stand the hazard of what may arise from the shock of contesting such a probable event, results the expediency of some immediate remedy. It surprised the great Chancellor, Lord Talbot, that one hundred thousand voters should elect the majority of representatives for eight millions of fellow-subjects. What would he have said to the nicer calculation of six thousand voters electing two hundred and fifty-four members? a number sufficient for a majority on any question, and from which we have long known, that a few opulent families, by possessing many of the boroughs, and a consequent influence, must ever embarrass government, nominate a ministry, control the throne, and plunder the state. That the sense of the people ought to be learned only in the resolutions of parliament, is most justly true; but this is impossible, while they are scarce virtually represented, and while, consequently, the sovereign may have the sad resource of appealing to the electors against the conduct of the elected. If no mere plain country gentleman can, as such, in many counties gain at home a seat in parliament, from the inadequate state of representation, he must buy it in some distant borough; that is, in order to satisfy his honest pride of thus serving the community, he must begin by basely corrupting the people, and not unfrequently ruining himself, or yield all contest, as most of the landed gentry have necessarily yielded it, to those, whose daring talents, corrupt eloquence, loose principles, dependant stations, and rank lust of public plunder, rouse in them every motive and every means to take possession of our representation, where they can acquire a more speedy fortune than from a patient industry in the trade or profession to which they were bred, or can seize from every other competitor the benefits of either, by the preference that must be be given to their mere parliamentary weight. Hence venality is extended through all ranks, since, as Montesquieu observes, it is impossible the higher class in any state should be little less than knaves, and the lower be contented with remaining no better than dupes: they must mutually agree to buy and sell, in order to be bought and sold. In short, what Pope, our great moral satyrists, imagined, in a poet's vision, he saw in 1738, under Sir Robert Walpole; that encourager of our national debt and political profligacy, from which much of what may be termed the private vices of individuals is virtually derived, as being warmly supported, is now to our dull sight nearly realised by that minister's well-trained pupils—

GENT. MAG. August, 1784.

In statesman, soldier, patriot, man in power,
Tis avarice all,—ambition is no more:
See all our nobles, begging to be slaves;
See all our fools, aspiring to be knaves;
And hear corruption through the realm proclaim,
That—not to be polluted—is the shame.

With every apology for the length of this, I am, &c.

AN ESSEX PETITIONER.

In a former Mag. p. 428, col. 2, in remarks on Dean Tucker's address, after the words of a strong interest, should have been added, and fire him with the pride of public virtue.

MR. URBAN;

Aug. 4.

I TAKE the earliest opportunity of performing my promise of sending you some

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES OF THE LATE DR. ANDREW GIFFORD.

This learned divine, son of Emanuel, and grandson of Andrew Gifford, was born Aug. 17, 1701, and educated at Tewksbury, under the Rev. Mr. Jones, author of the "History of the Canon of Scripture," whose seminary produced, amongst many shining men, the late learned and respectable Abp Secker, Bp Butler, and Dr. Chandler. Mr. Gifford finished his studies under the famous Dr. Ward. He was baptized, joined to his father's church at Bristol, and removed from thence to the Baptist Church Meeting in Devonshire-square, London, some time before July 23, 1723. In 1725 the people at Nottingham enjoyed his early labours, and he was there very popular. Afterwards he was invited to London, and was ordained, Feb. 5, 1729-30. In the first parts of his ministry, it was his practice to write, and to read, a considerable part of his sermons; but afterwards he delivered his previous meditations without notes. His intimacy with Sir Richard Ellys, Bart. the learned author of "Fortuita Sacra," consisting of critical notes upon certain texts of scripture, commenced about 1731, when he became his chaplain, taking the lead in family worship, especially in morning and evening prayer. Sir Richard, who was one of the heartiest friends Mr. Gifford ever had among the Protestant Dissenters, continued him in his office till his death, and his lady did so afterwards, making him an annual present of forty guinea, till about 1745, when she was married again. A sermon of his, preached and printed in 1734, occasioned by the high wind in 1703*, is very respectfully dedicated to that great and good man. In 1754, he was presented with a diploma, creating him D. D. from the Marischal College at Aberdeen. He had a particular delight in antiquities. His own private collection of coins, one of the most curious in Britain, was purchased by George II. as an addition to his own Cabinet. A thorough acquaintance with ancient coins and manuscripts was his forte. His fitness for his station, and his being F. S. A. were the occasion, but the personal friendship of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, Abp Herring, the Speaker Onslow, and his unshaken patron Sir R. Ellys, were the immediate cause, under Providence, of his being appointed Assistant Librarian at the British Museum; a post to which he was remarkably suited. Here his opportunities for improvement were very much enlarged, and, having a talent to receive and communicate knowledge with all the ease of an unaffected politeness, his acquaintance amongst the nobility and gentry soon became very extensive. Some of them did him the honour of a mutual exchange of friendly visits, and others of the first rank discovered their respect for him, either by an occasional attendance on his ministry, or by an obliging correspondence and intimacy. Among these were the Marquis of Lothian, the Earls of Halifax, and Dartmouth, Lady Buchan, Lady Huntingdon, &c. As a minister of the Gospel, he was lively and evangelical; he was an hearty friend to the doctrines of Free

* It is a regular practice, we hear, among the Baptists to commemorate this remarkable storm at stated periods. Q. why? EDIT. Grace

Grace; and his system corresponded with the confession of faith put forth by the elders of the Baptist Churches in and about London, in 1677 and 1689. He was master of the pathetic, and persuasion dwelt on his lips. His heart was in the work; and upon some occasions particularly it might have been said of him, as it was of one of the blessed reformers, "Vividus vultus, vividi oculi, vividæ manus, denique omnia vivida." If ever any man was all alive in the public service, Dr. Gifford was the man; and he retained his evangelical fervour in his stated and occasional labours*, even to the very last, with but very little abatement; insomuch that, when he was above eighty years of age, he was more active and zealous than many young men of twenty-five. It was thus he kept up a numerous auditory, and made every one say, what indeed appears true, "that the Doctor would die popular." The persons he baptized many years ago, were 600; of late he kept no exact account: and eleven persons, or more, he sent out into the work of the ministry. The Doctor's friendly and pastoral visits were cheerful and serious. In the administration of baptism and the Lord's supper, he seemed to go beyond himself. At baptisms, he was lively and excellent. He used to say, when he was but poorly, and in prospect of administering this ordinance, "I shall get well, I hope, if I can but go and baptize." Sometimes, when he came up out of the water, he stood and addressed the audience; and the last time that ever he performed this sacred rite, he stood at the head of the Baptistery, though his gown and his other cloaths were wet around him, and sang a hymn with the people: he was a veteran in the service, and often declared, "he never took cold by baptizing, that he knew of, in his life." The last time he administered the Lord's supper, June 6, 1784, he went to the table very weak and low, and was not able to pour out the wine. On the next evening, June 7, he preached a sermon to the Friendly Society which meets in Eagle-street, conversed very freely with some of the members of the society, and then parted from them, saying with a cheerful voice, "Farewell;" then he came back to the vestry again, and, just putting in his head, said once more, "Farewell." This was the last time he was ever in the Meeting. He bore his afflictions as a Christian, and exemplified that patience in them which he recommended to others. Affectionately addressing himself to those who were around him, he placidly departed this life, June 19, in the 84th year of his age. He left the people of his charge, deeply interested in their affections, and so they were in his. An ample proof of his love to them he has given, by making his six deacons the executors of his last will and testament, and by the handsome legacy of 400*l.* to the Church meeting in Eagle-street, in whose service he ended his days. He had two sons by his first wife, Martha Ware, and one son by his second wife, Grace Paynter; all these died in their infancy; and in the Doctor's death, after a very long line of respectable descent, the name of Gifford (in his family) dies: but lives in the affectionate remembrance of his congregation, and in the Baptist Academy at Bristol (see p. 485). He wished to have taken an active part in procuring a charter and an endowment for that seminary as a college; but the modesty of the present tutors would not permit them to forward so vast a design.

* For the last twenty-five years of his life, he preached an evening lecture, once a month, at Little St. Helen's, in connection with several ministers of the Independent persuasion.

Yours, &c.

EUGENIO.

MR. URBAN,

THE following epigram was written by Mr. Prior, on the funeral of the Duke of Buckingham, in Westminster Abbey, as performed by Bishop Atterbury, in 1721; that famous Bishop of Rochester, whose Memoirs, lately published by Mr. Nichols, contain the history of that accomplished, but turbulent, prelate from his advancement to the see of Rochester in 1713, to his banishment to France in 1722—and his own interment in 1732. See vol. I. p. 79.

"I have no hope,"

The Duke he said, and dies:

"In sure and certain hope," the Prelate cries.

Of these two learned peers,

I prythee—say, man,

Who is the greater liar, the priest or layman?

The Duke he dies

An INFIDEL confess:

"He's our dear brother," says the lordly priest.

The Duke a KNAVE!

Still "BROTHER dear," he cried,

And who dare say "the reverend Prelate lied?"

R E M A R K.

They neither lied—each spake as undeceiv'd,
What all suspected, and now all BELIEV'D.

74. An Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of the African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies. By James Ramsay, M.A. Vicar of Tetton in Kent. 8vo. (See p. 579.)

THIS Essay was announced last year, by the Bishop of Chester (see our last volume, p. 859). The author is well qualified to discuss this humane and important subject, by twenty years residence in the West Indies, and above fourteen years application to it. In the first chapter he considers the several natural and artificial ranks that take place in social life, that of master and slave in ancient and in Gothic times, as proposed by Fletcher for Scotland in 1698, in the French and British colonies, and in particular instances. In the 2d and 3d he shews how much the publick would be profited, and how much the master would gain, by advancing slaves in social life, and by allowing them the privilege of a weekly sabbath. In the 3d he gives examples of the difficulty of instructing slaves in their present state; relates the obstacles that the Moravian missions had to encounter; the inefficacy of the author's private and public attempts to instruct slaves; and suggests a mode in which private attempts on large plantations to improve slaves may probably succeed. In the 4th the objections to African captivity, drawn from philosophy, from anatomy, and observation, are fully considered, and ably vindicated, from experience. And in the 5th a plan is laid down for their improvement and conversion, by establishing clergy among them, indulging the slaves with certain privileges, and extending to them a police. The whole concludes thus:

"Though what is here written, if deemed worthy of notice, will certainly expose the author to much abuse from men whose wishes and interest, as they imagine them to tend, are opposed to all reformation, yet is he not sensible of having had any thing sinister, selfish, or censorious in view; nor can he, in any respect, be particularly benefited if the improvement were to take effect. He has intended no slight or injury to individuals, or to any condition or community of men, separated from their opposition to the unalienable rights of human nature, and the dictates of benevolence and religion. His consolation is, that a simple love of truth, and a sincere desire to do good, alone excited him to the attempt, and that many pious and learned persons thought it worthy the attention of the publick. And, after seriously reviewing the whole, he sees no objection to be offered before hand, either against the practicability or expence of the plan, except the manners and prejudices of the age. On the contrary, there are considerations to encourage both individuals and government to make the attempt; arguments of strength, not only to be drawn from topics of humanity, liberty, religion, but also of safety, conveniency, positive interest and profit, both public and private.

"Doubtless, in a subject like this, where we must be satisfied with general accounts, probable conjectures, and analogical reasoning, a person inclined to take the other side may select many things to be objected to, many to be contradicted. But, till such a man can, simply and generally speaking, vindicate, on the score of religion, morality, or even policy, the conduct, or rather negligence, of government, with respect to the sugar colonies; till he can prove that the diet, the cloathing, the labour, the punishments of 400,000 negroes*, ought to be left entirely to the discretion of their masters; till he can affirm that slaves have an adequate remedy, either in law, opinion, or interest, as practised or understood among us, against the parsimony, insensibility, prejudices, meanness, ignorance, spite, and cruelty of their owners and overseers; till he can shew that the present state of our slaves is the best possible state, both for them and their masters, into which they can be put, and that we had a right to ravish them from their country, to transport and place them in our own; till he can shew it to be impossible to make them real Christians, or to render them more useful members of the state than they are at present; till he can shew that reason is convinced, humanity pleased, that liberty has no claim, and religion no wish; the justice of our remarks must remain established, and the necessity of that attention to the improvement of slaves, both as men and Christians, which is here enforced, must remain unconfuted.

"May God, in his providence, in his goodness, esteem us a people worthy of a blessing, so valuable and extensive as the social improvement and conversion to Christianity of our slaves would indisputably be!"

In this prayer every pious, humane, and considerate reader will join with the author.

75. Captain Cook's Voyage. 4to.

Relation of the events that led to the murder of Capt. Cook, continued from p. 450.

"Captain King, having observed the disposition of the savages in the night, went on board the Resolution, as soon as it was light, for the time-keeper, and in his way was hailed by the Discovery, and informed that their cutter had been stolen from the buoy where it was moored.

"When I arrived on board," continues he, "I found the marines arming, and

* Orig. 4000,000. Qu. a mistake? —
Capt

Capt. Cook loading his double-barrelled gun. Whilst I was relating to him what had happened to us in the night, he interrupted me with some eagerness, and acquainted me with the loss of the Discovery's cutter, and with the preparations he was making for its recovery. It had been his usual practice, whenever any thing of consequence was lost at any of the islands in this ocean, to get the king, or some of the principal chiefs on board, and to keep them as hostages till it was restored. This method, which had been attended with success, he meant to pursue on the present occasion; and at the same time had given orders to stop all the canoes that should attempt to leave the bay, with an intention of seizing and destroying them, if he could not recover the cutter by peaceable means. Accordingly, the boats of both ships, well manned and armed, were stationed across the bay, and before I left the ship, some great guns had been fired at two large canoes that were attempting to make their escape.

"It was between seven and eight o'clock when we quitted the ship, together with Capt. Cook, in the pinnace, having Mr. Phillips and nine marines with him, and myself in the small boat. The last orders I received from him were, to quiet the minds of the natives on our side of the bay, by assuring them they should not be hurt; to keep my people together, and to be on my guard. We then parted. The captain went towards Kowrowa, where the king resided, and I proceeded to the beach. My first care, on going ashore, was to give strict orders to the marines to remain within the tent, to load their pieces with ball; and not to quit their arms. Afterwards I took a walk to the huts of old Kaoo and the priests, and explained to them, as well as I could, the object of the hostile preparations, which had exceedingly alarmed them. I found that they had already heard of the cutter being stolen; and I assured them, that though Capt. Cook was resolved to recover it, and to punish the authors of the theft, yet that they, and the people of the village on our side, need not be under the smallest apprehension of suffering any evil from us. I desired the priests to explain this to the people, and to tell them not to be alarmed, but to continue peaceable and quiet. Kaoo asked me, with great earnestness, if Terree-boo was to be hurt? I assured him he was not; and both he and the rest of his brethren seemed much satisfied with this assurance.

"In the mean time, Capt. Cook having called off the launch, which was stationed at the North point of the bay, and taken it along with him, proceeded to Kowrowa, and landed, with the lieutenant and nine marines. He immediately marched into the village, where he was received with the usual marks of respect, the people prostrating themselves before him, and bringing him their accustomed offerings of small hogs. Finding that there was no suspicion of their design, his next step was to enquire for Terree-boo, and the two boys his sons, who had been his constant guests on board the Resolution. In a short time the boys returned with the natives who had been sent in search of them, and immediately led Capt. Cook to the house where the king had slept. They found the old man just awoke from sleep, and, after a short conversation about the loss of the cutter, from which Captain Cook was convinced that he was in no wise privy to it, he invited him to return in the boat, and spend the day on board the Resolution. To this proposal the king readily consented, and immediately got up to accompany him.

"Things were in this prosperous train, the two boys being already in the pinnace, and the rest of the party having advanced near the water-side, when an elderly woman, called Kaneekabareea, the mother of the boys, and one of the king's favourite wives, came after him, and with many tears and intreaties besought him not to go on board. At the same time, two chiefs, who came along with her, laid hold of him, and insisting that he should go no further, forced him to sit down. The natives, who were collecting in prodigious numbers along the shore, and had probably been alarmed by the firing of the great guns, and the appearances of hostility in the bay, began to throng round Capt. Cook and their king. In this situation the lieutenant of marines, observing that his men were huddled close together in the crowd, and by this means incapable of using their arms if occasion should require it, proposed to the captain to draw them up along the rocks, close to the water's edge; and the crowd readily making way for them to pass, they were drawn up in a line, at the distance of about 30 yards from the place where the king was sitting.

"All this time the old king remained on the ground, with the strongest marks of terror and dejection in his countenance; Capt. Cook, not willing to abandon the object for which he had come on shore, continuing to urge him, in the most pressing manner, to proceed; whilst, on the other hand, whenever the king appeared inclined to follow him, the chiefs, who stood round him, interposed, at first with prayers and intreaties, but afterwards having recourse to force and violence, and insisting on his staying where he was. Capt. Cook, therefore, finding that the alarm had spread too generally, and that it was in vain to think any longer of getting him off without bloodshed, at last gave up the point, observing to Mr. Phillips, that it would be impossible to compel him to go on board without a risk of killing a great number of the inhabitants.

"Though the enterprize which had carried Capt. Cook now on shore had failed, and was abandoned, yet his person did not appear to be in the least danger till an accident happened, which gave a fatal turn to the affair. The boats which had been stationed across the bay having fired at some canoes that were attempting to get out, unfortunately had killed a chief of the first rank. The news of his death arrived at the village where Capt. Cook was, just as he had left the king, and was walking slowly towards the shore. The ferment it occasioned was very conspicuous. The women and children were immediately sent off, and the men girt on their war mats, and armed themselves with spears and stones. One of the natives, having in his hands a stone and a long iron spike (which they call a pahooa), came up to the captain, flourishing his weapon, by way of defiance, and threatening to throw the stone. The captain desired him to desist; but the man persisting in his insolence, he was at length provoked to fire a load of small shot. The man having his mat on, which the shot were not able to penetrate, this had no other effect than to irritate and encourage them. Several stones were thrown at the marines, and one of the crews attempted to stab Mr. Philips with his pahooa, but failed in the attempt, and received from him a blow with the butt end of his musquet. Captain Cook now fired his second barrel, loaded with ball, and killed one of the foremost of the natives. A general attack with stones immediately followed, which was answered by a discharge of musquetry from the marines and the people in the boats. The islanders, contrary to the expectation of every one, stood the fire with great firmness, and before the marines had time to reload they broke in upon them, with dreadful shouts and yells. What followed was a scene of the utmost horror and confusion.

"Four of the marines were cut off amongst the rocks, in their retreat, and fell a sacrifice to the fury of the enemy; three more were dangerously wounded, and the lieutenant, who had received a stab between the shoulders with a pahooa, having fortunately reserved his fire, shot the man who had wounded him just as he was going to repeat his blow. Our unfortunate commander, the last time he was seen distinctly, was standing at the water's edge, and calling out to the boats to cease firing, and to pull in. If it be true, as some of those who were present have imagined, that the marines and boatmen had fired without his orders, and that he was desirous of preventing any further bloodshed, it is not improbable that his humanity on this occasion proved fatal to him. For it was remarked that, while he faced the natives, none of them had offered him any violence, but that, having turned about to give his orders to the boats, he was stabbed in the back, and fell with his face into the water. On seeing him fall, the islanders set up a great shout, and his body was immediately dragged on shore, and surrounded by the enemy, who, snatching the dagger out of each other's hands, shewed a savage eagerness to have a share in his destruction."

Before we give any further extracts, we shall now go back to the Introduction, a masterly performance, for which the publick, it seems, are indebted to the learned and ingenious Dr. Douglas *. In this the question of Cui bono? is very satisfactorily answered by a summary view of what has been done in the six circumnavigations performed under the auspices of Geo III. And, 1. In the South Atlantic Ocean, Commodore Byron, in 1764, ascertained the true position of Falkland's Islands, before unknown; and Capt. Cook, in 1775, discovered Sandwich Land, &c. : 2. The passage round Cape Horn, when made at a proper season, has been proved to be safe and easy; the Straits of Magelhaens, and Le Maire, and the coasts of Terra del Fuego, have been accurately surveyed; a chart drawn of the former, &c. : 3. The Pacific Ocean has been repeatedly traversed; the Terra Australia del Espritu Santo, of Quiros, long supposed to be part of a Southern continent, has been proved by Capt. Cook, who sailed round it, to be nothing more than the Archipelago of the New Hebrides, and its true position and bounds have been assigned; 4. Within the Southern tropic numberless habitable islands have been discovered, some grouped, others separated, for near 80 degrees of longitude: 5. the Eastern coast of New Holland, from 38° to within 10½ of the Equinoctial, has been accurately surveyed by Cook and Furneaux, and Van Diemen's Land, and New South Wales, are found to be only the extremities of that amazing island, that fifth part of the world: 6. New Zealand, of which only the Western side had been explored by its discoverer Tasman, instead of a Southern continent, as had been supposed, is now found to consist of two large islands: 7. Instead of New Holland and New Guinea joining, a passage has been found to the Indian Ocean, through Endeavour Strait: 8. New Britain is now known to be divided into two islands by a much better and shorter passage, St. George's Channel, than had been before discovered;

* Residentiary of St. Paul's, &c. and the detector of Lauder's forgeries to prove Milton a plagiarist. See our vol. XX. p. 535.

And, lastly, the idea of a Southern continent is now for ever exploded by Capt. Cook's second voyage, and "it is now discovered, beyond all doubt, (as an inscription to his memory well expresses it) that the same Great Being, who created the universe by his fiat, by the same ordained our earth to keep a just poise, without a corresponding Southern continent — and it does so. He stretcheth out the North over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. Job xxvi. 7." — All that had been done by former English navigators and travellers, towards the discovery of a N. E. or N. W. passage, is then very accurately stated; the instructions given to Capt. Cook, and also to Capt. Young, who was to meet him, if possible, in Bassin's Bay; a curious account of Mr. Hearne's journey by land from Prince of Wales's Fort, in lat. $58^{\circ} 47\frac{1}{2}'$ N. to the Copper-mine River, lat. 72° N. in 1770, and of the last Spanish voyage of discovery on the American coast, in 1775, are inserted; and Capt. Cook is proved, in his last voyage, to have much surpassed these boasted discoveries of the Spaniards, "so high as the latitude of 58° ," not only by exploring Kerguelen's Land, in the South Indian Ocean, improving the geography of the Friendly Islands, and discovering, in the Northern Pacific Ocean, the Sandwich Islands, a noble group, before totally unknown, but also by ascertaining the true position of the Western coast of America, with few interruptions, from lat. 44° to beyond lat. 70° , and the position of the North Eastern extremity of Asia; by giving more authentic information concerning the islands lying between the two continents than was ever before procured; and by discovering the narrow bounds that divide Asia and America; has solved the puzzling problem relating to the peopling of America; and even, by his failure in the principal object of his voyage, has instructed future navigators, and taught them the impediments they may expect to encounter in attempting a passage to the E. Indies through Beering's Strait. The Editor then discusses the many commercial advantages, improvements in sciences, and philosophical speculations, arising from these discoveries. But for them we must refer to the work, adding only, that Dr. Douglas adduces many arguments to shew that our voyages have conveyed much benefit to the discovered, and may, in due time, spread the blessings of civilization amongst the numerous tribes of the South Pacific Ocean. — The origin of these numerous tribes he then deduces from one common stock, the Asiatic nation called Malayans; and shews, from Capt. Cook's observations, that the Esquimaux, and the native inhabitants of Greenland, Labradore, and Hudson's Bay, also people the bays and islands on the West coast of North America, a space, from East to West, of at least 1500 leagues, and from the lat. of 60° to that of 72° N.

* Now governor of Prince of Wales's Fort, in Churchill River. See p. 554.

The two first volumes are compiled from the journals of Capt. Cook and Mr. Anderson, surgeon of the Resolution, an excellent naturalist, who unfortunately died in the voyage. For the third we are indebted to Captain King. — The Editor, after answering for the notes on the two first volumes, and this introduction, begs leave to add, that "he considers himself as entitled to no inconsiderable share of candid indulgence from the publick, having engaged in a very tedious and troublesome undertaking, upon the most disinterested motives, his only reward being the satisfaction he feels of having been able to do an essential service to the family of our great navigator, who had honoured him, in the journal of his voyage, with the appellation of friend." — "The volumes, and their attendant illustrations and ornaments," furnish a sufficient apology for the delay of the publication, had it been greater. (To be continued.)

76. Select Works of the Emperor Julian, &c.
(Continued from p. 447.)

TWO or three of the Epistles of this Imperial writer shall now be inserted. The first may be the more curious to Britons as being addressed to an officer who then commanded in Britain, being vicar, or vice-præfect, of our island. He was afterwards ineffectually employed in attempting to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem.

"EPISTLE XXX.

"To ALYPIUS, Brother of CÆSARIUS*.

"I was just recovering from an indisposition when I received the geography† that you

* The XXIXth is also addressed to him.

† "This geography seems to have been the composition of Alypius. Moreri says, "another you sent me; nor was the book less acceptable for coming from you. For it contains not only better descriptions than any book of the kind, but you have also embellished it with Iambics, not "singing a Bupalian war," as the Cyrenean poet † expresses it, but such as fair Sappho would have thought worthy of adapting to her hymns. Such a work it may be proper perhaps for you to give, but certainly it is most agreeable for me to receive. With your administration of affairs, as you study to act, on all occasions, both with diligence and mildness, I am highly satisfied. For to blend lenity and moderation with fortitude and resolution, and to exert those in encouraging the good, and these in correcting the wicked, requires, I am confident, no small degree of genius and virtue.

"May you have these objects always in view, and make both subservient to your own honour! The wisest of the ancients justly thought that this should be the end proposed by every virtue ‡. May health and happiness be your portion as long as possible, my most esteemed and beloved brother §!"

The next, which was addressed to a friend on the loss of his wife, will serve to shew how weak were the consolations suggested by Paganism, when compared with those of Christianity.

" EPISTLE XXXVII. To AMERIUS ||

* Your letter, in which you mention the death of your wife, and express your extreme affliction, filled my eyes with tears. Painful would it have been to hear that any wife, young, chaste, and engaging, and also an excellent mother, was prematurely snatched away; but that you have sustained such a loss gives me peculiar concern. For, of all my friends, Amerius least deserved such a calamity; a man whose understanding is superior to most; a man whom I highly esteem.

"If I were writing on this subject to any other person, I should be more prolix in telling him that such is the lot of human nature; that submission is necessary; that the most poignant grief admits of consolation ; and, in short, should use, as to a novice, all the arguments that are likely to alleviate affliction. But, as I am ashamed of employing to one who instructs others those arguments which are used to teach and improve the ignorant, waving every thing else, I will relate to you a fable, or rather a true story, of a certain wise man, not new perhaps to you, but probably unknown to many, whose only medicine, mirth, you will find as effectual a remedy for sorrow as that cup †† which the fair Lacedæmonian is supposed,

"another geographical work is also ascribed to him, which was a description of the old world."

* "Bupalus, a statuary, made the image of the poet Hipponax, who was very deformed in person, in ridicule; which he resenting, wrote such severe Iambics against him, that he hanged himself. This was the common report, which Horace (Epod. v. 14.) seems to confirm. But Pliny (xxxvi. 5.) says, that report was false. Hipponax is reprobated by Julian in his Duties of a Priest, vol. I. p. 132."

† "Probably Callimachus, born, as Strabo says (l. xvii.), at Cyrene in Africa, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Thence he is often styled "the Libyan bard." His hymns were translated by Dr. Dodd."

‡ "Thus they made the entrance to the temple of Virtue the passage to that of Honour."

§ "Little did Alympius imagine, while he was exercising his poetical and political talents in Britain, among a people as insensible to the charms of his poetry as their rocks and forests, that, in a distant age, when the Britons could have relished his verses, he would not have been known as a poet, and scarcely as a governor, eminent as he was in both those characters, had not this accidental billet been happily rescued from the gulph of time."

|| "I know not that this man of letters, apparently a sophist and a Pagan, is elsewhere mentioned. One MS. styles him 'Himerius.' We are acquainted with a celebrated professor of that name, the rival and the colleague of Prohæresius, and who, like him, taught eloquence at Athens when Julian was there. Himerius left some discourses, of which there are some extracts in the Bibliotheca of Photius. It might be supposed that this Epistle was addressed to him, if the MS. did not style him 'Præfect of Ægypt.'—In the reign of Julian that province was governed by Ecdicius; and this Epistle is certainly written to one who was a teacher: but it might not be impossible for the title of Præfect to be here no more than an honorary title. In those times honorary titles of the greatest employments were sometimes given to men of letters. I would not venture, however, to assert, they had that of governor of any particular province. LA BLÉTERIE."

 "Thus the three remedies which Pliny prescribes are, "Length of time, the necessity of submission, and satiation of grief."

†† "In the IVth book of the Odyssey, ver. 220, &c. when Menelaus gives an entertainment to Telemachus, Helen puts into the wine a drug which had the virtue to induce an oblivion of the most cruel anxieties. LA BLÉTERIE."

"Julian refers to the same passage in his Consolatory Oration, vol. I. p. 32, where it is quoted in the notes."

GENT. MAG. Augst, 1724.

on a similar occasion, to have given to Telemachus.

"It is reported, that Democritus * of Abdera, finding nothing that he said could console Darius for the loss of a beautiful wife, promised to restore her to life, if the king would supply him with all things necessary for the purpose. Darius ordered him to spare no expence, but to take whatever was requisite to perform his promise. Soon after, Democritus told him, that 'every thing was ready for the completion of the work, one only excepted, which he knew not how to procure; but that Darius, as he was king of all Asia, would perhaps find no difficulty in providing it.' On his asking what this important matter was, Democritus is said to have replied, 'If you will inscribe on the tomb of your wife the names of three who have never known affliction, she shall immediately return to life, this ceremony being irresistible†' Darius hesitating, and not being able to recollect any one who had not experienced some sorrow, Democritus laughed, as usual, and said to him 'And are not you, the absurdest of men, ashamed still to lament, as if you alone were involved in such distress, when you cannot find one that ever lived exempt from some domestic misfortune.'

"That Darius, an illiterate Barbarian, a slave both to joy and grief, should be told this, was highly proper; but you, a Greek, who cultivate true literature, should learn from yourself to govern your passions. For it is shameful that reason should not anticipate the certain effects of time‡."

The last, which is one of the six (remaining) to his friend Libanius, was first published by Fabricius, with seven other Epistles, in his Lux Evangelii, 1731, and consequently has not been inserted in any of the editions.

"EPISTLE LXXV. To LIBANIUS, Sophist and Quæstor §.

"How fortunate was our disappointment of a public carriage! For instead of the terror and apprehension attendant on such a vehicle, where we meet with drunken muleteers, and mules, like those in Homer, 'pampered with barley||,' such are their idleness and repletion, and are annoyed with clouds of dust and the intolerable dissonance of clamorous drivers and smacking whips, I now travel at my leisure on a pleasant shady road, abounding with fountains, and having many commodious inns, and when the hour of refreshment arrives, I rest wherever I please, beneath the spacious, fragrant boughs of the plane or cypress, with the Myrrhinusian†† Phædrus‡‡, or some other work of Plato, in my hands. As I thus enjoy an unembarrassed journey, did I not communicate this pleasure to you, my dearest friend, I should think myself inexcusable."

The LXXVIIth, "To Photinus," (bishop of Sirmium), preserved by Facundus, bishop of Hermania in Africa, and printed by Sirmond at Paris, 1629, is, for an evident reason, here inserted in Latin only.—The two Monodies of Libanius give a good idea of the oratorical powers of that celebrated sophist, none of whose works we remember to have seen before in English. And the reign of Jovian, hitherto lost, as it

* "Demonax comforted Herod the philosopher under affliction by a similar fable, as Lucian relates in his life. ΠΕΤΑΥ."

"This story is no where found. Though Democritus had travelled into Persia, and was acquainted with the secrets of magic, his discourse with Darius has all the appearance of being only a philosophical novel. At the time of the death of Darius, the son of Hykaspes, Democritus was, at most, 28 years old; perhaps he was no more than 23, or even nine. This philosopher was on his return to Greece, when Darius II. surnamed Nothus, ascended the throne, in the year before Christ, 423. LA BLETERIE."

"See Vol. I. p. 21. note †."

† "It is in the Greek Εὐθύ; αὐτὴν ἀναβιωτέσθαι τῷ τῆς τελευτῆς γὰρ δυσωπημένῳ, which Martinus has translated thus: Illam ab inferis esse redituram; fore enim ut ejus mortis consuetudine erubesceret. I think that it may be restored by leaving out a single letter. Instead of τῆς τελευτῆς, we should read τῆς τελευτῆς, and translate it, fore ut statim revivisceret, ejus ceremoniarum ritu exorata. The word δυσωπητέσθαι signifies not only 'to blush, to be ashamed,' but also, 'to suffer oneself to be persuaded, to be moved.' Ibid.

‡ "If Julian had read the Latin authors (and why should he not have read, at least, some of them?) I should say that he has copied this passage of the letter of Servius Sulpicius to Cicero. Nullus dolor est quem non longinquitas temporis minuat atque molliat. Hoc se expectare tempus turpe est, ac non ei rei tuâ significatâ se e. curare e. LA BLETERIE."

§ "So styled also in Epistle XXVIIth. But here, for a reason given below, I suspect it to be an anachronism." || "Ληοσσοισι. Iliad. VI. 506. XV. 263."

 "The inconveniences of the public vehicles in those days seem by this account very similar to those experienced in our times. Had Julian then been Emperor, or even Cæsar, all the public carriages, with their motions, would have been at his command."

†† "Of Myrrhinus in Attica. FABRICIUS."

‡‡ "The book of Plato so inscribed, from his scholar of that name."

were, in general history, having been judiciously snatched from oblivion by M. de la Bletterie, makes a proper appendage to the Life and Works of his predecessor. — An account of this learned Abbé, who was born at Rennes, and died, in an advanced age, in 1772, is given in the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, printed at Caen, in eight volumes 8vo, 1783, a work which is of itself a library. It will also speedily appear in an improved edition of the “New Biographical Dictionary.”

77. A Journal of a Voyage to The South Seas, in his Majesty's Ship the Endeavour, faithfully transcribed from the Papers of the late Sydney Parkinson, Draughtsman to Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. in his Expedition, with Dr. Solander, round the World; and embellished with Twenty-nine Views and Designs, engraved by capital Artists. To which are now added, Remarks on the Preface by the late John Fothergill, M. D. F. R. S. And an Appendix, containing the Voyages of Commodore Byron, Capt. Wallis, Capt. Carteret, Mons. Bougainville, Capt. Cook, and Capt. Clerke. 4to.

THE readers of the Gentleman's Magazine might have reason to complain that this AUTHENTIC RELATION had lain so long neglected, had the Editors been unable to account for the delay. But about the time when its first publication was announced in 1773*, Hawkesworth's Voyages, printed by authority, had just come from the press, and an injunction against that of Sydney Parkinson having been obtained, it was then thought rather unfair to obtrude upon the publick a dubious relation, while one of unquestionable authority attracted every one's attention.

All prejudice apart, we now find reason, upon an attentive perusal, to join in sentiment with the author of the Additions, “that the Journal of Sydney Parkinson deserves the approbation of the sensible and intelligent reader by its originality, by the accurate diary it contains, by the exact description given therein of the countries explored, and their inhabitants, by the indefatigable labour of his searches, and by the variety, fidelity, and elegance of his drawings†:” and cannot help expressing the pleasure we have received from observing that he suffered no day to pass at sea without some pertinent remarks, nor at land without some useful discovery. We have only to add, upon the present occasion, that our readers may expect some agreeable entertainment from the extracts that shall occasionally follow; and the publick at large the advantage of seeing brought together, in the work before us, a concise account of the discoveries of others.

78. The Life of the Rev. Dr. Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin. [Prefixed to a complete Edition of the Dean's Works, in XVII Volumes, with Critical Notes, by Thomas Sheridan, M. A]. 8vo.

THE Life of Swift is so trite a subject, his politicks and his amours, his Harley and St. John, his Stella and Vanessa, are so well known to readers of every description, that, as to the most material facts, the far greater part of this bulky volume will at first be considered as a crambe repetita, or “a twice-told tale.” Facts, however, may have been misrepresented, and in this light the present biographer claims our attention, by professing himself utterly dissatisfied with all that has been “hitherto produced on the subject;” and determining to correct the “erroneous opinions” that have been too generally formed, which he imputes partly to Swift himself, who “had early imbibed such a strong hatred to hypocrisy, that he fell into the opposite extreme,” disguising even his good qualities, concealing his virtues, and “always appearing to the world in a mask,” and partly to the calumnies of “a whole virulent faction,” and to “the general appetite for scandal, and spirit of envy in the bulk of mankind.” The former biographers of Swift must therefore expect no quarter; and first and principally John Earl of Orreery, whose “chief view,” in his publication, Mr. Sheridan affirms, “being to acquire celebrity as an author,” to “this great end all regard to truth, justice, honour, and humanity was to be sacrificed.” The “rapid sale” and “favourable reception” of this work was owing, we are told, to “general prejudice” and the “spirit of envy” (above-mentioned), and also to its being “written by a Lord.” — Dr. Delany's “Observations,” in answer, being anonymous, it seems, were “little attended to, and remain unsold.”

* See vol. XLIII. p. 342.

† Two of these are copied in one of our plates for the present month, representing Chiefs in two different islands, one in a high, the other in a low latitude, by which their different natures are strongly contrasted.

Mr. Deane Swift's answer also disappointed all expectation, and is "consigned to oblivion." Dr. Hawkesworth's Life is very imperfect, "many of the most important articles are omitted, and others still left very doubtful." And even Dr. Johnson "has produced little new, except some unfavourable observations of his own," for which Mr. Sheridan ranks him, with Lord Orrery, "in the band of true critics, as described in the Tale of a Tub," and on which he makes some particular strictures. — The motives which induce the present biographer to enter the lists, and "at this advanced period of life" to engage in this design, are these: "the love (he says) I had to his [Swift's] person, and the reverence in which I was taught, from my earliest days, to hold his character, and with which I had an opportunity of being well acquainted, on account of the long intimacy subsisting between him and my father; and, above all, the means I have in my power of rescuing his good name from the aspersions thrown on it," &c. And, on the whole, he thinks "it of moment to the general cause of religion and morality to make it appear, that the greatest genius of the age was, at the same time, a man of the truest piety and most exalted virtue."

(To be continued.)

79. Critical Disquisitions, containing some Remarks, I. On Masius's Edition of the Book of Joshua, and II. On Origen's celebrated Hexapla. By the Rev. Dr. Henry Owen, F. R. S. Rector of St. Olave, Hart Street, &c. &c. 8vo.

THIS little work abounds with much true learning and just reasoning; and its utility is apparent.

I. MASIVS's work, here criticised, was first published at Antwerp, in 1574, and almost generally approved. Twenty-two passages, however, were expunged by the Church of Rome; yet it maintained its credit, especially among Protestants, principally on account of the insertion of the obeli and asterisks in the Greek and Latin columns, taken chiefly, it is said, from an ancient Syriac MS*, charged with these marks, and literally translated from the Septuagint version, as it stood in the Hexapla. The annotations that follow the text have been wholly adopted by Bp. Walton, in the VIth volume of the London Polyglott; and by Dr. Grabe, in his edition of the Alexandrian MS. Thus approved, and having been also commended by Jerom, these marks have been much esteemed; and while they stood entire in the Hexapla, Dr. Owen allows, had some use. But few of them, he adds, have reached our time; those few are not to be depended on; and if they could, he knows of no useful purpose to which they can now be applied. Many, if not most of them, Masius himself adjusted and applied, our author contends, on wrong principles. This heavy charge he proceeds to establish by contesting the truth of these two postulata, on which Masius proceeds: 1. "That the common Hebrew text is the true, perfect, and original text; 2. That the Vatican MS. contains the true and simple version of the Seventy interpreters;" the printed Hebrew text being, we are now certain, in many places imperfect and corrupted, and the Vatican MS. having its additions and omissions, as well as other copies, though not perhaps in equal degrees. But as other Greek MSS. exclude the redundances, and supply the deficiencies, to which Masius has prefixed his obeli and asterisks, this able critic is of opinion that "Masius was strangely prejudiced in favour of his own system, that the archetypal copies, from which those other MSS. were transcribed, were perfectly exact and right; and consequently that the Seventy were faithful interpreters." To prove this position, Dr. Owen considers, 1. Words placed under asterisks, and 2. Words placed under obeli; under each of which heads he ascertains that these marks "are often prefixed to words where several MSS. clearly shew that they ought not in truth to have been prefixed to them." — Out of many instances here adduced, three or four shall be added.

"In chap. ii. ver. 15. there are two supposed omissions, filled up under asterisks. But the Oxford MS*, which has as much

* "Some have doubted whether he was ever possessed of such a MS. See Le Long, Biblioth. Sacra, ed. Lips. 1769."

* "The Oxford MS, which belongs to University College, and comprehends the Octateuch, is one of the most valuable we now possess. Though it was written so late as

It not more right to claim descent from the original Septuagint than even the Vatican has, supplies, in a great measure, both these defects. For it reads διὰ τῆς Συρίας ἡ ὁμήρου ἐν δ' αὐτῇ αὐτῇ ἢ τῷ τριχῷ. It leaves out indeed the latter part, (and it is wanting in the vulgar Latin,) as bordering upon something like tautology. For if Rahab's house was on the town wall, is there any necessity to add, 'and she dwelt on the wall?' I suspect even the Hebrew to be an ancient marginal gloss. Of such glosses I see, or think I see, many other instances. What is to be thought of Exodus xvi. 36? And what of many other explanations, which the Israelites could have no need of in the days of Moses?"

"Chap. vii. 22. The Alex. MS. reads, καὶ ταῦτα ἦν κικλυσμένη ἡ τῇ γῇ. And three Hebrew MSS, having וְהָיָה, confirm the truth of this reading; which Dr. Græbe has nevertheless thrown out of the text."

"Chap. vi. 5. ἡ ἀπορία καὶ δ' αὐτῇ. Here Masius has obelized the adjective καὶ. But an excellent Hebrew MS 99 Kennicott, reads, in this 2d place, וְהָיָה, according to the Septuagint.

"Chap. vi. 7. The printed Hebrew is וְהָיָה, plural and ungrammatical. The LXX read, in the singular, וְהָיָה, which is now confirmed by no less than thirty-five Hebrew MSS. See Kennicott."

"Chap. ix. 3. Two Hebrew MSS, for וְהָיָה, read here וְהָיָה לָּהּ, conformable to the Septuagint version, πάρτα ἰνα. The word πάρτα, however, Masius has placed under an obelus, because the Hebrew וְהָיָה was not in his copy."

In conclusion, our author enters a caveat against any deduction being made from his remarks, to the disparagement of Masius's character, as, with his prejudices, which led him latently to confirm the authority of the Vulgate, he had "great integrity and profound learning."—Several other writers had the same end in view (as is here shewn), and justly incur the same censure. The laudable end, therefore, of this Disquisition, which does no less credit to the candour than to the learning of its author, is, to guard young students against the seduction of authority, and to teach them, by example, to think for themselves.

II. ORIGEN, in his Hexapla, making the Hebrew the standard, has inserted, 1. the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters; 2. the same in Greek characters; 3. the Greek version of Aquila, a converted Jew, published about A. D. 130; 4. that of Symmachus, a learned Samaritan, published about 70 years after (both then highly esteemed by the Jews); 5. the Septuagint version (made about 280 years before Christ), modelled and accommodated to his Hebrew text; and 6. the version of Theodotion, an Ephesian and Jewish proselyte, published about A. D. 175, a work of little or no credit with the Jews. Prejudiced in favour of his Hebrew copy, which was far from perfect, some sentences, as our author shews, being omitted, and others interpolated, Origen "eventually, though not intentionally, contributed a great deal to the depravity and corruption of the Septuagint version; which we can now by no means rectify again. All the blame, however, must not be laid on Origen's Hexapla; the other two editions, of Lucian and Hesychius, bore, most probably, a share in the mischief."—These are the principal points discussed and proved in this Disquisition; and in an Appendix the learned writer has made good his charge against the Hebrew column of the Hexapla by various appropriate instances.

These Essays, we may safely say, would add to the author's reputation for judgement and biblical learning, if his former publications had left any room for it. We are afraid, however, that he is not to expect many readers, even among professional men; but he will be amply repaid for any deficiency in that respect by the applause of the discerning few.

80. An Investigation of the Natural Rights of British Subjects. 8vo.

THIS work was intended as an introduction and leading argument to the Case of the Earl of Northburgh, who lately instituted a claim to the House of Lords for title and estate, which he afterwards withdrew. The author, who seems to write with much legal precision, and by his language appears to be a North Briton, lays down much of the law relative to aliens and attainments; and in the Appendix, which comprizes the the year of our Lord 1126, yet was it taken from a very ancient copy; a copy that agreed, as appears on comparison, with one of those (for he evidently made use at least of two) which Philo Judæus had in his hands. This MS. deserves much more attention than has yet been paid to it. The Collation in Walton's Polyglott ought to be revised. It is far, I am afraid, from being abovementioned case, he shews to what his preceding arguments particularly point. It is impossible to follow him through all his intricate researches; but the following are the stable principles on which he builds his fabric.

“That every person born in a captured country before its capture, are aliens to the conquering state; but every one born there afterwards claims as a natural-born subject to the conquering state. As in America, all persons born there before its independence are clearly natural born, and claim legiance to this country, and those born there now are aliens; and the reverse is the case in Canada, which now belongs to this crown. The same principle is apparent in the act of Edw. III. in favour of children inheritors, which he particularly dwells upon, and which enables them, if born of English parents, to inherit to their ancestors all lands in England, as if born here; and the same is confirmed by 7 Ann. 5; attainders and felony excepted by 4 Geo. I. c. 21. So a child born here of alien parents is not an alien, and though he cannot inherit from or through them, yet he may inherit from any collateral line. This restriction was afterwards done away entirely, by the stat. of K. William, in 1700; but was again, in some degree, renewed by 25 Geo. II. c. 39, which makes it necessary for the claimants to be capable to take at the death of the ancestor last seized. A bastard cannot inherit, but may take lands by purchase, and may be inherited by his issue. But the grand question here is, whether the privileges of children inheritors, created by Edw. III. are in any shape excluded from those born of parents attainted, &c. The author presses it much, that if a father be alien, or be attainted, the son may inherit under the mother; this involves much doubt and investigation, and must certainly depend on the nature of the father's or mother's claim: If the estate belong to the father only, how can the son inherit it from the mother, who cannot even claim her dower, if her husband be attainted? but if the estates belonged to the mother only, then her heirs may take, but the words of the settlement would limit this; and if there be no settlement, the whole being her husband's, must be forfeited to the crown. The author extends his power of parliaments beyond the bounds of English jurisprudence, when he says, “that if they were to make an act howsoever unreasonable, yet there is no power on earth to controul it.” He should reflect, that the people who dispute, have a clear and inalienable right to annul; and at the voice of that people the parliament have been more than once obliged to rescind oppressive measures! As to the case of the present earl of N—b—b, it appears briefly thus;—he is the present only descendant of the ancient family of Derwentwater, his uncle James, the late earl, having been beheaded for rebellion in 1715, and his father, Charles Radcliffe, brother to the late earl, having been executed (for the same treason) in 1746, when he returned to England at the head of some of the Pretender's troops from France, whereto he had fled on the attainder of himself and brother. This Mr. Charles Radcliffe had married the countess of N—b—gh, by whom he had two children during their residence in France; and the present Mr. James Bartholomew Radcliffe is the first son of that marriage, and claims, under his mother, to be earl of N—b—gh. The family estates of Derwentwater were forfeited to the crown by the two attainders, and the children of the above marriage were deemed aliens by 4 Geo. I. which expressly excludes all children of persons attainted for high treason or felony, or in the service of our enemies, and born out of the legiance of this crown, to be natural born subjects of this kingdom. All which are the case of the present claimant. The settlements vested the estates in tail male; and being forfeited to the crown, were sold; but as no fine and recovery was ever passed to bar the entail, the present Mr. Radcliffe put in his claim to the reversion devolved to him at the death of his father: the sale was examined, and actually declared void; and, though the act of parliament, 22 Geo. II. does not extend so far as to permit him, and his brothers and sisters, to be natural-born subjects, yet it states him to be consenting to receive an equivalent of the estate of himself, and his issue male, in the premises; and accordingly he received, from the trustees appointed by the settlement, 30,000 l. 6000 l. of which was paid to the younger children of the countess of N—b—gh, and the remainder to him. The grievance complained of, and for which the late application to parliament was made, is, that the earl still is deemed an alien by the above statute, tho' he thinks not so by birth or by law.

“If he was an alien, he could have done no act to concur in the above composition; if he was not so, then ought he to receive his estate, which on the death of his father he was entitled to. That the sum given as an equivalent was not more than a third of the value of the interest in the estate; that he ought to be allowed to be a natural-born subject; and, that his son, lord Kinnaird, ought not to be barred from his succession, after his, the present earl of Newburgh's death, the entail having never been barred: how this essential act came to be omitted, does not appear to the author; but if the attainder extended to all the issue then born, and their future issue, which is the fact, then the earl cannot have any further advantage than what he has received! for the law is, that attainder corrupts all the blood; his children or other kindred cannot inherit his estate, nor his wife claim her dower: therefore his only claim, under the settlement through the father from the uncle, who were both attainted,

attained, is done away; exclusive of the equivalent received for all his right and interest therein."

The author's ingenuity is very commendable; and it may be regretted, for his sake, that this claim was withdrawn from the House of Lords, where he would have had a fair and honourable opportunity of shewing forth his talents oratorical and professional.

§1. Essays on Suicide, and the Immortality of the Soul, ascribed to the late David Hume, Esq. Never before published. With Remarks, intended as an Antidote to the Poison contained in those Performances, by the Editor. To which are added, Two Letters on Suicide, from Rousseau's Eloisa. 12mo.

THESE Essays, it is well known, were printed and advertised by Mr. Millar, with some others by Mr. Hume, near thirty years ago; but before the day of publication, being intimidated by threats of a prosecution, the bookseller called in some copies that he had dispersed, cancelled the two Essays, and (with difficulty) prevailed on Mr. Hume to substitute some others less obnoxious. Some copies, however, escaped this proscription, and have since been privately sold at a large price. As needy authors evade the patent by writing, or pretending to write, notes on the Bible, the present editor seems to think himself safe from prosecution by supplying this code of infidelity with what he calls "a comment," or "an antidote." A poor evasion, and which, we apprehend, would no more justify the vender of poison of any kind in foro legis, than in foro conscientie; as many, who swallow the poison, will not apply the antidote, even were it much stronger than that here administered. And, by adding Rousseau's Letters, the design is obvious. Sophistical and fallacious as are the arguments, we will not, by retailing them, be guilty of a practice that we condemn; but, as a much better antidote than any here prescribed, will recommend the small tract reviewed in our next article, which is supposed to be by the Dean of Canterbury.

§2. Letters on Infidelity. By the Author of a Letter to Dr. Adam Smith. 8vo.

THIS writer seems to think, with Horace, that

*Ridiculum acri
Fortius et melius magnas plerumque facit res.*

But he justifies the ludicrous vein, which he sometimes indulges on the most serious and sacred subjects, by much higher authority, the irony of Elijah: Cry aloud, for he is a God, &c. The three first letters contain—"Remarks on the Apology for Mr. Hume's Life and Writings," the IVth "A Dialogue on Philosophical Scepticism," occasioned by Mr. Hume's posthumous Dialogues on Natural Religion†; the Vth, VIth, and VIIth, an "Examination of the [abovementioned] Essay on Suicide." And the VIIIth and nine succeeding letters; an "Answer to a Pamphlet, intituled, Doubts of the Infidels: or, Queries relative to Scriptural Inconsistencies and Contradictions. Submitted to the Consideration of the Bench of Bishops. By a weak Christian." In these Doubts, and consequently in this answer, the following subjects are discussed:—"Miracles. Testimony. Mr. Valentine Greatrix (the stoker). Pentateuch. Representations of the Deity. Light before the Sun. Darkness. Firmament. Tree of Knowledge. Death of Adam. Fall. Cherubim. Rainbow. Conduct of the Deity, with respect to the Posterity of Abraham. Esau and Jacob. Pharaoh. Magicians. Egyptian Jews. Horses and chariots. Balaam. The Canaanites. Judges i. 19. Chemosh. The Witch of Endor. David's Treatment of the Ammonites. The Amalekite. Numbering the People. Prophecy and New Testament. Name of Christ. Nature of his kingdom. Thirty Pieces of Silver. Division of Christ's Garments by Lot. Differences of Divines. Revelation of St. John. Genealogy of Christ. Pascal. Voice from Heaven at Christ's Baptism. Slaughter of the Infants by Herod. Pious Frauds. End of the World. Fig-tree. Grain of Wheat. Elias. Spurious Gospels. Liberty. Passion and Resurrection. Faith and Reason."

Of a work so miscellaneous we can only give a few extracts, observing, that when old objections are retailed, old answers must be given, and therefore on the above subjects little new can be expected, except in the manner, of which some idea may be formed from the following remarks on two or three passages both in Hume and the Doubter.

* See Vol. XLVII. pp. 322, 338.

† See Vol. XLIX. p. 507.

Hume. "It would be no crime in me to divert the Nile or Danube from its course."

Answer. "None at all. Some opposition might be formed from the inhabitants of certain countries perhaps, when they found they were likely to lose their rivers. But I wish you had been so employed, instead of writing essays in defence of suicide."

Hume. "Where then is the crime of turning a few ounces of blood from their natural channel?"

Answer. "The public prints informed us, some time ago, of a man who killed his wife and children, as well as himself, to prevent them from being unhappy. And where was the crime? It was only 'turning so many more ounces of blood from their natural channel!' This, it seems, is the philosophical idea of murder, somewhat similar to the notion once entertained of perjury, by an Irish evidence.—Who would not smack the gabbykin (said he) for a friend?"

Hume. "'Tis Providence surely that has placed me at this present in this chamber; but may I not leave it when I think proper, without being liable to the imputation of having deserted my post or station?"

Answer. "Is there no difference, then, between your walking out of life, and your walking out of one room into another?"

Hume. "Cato and Brutus, Arria and Portia, acted heroically; those who now imitate their example ought to receive the same praises from posterity."

Answer. "Christianity inculcates a far nobler heroism. It touches us, when we are engaged in a good cause, to die for it like men, but not by our own hands; to "endure the cross, despising the shame." Cato had not patience to do the one; and Brutus was too proud to do the other. But surely Cato might have lived, though Cæsar conquered; and Brutus have left the world with a quiet conscience, though he had forborne to stab the dictator, or himself. Of the Roman ladies, nil nisi bonum.—But there have been martyrs of that sex among us, who could have shewn to them likewise "a more excellent way." There cannot be a finer or more just representation of this matter than that given by Mrs. Chapone, in the story of Fidelia, first published in the Adventurer, N^o 77, &c. and afterwards reprinted in a little volume, entitled Miscellanies in prose and verse. Every female, who, on account of her crimes, her miseries, or both, may be tempted to put a period to her life, should read that story. Nor let me omit this opportunity of recommending to general perusal a charming ode published among the poems of Mr. Warton, styled, *The Suicide, in which the best of poetry is applied to the best of purposes."

In this manner our author irrefragably shews that suicide is a breach of our duty to God, our neighbour, and ourselves.—Now for one or two of the Doubts abovementioned.

P. 7. "From whence came the water of the flood?"

Answer. "From the place to which it returned, and in which it has remained (God be praised) ever since. The globe of the earth, as the Scriptures inform us, is a shell, or a hollow sphere, inclosing within it a body of waters, styled, "the great deep," or abyss. The earth, at the creation, was covered on all sides with water, which, at the command of God, retired to this abyss beneath, from whence, at the same command, it came forth in the days of Noah; and, having performed its task, was again dismissed, as before. "The fountains of the great deep," by the divine power, were "broken up;" gravity for a time was suspended, or overcome; the waters were violently thrown upwards into the atmosphere, and descended in torrents and cataracts of rain. If we measure the circumference of the earth, and gauge its contents, we shall find water enough, I dare say, to answer every purpose of the book of Genesis*. The shells, and other marine bodies, deposited in the bowels, and on the tops, of the highest mountains, afford sufficient evidence, that the waters have been there. If any one can give a better account than Moses has done, when and how they came there, e'en let us have it! A learned and respectable person expresses his surprise, that the shell fish should transport themselves from the bed of the ocean, where they were so much better accommodated, to so uncomfortable a situation as the summit of a barren mountain. Alas, worthy sir, it was no party of pleasure! Whenever they took the journey, depend upon it, it was "upon compulsion, Hal!"

P. 35. "It is strange, that the horrid massacre of the children by the command of Herod, should be totally unnoticed by Josephus."

Answer. "It was too nearly related to the birth of the wonderful child which occasioned it, and concerning which Josephus thought that questions might be asked. For otherwise, is it not equally strange, that he should be totally silent concerning the life and death of Christ, and the appearance of a new religion, which had extended itself to Rome, and attracted the notice of the historians there? Yet, if the celebrated passage be an interpolation (as these gentlemen deem it to be) of such events, has Josephus said nothing,

* "Some are puzzled to find water enough to form an universal deluge: to assist their endeavours, it may be remarked, that was it all precipitated which is dissolved in the air, it might probably be sufficient to cover the surface of the whole earth to the depth of above thirty feet." Watson's Chemical Essays, Vol. III. p. 87.

* See it in our vol. XLVII. p. 496.

though falling within a period, the transactions of which are by him minutely and exactly related. But though Josephus was silent, and had good reasons for being so, it evidently appears, from the often recited passage of Macrobius, that Herod's slaughter of the infants in Judæa was a thing well known in his time, and was not contested by Heathens *. We may add, that St. Matthew must have been out of his senses to have told such a story as this, had it been otherwise than true, nor is there any thing in the character of Herod that renders it improbable. Quite the contrary."

May every poison meet with as good an antidote!

83. An Inquiry into the Nature and Cause of that Swelling, in one or both of the lower Extremities, which sometimes happens to lying-in Women. Together with an Examination into the Propriety of drawing the Breasts of those who do, and also of those who do not, give Suck. By Cha. White, Esq. F. R. S. &c. &c. 8vo.

THE symptoms of the disorder, in its simplest state, are thus described :

"In about 12 or 15 days after delivery, the patient is seized with great pain in the groin of one side, accompanied with a considerable degree of fever, which is seldom preceded by a shivering fit or cold rigour. This part soon becomes affected with swelling and tension, which extend to the labium pudendi of one side only, and down the inside of the thigh, to the ham, the leg, the foot, and the whole limb; and the progress of the swelling is so quick, that in a day or two the limb becomes twice the size of the other, and is moved with great difficulty, is hot and exquisitely tender, but not attended with external inflammation. The pain in the groin is generally preceded by a pain in the small of the back, and sometimes by a pain at the bottom of the belly, on the same side; the parts which suffer the most pain are the groin, the ham, and the back part of the leg, about its middle. The pain indeed extends over the whole limb, owing to the sudden distension; but in a day or two it becomes less considerable. The swelling is general and equal all over the limb: in every stage of the disorder, it is much harder and firmer than anasarca; not so cold in any state of the disease, nor so much diminished by an horizontal position; neither does it pit when pressed by the finger, nor any water issue from it on its being punctured with a lancet. It is very smooth, shining, and pale, and even equal to the touch in every part, except where the conglobate glands are situated, which in some cases are knotty and hard, as in the groin, the ham, and about the middle of the leg, at its back part. This disorder generally comes on about the 2d or 3d week after delivery; but I have known one instance of its shewing itself so early as 24 hours after, and another so late as 5 weeks; but neither of these are usual. The first parts that begin to mend, both as to pain and swelling, are the groin, and labium pudendi; the thigh next, and lastly the leg.

"The fever in some patients subsides in 2 or 3 weeks, in others it continues 6 or 8 weeks, attended with quick pulse and hectic symptoms. It sometimes attacks both the extremities, but this rarely happens. After the disorder has subsisted a week or two, it is not uncommon for the sound leg to swell towards evening, and become adematous; but then the groin and thigh are not affected on that side, and this leg is much softer to the touch than the other, and pits when pressed upon by the finger. This disorder attacks women who are in full strength, and those who are reduced by flooding; those who have a moderate discharge of the lochia, and those who have a small or large quantity; those who give suck, and those who do not; whether their breasts be drawn or not; and whether they have a great deal, or little milk. It attacks women who were delivered on the knee, and others who were delivered on the side; but of those who were delivered on the side, it appears that the greater number were affected on that side on which they lay at the time of delivery. It attacks women of all ranks and of different habits, both the rich and the poor; the most healthful, as well as those who have laboured under chronic diseases; the strong, and the weak; the lean, and the competent; the sedentary, and the active; the young, and the middle-aged; after their first, or any other labour, and whether the labour be natural, or præternatural; but I have not known it happen after a miscarriage, nor to a woman more than once, though she has afterwards had more children. It happens at all seasons of the year indiscriminately; and in the country, as well as in large towns. It never attacks either of the arms, or other parts of the body. I have never known it to suppurate, or prove fatal, or any material inconvenience to arise from it, after a few months were elapsed, except a little swelling of the leg, after fatigue, particularly walking."

* "Inter pueros, quos in Syriâ, Herodes, rex Judæorum, intra bimumum jussit occidi." [Interfici in the original.] Macrobi. Saturnal. lib. II. cap. 4. "See at large on this subject, Lardner's Credibility, Part. I. b. 2. ch. 2, and Findlay against Voltaire, p. 541."

GENT. MAG. August, 1784.

Several cases of the disease are next related, as they occurred to our author, or other eminent practitioners; and these are followed by some observations on on its proximate cause, which Mr. White considers as depending on "an obstruction, detention, and accumulation of lymph in the limb." And this opinion is confirmed and illustrated by several considerations which immediately follow this proposition. Of the remote cause, however, our author is less explicit, very candidly observing, that it "probably will not be precisely ascertained, till it be proved by dissection; and it may be a long time before such an opportunity offers, as this disorder has never been known to prove fatal."

The method of cure recommended in this disease, and which, Mr. White observes, happily coincides with the theory he has given of it, consists in observing the antiphlogistic regimen during the inflammatory stage of the complaint; and this chiefly by keeping pervious the intestinal canal, "by gentle aperients and glysters;" at the same time alleviating the pain "by opiates internally; by anodyne fomentations, and by the warm and vapour bath. Blisters applied to the upper part of the thigh" are also recommended; with "antimonials" to moderate the fever, and cooling medicines and diet. In the second stage of the disease, wine and a fuller diet is allowed. And in the third and last stage, those remedies which are directly tonic are particularly advised.

In an appendix, Mr. White very candidly acknowledges himself a convert to Mr. Crutwell's * opinion against employing any other agent than the child itself to draw the milk from the breasts.

This work is illustrated with three very elegant plates of the lymphatic system, from Mr. Hewson, which were obtained by leave of the widow of that very "distinguished anatomist." We cannot conclude without observing, that we think much praise is due to our author for his description of this disease; a complaint which has hitherto been unnoticed, or but little observed by writers.

84. A View of the British Empire, more especially Scotland†; with some Proposals for the Improvement of that Country, the Extension of its Fisheries, and the Relief of the People. By John Knox. 8vo.

THIS judicious and philanthropic pamphlet is the production, we understand, of the original Editor of by much the greater part of "Guthrie's Geographical Grammar;" and is evidently the result of such "infinite fatigue, application, and expence," that there can be no doubt of its being attentively perused by an enlightened and generous publick. Let our author's ingenuous preface explain both his motives and his plan.

* See Gent. Mag. vol. XLIX. p. 157.

† A most excellent "Commercial Map of Scotland" accompanies this publication.

"Having been led, through curiosity, to view the rude magnificence of the Highlands of Scotland, my attention was soon attracted by the less pleasing scenes of human misery in all its shapes; unalleviated by the cheering rays of hope, or any of the comforts, which the lower ranks of mankind, inhabiting richer soils, enjoy in a certain degree. Succeeding journeys over the various districts of those mountainous wilds, served only to disclose similar distresses; and curiosity, the primary impulse, gave way to serious investigation. By hearing the complaints of those unhappy people; by comparing their various relations with each other, and with my own observations; I was enabled to ascertain those facts which form the ground-work of the following narrative.

"A tract of land that composes a fifth part of Great Britain, appeared, with some few exceptions, to be in a state of nature; a great body of people, and these the most virtuous in our island, dragging out a wretched existence, perishing through want, or forced by wild despair to abandon their country, their kindred, and friends, and to embark, moneyless and unknown, the indentured slaves to unremitting toil and drudgery, in boundless deserts, at the distance of 3000 miles.

"The result of these observations was an enquiry whether the improvement of the country, and the relief of the people, were practicable; to what extent these objects could be carried; whether merely to soften local distress; or, in doing this humane duty, whether a permanent and valuable colony might not, at the same time, be established in those outskirts of Britain, to the great benefit, and security, of the centre. But, such was the disposition of the times, that it seemed a useless labour and expence, to introduce the subject on either side of the Tweed. Some few lines, however, found their way to public observation, wherein the fidelity and bravery of the Highlanders were applauded, and the utility of permitting them to resume their favourite dress was warmly recommended.

"Thus stood matters, when a train of events, the most unexpected and humiliating, contributed, in the operation and consequences, to exhibit, more than ever, the value of the Highlanders, and the importance of the country which gave them birth.

"Emboldened by these considerations, and seeing seeing no regular plan of policy proposed, relative to that country, I arranged, in 1782, the various memorandums which I had been collecting during a series of years; stated the distresses of the people, and the causes of these distresses; attempted the outlines of a plan whereby some inconveniences would be removed, others mitigated, the country improved, the fisheries and nursery for seamen greatly extended; and resolved, in humble deference, to lay the same before the public.

"I have, throughout the whole, avoided all chimerical theories, and tiresome conjectures, founded merely upon report, or collected from the very erroneous representations of old writers. It was my wish to propose a plan, adapted in all its parts to the natural state of the country, the genius, qualifications, and relative situation of the inhabitants; practicable, expedient, and within the abilities of Government.

"These observations were printed in the Spring 1783; and in a journey through part of Scotland in the following Summer, I was satisfied that the calamitous situation of the Highlands had not been exaggerated in the narrative; and it was from the affecting relations of the people, that I drew up and annexed some particulars respecting the famine, which had not then fully subsided.

"The Second Part, or Appendix, while it served to establish the foregoing propositions, afforded also an opportunity of introducing sundry remarks, which did not fall within the general heads of the pamphlet. The shores, seas, and lakes, of the Highlands had been fully described, because these are, or ought to be, the first object of public attention. Secondary to this national concern, is the improvement of the vallies; and a short topographical account of those tracts of fertility, in the manner of an itinerary, was deemed the most satisfactory mode of conveying information to the reader*.

"Many of the arguments, which had occurred in treating of the Highlands, seemed applicable to Scotland in general. This opened a new, and more extensive field of enquiry. If the revolt of some colonies, the conquest of others, and the then apparent danger of losing the remainder, gave those neglected wilds additional consequence, the improvement of the kingdom at large appeared equally expedient. The same idea admitted of being extended even to England itself, a country more indebted to nature, and the industry of individuals, than the attention or assistance of its Government. as will evidently appear to any person who shall take the trouble of considering the matter in a general view.

"Thus, the whole island seems to have been, in a greater or lesser degree, neglected, and its real interests sacrificed to expensive schemes of conquest and empire, which, without effecting any valuable purpose, have brought it to the verge of ruin and bankruptcy.

"There are, however, many persons, who, notwithstanding that the events and consequences of the late war, have disarranged the old delusive system of politics, and shewn its inefficacy, still adhere to opinions, which cannot be defended on any principle of justice, humanity, or national expediency.

"To such persons particularly I have, with greater zeal than abilities, addressed the following preliminary sketches, relative to the ancient and present state of Great Britain; being fully convinced, that the objects of the greatest value to society may be obtained at less expence of treasure, and without involving the innocent multitude in the complicated, undescribable distresses of war.

"Some of the tables, calculations, or estimates, are inserted from authentic documents; others, upon miscellaneous authorities; and some upon probable conjecture. Any errors that may have escaped notice, amidst so many figures, will be corrected; the same attention will be given to any mistakes in opinion, so soon as they shall be discovered, or pointed out."

In a future Magazine, some extracts shall be given from this truly patriotic publication, which we hope will be properly noticed in the next session of parliament; the author having already received, from Mr. Dempster, as we have been well assured, the thanks of the committee who were in the last session engaged in devising a plan for extending the fisheries of Scotland. (see p. 621.)

85. Two Sermons preached before the University of Cambridge, viz. 1. on Nov. 5, 1783; 2. on Jan. 30, 1784. By Peter Peckard, M. A. Master of Magdalen College. 4to.

BOTH these discourses do credit to the understanding and liberal principles, civil and religious, of the preacher. But we shall confine ourselves to his own account of them, in a dedication to the Rev. Samuel Hey, M. A. president of the same college: "They contain a sort of outline, or rough sketch of my sentiments on some very important subjects. My whole view
" in

* "The improveable parts of the Highlands and Western Isles are, as one to four of the whole, or one 20th part of Great Britain; containing collectively above 2500 square miles, or 1,600,000 square acres; being the dimensions of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent united."

“in them is to recommend the great “principles of Christian morality, of “reverence to the Supreme Being, and “a dutiful submission to political go“vernment; with a due regard for “civil and religious liberty, as founded
 “on the gospel of Christ, and the prin“ciples of the Revolution. I have not “advanced any thing, but what after “serious consideration appeared to me
 “to be true. So far as the points “recommended appear to you in the “same light, I shall wish for your at“tention to them in the education of “youth, committed in great measure
 “to your care, but no farther.”

With such principles, Mr. Peckard may naturally be expected to be a strenuous advocate for Mr. Locke, whom of late (he says) it has been the fashion to decry; and an enemy to the slave-trade. The dedication thus concludes:
 “In all human probability, this will be “the last public act of my life. The “course of nature, my advance in years,
 “the indication which I perceive of “declining strength, all intimate to me
 “that my continuance with you cannot “be of long duration. So long as I “shall remain with you, I shall be “happy to co-operate with your en“deavours in the care of the young “men entrusted to us, whose parents “wish for a virtuous rather than “a fashionable education. When I “shall be removed hence, I shall “leave you in the well assured-hope “that you will not only persevere, but “recommend it to your successors and “mine, to follow us in those paths,
 “which lead to the satisfaction of con“science, and to virtuous education.”

86. Two Odes: I. To the Humane Society.
 II. Performed before the Governors of that Society. By Edward Burnaby Greene,
Esq. Printed for the Benefit of that excellent and charitable Institution. 4to.

RELIGION, and her “hand-maid “Charity,” those Muses at Sion and “Siloa,” far superior to those of Pieria and Olympus, are the deities here invoked. And indeed no subject can be more worthy of their inspiration. How far it has been vouchsafed to our author, whose sentiments and intentions do him honour, let the reader judge from the conclusion of Ode II.

“AIR.

“See where they come!—Oh! spirit roll
 Thy purest fervour to my soul,

Pure as the seraph’s hymn; his ear
 Bend from the heaven of heavens to hear.
 — When clos’d each avenue of life,
 Clos’d to each earthly joy, each earthly strife,
 Plung’d in the horrors of the wave, — Humanity, ’tis thine to save.

“SMI-CHORUS.

“Brisk heaves the pulse, the genial currents flow,
 They live, to comfort live, and lull the kindred woe.

“CHORUS.

“Thou God of Hosts, whose ruling force
 Controls the tempest in its course,
 Whose awe-commanding sounds declare
 “Thus far, nor farther, OCEAN dare;”
 Eternal Power! if such thy will,
 Thy smile our mercy’s task fulfill;
 Ours be the sinner’s pang to heal,
 Be his for others pangs to feel;
 And each, accordant to THY WORD’S decree, Devote the life, thou gav’st, to gratitude and “THEE!”

87. The School for Scandal, a Comedy, as it is performed by His Majesty’s Servants. 8vo.

THIS we only mention to prevent its being mistaken for the comedy of the same name by Mr. Sheridan, to which it has no more resemblance in any other instance than dullness has to wit—the Coalition and the India bill are the subjects.

THEATRICAL REGISTER.

HAY-MARKET.

- July 31. Two to One—Agreeable Surprise.
 Aug. 2. The Noble Peasant—The Guardian.
 3. The Young Quaker—Midas.
 4. The Noble Peasant—A Mogul Tale.
 5. Isabella—Gretna Green.
 6. Summer Amusement—Man of Quality.
 7. The Noble Peasant—Who’s the Dupe?
 9. Ditto—Genius of Nonsense.
 10. Lionel and Clarissa—What d’ye call It?
 11. The Noble Peasant—Gretna Green.
 12. Ditto—Fitch of Bacon.
 13. Douglas—Genius of Nonsense.
 14. Two to One—The Son-in-Law.
 16. The Noble Peasant—A Mogul Tale.
 17. The Maid of the Mill—Rosina.
 18. Hayley’s Lord Ruffel—Agreeable Surprise.
 19. Clandestine Marriage—Genius of Nonsense.
 20. Summer Amusement—Dead Alive.
 21. Lord Ruffel—Hunt the Slipper.
 23. Ditto—Ditto.
 24. The Good natur’d Man—The Deserter.
 25. Noble Peasant—Hunt the Slipper.
 26. The Manager in Distress—The Beggar’s
 Opera—Medea and Jason.
 27. Lord Ruffel—The Agreeable Surprise.
 28. Spanish Barber—Hunt the Slipper.

DRURY-LANE.

- Aug. 20. Lord Ruffel. [By Dr. Stratford.]
 25. Ditto. 27. Ditto. 28. Ditto.

SONNET

SONNET TO MISS WILLIAMS ON HER EPIC POEM, PERU.

POETIC sister, who with daring hand, Ere thy fourth lustre's last lost year is flown,
Hast seiz'd the epic lyre—with art divine
Wak'd on its golden strings each spirit bland,
Or bade its deep sonorous tones expand:
Shalt thou the claim to glory's meed resign,
Call other strains, less silver sweet than
thine,
To hymn the fate of a disastrous land?
See! at that call, Peru's wild genius flies
To Thespian bowers:—there, as Urania strays,
Grasps her bright robe, and thus impatient cries,
With bending knee and supplicating gaze:
“Be mine alone thy lovely female bard,
“O from obtrusive lyres my well-sung story “guard!”
Lichfield, May 3. ANNA SEWARD.

A S O N G,
WRITTEN FOR THE TENANTS OF THO-MAS WHICHCOTE, ESQ. OF HARPS-
WELL, IN LINCOLNSHIRE, ON HIS COMING OF AGE, AND INTO POS-SESSION OF HIS GRANDFA-THER'S ESTATE. BY MAJOR WALLER.

COME, join, brother tenants, our voices
let's raise, [days,
And hail the fair prospect of those happy
Which we, who liv'd under, and honour'd his fire, ['Squire.
Still hope, will continue, and bless our young
No high-sounding words; which to flatterers belong,
No sulsome applauses shall tinsel our song,
Sincerity, wrapp'd in plain home-spun attire,
Shall warm us with love and with zeal
tow'rd our 'Squire,
Our hearts with full glee let this subject
engage, [of age;
For this is the year when our 'Squire comes Then with his fond parents our notes we'll raise higher, [our 'Squire.
And welcome the day which gave birth to
From his infancy onwards to prime of his youth, [truth;
We have always admir'd his good-nature and
Such qualities well may our bosoms inspire,
And fill them with friendly respect for our 'Squire.
Their consequence some may presume they advance, [France;
By learning of capers and vapours from Home-bred and home-fed, what we tenants admire, ['Squire.
Is the true English spirit display'd in our
To great lords and princes let others resort,
And learn the fine airs and the arts of a court:

We have reason to think that the Gods, in their ire,
To punish poor tenants bestow such a 'Squire.
Though some love to deal in harangue or oration, [nation;
And make a huge fuss (as they say) for the Full many of them are seen mov'd by a wire,
But (thanks to kind Heaven!) we have not such a 'Squire.

No pride or oppression we have reason to dread;
His heart is too proud by such foes to be led:
Nor fear we hereafter that monsters so dire Should ever lay hold of, or poison, our 'Squire.

Our rents, in due season, we'll chearfully pay, [day:
Nor ever prove backward, but true to a
What more of us tenants can reason require,
Than that we prove faithful and just to our 'Squire?

Whilst each, by fair industry, labour, and pains,
Himself and his family neatly maintains,
That “the labourer is not unworthy his hire,”
Is a thought which must glow in the breast of our 'Squire.

He never will grudge us our cask of good beer, [cheer;
But feel himself happy when we our souls
And, as in the evening we sit round the fire, We'll sing and we'll drink a good health to our 'Squire.

With equal content, when we 're moul-der'd to dust,
Our children hereafter (as we do) we trust,
Shall raise up their voices, and sing to the lyre,
“May a Whichcote of Harpswell for ever
“be 'Squire!”

AN ELEGIAC BALLAD.

SAID TO BE BY MRS. COWLEY, OR MISS SEWARD †.

WHERE is my lover and my friend?
Surely he will not linger long:
He early us'd to seek my cot,
And cheer me with his dulcet song,

Where is my lover and my friend?
Sadder the pensive twilight grows:
Its latest gleams are now no more,
The screech-owl flaps, the north wind blows.

Where is my lover and my friend?
Hark! the hoarse thunder growls around;
Nearer and nearer are its peals,
The livid lightnings skim the ground.

Where is my lover and my friend?
The storm is past, the sky is clear:
I'll leave the cot, and trace the path
Which each dear evening brings him here.

† Q. which?

Where

Where is my lover and my friend ?
 My eye darts o'er the mead, the vale.
 He is not there !—What caus'd his stay ?
 I'll chide, nor listen to his tale.

Where is my lover and my friend ?
 Perhaps he loiters through the grove :
 I'll thither bend my eager steps—
 Guide them, kind Fortune, to my love.

There is my lover and my friend !
 I know his dear, his graceful form :
 Yon lofty oak supports his head—
 Its foliage kept him from the storm.

O speak, my lover and my friend !
 See ! anxious through the night I came ;
 I scorn the babbling neighbours' talk,
 Nor heed their comments or their blame.

O gracious God ! my hair upheaves !
 Thou didst the blasting lightning send !
 I sink—O neighbours, dig the grave—
 I join my lover and my friend.

E L E G Y
 ON THE DEATH OF BUNGY *.

—*Quis solia fando
 Temperet a lacrymis ?*

DESCEND, Melpomene, descend,
 To me your kind assistance lend,
 Whilst I attempt, in plaintive verse,
 Poor Bungy's merits to rehearse :
Bungy, a dog of high renown,
 In city and in country known ;
 Bold as a lion, in his gait
 He e'er preserv'd uncommon state,
 And, did his mistress walk or ride,
 A firm companion at her side,
 On castriffs vile he fix'd his eye,
 But gents. he pass'd unheeded by ;
 And well the difference he could scan
 Between a rogue and honest man ;
 For Bungy had a great pretence,
 I'd almost said, to human sense :
 His mistress' guard by night and day,
Bungy was ever in the way :
 To sum up all, and make an end,
 Poor Bungy was a faithful friend :
 A better brute I never knew,
 Therefore I pay this tribute due.

But now, Melpomene, relate
 Poor Bungy's miserable fate !
 His health, alas ! poor dog, impairs,
 In spite of all his mistress' cares.
 The doctors all in haste repair,
 All the dog-doctors soon are there.
 One down his throat a vomit drives ;
 Another, fond of laxatives,
 Thinking a vomit much too rough,
 Cries, ' Give him jalap quantum suff.'
 All shew their medicinal skill,
 This brings a bolus, that a pill :
 But all in vain ; his pains increase,
 Nor but with life and breath they cease.

* A Newfoundland dog belonging to the Recorder of Canterbury.

Not ev'n Sir Compton's † skill could save
 The much-lov'd Bungy from the grave.
 He dies—in his our fate we see ;
 Poor Bungy dies—and so must we.

June 6.

T. W.

MR. URBAN,
THE following applications of various passages from the ancients to some few modern characters are by various hands, and possibly may be worth inserting in your valuable repository ; the lines applied to Bentley ought rather to be considered as a motto to his book against Boyle's Phalaris, than as a character of the man. C. T. O.

DR. BENTLEY,

ESTO bonus miles, tutor bonus, arbiter idem
 Integer: ambiguae si quando citabere testis
 Incertaeque rei, Phalaris licet imperet, ut sis
 Falsus, et admoto dictet perjuris tauro.
 Juv. Sat. viii. 79.

HON. C. J. F—x.

—In magnâ legatum quære popinâ.
 Invenies aliquo cum percussore jacentem,
 Permissum nautis, aut furibus, aut fugitivis ;
 Inter carnifices, et fabros sandapitarum,
 Et resupinati cessantia tympana Galli :
 Æqua ibi libertas, communis pocula, lectus
 Non alius cuiquam, nec mensa remotior ulli.
 Quid facies, talem sortitus, Pontice, servum ?
 Nempe in Lucanos, aut Thusca estagula mittas.
 At vos, Trojugenæ, vobis ignoscitis, et quæ
 Turpia cernoni, Volesos Brutosque decebunt.
 Juv. Sat. viii. 172.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

—Imâ plebe Quiritem
 Facundum invenies: solet hic defendere causas
 Nobilis indocti: veniet de plebe togatâ,
 Qui juris nodos, et legum ænigmata, solvat.
 Juv. Sat. viii. 50.

DR. JOHNSON.

Iracundior est paulo: minus aptus acutis
 Naribus horum hominum: rideri possit, eo quod
 Rusticius tonsa toga defluit: et male laxus
 In pede calceus hæret. at est bonus, ut melior vir
 Non alius quisquam: at tibi amicus: at ingenium ingens
 Inculto latet hoc sub corpore.
 Hor. Sat. iii. lib. i. 29.

DUKE OF LEEDS.

—Venit et Crispijacunda senectus,
 Cujus erant mores, qualis facundia, mite
 Ingenium, maria, ac terras, populosque regi genti

† Spencer, a noted dog-doctor in Canterbury.

Quis comes utilior, si clade et peste sub illâ
Sævitiam damnare, et honestum afferre liceret
Consilium? sed quid violentius aure tyranni?
* * * * *

Ille igitur nunquam direxit brachia contra Torrentem: nec civis erat, qui libera posset
Verba animi proferre, et vitam impendere vero.

Sic multas hyemes, atque octogesima vidit
Solstitia, his armis,——

Juv. Sat. iv. 81.

DR. URI, Author of the Hebrew Pharos.

Ast te facetiarum mille senex, quam libenter agnosco! tuâ nempe in consuetudine soles sæpissimè inter dicendum condidi, te quoties in memoriam revocamus lepore quo-dam eximio risus omnium temerè elicientem, irrequieta subit profecto et frequens lacrymatum demum illam in loquendo tam pro-prium jucunditatem, teque tam agrestè et incocinni rusticæ quodammodo sapientem verè desideramus.—Vtrum ubi, o ubi inveniemus cordis adeo simplicis et meri? proinde ut de re magis quam de verbo semper laborabas—in literis interioribus et penitus serè reconditis versatum te aspicio, nescio quam bene!
Sed ita accuratè scilicet versatum ut nihil possit supra. Win. P. Nor. ill. p. 13, chap 5.

O D E,

Sung at the annual Chapel Feast at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in The Strand, July 30, 1784; composed by Mr. DUPUIS, jun. of Christ Church College, Oxon and set to Music by Mr. THOMAS SAUNDERS DU-PUIS, Organist and Composer to His Majesty.

RECITATIVE. MR. D'YNE.

HAIL, festive day!
that glads the circling year,
Treasures of mirth,
of Bacchanalian cheer;
Euphrosyne the fair,
the young, the gay,
Invites the warbling
in a welcome lay.

AIR.

The sweets of industry how dear!
That wreath refreshment's smile:
These daily sooth the rustic's care,
And crown his duteous toil;
His honest wealth, that in the morn
Is gladly reap'd in peace,
At setting day, from Plenty's horn,
Sheds forth its rich increase.

SONG.

Sung by Mr. ROBERT HUDSON, B. M.
Not less, behold! the bounteous maid*
Regards our festive band;
To us a just reward is paid,
Her blessings wide expand.

* Industry

Yet from our Sovereign, gracious lord,
That just reward extends;
He richly crowns the joyous board
Who merit's cause befriends.

DUETT.

By Two of the King's Scholars.
With loyal ardor praise his name,
'Tis gratitude demands:
Your Sovereign's generous worth proclaim
To far admiring lands!

RECIT. and AIR. MR. D'YNE.

Upon him, Conquest, ever smile,
Accept our loyal vow;
Renate, round Albion's sea-girt isle,
Let Fame's proud laurels grow,
And boughs of peace, and plenty's vine,
To guard its native oak entwine.

RECIT. and AIR. MR. LUTHER.

Now, great Anacreon, next to thee,
The tribute's due to Harmony;
Beneath the rich empurpled shrine
We roll libations, streams of wine:
Our joys, elate on fancy's wing,
Shall hail thee for their jovial king!
Array'd in Pleasure's rosy vest,
Send Friendship, ever-honour'd guest,
Yes, let thy blissful vot'ries prove
That emblem of concordant love.

CHORUS.

Thus blest'd and united,
Thus happy and free,
Say, brethren, what mortals
So jovial as we?
O'er the cheer of Old England,
O'er the cheer of our King,
We'll join hand in hand, and
"God save him," we'll sing.

E X T E M P O R E.

ON SEEING A LATE PARAGRAPH IN THE PAPERS ON MESSRS. A——.

QUOTH Ralph to his friend, "Here's a
"strange rout and pother,
"It matters not which they chuse, this man
"or t'other;
"I'd as soon give my vote for the India Con- "tractor,
"As I would for the no less deserving Corn-
"factor.
"They are both rogues alike, I repeat it a"gain,
"The one rogue in spirit, the other in grain."
T. W.

ON TWO BISHOPS, ANNO 1732.

CECIL and Butts have both obtain'd the lawn,
As lead one heavy, t'other fat as brawn.
Two such defenders of the Christian law
Frighten the Hereticks, and the Deists awe.
Sure none can say that bishops now are putts,
Since grac'd by Cecil, and adorn'd by Butts.

PRO-

PROLOGUE to "Musical Imitations, &c."

Written and spoken by GEORGE WRIGHT,
Esq. of Tottenham-Court-Road.

WHILE some attempt in tragic mournful strain

To move the passions into real pain,
To soften into tears the hardest heart,
With all the woes that murder can impart,
While others, more to be commended, strive
By comic scenes to keep your mirth alive,
O'er every face the chearful smile diffuse
With all the drolleries of a laughing Muse,
Let me endeavour now to make you smile
With IMITATIONS in a novel style;
A CONCERT SOLO, or perform'd by ONE!
Bless me! you say; this surely can't be done.
To which submissive hear me then reply:
A paradox it seems—none can deny;
But, when 'tis finish'd, I shall hear you own
You could not think it from one man alone;
Such different voices, and so many sounds,
With which my exhibition rare abounds,
If what you hear your approbation gains
'Tis well, and I'm requited for my pains.
Should I be out of tune, as like I may,
You'll not be too severe, I dare to say;
Your known good-nature, if the mimic errs,
Will grant my pardon—so, your servant,
sirs!

EPILOGUE to the same.

Written and spoken by the same.

NOW, let me ask you, must you not declare

This mode of entertainment somewhat rare?
To hear one person, and so little too,
Make so much noise may well astonish you, }
'Tis doubtless more than every one can do;
So many different sounds from only one,
You'd hardly think it ever could be done;
But so it is, you hear with mute surprise,
And scarce believe your ears! believe your eyes!

Indeed so very marvellous it appears,
You'd hardly credit either eyes or ears.

"Bless me!" methinks some person present says,

"I never saw the like in all my days.

"Whilst thus in varied notes our ears he tries,

"He sings as loud as men of twice his size,

"And imitates, good Lord! so many sounds,

"His noise at once surprises and confounds."

"You're right," exclaims another, "as to me,

"I know my head aches most confoundedly,

"His imitations may be somewhat clever,

"But one would think his lungs were made of leather,

"I ne'er shall envy him his noisy art,

"I'm sure I'm glad he's done with all my heart."

Well then, be thankful now my roarings
cease,

And hence your servant, sirs, shall rest in peace!

MR. URBAN,

I SEND you a copy of a Latin epitaph which has probably never appeared in print. I transcribed it out of a book which formerly belonged to the writer of the epitaph, or at least to some of the family of the Terylls; of whom I know nothing more than what is said in the memorandum prefixed. Some of the lines are not deficient in harmony or spirit; and, as they probably were composed almost a century before May and Milton taught the English to write Latin verse with classical elegance, they may be deemed, perhaps, on that account, a curiosity not unworthy of a place in your valuable Magazine. R. C.

E P I T A P H I U M

RICHARDI TERYLL, qui obiit XIIIto
Die Januarii, Anno D'ni 1556, et Anno Regnorum Philippi et Marie, Regis et Regine, tercio et quarto, per JOHANNEM TERYLL, juniozem, nepotem
suum, editum.

O jactura gravis, o lamentabile damnum!
Teryllum subito mors extimulata furore
Lethifero rigidi transfixit acumine ferri:
Libera corporeo mens carcere sidera scandit:
Ceruleo effictum tegitur sub marmore corpus.
Longius ab poteras, Lachesis, producere fi-lum,

Et miseris charum ad tempus servasse patro-num.

Nil mollire preces poterant? suspiria? fletus?
Nil hominum lachryme, fuerat quibus ille benignus?

Heu! vestrum experior non exorabile nu-
men:

Rex, presul, pauper, dives, mercator, avarus
Colla dabunt seva mortis refecanda securi:
Ergo, fratres, nolite fratrem lugere peremp-tum,

At pro anima detis redolentia thura precesq;
Et, quoties istuc sors lumina flectere cogit,
Dicite, "Terylli molliter ossa cubent."

VITA ACTIO EST.

AMPHITHEATRALIS rapimur spectacula scenæ

Omnes. Ah miseri! Fabula mœsta sumus.
Actor homo, cælum spectator, grande thea-trum

Hic nobis, vita est actio, scena dies.
Jam data regali postrema est clausula vitæ:
Hoc est postremum; — plaudite: — abire licet.

E P I G R A M

ON AN HYPOCHONDIAC.

THAT physic sometimes is, most people think,
Of much more use than either meat or drink;
But Flavia says (and yet she has no ill),
She's never well but when she's taking pills.
Bridgwater.

Y.
Pro-

Proceedings in Parliament continued from p. 547.

Thursday, June 17.

The house balloted for a committee on the Dowston petition; but no debate.

Ordered an extract of a letter from Capt. Wilson, relative to the effects of Mr. Phillips's powder for destroying insects, to be laid before the house.

Read several private and local bills, and broke up early.

Friday 17.

Capt. Brett, in a committee of supply, moved the navy estimates, which he thought all together would amount to somewhat more than 718,000*l*.

Mr. Hussy observed, that the ordinaries were well-known, but the extraordinaries were held in concealment. He begged gentlemen to attend to that particular: as to the application of the sums granted for that purpose, the house was as much in the dark as if the same was put into the hands of government for ministers to do with it what they pleased. He wished that those who were more conversant with naval affairs than he was, would endeavour to investigate the specific application of this branch of the revenue.

Capt. Brett agreed with the hon. gentleman so far as to acknowledge the difficulty of ascertaining the specific services to which the sums granted for extraordinaries were to be applied; but thought the present administration as worthy of trust as any of their predecessors.

Sir Tho. Frankland was very severe on the present management of the whole naval system, to which he attributed all our losses and miscarriages by sea during the course of the late inglorious war. It was for want of proper discipline that our enemies had triumphed. The influence of party and parliamentary interest had taken place of justice, and rendered all naval subordination merely nominal. He concluded his remarks with recommending a strict regard to discipline in the naval department, without which nothing great or glorious could ever be achieved for this country.

Commodore Bwyer thought very differently, he said, from the hon. Admiral who had just sat down, whose ideas being improved by more than 30 years absence from the service might be supposed to have acquired a certain degree of refinement in proportion to the time that he had continued unemployed: for what else had the hon. Admiral to do but to contemplate on the subject, and mature a system, while those who were busied in action had other business to think of? Yet he, for one, could not be led to think so contemptibly of the present discipline of the navy, nor so highly of the triumphs of the enemy, as the hon. Admiral had been pleased to express. The navy of England, in a contest with almost all the naval strength of Europe, had exhibited no contemptible degree of prowess. They had fixed the enemy every where with credit.

GENT. MAG. Aug 1784

The honour of the flag had been maintained without a stain in every quarter of the globe; and the triumphs of the enemy had been displayed in the capture of their commander in chief, and their boasted Ville de Paris that was never to strike while she could float upon the water. Such were the triumphs of the enemy; and such the effects of the present want of discipline in our navy. The commodore did not however, approve altogether of the expence bestowed in coppering our ships. He did not think the use would quit the cost.

Capt. Macbride was of the same opinion. When the ships were clean, and in action, it was undoubtedly of great utility: but when the ships were laid up, it would accelerate their decay; and, when wanted again for service, they would be found in a most miserable condition. On some future day, he said, he meant to make a motion relative to this matter, which he thought of great consequence to the safety of the country.

The motion passed without a division; and 200,000*l*. was voted besides, for the purpose of repairing and improving the dock-yards.

The order of the day being read,

Alderm. Newnham rose, he said, in obedience to the instructions of his constituents, to move for a repeal of the receipt tax. He represented it as grievous to trade, unjust in its principle as affecting chiefly the middle and mercantile class of people, and almost exempting the highest and lowest classes of the community from its operation. In short, it was a tax upon time, which to the busy part of mankind was the most precious of all their enjoyments, and which till now all the world had enjoyed with perfect freedom. He flattered himself, that his motion would meet the concurrence of the house, as he understood a person high in office, and eminent for his great knowledge of the laws [the Chancellor of the Exchequer] thought favourably of it.

Mr. Savbridge, having received the same instructions from his constituents, whatever his own private opinion might be, thought it his duty to enforce their sentiments with every argument he was master of. He contended, that no imposition ought in a general sense to be laid upon the industrious, that did not equally affect the idle and voluptuous. The tax on receipts could scarcely be felt by any of the higher classes of the people. Noblemen and gentlemen of landed property, the very respectable body of the clergy and law, the liberal professions, physic surgery, and land-holders; all these, as well as the poor, are in a manner exempt. Who then were the people who were to be the contributors to this productive tax? Who! but the industrious body of tradesmen and traders, who by their spirit and activity were the life and soul of the community? And ought they to be oppressed with a burden that at once acted as a check to their industry, and as a drawback on their gains? He was confident that, if the present minister intended to preserve his popularity, he would heartily concur in the repeal of this invidious tax.

sent

Mr. Smith reprobated the receipt tax, as embarrassing and insidious, opening a door to knavery and craft, to the quirks of the law, and the ruin of the ignorant. Thousands were at this hour unacquainted with the penalties of this tax, and must for ever by their situation in life remain so, if not informed to their cost for giving receipts on paper without being stampd.

Hon. Mr. Berkeley thought the receipt tax a clog upon trade, and inimical to the interests of this country.

Chanc. of Exch. expressed his astonishment that any report should have been circulated, as if he had been hostile to the receipt-tax. In his situation, it could not be very pleasing to see a tax generally disliked, which it was not in his power either to alter or exchange. Thus much, however, he would venture to say for it, that the more it had been complained of, the more productive it had grown; and that, when its effects were fully made appear, he did not doubt but the thinking part of the people would be thoroughly reconciled to it. That there were inconveniences attending it, could not be denied: but is it possible for human wisdom to frame a tax that is not attended with inconveniences, and even hardships to individuals? He thought not.

Mr. Macnamara supported the motion on the same ground as had been taken by the worthy Alderman who had brought it forward. His constituents of Leicester had felt its effects, and had instructed him to endeavour to procure its repeal. He hoped the reasons that had been offered in favour of the motion, would induce others to join him in support of it.

Capt. John Luttrell (member for Stockbridge) produced a letter from his constituents, in which they left him at full liberty to follow the dictates of his own mind. He thought it a good tax, because it was a productive one, and nobody could be materially hurt by it but those who meant to evade it.

Mr. Fox could not help being partial to the tax, because he had the honour to prepare it; but thought it rather singular, that, at the same time that it increased in produce, it should increase in popularity. This he thought a proof of its excellence; for none could be sufferers, who were not at the same time gainers by it; and, what added still more to its merit, the poor were wholly exempt from it. He urged it as an instance in point, to prove that an implicit submission to the instructions of constituents would, in this country, be a dangerous principle; for, had the H. of C. given way to the clamour which at first was raised against it, ministers would now have been at a loss to substitute a less burthenome tax equally productive in its room.

Sir M. W. Ridley reprobated the tax, which, he said, was every where execrated. It was so odious, that those who brought it forward and patronized it had hurt their interest, or lessened their popularity by it.

He instanced Ld John Cavendish, one of the most useful and patriotic members who had ever sat in that House; and the Rt. Hon. Gentleman beneath him [Mr. Fox], so celebrated for the strength of his reasoning and the force of his elocution; the former of whom had lost his election, and the latter had sunk his popularity, by the part they had taken in promoting this most ungratious tax, which was every where disliked; and that dislike he thought a sufficient reason for its repeal.

Sir Edw. Ashley declared himself an enemy to the tax.

Mr. Thornton insisted, that the Receipt tax had by no means been so productive, or likely to be so, as was at first expected. Like other unpopular taxes, people of all descriptions were anxious to evade it; and there were ways and means enough for so doing. He was therefore for the repeal.

Ch. of Exch. assured the hon. gentleman, that, with respect to the produce, he had been greatly misinformed; for, by the late regulations that had been adopted, it had amazingly increased. He stated, that since the 25th of March it had produced 12,000*l.* which, on an average, would amount to at least 100,000*l.* a year.

Mr. Peck Watson was decidedly against the tax. His constituents, to whose sentiments he thought it his duty on all occasions to conform, had declared their aversion to it; and in his mercantile capacity he had felt how materially they suffered by it. Had the landed gentlemen been equally affected by this hateful tax, he was persuaded it never would have passed; but gentlemen who were unacquainted with trade thought nothing of the interruptions occasioned by it, but were ready enough to impose a burden upon others, of which they were to bear little or no part themselves. In this light, he deemed the tax iniquitous.

Mr Courtney did not wonder that the tax in question was peculiarly obnoxious to the trading part of the people, as there was nothing to be gained by it; another good reason there was against it, that it did not enough affect the poor. This he thought a criminal affair in any tax. He entertained the House for some time with his astonishing powers of pointed ridicule; and at length concluded, that, with regard to the motion, he should be guided by conscience.

Mr. Hogg thought of the tax as of all others; if productive, it should be confirmed because necessary; if not productive to a certain degree, it ought to be repealed, to satisfy the people.

Ch. of Exch. could give the hon. gent. assurances on that point; and therefore hoped he would oppose the motion.

On the question being put, the House divided. For the motion 29. Against it 118.

Monday

Monday 17.

Mr. Whitebread complained to the House of a practice, adopted in most trading houses, of evading the Receipt Tax by memorandums of payment made in the presence of witnesses. He mentioned one house in particular, supposed to clear 50,000*l.* a year, who practised that evasion; which, for his part, he thought a grievance, because, while he honestly paid the tax, his neighbours availed themselves of the evasion. He submitted this remark to those whose business it was to watch over the evasions of the law, and could not help thinking it an object of attention. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated the tax at 100,000*l.* a year in its present form; if so, it would not be too much to rate it at a million, if the practice of paying the tax was as general as that of evading it.

Mr. Hussey gave the hon. member credit for his information; and wished, at the same time, that some of the Crown lawyers would inform the House, whether such a memorandum could be considered as a receipt within the act.

Attor. Gen. joined in applauding the hon. gent. who gave the information; but said, he must take time to consider, before he could answer the last speaker's question.

Ch. of Exch. then rose to deliver his opinion on the report from the committee appointed to take into consideration the best means to prevent smuggling. He observed, that this illicit trade had risen within these few years to such an amazing height, in the article of tea, that though no more than 5,500,000 lbs were sold annually by the E. I. C. it appeared from good authority that the consumption amounted to more than twelve millions. To meet this evil, it had struck the committee, that the best way to remedy it would be to lower the duty, so as to take away from the smuggler the temptation to smuggle, by reducing his profits so much below the risk, as to render his ruin certain, if he continued the employment. This idea he was ready to adopt; but as the revenue could not admit of so great a diminution, it would be necessary to find a substitute. The amount of the duty upon tea was at present between 7 and 800,000*l.* annually. It was his intention, not to raise on tea in future more than 169,000*l.* so that there would be a deficiency of at least 600,000*l.* a year, to be provided for. By a fair statement of the expenses attending the smuggling trade, he clearly proved that the smuggler must sell at 40 per cent. above prime cost to be a gainer, so that it was not necessary to take off all the duties on tea to abolish smuggling. His plan, he said, was to clear it from excise, and to impose a custom duty;

On Congo	- - -	30 per cent.
On Singlo and Hyson	- - -	20 per cent.
On Souchong, &c.	- - -	15 per cent.
On Bohea	- - -	12½ per cent.

[These duties have since been altered.]

Having opened thus much of his plan, he proceeded, from various statements, to prove, that the quantity of tea imported into England legally and illicitly amounted to 12 millions annually, and he supposed the grown people of England about six millions; that of these, four millions he reckoned drank tea; and that one with another they consumed 4lb. of tea each annually; for every pound of which they now pay on an average 2s. 7d. duty. This duty being wholly or nearly taken off, the people could afford to pay to a substitute tax, which he proposed to raise on houses in the manner already inserted (p. 474). He calculated that in England there were houses

Under 7 windows each	- - -	286,206
From 8 to 20	- - -	211,483
11 Ditto	- - -	38,324
12 to 13	- - -	24,919
14 to 19	- - -	67,652
20 and upwards	- - -	52,652
In Scotland	- - -	17,734

Of these about 200,000, being of the lowest sort, would pay nothing; and tea being now among the luxuries as well as necessities of life, the occupiers would be substantially benefited. Other advantages to be expected from this new regulation, would be the abolition of smuggling, and the putting all the dealers in tea upon an equal footing, freeing them in a great measure from the unwelcome visits of excise-officers, and their customers from frauds and impositions of various kinds. Such would be the advantages to individuals; but to the E. I. Company, and the public at large, the benefit would be immense. Instead of vending five millions annually, the company will be enabled to vend 13 millions of lbs.; and instead of the small number of ships now employed in the China Trade, they will of course take 20 more into their service, by which an increase of 2000 seamen will be added to the naval strength of this kingdom, a consideration of no small weight to a commercial people. For his part, he said, he could foresee but two objections to this plan. The one, that the E. I. C. having the market to themselves, might avail themselves of the monopoly to raise the prices of their tea; the other, that persons holding more houses than one or two would be liable to pay an exorbitant duty if all their houses were to be paid for. To the first objection he answered, that the interest of the company would prevent their advancing the prices, as on that would depend the existence of smuggling, which it would be their interest to abolish; and to the other, a remedy might be applied, by stating a certain rate, beyond which no person should pay. He concluded by moving the duties as above to be laid upon tea, which see, p. 474.

Mr. Eden, as soon as the chancellor sat down, expressed his full approbation of the principle of the plan in general, whatever objections he might make hereafter to particular parts of it. He did not, he said, expect much immediate immediate benefit from the regulations proposed; for, as the warehouses on the continent were known to be stored with tea, the smugglers would not fail to pour in immense quantities, and sell even at a loss, rather than it should lie upon hand. He said, the continent consumed a very inconsiderable quantity of tea, in comparison to the consumption of that article in England; and that, if smuggling was prevented, and the importation solely confined to the E. I. Company, it would scarcely be worth while for any other nation to bring tea from China. He did not agree, he said, in all the calculations of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, but in most of them he did; and concluded with declaring, that, if those new regulations should prove unpopular, he should be ready to bear a part of the odium.

Mr. Gascoyne remarked, that tea-gardens ought particularly to be an object in these new regulations; and that in hospitals, where no window-tax was paid, there was a very great consumption of tea. He instanced Greenwich Hospital in particular.

Sir P. Burrell observed, that if gentlemen who occupied two houses only, and occasionally resided at each alternately, were to be charged to the full for both, these would certainly be losers, and not gainers, by this new regulation.

Mr. Pitt, to combat this objection, supposed a case in the extreme; that a gentleman should occupy one house in which there were 180 windows, and another in which there were 60; for the first he would be charged 20l. for the other 7l. a year. Now, the person in two such houses could not be estimated at less than 50; and if such were supposed to consume but 4 pounds of tea in the year, the gross duty would be 47l. and the saving, even in this extreme case, be 20l. annually.

Ld Surrey wished that some method could be thought of to relieve the middle class of people, who, to relieve themselves, would begin by shutting up their windows, and thus, by excluding both the light and the air, subject themselves to diseases, of which no man could foresee the consequences.

Mr. Rolle was for exempting the poor who received alms, and day-labourers in husbandry generally, from this tax.

Mr. Pitt replied, that 200,000 houses were allowed in his calculation for the poor; and if it were found possible to devise a method of equalizing the tax, he should be ready to adopt it, but he feared it would be impracticable. Some, rich in wealth and poor in spirit, would live with a very scanty proportion of air and light, and save their money; and others, of a contrary disposition, would distinguish themselves by a display of public spirit that would do honour to their dignity and character. A plan to regulate these irregularities he pronounced impossible.

Mr. Huffey approved of the principle, but doubted the ground on which the Rt. Hon. Chancellor had founded his calculations.

Mr. Dempster thought the plan a good one for those who drank tea; but a bad one for those who did not. It subjected the latter to a new tax, without taking an old one away. He wished a mode could be settled of rating houses according to their value, and not according to the number of their windows; for many houses in the distant counties, and particularly in Scotland had as many windows as houses of twenty times their value in and near London. The people in England might, perhaps, generally speaking, drink their tea cheap, while the people in Scotland would be made to pay for tea who never tasted it.

Mr. Rose (Sec. of the Treasury, and of the same country with the last speaker) made answer, that the Scotch would have very little cause to complain, as the whole amount of the house tax in that country was only 3000l. and the new tax was to be formed on the above calculation.

Mr. Sheridan did not dislike the principle; but denied the present minister the honour of devising the plan, which he ascribed to Ld John Cavendish, who had bills ready prepared to bring it forward. There was indeed some difference between them. The plan of the former was optional; that of the latter compulsory, for which reason he would not pledge himself to support it.

Mr. Jenkinson remarked, that a voluntary composition had succeeded in Holland; but no voluntary composition had ever succeeded in England, nor he believed ever would.

Many other objections were started; but in the general plan the whole house concurred, and the motions of the chancellor on each article carried without a division.

June 22.

Mr. Sec. Orde moved for leave to bring in a bill relative to the conveyance of official letters between this Kingdom and Ireland.

Mr. Eden objected to the motion, as unusual, without giving previous notice to the person who had brought forward the Act proposed to be altered.

Mr. Orde replied that the bill he moved for, when brought in, would be found to contain an explanation only of that to which the hon. gent. alluded. Leave was granted. No debate.

Mr. Dempster begged the attention of the house to a subject to which he never turned his thoughts without feeling the deepest concern. The state of the finances of this country was alarming. The immense aggregate of the national debt amounted, he said, to 280 millions; the interest of which was 9,500,000l. add to this 900,000l. for his majesty's civil list; 3 millions for the naval and military establishments of the year; and the whole annual expenditure would be found to rise to the amazing sum of 13,400,000l. the ways and means for defraying of which was,

For the land and malt taxes	2,500,000
The old taxes before the late war	6,500,000
The taxes imposed during the war	3,050,000
The produce of the taxes of last war	550,000

Making in all

12,600,000
which

which sum falls short of the expenditure to the full amount of 800,000 l. This prospect was the more distressing, as the sinking fund, from which some assistance might have been hoped, was totally absorbed. Four ways, however, appeared to him practicable to equalize the expenditure to the income: 1. by a reduction of our naval and military establishments; 2. by checking the progress of smuggling; 3. by laying on new taxes; and 4. by paying off part of the national debt. This last, after reading the treatises of Dr. Price and Mr. Sinclair (a member of that house), he would not despair of seeing accomplished. Gentlemen would probably be surprized when they were told how much might be done by the application of a single million; that in the small space of sixty years 217 millions might be annihilated thereby; and that by converting the 3 per cents. into 4 per cents, that million so to be applied might be raised. If this plan upon examination should appear to be founded, why not try the experiment? This, however, was not the sole object which government should have in view. The faculties of the public should be called forth; employment should, in the first instance, be found for those who, by the peace, had been discharged from the army and navy, and for those also who, by the check to be put to smuggling, will be thrown upon the world destitute; for those, he thought, the fisheries, if properly encouraged, an ample field for private gain, and might be extended so as to make it a mine of wealth to this country. In other respects, commerce might be much improved, by freeing it from the fetters by which it is restricted. The restraints on the coasting trade were grievous to an almost intolerable degree, particularly in Scotland, where trading vessels can hardly pass a ferry or a frith, without being obliged to have as many papers as are necessary even in time of war for the longest voyages. He thought a table of fees, as in England, would be a great relief; but a table of fees had been long solicited, but still withheld. He concluded with moving, that a committee be appointed, to inquire into the state of the British fisheries, the commerce and navigation of this kingdom; and to report the same from time to time to the house.

Several members rose, to second the motion.

Chas. of Exch. declared, that no man saw more clearly than himself the necessity of calling forth the faculties of the nation, and exploring all her resources; and did not look on these resources with despondency. He agreed with the Hon. Gent. so far as to own that the produce of the sinking fund had been absorbed by the exigences of the state in the last war; but it was not annihilated; on the contrary, by the means that would be taken for equalizing the expenditure and the revenue of this country, he did not despair of restoring the sinking fund to its most flourishing state. He was sensible likewise of the importance of appropriating a fund towards the reduction of the public debt; but he was not clear that the plans alluded to for that purpose were the best that could be adopted. They seemed to him to promise too much, and to have more of show than solidity in their accumulation. With respect to the motion, he had but one objection; it embraced too many objects at once; before any one of them could be carried into effect, a stop would be put to the whole by a prorogation. He wished therefore that the Hon. Gent. would leave commerce and navigation out of his motion, and confine it solely to the fisheries. As to the grievance complained of respecting the coasting trade, particularly in Scotland, it had been for some time under the consideration of government, and would probably be soon submitted to the house.

Mr. Hussey thought the Rt. Hon. Chancellor had misunderstood what Mr. Dempster had said of the sinking fund. He had not said that the fund itself was destroyed, but that it had been diverted from its original purpose.

Mr. Dempster did not think he had been much misunderstood, and was ready, if necessary, to go into calculations that would prove what he had asserted. As to what the Rt. Hon. Gentleman had said respecting the coasting trade in Scotland, it would have given him great satisfaction, if he had not known that similar assurances had been given by ministers almost every year, from 1718 to the present time; and therefore, unless a committee were appointed to take up the matter, he had very little hope of seeing it brought before the house. He had no objection, he said, to narrowing his motion, and confining it to the fisheries; but he was by no means convinced that it was right so to do.

Mr. Hussey was in hopes that, by confining it to the fisheries, something might be done. And he threw out a hint, that a sum for experiment might be raised, by lowering the interest in the public funds.

Mr. Pitt reprobated the very idea of such a reduction. The justice and honour of the nation forbid it. No minister should dare to propose it.

Mr. Hussey thought so himself, and only threw out the salvo to give the Hon. Gent. an opportunity of scouting it [a laugh throughout the house]. The motion (as narrowed) passed unanimously.

Chas. of Exch. brought up his bill for checking smuggling, which was read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Eden complained of being refused the lists at the proper office of those who had paid the servants tax. He understood, that, though there were a million of masters in the kingdom, only about 40,000 of them had paid the servants tax. The evasions, every one must know, must be great. He therefore moved, that lists of those who paid might be laid before the house.

Sr James Johnston was earnest to know why the Rt. Hon. Gent. had not done justice to Scotland, where the tax had been punctually paid.

Mr.

Mr. Eden begged the Hon. Baronet's pardon. It had slipped his memory. He had, indeed, then readily shown the lists—probably, because there had been little trouble in making them out, for very few had paid the tax in Scotland.

The motion passed without debate.

Capt. John Luttrell then brought forward Mr. Phillips's petition (see p. 617.) by moving, "That it be referred to the Committee of Supply." In support of the motion, he caused a letter from Capt. Wilson, of the Race-horse ship of war on the coast of Africa, to be read, which was much in favour of the powders.

Alderm. Sarsbridge said, he had made many trials with it, and found it answer in none.

Mr. Storer had talked with several officers who had made trial of it, and it had failed with them.

Capt. Luttrell said, that Sir Richard Hughes had experienced the good effects of it on the Leward Islands station, where great havoc had been made on shore by weavels and other vermin, while the provisions on board the ships had been preserved by means of the powders.

Some members expressed their wishes, that the report might be re-assumed before the petition should be referred to the Committee of Supply; to which Capt. Luttrell consented.

June 24.

The order of the day being read, for the House to go into a committee on the bill for empowering Sir Ashton Lever to dispose of his Museum by way of lottery; Mr. Stanley took the chair.

E. of Surrey objected to the sum of 42,000*l.* as meant to fill up the blank, as it was deceiving the public, by giving a tacit acknowledgment of the museum being worth so much, when perhaps, were it to be sold, it might not fetch half that sum: he therefore moved, that 21,000*l.* be inserted instead of 42,000*l.* This was negatived, as were several other sums proposed; and the original sum of 42,000*l.* was carried. Ed. Surrey objected on another ground, being apprehensive that the creditors of Sir Ashton might be injured by it: he was against vesting the property in trustees, who, the moment they were put in possession, would divest the creditors of their security.

Aldr. G. observed, that the case was the same. Were Sir Ashton to make sale of his museum, and put the money in his pocket, the creditors could not pursue what was no longer the property of their debtor.

Mr. Gascoyne jun. had seen a state of Sir Ashton's affairs, and believed his case stood perfectly clear of the consequences the noble Lord had suggested.

Lord Surrey did not deny this; but gave notice, that, unless the friends of the bill would consent to produce evidence that the museum was not incumbered, he would oppose the bill in its next stage.

Chan. of Exch. begged leave to direct the attention of the house to a motion he had to make relative to the affairs of the East India Company, to which motion, however, he expected no opposition. He had just learnt, that, as the case stood at present, the Company could make no dividend for the half-year now due without consent of Parliament. He believed no man would wish, for the sake of public credit, that there should be no dividend, however they might differ as to the quantum. He therefore would move for leave to bring in a Bill "for enabling the E. I. Company to make a dividend for the last half year." For his part, he wished the old dividend of 4 per cent. to be continued for the last half-year at least, however it might be reduced in future.

Mr. Eden confessed the awkwardness of the situation; for either the House must order no dividend at all to be made, or proceed without having before them the state of the Company's affairs, to settle the quantum of a dividend, which he could not consent to be so large as when the Company was in full credit. He thought 3 per cent. a great stretch of generosity!

Mr. Dundas wished, of all things, to deprecate a debate on the subject, which was of too delicate a nature to be roughly handled. Even private assertions unsupported, might do infinite prejudice to public credit. He was for no alteration of the dividend at this crisis.

Mr. Smith (chairman of the E. I. C.) observed, that were he in a few days to go in to the Court of Proprietors, and tell them they were to have no dividend, he would not be answerable for the consequences. The news would soon reach Holland, and gentlemen need not be told what would follow.

Mr. Fox was not against the Company's declaring a dividend; but thought it unreasonable to divide in the present embarrassed state of their affairs the same as in the days of their full prosperity.

Mr. Atkinson hoped, for many reasons, unconnected with the Company's affairs, the dividend might be continued. Holland would not be the only country that would take the alarm if the dividend were to be reduced. He dreaded the effects in every country with which we are connected.

Several other gentlemen delivered their opinion. The motion however was carried unanimously; and the bill, which was ready drawn, was brought in, and read, and ordered to be sent to committee to-morrow.

June 25.

The order of the day for going into a committee was read: and a motion having been made for the Speaker to leave the chair.

Mr. Eden rose, to state his objections. In the first place, the House had not considered that they were giving the Company leave to divide money not their own; and it was rather singular, that when the Company were unable to pay their bills, they should yet be allowed to divide upon their profits. There was another consideration which weighed weighted more forcibly with him. By law the Company are bound to pay certain sums to the King's ships, while their dividend continues at 8 per cent. per annum. Gentlemen might see to what extent this might lead.

Chanc. of Exch. expressed a willingness to word the bill in what manner the committee should chuse, provided they preserved the principle. He thought it dangerous to depart from the old mode for the present half year; and suggested an alteration, that instead of "the money to be divided be equal to 8 per cent. per annum." to say that it should not exceed 8 per cent. which would leave the company at liberty to divide less if they found it necessary. The bill then went through the committee, was reported; read the third time, passed, and sent to the lords.

Ld Beauchamp stated to the House the case of four regiments which ministers had thought proper to advise his Majesty to disband. He did not presume to call his Majesty's prerogative in question; but to submit the equitable claim which the officers of those regiments had to the humanity of the House for many years services performed for their country. He was aware that acts of grace and favour should come from the Crown, and therefore did not mean to state any motion, only to ask the secretary at war if Government intended to take their case into consideration.

Sec. at War said, the case of those officers well deserved the consideration of ministers; and when he said so much, the house might perceive it would not be neglected.

Mr. Pitt observed, that the reduction of those four regiments was not in consequence of the advice of the present, but of the late ministers; and he wondered, when they advised the measure, that they did not think proper to recommend their case to the House.

Gen. Burgoyne declared that he for one had mentioned their case, and what he had said was highly approved by the commander in chief (Gen. Conway) and by the country gentlemen then present.

Ld Beauchamp said, a provision for those officers would not amount to more than 7200l. a year which would lessen from time to time, as those officers should die or be otherwise provided for.

The House went into a committee of supply, and voted the extraordinaries of the army without debate.

The bill for the relief of insolvent debtors came next under consideration, at the instance of Ld Maitland, and passed likewise through the committee without debate.

The Chanc. of Exch. gave notice that he should open the Budget on Wednesday, and the House adjourned.

June 28.

The bill for allowing the E. I. Company to divide after the rate of 8 per cent. met with great opposition from Ld Loughborough and Ld Stormont in the H. of Lords;

In the H. of Commons, the House went into committee on a bill for enabling soldiers and sailors, who had served in the army or navy since the 1st of April 1763, to exercise trades in corporate towns without having previously obtained the freedom of such towns.

Sir James F. Balfour was for extending the privilege to all that had served in the militia and fencible regiments in Scotland, and who have been honourably discharged.

Mr. Medley was apprehensive, that if such an extension took place, so many persons would obtain parochial settlements, that the inhabitants would be overburthened with them. He proposed an amendment, and was for confining it to those of the militia who had been duly balloted.

Mr. Robinson thought the substitutes who had served, equally entitled to favour with those who had only found money; but this not appearing to be the sense of the House, he did not persist in pressing his opinion. And the motion was carried according to Mr. Medley's idea without farther debate.

Mr. Gilbert brought up the report of the Committee of Supply on the army estimates; which were read as follows;

2,360,992l. for extraordinaries.

75,116l. for reduced officers.

563l. for pensions to officers of horse reduced.

130,300l. for the same.

44,653l. for commissioned officers of British troops in America.

3,544l. for officers late in the service of the States General.

17000l. for pensions to widows.

686l. for pensions to widows of officers in the American service.

4,246l. for the charge of two regiments of foot from Ireland to Gibraltar.

10,524l. for additional to the three regiments of foot in 1783.

23,419l. for five battallions of Hanoverians.

6,291l. for staff officers in America and the West Indies.

Col. Fitzpatrick lamented, that he was not in the House on Friday, when a report was mentioned, as if a promise had been made by the late Administration to the officers of the six last reduced regiments, "that notwithstanding, by the Votes of the House, it appeared that the army was to be reduced to the 64th regiment, yet they might rest assured, that it would not take place lower than the 70th," this, he asserted the House, was false. No such promise was ever made, or intended to be made; but they considered the case of those officers, who had purchased at full price, as extremely hard; and he hoped the Rt. Hon. Gent. would see their case in the same light, and would take some steps towards giving them relief, that he, who by his office had been obliged to carry them the wrong way, might now be the messenger to glad tidings to give them comfort.

Ch.

Cb. of Exch. said, he mentioned the affair on Friday as a report, which he did not believe; and he was glad to hear it contradicted so much to his satisfaction.

The different sums were then put, and agreed to without a division.

Mr. Wrexall pressed the minister strongly on the necessity of bringing forward his bill for regulating the affairs of India. Tippoo-saib, he said, was in arms in the Carnatic, and the French had been slow in withdrawing their troops from his assistance. A proof of their perfidy was the detaining 400 of our troops in Pondicherry. Unless something was speedily done for the regulation of that country, he predicted, that it would soon be lost for ever. He was severe on the Directors of the Company, whom he believed to be lethargic from principle as well as from nature.

Cb. of Exch. replied, that his promised bill would soon be ready, and that the Company's affairs was intended for to-morrow; but, on account of the Wednesday's business, must be postponed to Friday.

Tuesday, June 29.

Ordered, that the papers presented by Mr. Morton, from the E. I. Company, on the 25th, be taken into consideration on Friday next. And

Mr. Scot moved for minutes of the Council of Bengal, relative to the reduction of the Bengal army, which were ordered. This day the House dispatched a great deal of parliamentary business without debate.

Wednesday, June 30.

Mr. Martyn, seeing several peers in the House, apologized for not moving to turn them out. It was natural, he said, for Lords as well as Commoners, to feel themselves deeply interested in the business of the day, and he had no inclination to shut them out; and the less so, as he intended to put in execution a design he had formed of demanding admittance into that part of the House, which is open to Commoners who have the honour of being related to the peerage.

Mr. Dempster said, that a few days ago, wanting to get into the H. of Peers, he had asked one of the door-keepers, whether he might not get admittance at that end of the House where the Throne stands, the answer was, "By no means, sir."

The cry of the House, was general, Move! move! on which

Mr. Hamet rose, to request the Hon. Member not to enforce the order, as he understood some intimation had been given, that the Lords intended to provide accommodations for the Peers of the Lower House [Here was a general laugh].

Mr. Hamet said, he possibly might have said something ridiculous, and should be glad to be informed what it was. [This raised a still louder laugh.]

Mr. Martyn said, he had been informed a noble Lord, a member of the Upper House, intended some time ago to move, that a gallery should be erected for the use of the members of the H. of Commons; but, independent of that, he wished the House would not now press him to move.

At that instant the Chancellor of the Exchequer came into the House, which immediately resolved itself into committee of ways and means, Mr. Gilbert in the chair.

Mr. Pitt began by expressing his concern, that, after the nation had for some time tasted the blessings of peace, he should still find it necessary to lay heavy burdens on the people. His consolation, he said, was, that he had not made the necessity, but found it. The task which his office threw upon him was nevertheless unpopular, but he trusted to the candour of the House in what he had to propose. He then entered into an accurate statement of the several sums which were necessarily to be provided for, and of the sums that had already been voted.

The money to be provided for he stated as follows:

For the Navy, - - - - -	3,153,869
Ordnance, - - - - -	610,149
Army, - - - - -	3,640,814
Deficiencies to be made good, - - - - -	1,676,647
To cancel Exchequer Bills, - - - - -	2,500,000
Levant Company, Museum, &c. - - - - -	11,831
Somerset-house, - - - - -	25,000
Foreign Plantations, - - - - -	2,164,250
To the Civil List, - - - - -	120,000
	<hr/>
	14,362,760

Of which sum he meant to borrow only six Millions; and to do that on the lowest terms, the best way, he thought, was by competition. There were, he said, two sets proposed, and he had accepted of that which afforded the most advantageous terms to the public, and had pledged himself most religiously and faithfully to adhere to his plan, without favour or affection to any person whatever. The terms which had been accepted he stated as follows.

100 l. of 3 per cents. taken at - - - - -	57	12	6
50 l. of 4 per cents. - - - - -	37	8	9
5 s. 6 d. of a long annuity, value - - - - -	4	17	11½
These together amounted to £	99	19	2½

And this in fact was all that the public had to pay; but it was not all that the money-lenders were to receive. The lottery ticket was not out of the public pocket, but it was a valuable douceur.

The 3-5ths of a lottery ticket was valued at

- - - - -	2	8	0
£	102	7	2½

And according to the terms of payment in his motion, the discount would amount to 1 7 2

Therefore the whole sum thus stated would be for every 100 l. 103 14 4½

These, he said, were in his mind terms ample and sufficient for the money-lender, and beneficial to the public. He thought that the competition had been productive of much good. (See p. 541.)

[To be continued.]

F O R E I G N I N T E L L I G E N C E.

Letters from Smyna of the 1st of June bring melancholy accounts of the raging of the plague in that city, where 3 or 400 die daily; many of the neighbouring villages are quite depopulated, and no man living remembers so general a calamity.

By Letters from Clevis, of a late date, a camp is marked out for 20,000 Prussian soldiers, who are expected to occupy it some time this month. It is supposed his Prussian majesty has some secret project in view.

Hamburgb, June 15. A few days ago a singular incident occasioned the death of a young couple. The lady going to the church of the Augustin Friars, knelt down near a Mausoleum, ornamented with divers figures in marble, among which was that of Death, armed with a scythe. A small piece of the scythe, being loose, fell on the hood of the lady's mantelet. On her return home, she mentioned the circumstance as a matter of indifference to her husband, who, being a credulous and superstitious man, cried out, in a terrible panick, that it was a presage of the death of his dear wife. The same day, he was seized with a violent fever, took to his bed, and died. The disconsolate lady was so affected at the loss, that she was taken ill, and soon followed him. They were both interred in the same grave; and their inheritance, which was very considerable, fell to some very distant relations.

Venice, June 10. The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic was the most magnificent ever seen here in the course of the present century; there were more than 120 gondolas on the water on this occasion, which, with the men of war, &c. made a most splendid appearance. The squadron under command of Monf. Emo sailed the 4th, consisting of four ships above 50 guns, and three others; the grand squadron, under command of Admiral Antony Melo, has not yet put to sea, though it is daily expected to proceed against Tunis. Venice has not had so formidable a squadron on foot for many years.

A Letter from Rome of the 6th of May says, "The Pope has ordered all the estates of a young Duke to be seized and confiscated, who has fled from Rome to avoid marrying a young lady of quality whom he had abused under a promise of marriage."

Vienna, July 12. The magistrates of Buda in Hungary, having requested leave to erect a statue of the present Emperor, received an answer to the following purport, written by his majesty's own hand.—"When all prejudices are laid aside, and when narrow systems shall have given place to sounder notions; when every individual shall be enabled, by his industry, to contribute with pleasure to the necessities of the state; when agriculture shall flourish, and prosperity universally prevail; when the laws shall have their full force, the arts become general; when science shall have enlightened men's minds, and emulation shall have given life to every class of citizens; then, then let a statue be raised to me; but not now, when the city of Buda has received no extraordinary advantages from me, except in the circulation of its products, which is alike beneficial to commerce throughout the empire. JOSEPH II."

Vienna, July 24. Yesterday arrived in this capital the Prince Bishop of Osnabrug, accompanied by Gen. Grenville, and Sir Rob. Murray Keith, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from his Britannic Majesty to the Imperial Court, who went to Molt, to meet his Royal Highness.

Madrid, July 12. The expedition against Algiers, under the command of Don Antonio de Barcelo, consisting of 230 sail, left Carthagera on the 28th of last month; and after remaining two days in sight of the harbour, proceeded towards their destination the 30th in the evening, with a fair wind.

Madrid, July 19. A courier arrived from Don Antonio Barcelo on the 9th, with letters dated the 13th instant, from which we learn, that the combined fleet was at anchor in the bay of Algiers, and that the first attack had been made upon the place on the 12th in the morning: that the Algerines did not come out to meet the assailants, as had been expected; but their gun-boats (60 in number) were drawn up without the walls of the town, ready to receive them: that the Spaniards had sunk four of the enemy's gun-boats, and that a fire had been observed in the town, which broke out at ten o'clock in the morning, and burnt till past four in the afternoon: that the principal loss sustained by the assailants was from the bursting of one of the Spanish bombs, by which two officers and six men were killed; and a gun-boat, the crew of which were Neapolitans, blew up some hours after the action. A second attack was to take place on the 13th. [See a plan of Algiers in our vol. XLX. p. 497.]

Carthagera, July 27. The day before yesterday and yesterday our armament destined against Algiers was in view coming into this port. It seems a strong East wind obliged them in great haste, and with the loss of several anchors and cables, to quit the bay of Algiers, after having been there 14 days, opposed by high and contrary winds and a rough sea; besides which, they had to defend themselves against 60 Algerine gun-boats, which were drawn up in the best order within half a gun-shot of the works of the place, and were anchored in the most advantageous manner possible to oppose the bombardment. Don Barcelo could only bombard the place eight times, from all of which, except the first, he retired with loss, and without damaging the place. It is reckoned he had 100 men killed on board his fleet. The undertaking

Genl. MAG. August, 1784.

dertaking had another hindrance, which was not foreseen, namely, a disagreement among the commanders, which was carried to far between Don Barcelo and Major Moreno, the commander of the Maltese galleys, and some other principal officers, that they at last almost refused to obey his orders; so that this expensive expedition has been attended with as little success as that against Gibraltar.

Copenhagen, July 30. The subterraneous fire which was discovered for the first time on the 7th of June 1783, in the westerly parts of Skaptofields Seydell, on a mountain called Shapton-Glover, has since that period made so rapid a progress, that it extends now 20 leagues distant from the above mountain, to the S. S. W. nor has it yet subsided. This subterraneous firey furnace measures above four leagues in breadth. The large river of Scaptaga, whose depth was in most places from seven to eight fathoms, is entirely dried up. On the E. the fire broke out nearly at the same period in the river called Huer-vissodt. The combustible torrent then took its direction towards the sea, and over several large districts, so that the extent of the territories over-run by the fire measures above 30 leagues from E. to W. A few of the inhabitants still remain, but reduced to all the extremities of want and famine; the sulphureous vapours which last year infested the country having spoiled the hay and other provenders so as to occasion the total destruction of their cattle.

Warsaw, July 30. Accounts from Petersburg say, that the differences between the king of Prussia and the city of Danzig have been terminated to the satisfaction of the king, and in some respects to that of the city.

Hague, July 11. On Thursday last the States of Holland, West-Friesland, &c. sent a solemn deputation to his Serene Highness the Stadtholder, the object of which was to represent to his Most Serene Highness, that the wish of the nation being that the duke of Brunswick be dismissed from his employments, and retire from the territory of the republic, his Most Serene Highness would persuade the field-marshal to demand himself his dismissal, and in that case their Noble and Great Mightinesses would use their influence that he may preserve his appointments.

Hague, July 15. The answer which his Serene Highness was pleased to return to the above requisition, concludes thus: "I cannot prevail upon myself to comply with the desires of the deputies; in fine, I here repeat the declaration I have made before, that nothing can give me more satisfaction than the restoration of peace and harmony in this country upon solid grounds, and conformable to the principles of the constitution; but I am convinced the dismissal of the Duke cannot contribute to the re-establishment of that harmony so much to be desired.

(Signed) G. PRINCE OF ORANGE."

Hague, Aug. 19. The States of Holland and West Friesland came to a final resolution on the 18th to dismiss his Serene Highness the Duke of Brunswick-Lunenburgh, field-marshal in the service of the republic, from all his employments; and that his appointments arising therefrom shall cease from the 31st of next December.

The States General have returned an answer to the demands of the Emperor (see p. 548); but so unwilling are those of Holland and West Friesland to have them transpire, that the editors of the Hague Gazette having published the first two articles of the demands with the answers, and promised the rest in course, the counsellors of the committee sent an order to discontinue it.

The court of Versailles continues to interpose its good offices to effect an accommodation of the differences subsisting between his Imperial Majesty and the States General. The Marquis de Noailles, principal minister of his Most Christian Majesty, last week held a conference with Prince Kaunitz, and then produced a conciliatory plan, which, in the opinion of the King his master, is founded in justice and equity.

Paris, July 16. The King of Sweden has taken leave of this court, and fixed Sunday next for his departure. There is no private treaty concluded between this Court and that of Sweden. It is true, the Northern monarch wished for an establishment in the West-Indies; but no island could be found there that would suit his majesty. (Advice has since been received of his safe arrival at Stockholm.)

Paris, July 30. There is a young stranger in this city, whose language nobody here understands; but he is supposed to be a native of Otaheite, and probably the mystery will be soon explained by Mr. Bougainville.

Naples, July 3. The British Squadron under the command of Commodore Sir John Lindsay, consisting of the Trusty, Thetis, Andromache, Sphinx, and Rattlesnake, anchored in this bay on the 17th. On its arrival, the King of Naples was pleased to command that it should be immediately admitted to Prattick, notwithstanding the quarantine lately laid on all ships from whatever quarter they should come.

The King and Queen having previously signified to the Commodore their intention of honouring the Squadron with a visit, their majesties set out on the 24th in the morning from the Galley mole, attended by Gen. Acton, and several other officers of the court, and by the captains of the Squadron, in their respective barges. As soon as their Majesties were at a little distance from the shore, all the ships manned their yards, except the Sphinx and Rattlesnake, which being dressed with colours, displayed them at the same instant the others manned; and after they were on board the Trusty, all the rest of the Squadron fired a royal salute.

Their

Their Majesties visited the ship above and below, and then the King went into the Commodore's barge, and visited all the other ships of the Squadron, returning again to the Trusty. On leaving the Squadron, their Majesties were saluted by all the ships with 21 guns each; and the Commodore with the Captain had the honour of dining with their Majesties on shore, and the following day on board the King's yacht, which, with two of the King's galleys, was dressed with colours after the English manner, the English flag being at the yacht's foremast head.

At dinner on board the yacht their Sicilian Majesties drank the health of the King and Queen of Great Britain, when a royal salute was immediately fired from the yacht and the two galleys. Their Majesties, during the dinner, were pleased repeatedly to express their satisfaction at seeing an English Squadron in the bay of Naples, and appeared desirous by every means in their power to manifest their friendship for his Britannick Majesty.

His Sicilian Majesty having fixed on Thursday the 28th of July to honour the Squadron again with his presence, and to see a few evolutions performed in the bay, his Majesty, attended by General Acton and the officers of the court, arrived at the time appointed; and the ships, being in all respects prepared, slipped their cables, and sailed in good order about o'clock with a very fine sea breeze.

The exercising of the Squadron began immediately, and such manœuvres as could be performed by so small a number of ships were executed at half past two o'clock. His Majesty was pleased to honour the Commodore with his company at dinner, when the Commodore took an opportunity to drink the Queen's health, and fired a royal salute from the whole Squadron.

About four o'clock the evolutions recommenced, and were continued until half past six, when the ships resumed their former anchoring stations in the bay of Naples. The several manœuvres of the Squadron were honoured with repeated expressions of applause by his Sicilian Majesty. He was saluted on his coming on board and going on shore by all the ships, with 21 guns each, and attended on both occasions by the captain in their respective barges.

EAST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.

MR. URBAN, Aug. 21.

Having obtained from a jurymen at Calcutta an authentic Copy of Sir WILLIAM JONES'S FIRST CHARGE TO THE JURY, after he had taken his seat in the Supreme Court of Judicature, I am happy in embracing the earliest opportunity of communicating it to the publick through your excellent Magazine. Yours, &c. N.X.

GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY,

"IT may, perhaps, be sufficient if my address to you this day were confined to some short remarks on those offences of which the prisoners named in the Calendar are accused; but such is the peculiarity of my own situation, that I cannot help feeling an inclination to take a wider range. Five years have elapsed since the seat which I have now the honor to fill became vacant; and in that interval so many important events have happened in India, and so many interesting debates have been held in the parliament of Britain, on the powers and objects of this Judicature, that I may naturally be expected to touch at least, tho' not to enlarge, on those events, all of which I have attentively considered; and on the result of those debates, at most of which I was present. Such expectations, if such have been formed, I should be very loth to disappoint; and as I shall express my sentiments without reserve, you will hear them, I am confident, with perfect candor. None of you will, I hope, suspect me of political zeal for any set of ministers in England, with which vice my mind has never been infected; nor of political attachments here, which in my station it will ever behove me to disclaim; if, in the character of a Magistrate appointed to preserve the public tranquillity, I congratulate you, who are assembled to enquire into all violations of it, on the happy prospect of a general peace in every part of the world with which our country is connected. The certain fruits of this pacification will be, the revival and extension of commerce in all the dependencies of Britain; the improvement of agriculture and manufactures; the encouragement of industry and civil virtues, by which her revenues will be restored, and her navy strengthened; her subjects enriched, and herself exalted; but it is to India that she looks for the most splendid, as well as the most substantial of those advantages, nor can she be disappointed, as long as the supreme executive and judicial powers shall concur in promoting the public good, without danger of collision, or diminution of each other's dignity; without impediment on the one side to the operations of government, or on the other to the administration of justice. The institution, gentlemen, of this court appears to have been misrepresented. It was not, I firmly believe, intended as a censure on any individuals who exist, or have existed. Legislative provisions have not the individual for their object, but the species, and are not made for the convenience of the day, but for the regulation of ages. Whatever were the reasons for its first establishment, of which I may not be so perfectly apprized, I will venture to assure you, that it has been continued for one obvious reason: that an extensive dominion without a complete and independent judicature would be a phenomenon of which the history of the world affords no example. Justice must be administered with the strictness, or society cannot long subsist. It is a truth coeval with human nature, not peculiar to any age, or country, that power is in the hands of men will prepared for any event. We are induced therefrom to apprehend that the negotiation for peace does not promise so much success as first appearances led to expect.

We have had a late letter from Lieut. Anderson, which acquaints us that Sindia has been advised by Nana Furnavese, that his letter to Tippoo on the 21st October had been received, but not yet answered; and that the steps which Tippoo has since taken, particularly in the recall of his vakeel from Poonah, are such as leave Nana little or no hopes of his acquiescence in the treaty. In the event of a renewal of hostilities, it will rest with the Select Committee at Bombay, to concert measures with the ministers at Poonah for conducting the war, and to furnish the troops necessary to the part which we take in it: we will furnish them with money as far as we can.

Your detachment under Col. Morgan was arrived at a place called Ekayah*, on the 14th of last month, and it was expected could be at the banks of the Junna by the end of it.

We have appointed Mr. Richard Johnson to be our Resident with the Nabob Nizam Ally Cawn. Mr. Bristow has received his orders of recall; and was to leave the Vizier's court as soon as his Excellency had given the security of creditable bankers for the amount of the balance due from him to the Company, and the current kits.

On the 20th of last month the Honourable the Governor General informed us of a desire entertained by the Vizier, his Minister, and all the principal persons of his family and court, that he should proceed to Lucknow; and, expecting a declaration of this wish from the Nabob himself, made an early tender of his services for that purpose, whenever an invitation from the Vizier should arrive, in order to regulate the Company's interests in the province of Oude, and afford to Nabob Vizier the like assistance for the regulation of his. We are not able to explain in this short abstract all the reasons that have led to this proposal—they will appear in our advices by the packet under dispatch directed to Europe, by your ship Lord Macartney. The Governor General's offer has been conditionally agreed to; and we are in daily expectation of the letter from the Vizier.

We have been this day informed that security has been given by the Vizier for the sum of Lucknow sicca rupees 1,03,84,420 being the balance due from his Excellency to the Company as well as for the subsidy, and other current demands of the present year, according to a statement adjusted by Mr. Bristow; part is to be paid in the course of this year 1191, and the remainder in the next year 1192 Fullullee; Lala Butchrause and Faquin Ohund having entered into engagements for this purpose, which are deposited with Mr. Wombwell.

We have the honour to be, &c.

WARREN HASTINGS,
EDWARD WHELER,
JOHN STABLES.

P. S. Advice has been received this day, that the detachment under Col. Morgan was advanced, on the 23d ult. as far as Noon Querai, which is about twelve coss from Gualcar.

From the London Gazette.

Extract of a Letter from the President and Council of Bombay, to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors of the East India Company, transmitted to the Right Hon. Lord Sydney, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the home department. Dated Bombay-Castle, April 7, 1784. Received over Land, Aug. 3.

A few hours after we had closed our accompanying address of the 31st ult. on the 1st instant, we were informed, by advices from Lieutenant-Colonel Barry of the 12th, that the treaty of peace between the Hon. Company and the Nabob Tippoo Sultan had been actually signed the night before.

Yesterday, by the return of the Scorpion from Tellicherry, we received two letters from the Commissioners, Mess. Staunton and Huddleston, of the 12th and 18th ultimo, inclosing a copy of the treaty itself, and an address to the Hon. the Court of Directors, which we now have the honour to transmit with this.

We embrace this early opportunity of congratulating your honours on this happy event having at length taken place, and of peace being restored to your settlements in India.

Heads of the above Treaty.

Preliminary Declaration that the English Commissioners act under full powers from the Governor-General and Council. Tippoo Sultan signs the Treaty himself.

Article I. Peace and friendship immediately to take place between Tippoo and the English, and their respective allies. No assistance to be given in future by either party to the enemies of the other.

II. Immediately after the signing the Treaty, the Carnatic to be evacuated, and all the prisoners, European and Native, to be released in 30 days. The Company to release the prisoners taken by them from Tippoo.

III. Immediately after signing the Treaty, the English to deliver up all the places they have taken from Tippoo.

IV. When the prisoners are released and delivered, the English to give up the fort and district of Cananore; and at the same time Ambourgin and Satgur to be delivered by Tippoo to the English.

V. No future claim to be made upon the Carnatic by Tippoo.

VI. All natives carried away from the Carnatic

* This place is in Rennell's map called Ekac, and lies in near latitude 25.

Carnatic by Hyder Ally Cawn during the late war, to be permitted to return to their dwellings in the Carnatic and Tanjore; and, in like manner, all subjects of Tippoo Sultan to be permitted to return to his country.

VII. This being the happy period of general peace and reconciliation, the Nabob Tippoo Sultan Bahadre, as a testimony and proof of friendship to the English, agrees that the Rajahs or Zemindars on his coast, who have favoured the English in the late war, shall not be molested on that account.

VIII. Tippoo Sultan confirms all commercial privileges hitherto granted to the English.

IX. Tippoo restores the Factory of Callicut, and the districts about Tillicherry.

X. The Treaty to be signed and sealed by Commissioners, and returned by the President and Select Committee of Fort St. George, within one month, or sooner if possible; and acknowledged by the Governor-General and Council and the Government of Bombay, and a copy returned in three months, or sooner if possible.

Signed, on the 11th of March, 1784, by

ANTHONY SADLER,

GEORGE LEONARD STAUNTON,

JOHN HUDDLESTONE.

(Signed) TIPPOT SULTAN BAHADRE.

ADVICES from AMERICA.

New Providence (New England). The question, which has been long agitated, was, on June 28, again solemnly debated in the general assembly of this State (Whether this State will vest Congress with a power to levy an impost of 5 per cent. on all goods imported from foreign parts?) and negatived by a great majority. At the same time, they passed an act for levying and paying into the public treasury the sum of 20 000l.; and likewise an act for adding one half per cent. to the state impost of 2 per cent. on all importations from foreign parts.

The general assembly of Massachusetts have passed a duty of 4d. a ton on all foreign vessels, to be paid to the naval officers where they shall clear out.

It is said, that no less than 2000 families have emigrated from the Thirteen United Provinces, and taken refuge in the new State of Vermont, the people of which are now at open war with the State of New-York; and, notwithstanding every effort of Congress, they find it impossible to keep their subjects at home, such is the grievous oppression of their taxes, and the weakness of their government.

By a proclamation of the Spanish governor at the Havana, St. Augustine is declared to be a free port.

In the senate of Virginia, on the 26th of June, it was resolved, that Great Britain had made an infraction of the 7th article of the treaty of peace, by not restoring the slaves and negroes, and other property of the United States; and that a just regard to the national honour, requires that this assembly do withhold their co-operation in the compleat fulfilment of the said treaty, until reparation be made. And that, as soon as reparation shall be made, all such acts of the legislature as inhibit the recovery of British debts shall be repealed. An amendment was proposed, for manifesting to the world the justice and regard of the citizens of this Commonwealth, by repealing forthwith all such laws, and leaving it to Congress to enquire into the breach of the peace by Great Britain. The amendment was negatived, and the original motion carried, 13 to 6. On which a protest was entered, signed by the six dissenting members.

A prohibition has taken place in S. Carolina of the exportation of rice, corn, and peas, for one month from the 25th inst., on account of the severe drought we have had for some time past. Rice is risen to 2rs. per 100lb. but scarcely any to be got, being almost all exported, or on board vessels waiting to compleat their cargoes.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

On Monday the 26th inst. the house of James Harrington, Esq; of Moniffeed, in the county of Wexford, was broke open by villains armed with blunderbusses and pistols, who cut and wounded Mr. Harrington (upwards of 70 years old) in several parts of the head; when they got lights, they searched for his daughter, a young lady, who escaped from her bed into a vault; they afterwards obliged the father to give them his keys, and carried off cash, jewels, plate, &c. to the value of 500l. Maj. Channey, with a party of the Rockingham Volunteers, pursued them thro' Wexford, Carlow, Wicklow, and Kildare, and at last came in sight of them near Catterdermot, when the villains quitted their horses, and concealed themselves in a corn field, where two of them were found, who delivered up their arms, and surrendered. One of them, named Ramsay, formerly had a good property in Tullow, but is said lately to have been concerned in many robberies in the county of Kildare, &c. before he was taken he had made away with his part of the booty; but on the other were found 37 guineas and a half in gold and three in silver, a fine piece of linen, the gold case of Miss Harrington's watch, several pieces of lace, and her father's pocket-book, in which were several bills and notes."

At a full meeting of the Rathdowny Volunteers, held on Sunday August 1, the following resolutions were unanimously agreed to: "Resolved, That we shall ever maintain unshaken loyalty to our much respected Sovereign, and veneration for our excellent constitution.

"Resolved, That this kingdom has been very materially injured by the constant importation and too general use of foreign manufactures.

"Resolved, That it is our duty at this crisis

eris to accede to that non-consumption agreement which has been so universally adopted throughout this kingdom.

“Resolved, therefore, That we will not purchase for ourselves or families any other than Irish manufactures, until the legislature shall have established some proper and permanent encouragement for the commerce, trade, and manufactures of this kingdom.”

In consequence of the breach of this agreement, a great number of respectable citizens have been pulled out of bed in the night, stripped and barbarously flogged; and afterwards tarred and feathered, a punishment as common now in Ireland as it was formerly in America. Not a day passes but some outrage or other is committed either by the military, the mob, or the volunteers, so that Dublin is at present the theatre of riot and licentious delinquency.

At a meeting of the Independent Dublin Volunteers, the following resolutions were agreed to:

“Resolved unanimously, That we behold with the highest indignation and concern the unjustifiable conduct of certain officers in his Majesty’s army on the night of Monday the 2d instant*, who indecently and abusively attacked the wife and person of a citizen of this metropolis; and at the same time committed the most flagrant violation of the laws by acts of outrage and riot, disgraceful to the soldier and the gentleman, and subversive of the peace and security of the public.

“Resolved unanimously, That, from the complexion of the times, we think it incumbent on us to invoke all our fellow-citizens, not yet disciplined, to immediately join us and learn the use of arms.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, Aug. 13.

Came on to be tried, before the High Court of Justiciary, George Hutchinson and Peter Brown, journeymen bakers, and John Atkinson, shoemaker, charged with assembling in a riotous manner on the night of the 26th of February, and giving Wm. Wallace, late servant to the Lord Chief Baron a mortal blow, of which he died; also for attacking, beating, and abusing passengers in the High-Street on the said night. Ld Braxfield summed up the evidence; and the jury returned their verdict unanimously, finding the homicide not proven against the pannels, but unanimously finding them actors art and part in the riot libelled on. The Court sentenced them to be imprisoned in the Tolbooth till Wednesday the 25th inst. and on that day to be whipped through the Cannongate, receiving five stripes each at four different places, and then to be set at liberty.

PORT NEWS.

Chichester, Aug. 14. As an Excise-officer and a party of light-horse were looking out in the evening after some smugglers, two gentlemen of this city (Mr. Tupper and Mr. Gillam) passed them on the opposite side; and one of the officers observing to the soldiers that Mr. Gillam was a noted smuggler, two of them instantly fired, and shot him dead. On Sunday the Coroner’s Inquest sat on the body, and brought in their verdict Wilful Murder; and the supposed murderers were apprehended and committed to Hortham gaol.

Chatham, Aug. 15. The military here have interested themselves in a quarrel that has lately happened between the Majors Johnston and Campbell, of the marine corps; when, it is said, the latter gave the former the lye, and the former gave the latter a beating; on which a challenge ensued, which Col. Innis prevented taking effect, by putting them under arrest. A Court Martial was summoned to enquire into the affair; but Major Campbell having objected against being tried by the officers of his own regiment, the matter has been referred to the board of Admiralty.

Deal, Aug. 5. A desperate rencounter happened between a party of smugglers and the revenue officers, who were in pursuit of a lugger suspected of carrying on an illicit trade; in which a seaman belonging to the ship Scout, Capt. Lindsay, was shot dead. A proclamation has since been issued out, for discovering and apprehending any of the persons concerned in the same, and also in a like affair which happened at Deal on the 16th; past and a reward of two hundred pounds, with his Majesty’s free pardon, to the informer, offered for each person on conviction.

Amsterdam, Aug. 3. The E. I. Company have dispatched seven ships for Batavia and the Cape, which sailed the 24th of last month. Eleven more are in readiness.

Portsmouth, Aug. 1. By the ingenuity of Messrs Brathwaite and sons, we have once more the satisfaction of seeing the main sheet anchor of the Royal George safely delivered into the King’s yard. It weighs 98 hundred weight, perhaps the heaviest in the known world. They make no doubt of weighing up the ship. By means of their machine, they can work under water for several hours together.

Gosport, Aug. 11. The Ganges of 74, Stately of 64, Director of 64, and the Grampus of 50 guns, destined for the East Indies, are ordered to be coppered.

Scilly, Aug. 11. This morning passed by, to the westward, a Dutch Squadron of five men of war.

Portsmouth, Aug. 13. The Hebe frigate. Capt. Keppel, late on a cruise, fell in with seven French men of war, manœuvring in the Channel.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Canterbury, Aug. 5. At a monthly meeting of the Mayor and Justices of this city, an information was exhibited against a person for for letting a horse to hire to draw a two-wheel chaise without being licensed; when the same was decided to be within the Post Horse Act, and the person was convicted accordingly. The penalty was 5*l.* but as it appeared to proceed from ignorance, it was mitigated to 50 shillings. This seems, however, to be carrying the rigour of the laws to the extreme.

Felons capitally convicted at the late assizes in the Country.

At Aylesbury, one Joseph Radley, not 18 years of age, who, before his execution, confessed robberies committed by him to the amount of more than 300*l.*

At Bury	5	Maidstone	0
Chelmsford	0	Montgomery	1
Cumberland	3	Newcastle	2
Devon	6	Northumberl.	3
Derby	4	Norwich	10
Durham	2	Salisbury	6
Dorchester	4	Stafford	4
Exeter	0	Shrewsbury †	14
Guilford	6	Worcester	5
Gloucester *	15	Winchester	9
Hereford	7	Wells	4
Lincoln	10	York	6
Loughborough	5

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

June 24.

A remarkable trial came on in the Court of Common Pleas, in which one Levi, a Jew, was plaintiff, and Messrs. Williams and Bennet, constables, were defendants. The action was for false imprisonment, in taking the plaintiff into custody, on suspicion of receiving the great seal of England, knowing it to be stolen; but there appearing very strong circumstances of guilt, and one witness (Miss Lloyd) swearing that the plaintiff actually bought the seal of her and melted it down; the jury gave a verdict with one shilling damages to the plaintiff, and each party to pay their own costs. The constables took the plaintiff into custody without a warrant.

* At this assize came on the long depending cause of the Dean of St. Asaph (see vol. LII.), for a libel. On this occasion the doctrine of Ld. Mansfield was strongly combated by Mr. Erskine, counsel for the defendant, and as strongly defended by Mr. Bencroft. The fact of publishing being fully proved, the judge [Buller] told the jury, that they must at all events convict the defendant, the doctrine established by Ld. M. being now so settled as law, that it was improper to stir it. The jury withdrew, and brought in their verdict guilty of publishing libel. The judge told them the word only should be left out. Mr. Erskine insisted on its remaining; and an altercation ensued, which ended in the jury's insisting, that they found the Dean guilty of publishing the pamphlet; but as to its being a libel, they did not say that.

† Among these were the Dunstons (brothers), see p. 471. who are said to be hung in chains.

GEORGE, MAG. Aug. 1784.

June 25.

The Hanoverian regiments of Geldacker and prince Ernest, which have been in barracks at Plymouth these two years, embarked for Germany. Their behaviour, as soldiers, was exemplary, and the inhabitants parted with them reluctantly.

June 30.

Mr. Pitt rose, to open what is called the budget for the present year. And having stated the money to be provided for, as mentioned p. 624: towards this sum, he said, the house had already granted the land and malt taxes; two millions owing to the Bank would be postponed. The amount of Exchequer bills would be provided for by issuing bills for the same sum; and he would take the sinking fund for a million, which, with 100,000*l.* in the Exchequer would make together something more than 8,000,000*l.*; and that about six millions were to be raised by way of loan, the terms of which were already settled.

The next object was the unfunded debt. It was his most anxious wish to have brought forward and provided a fund for the whole of this debt. The amount of the unfunded navy was 13,000,000*l.* unfunded ordnance 1,000,000*l.* Total 14,000,000*l.* of which he proposed to fund 6,600,000*l.*

To pay the interest of the above, he proposed the following taxes:

Hats, 6*d.* on low, and 2*s.* on the higher, to produce 150,000*l.*—Ribbons, and a certain description of gauzes, 1*d.* per dozen yards, 120,000*l.*—Coals 3*s.* per chaldron to inland consumers, 150,000*l.*—Horses at 10*s.* a head, 100,000*l.*—Printed and stained linens and calicoes, a duty from 3*d.* up to 1*s.* per yard, and equal to ten per cent. 120,000*l.*—Candles one halfpenny per lb. 100,000*l.*—Licences to persons dealing in exciseable commodities, from 1*l.* to 50*l.* 80,000*l.*—Bricks and tiles 2*s.* 6*d.* on every thousand, 50,000*l.*—Qualifications of shooters, and depurations from the lords of the manor, one guinea per head, 30,000*l.*—Paper, one third additional duty, 18,000*l.*—Hackney coaches 5*s.* a week additional duty.—Total 930,000*l.*

Great objections were made to the above; and it was observed by one gentleman, that the chief of the burden was laid upon trade and manufactures, and little or nothing upon luxury.

July 20.

Between one and two o'clock this morning a dreadful fire broke out at the corner of King's street, Bloomsbury-square, opposite the Buffalo tavern, which entirely consumed five houses, and damaged many others.

July 27.

Being the day appointed for the general thanksgiving, their Majesties, with the royal family (the Prince of Wales and the princes abroad only excepted), attended divine vine service at the collegiate church at Windsor. The same was likewise observed throughout the cities and liberties of London and Westminster with uncommon solemnity; divine service was performed in all the churches and chapels; and the utmost decorum every where prevailed. The Lords and Commons appeared more devout than usual on this occasion: the bishop of St. David's preached before the former; and Dr. Prettyman, prebendary of Westminster, before the latter. Both Sermons have been since printed.

July 31.

Letters from France confirm the accounts, received during the course of the month, of a most dreadful fire at Brest, which had burnt the store-house for sails, blown up the powder magazine, and had put the general magazine and the whole port of Brest in the most eminent danger.

MONDAY, Aug. 2.

Began a new plan for the conveyance of the mail between London, Bath, and Bristol, by coaches constructed for that purpose. The coach, which left London this evening at 9 o'clock, arrived at Bristol the next morning before eleven; and the coach that set out from Bristol at 4 o'clock in the afternoon got into London before 8 o'clock next morning; and in this regular order the coaches have continued their course every day since.

This day Mr. H. Dundas, member for Edinburgh, moved in the House of Commons for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act which confiscated the estates of certain persons in Scotland, and to empower the Crown to restore them to the right heirs; which seemed to be generally approved.

The estates of the following noblemen and gentlemen were among those forfeited in 1745:

Simon Lord Lovat. Already restored.

Lord John Drummond, brother to the Earl, commonly called Duke of Perth.

George Earl of Cromarty.—Lord M'Leod is heir.

Archibald M' Donald, son of Col. M' Donald of Barraisdale.

Donald Cameron of Lochiel.

Charles Stewart of Ardsheil.

Donald M' Donald of Kenlock-Moydart.

Euan M' Pherson of Clunie.

Francis Buchanan of Arnprior.

Donald M' Donald of Lochgary.

Allen Cameron of Monakry.

Alexander M' Donald of Keppoch.

Tuesday 3.

An officer in the navy and a gentleman in the German service fought a duel with swords and pistols in a field near Bayswater. Four pistols were discharged, one of which slightly wounded the former in the left shoulder; but in the rencounter with swords the latter was run through the thigh. A surgeon who attended stopped the effusion of blood, which was great; and the gentleman was taken to his apartments in Dean-street, dangerously ill. This, it appears, is the second duel these gentlemen have fought; the first was in France, where they were both desperately wounded.—The quarrel was a difference of opinion on the conduct of Gen. Burgoyne in the Hudson's-bay expedition, in which they both served.

Wednesday 4.

A message was sent from the house of Commons to the house of Lords, as follows:

"That the house of Commons had come to a resolution, that, from and after the present session of parliament, no member of this house do frank any letter or packet unless the whole superscription be in his own hand-writing, and unless, together with the name of such member, the name of the post-town from which the said letter or packet is intended to be sent, and the day of the month and the year when the same shall be put into the post-office, shall be at the same time superscribed upon such letter or packet, which day of the month shall be in words at length; and that no member of this house do permit any letter or packet to be directed to him at any place except where he shall actually be at the time of delivery thereof, or at his usual place of residence in London or at the lobby of the house."

The Lords, having taken the subject-matter of the message into consideration, have come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, nem. contradicente, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that, from and after this present session of parliament, no member of this house do frank, &c." (making use of the very words in the resolution, above-mentioned, only dividing it, and making two resolutions, the first ending "in words at length.")

Thursday 5.

John Edwards was committed to prison, charged with stabbing his own father in the breast, who, being carried to St. Bartholomew's hospital, was seized with a violent inward bleeding, which it was thought would hasten his death.

Saturday 7.

The following resolutions were agreed to: That the holders of Navy Bills, bearing date on or before the 30th of June 1782, shall be entitled to a capital in the Bank of England of 107l. 20s. 6d. to be attended with annuities of 5 per cent. irredeemable, till 25 millions of 3 and 4 per cent. are paid off."

That Ordnance Debentures shall bear 4 per cent. from the expiration of 25 months after the 4th of July 1784, at the par of 107l. 10s. 6d.

Monday 9.

Protest in the H of Peers against the E. I. Regulation Bill. Dissentient. Because we think the principle of the bill false, unjust, and unconstitutional; false, inasmuch as it provides no effectual remedy for the evils it affects to cure; unjust, as it indiscriminately compels all persons returning from India to furnish the means of accusation and prosecution tion against themselves; and unconstitutional, because it establishes a new criminal court of judicature, by which the admission of incompetent evidence is expressly directed, and the subject is unnecessarily deprived of his most inestimable birth-right, a trial by a jury. Signed Portland. Devonshire.

Chelmsdeley. Northampton. Carlisle.

Thursday 12.

Being the birth-day of the Prince of Wales, his R. H. went early from Carleton-House to Windsor Castle, where the same was celebrated. Their Majesties, with the Royal family, dined together at the Queen's house in the Castle-yard. A great number of the nobility and gentry went from town, to pay their compliments to the King, Queen, and Royal family, on that occasion. In the evening there was a ball; and at night the streets in the vicinity of Carleton-house were finely illuminated.

Friday 13.

The Royal Assent was this day given by Commission to the Brick Act, Hackney-coach Act, Act for licensing retailers of excisable commodities, Exchequer Loan Act, Horse Act, Bank Act, E. India regulating Act; and for securing the dock-yards; and to a number of other public and private bills.

Saturday 14.

A gentleman gazing at a print-shop in the Strand, had his pocket picked of his purse, in which were bank notes to the amount of 700*l.* A poor woman that stood by observed the transaction, gave notice, and the fellow was pursued and taken, and the purse recovered. The fellow, after being rolled in the kennel, and had undergone the discipline of the mob, was permitted to escape; and the woman who discovered the theft rewarded with five guineas.

Sunday 15.

The H. of C. voted an address to his Majesty, to bestow some mark of his Royal favour on the Chaplain of the House. Also an address, to give directions for the printing 1500 copies of Journals with an Index.

Monday 16.

A fire broke out at a public house in St. James's-street, Wapping, which consumed the same, and considerably damaged the house adjoining. It was occasioned by the carelessness of the maid, who having put a child to-bed, left the candle burning, which set fire to the curtains, and in less than 20 minutes the flames burst through the windows, and the poor infant was unhappily burnt to death.

Tuesday 17.

This day his Majesty came to the H. of Peers; and, after giving the royal assent to the tea and window taxes, the game-bill, the postage bill, the silk duty bill, the pawn-brokers bill, the lead exportation bill, and 19 several private bills, made a most gracious speech, which shall be given in due course in a future Magazine.

Wednesday 18.

This day the new regulation of the franks took place at the general post-office, and has given occasion to many complaints.

Thursday 19.

An attempt was this day made (being the second) by the prisoners in the King's Bench, to make their escape; but the guards being sent for the ringleaders were secured. The act of Insolvency having been put off to another session, the debtors in all the goals throughout the kingdom are grown mutinous.

Friday 20.

In the London Gazette of this day, there is the copy of a letter, inserted at his request, from a conscientious Smuggler, to Mr. Pitt; in the original of which were inclosed bank notes to the amount of 300*l.* to be applied to the public service, he having in his younger days, when he followed the seas, injured the revenue—as most seamen do.

Saturday 21.

The Belmont Indiaman arrived at Plymouth. The corpse of Sir Eyre Coote was brought over in this ship for interment.

Report was made to his Majesty of the prisoners convicted in June sessions, when the following were ordered for execution on Wednesday next.

Robert Edwards, for robbing the Hon. Keith Elphinston, Esq; near the theatre in the Hay-market, of his gold watch, &c. Robert Moore, for snatching from the head of Mrs. Arabella Jeffreys, a cluster diamond pin on the highway, near St. James's-Gate. John Codd, for robbing Mr. Samuel Ellis on the highway. William Holmes for breaking into the house of Adam Hamilton, of Enfield, and robbing the same of plate, &c. J. Kelley, for being aiding with divers other persons, in rescuing from the officers 350*lb.* of uncustomed tea. James Napier, convicted at a former session, for assaulting the Hon. Albinia Hobart, and taking from her person a diamond ear-ring. The rest of the convicts were reprieved.

Sunday 22.

The last Dutch mail brought letters from the Bishop of Osnaburg, who, on the 7th instant, was going on a tour with the Emperor of Germany to review his troops. His Highness, who travels under the character of the Count de Hoya, is, by the Imperial family and the nobles at Vienna, treated with particular marks of attention.

Monday 23.

The empress of Russia, who has for some time been indisposed, is now said to be completely recovered; and has appeared in public, attended by the Grand Duke and his Royal Consort.

The Parliament of Ireland, which was prorogued to this day, is further prorogued to Tuesday the 2d of November.

P. 557. The husband of Mrs. Hand (daughter of Joseph Dickinson, esq;), is wrongly described as R. of Enfield: he is R. of St. George, Botolph-lane, as well as V. of St. Giles, Cripplegate, and Archdeacon of Dorset. His mother was remarried to the late bp. Newton.

BIRTHS.

COUNTESS of Traquair, a son.

Aug. 10. Lady of Abp. of Cashel, a son.
16. At Guy's-cliff, near Warwick, the Countess of Leicester, a daughter. The young lady, we hear, is to be baptised by the name of Elizabeth-Margaret.

21. Lady of Sir James Grant, a son.

24. Lady of Rt. Hon. W. Eden, a son.

Lady Page, a daughter.

25. Lady of G. L. Newnham, esq; a son and heir.

MARRIAGES.

LATELY, Mr. John Buxton, merchant, of Nottingham, to Miss Travell.

— Fry, esq; secretary to Sir William Gordon, K. B. late plenipotentiary at Brussels, to Miss Gotteridge, of Loughborough.

29. Lieut. Col. Pringle, to Miss Balneavis, of Portman-st.

30. Martin Whish, esq; one of the commissioners of excise, to Miss Saunders, dau. of the late rev. Dr. S. prebendary of Rochester.

31. Capt. Gason, of the second troop of horse guards, to Miss Price, of Featherstone-buildings, Holborn.

At Hertford, Capt. Thomas Spence, in the Antigua trade, to Miss Susanna Platt.

At Ash, Kent, Dr. John Hunter, physician, to Miss Le Grand, dau. of Rob. Le G. esq;.

At Edinburgh, James Traill, esq; sheriff-depute of Caithness and Sutherland, to the right hon. Lady Janet Sinclair, sister to the Earl of Caithness.

Aug 2. At Canterbury cathedral, the Chevalier Vanstratten, a knight of Malta, to Miss Elizabeth Feast, sister to Mr. F. brewer, in the City-road.

By special licence, Gov. Pownall, to Mrs. Astell, of Everton house, Bedfordsh.

3. At Wimbledon, the rev. Herbert Randolph, minister of that parish, to Miss Knapp.

6. At Marybone church, Thomas Ord, esq; to Mrs. Broderick, of Great Portland-st. widow of Edward B. esq;.

9. By special licence, Mr. Hawkes, to Miss Antony of Kensington.

11. Right hon. Lord Balgonie, eldest son of the Earl of Leven and Melville, to Miss Thornton, dau. of John T. esq; of Clapham. Edward Taylor, esq; of the Temple, to Miss Janhefer.

Cha. Roberts, of Thurnby, co. Northampt. to Miss Annabella Haslegrave, youngest dau. of the late Sir Arthur H. bart. Mr. H. is a lieutenant in the 56th reg. of foot; and was at Gibraltar during the whole of the late siege.

14. John Anstruther, of Lincoln's-inn, esq; to Miss Brice.

16. Mr. W. Feltham, of Fleet-st. to Miss Harvey.

W. Penlington, esq; of Rode, Cheshire, to Miss Mary Rawsthorne.

Geo. Pearson, M. D. of London, late of Doncaster, and author of the Chemical History of Buxton waters lately published, to Miss Pearson.

17. By special licence, the hon. Adm. Digby, to Mrs. Jauncy, eldest daughter of Andrew Elliot, esq; late Lt. Gov. of N. York.

18. Henry Bankes, esq; of Kingston-hall, Dorset, to Miss Woodley, dau. of W. W. esq;.

Nath. Jones, esq; of Brighthelmstone, to the hon. Miss Anne Smith, of St. James's-st.

19. At Bath, Nath. Peach, esq; of Roxborough, Gloucestershire, to Miss Julia Maria Keasberry.

At Ingoldsby, co. Linc. John Wing, esq; of Thorney-Abbey, to Mrs. Ward, widow of Mr. H. W. jun. of Stamford.

21. At Godwood, the seat of the D. of Richmond, the hon. Geo. Cranfield Berkeley, esq; M. P. for Gloucestersh. to the hon. Miss Charlotte Lennox, dau. of Ld Geo. Lennox, bro. to the Duke of R.

23. At Boxted, Essex, J. M. Grimwood, esq; of Gray's-Inn, to Miss Cook.

At Cheshunt, Mr. Waller, callico-printer, of Edmonton, to Miss Scott, daughter of Mr. S. carpenter, of Cheshunt.

24. Rev. Edw. Wollaston, of the Charterhouse, to Miss Ramsden, only dau. of Dr. R. master of that society.

25. Henry Hugh Hoare, esq; second son of Richard H. esq; of Barn-Elms, to Miss Maria Palmer Acland, third daughter of the late Arthur A. esq; of Fairfield, co. Somerset.

26. Mr. Dav. Davies, attorney, of Little St. Helens, to Mrs. Hitch, widow of Charles H. esq; of Plashett.

Mr. Edw. Foster, jun. ironmonger, of Oxford-st. to Miss Eliz. Hancock, of M. le bon.

Rev. John Fuller, pastor of the Presbyterian congregation in Carter-lane, to Miss Stratton, of Hackney.

Mr. S. Rodbard, of Liverpool, to Miss Johnson, of Edmonton.

Richard Miles, esq; of Wanstead, Essex, to Miss Bouille.

Dougal Campbell, esq; to Miss Fisher.

28. By special licence, Hon. Miss Thynne, third daughter of Lord Visc. Weymouth, to Ld St. Asaph, son to E. of Ashburnham.

29. By special licence, Miss Rainsford, of Oxendon-st. to — Shuter, esq;.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at his seat at Cockfield-place, Suffex, aged 74, Michael Sergison, esq; greatly lamented by all his friends and acquaintance, but especially by the poor, who have lost a liberal benefactor.

Mrs. Bartholomew, mother of Mr. B. proprietor of White's Conduit-House.

At Bath, after a few days illness, Matthew Dobson, M. D. His death was occasioned, it is said, by a cold caught by the damps in Spring Garden, where he had imprudently sat upon the grass.

In Manchester-sq. Archibald Grant, esq;

Prince Frederick, eldest son of the hereditary prince of Hesse.

At her seat in Monmouthshire. Mrs. Vane, sister of Sir John Morgan, M. P. for that county.

At Knightsbridge, the lady of J. Hames, esq.

At Quebec, the lady of Lt. Gen. Clarke.

At Rotterdam, Rachael Solomons, a Jewess, aged 110.

Lady Simpson, relict of Sir Edward S. knt. late dean of the arches, and judge of the prerogative court of Doctors' Commons, who died May 20, 1764.

On the 25th of Oct. last, at Tillicherry, Henry Williams, esq; on board the Bethborough, Capt. Montgomery, which sailed from Portsmouth March 12, 1783.

May 3. At his house, in The Close, Lichfield, aged 74, universally lamented, the rev Thomas White, M. A. prebendary and sacrist of that cathedral upwards of forty years, principal surrogate of the diocese, and vicar of Dunchurch, Warwickshire. This pious, learned, and benevolent divine, was the author of a much esteemed volume of sermons, the first edition of which was printed in 1757, the second in 1771.

June 26. Suddenly, at Quenndon, co. Leic', rev. Mr. Farnham, brother to the Countess of Denbigh, and representative of one of the oldest families in that county. His ancestor, Robert de Farnham, came over with the Conqueror, was engaged in the battle of Hastings, and appears in the roll of Battle Abbey. Mr F. dying unmarried, he is succeeded in fortune by his brother, Thomas Farnham, esq; captain of the Winchelsea frigate, now with Admiral Gambier on the Newfoundland station), who distinguished himself in the last war, and received the thanks of Admiral Sir George Collier for his gallant behaviour in the Nautilus frigate, in burning and destroying the rebel galleys within the bay of Penobscott, Aug. 14, 1779 (see vol. XLIX, p. 469.)

July . . . Mrs. Harrison, relict of Mr. H. formerly minister of Southgate chapel, where he was buried under the reading desk; and mother of Mrs. Griffith, relict of the late rev. Dr. Griffith.

Mrs. Hooper, wife of the rev. Mr. H. vicar of Shoreham, Sussex, and sister of the late rev. Dr. Griffith.

23. Near Bristol, Mr. Rich. Haynes Plover, who acted for many years as master of the ceremonies for the Hot Wells, and also for Weymouth.

24. Of a deep decline, at Bristol, Mr. John Mitchell, of Jeffries-sq. London, merch.

26. At his seat at Preston-hall, near Aylesford, Kent, the rev. Joseph Milner, D. D. in the commission of the peace for that county, one of the preceptors in convocation for the diocese of Rochester, R. of Ditton, and V. of Burnham. He changed his name from Butler, in pursuance of the will of his uncle Dr. M. a physician, who left him his estate. His extensive charities, and the gentleness of his manners, make him much lamented.

27. At Risley, co. Derby, Mrs. Frances Warren, aunt to Sir J. B. W. bart.

At Newport, Isle of Wight, Mr. Allford, one of the aldermen of that corporation, and under-keeper of the forest of Parkhurst; supposed to be this largest man in the island.

28. At her apartments in Windsor castle, the hon. Mrs. Cranston.

Rev. John Blake, M. A. rector of Screningham, and Catton, and master of the royal grammar-school at York.

29. In Gloucester-str. Bloomsbury, aged 84, Mrs. Beata Wilkins, relict of the late Mr. William W. formerly printer of the London Journal, (for which he received from the Government, between the years 1732 and 1735, 2955l. 16s. 8d. see vol. LII. p. 379). Mrs. W. has bequeathed to the Company of Stationers 320l and an original picture of some modern Bishop of Winchester. [Qu. Hoadly?]

30. Aged 45, William Wentworth, esq; of Lillingstone Hovell-hall, near Buckingham.

Daniel Crafter esq; of Northumberland.

31. Mr. Walker, master of the White Hart Tavern, Holborn, and cook to the society of Lincoln's-Inn.

In his 80th year, three days after his wife, Mr. William Powell, of Charlotte-str. Rathbone-place, father to the late celebrated tragedian, Mr. P. of Drury-lane theatre.

Mrs. Brooke, relict of the late Mr. B. register the coquets of the port of London.

Aug. 1. On Blackheath, Mr. Joseph Matthews Beacheruff, mercer in Gracechurch-str.

2. Mrs. Vyse, daughter of Sir Geo. Howard, K. B. and wife of Col. V.

Mr. Parsons, stock-broker.

3. In Wimpole-street, Mrs. Drake, second wife of William D. jun. esq; member for Agmondesham, and only surviving daughter and heiress of Jeremiah Ives, esq; alderman of Norwich: she has left two infant daughters. She had two brothers and a sister, who also died in the bloom of youth, by which she became sole heiress to a fortune of about 100,000l.

Mr. Robert Phillips, master of the Half-Moon tavern in Cheap-side, and one of the common-councilmen of Farringdon Within.

At Stoke Newington, Thomas Parsons, esq.

At Canterbury, aged 82, the hon. Mrs. Dawnay, relict of the hon. and rev. Godfrey D. and sister to the late Sir Narborough D'aeth, bart.

6. Dropped down dead on the Royal Exchange, Mr. Samuel Rainsforth, tallow-chandler, in Clare-market.

At Reading, in an advanced age, Mrs. Hill, widow of Francis H. esq.

Mr. Vaughan, master of the George and Vulture, Tottenham.

7. At

7. At Bath, Joseph Winfield, esq; of New Windsor, Berks.

In Windsor castle, Mrs. Brooks, wife of Mr. Samuel B. one of the gentlemen of the chamber to the Lord Chancellor, and one of his Majesty's Poor Knights at Windsor.

Nath. Hone, esq; royal academician.

At Chessent, Herts, Mrs. Cooke, wife of R. C. esq; merchant, in Crutched Friars.

At his seat at Dogmersfield, Hants. Sir Henry Paulet St. John, bart. aged 44.

8. Miss Gideon, sister to Sir Sampson G.

At Norwich, Edmund Houke, esq.

9. Dr. Tyson, senior physician of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He fell down in a fit, and, as two of his servants were carrying him up stairs, in order to put him to bed, he expired in their arms.

At Southampton, Allen Piper, esq; land-surveyor of that port.

10. At Dover, on his return from the continent, in his 71st year, Allan Ramsay, esq; principal portrait painter to their Majesties. By his death the polite and literary world have sustained an irreparable loss, as few men have exceeded him in correctness of taste, brilliancy of wit, or soundness of understanding. His writings bear the stamp of all those excellences. His publications are numerous and various; several of them are on political subjects, in which is displayed much useful knowledge of the constitution of this country, for which he was ever a strenuous and disinterested advocate. By his death the community is deprived of one of its most respectable members, and his family and connections of one of the best of friends. His father, of the same name, is well known as a poet by The Gentle Shepherd.

12. Mrs. Woide, wife of the learned and rev. Mr. W. of the British Museum, chaplain to the Dutch chapels at St. James's and the Savoy, one of the under librarians at the British Museum, and editor of the Alexandrine New Testament, now printing with fac-simile types.

13. After a short illness, at Westmead, near Llangharne, Caermarthenshire, J. Morgan, esq.

16. Mrs. Leslie, wife of Mr. L. of Buckingham-st. York-buildings.

At Baltimore, aged 108, Pat. M'Donaldson, esq.

18. Mr. Mason, formerly a haberdasher in Leadenhall-st.

Mr. Edw. King, attorney, of Bicester.

19. Mrs. Jouvancel, wife of Cuchet J. esq; of Clapham.

20. The wife of the rev. Mr. Keighley, V. of Low Leyton.

At her son's rectory-house at Fulmerston, 20. Norfolk, Mrs. Sandiford, relict of the rev. Rowland S. M. A. V. of Christ-church, Newgate-st.

21. Mr. Jas. Whitehead, a Blackwell-hall factor.

22. At Englefield-Green, Benj. Torin, esq; many years an East India supercargo.

24. In her 68th year, after a lingering illness, Mrs. Bosenberg, wife of Ch. B. esq; of Bury str. St. James's.

25. At Canterbury, Mr. John Raymond, an ingenious painter, and a student at the Royal Academy.

26. Mr. Tomlinson, hosier, in Piccadilly.

Aged 66, Andover Hendricks, esq; a Dutch merchant.

GAZETTE PROMOTIONS.

July 31. W M'Connell, esq; commissary of Wigtown.

Aug. 2. Col. Thomas Carleton, Captain-General and Governor in Chief of the province of New Brunswick in America.

7. General Sir John Griffin Griffin, of Audley-End, co. Essex, K. B. summoned to parliament, by the name of John Griffin, Ld Howard of Walden. [He takes place next to Lord St. John, 1597.]

Countess of Harcourt one of the ladies of her majesty's bed-chamber, vice Duchess of Argyll, resig.

11. F. Wille, of Hampstead, esq; knighted.

20. James Earl of Courtown, Treasurer of his Majesty's household, a Privy Counsellor.

Robert Waller, esq; Groom of his Majesty's bed-chamber, vice Maj. Gen. St. John.

Maj. Gen. Adzanc, a Groom of his Majesty's bed-chamber.

21. Hon. Keith Stewart, Receiver-General of his Majesty's land-rents and casualties in Scotland.

Rev. Rob. Wharton, M. A. Catton R. co. York, vice J. Blake, dec.

CIVIL PROMOTIONS.

THO. Locke, esq; Clarenceux king of arms, vice Heard (now Garter, see pp. 318. 478.)

Geo. Harrison, esq; Norroy, vice Locke.

Mr. Alderman Marc, land coal meter for the city of London.

Dr. Cook, physician to the London Hospital, vice Dr. Dixon, dec.

John Gideon Caulet, M. D. physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, vice Dr. Tyson, dec.

ECCLESIASTICAL PREFERMENTS.

July 21. CÆSAR Constantine Francis, Count of Hoenbroeck D'Od, unanimously elected Prince Bishop of Liege.

Aug. 4. Rev. Andrew Cheap, M. A. preb. of Knaresborough, a residentiary of York cathedral, vice W. Cawley, dec.

6. Rev. Edward Breary, Middleton on the Wolds, R. co. York, on the resignation of his father.

Rev. — Briscoe, North Wheatley, R. co. Nott.

Rev. Browne Grisdale, R. of Hutton, co. Cumberland, one of the Earl of Lonsdale's domestic chaplains, and R. of Bowness, in the same county, vice James Watson, dec.

William Allanton, B. A. R. of Springham, co. York, vice John Blake, dec.

Rev.

Rev. G. W. Anderson, B. A. R. of Epworth, Linc. vice Sir W. Anderson bart. refig.
 Rev. John Moore Brooke, M. A. fellow of Trin. Coll. Camb. Helplingham, co. Linc.
 Rev. Christ. Atkinson, M. A. of Trin. Coll. Camb. one of his Majesty's preachers at Whitehall.
 Rev. Basil Wood, B. A. lecturer of St. Peter's, Cornhill.

DISPENSATIONS.

Aug. 3. REV. — Smith, Burfwick, V. with Owthorne, V. both co. York.
 Rev. John Goddard, M. A. to hold Kimpston R. with Tidworth R. both co. Hants.

MR. URBAR,

Aug. 20.

THE history of the title to the earldom of Leicester in your late Magazine, calls to mind the "trial at bar" mentioned in your volume for 1782, p. 344, where, in col. 1, l. 54, we should surely read, "earldom of Leicester." In the same volume, p. 66, col. 1, l. 2, for "second" read "third." P. 368, col. 1, l. 13, read "Mill's." As to ll. 17, 18, of the same page, which have reference to p. 290, col. 1, ll. pen. and ult., it may not be amiss to recur to p. 277, col. 2, l. 7, as containing somewhat contradictory. P. 501, col. 2, l. 2, read "confirmed;" and p. 561, col. 1, l. penult. "Wroxton." P. 562, col. 2, ll. 12, 13, for "College" read "Hall;" and p. 602, col. 2, l. 27, read "Cawley."

In p. 33 of your last volume, col. 1, l. 6, for "Magazine" read "volume, p. 571." P. 39, note, l. ult. read "p. 528." A note in p. 47 intimates, that "most of the errors are corrected" in the large octavo edition of Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets. A gross one, however, still remains (exactly copied from the small edition) which was pointed out in your volume for 1781, p. 420, col. 2, ll. 15, 16. P. 94, col. 1, l. 63, read "John Breckon, M. D. of Bere Court." P. 376, col. 2, l. antep. read "col. 1." You have not yet favoured your readers with the account of the celebrated Brindley, alluded to in p. 408, col. 1. P. 605, notes, l. pen. read "xlv." P. 670, col. 1, l. 3, read "national;" and l. 10, "a vain."

AN OLD CORRESPONDENT.

BANKRUPTS.

GEO. Wood, Greg. Grant, and Charlotte Wood, Chandos-str. Cov.-garden, silk weavers.
 Samuel Breivogon, Gracechurch-str. merch.

John Watts, Burnage, Lancash. silk manufacturer.
 Henry Bicknel, Bristol, James Sutton, London, and Thomas Gillam, Bristol, bankers.]
 Robert Ferryman, Shoreditch, brewer.
 Peter Geo. Monteiro, jun. Aldermanbury Postern, London, merchant.
 George Garman, Pointon, Cheshire, carrier.
 Joseph Jump, Liverpool, wine-merchant.
 Wm. Haynes, jun. Croydon, Surrey, insorer.
 Jacob A. Smallpiece, Froome Selwood, Somersetshire, grocer and tallow-chandler.
 John Burdekin, King-str. Covent-garden, linen-draper.
 Madford Spring, Leeds, Yorksh. money scrivener.
 Alex. Turner, Kendal, Westmorl. linen draper.
 Tho. Newman, Gravel-lane, Surrey, twine-spinner.
 Christopher Butler, Preston, Lancash. grocer.
 Robert Taylor, Nantwich, Chesh.
 Benjamin Montague, Bath, perfumer.
 Henry Hands, Napton on the Hill, Warwickshire, dealer.
 John Burcham, Cockthorpe, Norfolk, coal-merchant.
 William Jones, Oxford, silversmith.
 William and Miles Myers, Liverpool, dealers in flour.
 Isaac Fitch, Great Totham, Essex, wool-staple.
 William Warrin, Brackley, Northamptonsh. linen-draper.
 Alex. Rob, Great Pulteney-str, taylor.
 John Parsons, Eardisley, Hereford, timber-merchant.
 James Welcombe, Exeter, bricklayer.
 Wm. Roe, Fashion-str. Spital-fields, victualler.
 Henry Moore, Wigan, Lancashire, grocer.
 Robert Harvey, Dover, shopkeeper.
 Humphry Adoicott, Lyme Regis, Dorsetshire, ship-wright.
 John Green, Prescott, Lancash. ironmonger and dealer in flour.
 John Sydenham, Cornhill, haberdasher.
 Matthew Hole, Devizes, Wilts, ironmonger.
 Geo. Horley, Charles Arthur, and John Collins, Parker-str. St. Giles in the Fields, tire-smiths.
 George Matthews, Brosley, Salop, iron-master.
 William Hopwell, Fleet-str. hufier.
 James Millar, Shad Thames, biscuit-baker.
 David Hannay, Hungerford, Berks, maltster and linen-draper.
 Godfrey Ward, Wednesbury, Staff. white-smith.
 Dorothy Jouas, Simon Jacob Jouas, and Jonas, St. Catharine's sq. Lond. merchants.
 Sam. Remnant, Palace-yard, Westm. merchant.
 Simon Miller, Shoreditch, mariner.
 Tho. Bayley, Ratcliffe highway, Middlesex, broker and auctioneer.

Bill of Mortality from July 27, to Aug. 24, 1784.

Christened.	Buried.
Males 836	Males 680
Females 818	Females 550
1654	1230
Whom have died under two years old 443
Peck Loaf 28. 6d.

   	2 and 5	93	50 and 60	104
	5 and 10	54	60 and 70	88
	10 and 20	47	70 and 80	54
	20 and 30	107	80 and 90	36
	30 and 40	110	90 and 100	3
	40 and 50	122	100

EACH DAY'S PRICE OF STOCKS IN AUGUST, 1784.

	Bank Stock.	3 per Cent. reduc.	3 per Cent. confols.	Ditt. 4 per Cent. Confols.	Long Ann	Short 1777.	Ditto 1778.	Ditt. 1779.	India Stock.	India Ann.	India Bonds.	South Sea Stock.	Old Ann.	New Ann.	Navy Bills.	3 per Cent. Scrip.	4 per Cent. Scrip.	Excheq. Bills.	Lottery Tickets.
28	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				7 s. dif.			56 1/2	15 1/4	57 1/2	75 1/2		15 6 0
29	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				7			56 1/2	15 1/4	57 1/2	75 1/2	2 s. 2	15 8 0
30	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				6			56 1/2	15 1/4	57 1/2	75 1/2	1	15 6 0
31	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5 s. 6			56 1/2	15 1/4	57 1/2	75 1/2		15 7 0
1	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5	64 1/2			13	57 1/2	75 1/2		15 12 0
2	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 11 0
3	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 10 0
4	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 13 0
5	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 16 0
6	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 15 0
7	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 15 0
8	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
9	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
10	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
11	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
12	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
13	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
14	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
15	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
16	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
17	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
18	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
19	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
20	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
21	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
22	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
23	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
24	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
25	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
26	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0
27	116 1/2	58 1/2	57 1/2	74 1/2	17 1/2		12 3/8				5					57 1/2	75 1/2		15 14 0

N. B. In the 3 per Cent. Confols. the highest and lowest Price of each Day is given; in the other Stock the highest Price only.

643

Hill

642 Meteorological Diary for September, 1783.—Average Prices of Corn.

Septemb. Days.	Thermom.	Barometer. Inch. 20ths	Wind.	Rain. 100ths of inch.	Weather.
1	61	30 1	E	118	violent thunder ¹ .
2	59	30 1	E		overcast, still.
3	56	29 17	W	.78	fair, rain.
4	54	29 10	SW	.74	fair, windy, rain.
5	53	29 6	SW	.25	clouds and wind, rain.
6	57	29 10	SW		clouds and wind.
7	52	29 15	W		ditto.
8	55	29 19	W		ditto.
9	49	29 11	SW		windy, with small showers.
10	55	29 13	SW		windy, and some clouds ² .
11	58	29 12	SW		brisk wind, and cloudy.
12	58	29 14	SW
13	58	29 17	SW		wind, clouds, small rain.
14	63	29 17	SW		wind, cloudy.
15	59	29 17	SW		fine grey day.
16	49	30	SW	.51	rain.
17	60	30 3	SW		cloudy.
18	60	30 1	E		warm, grey day.
19	58	29 14	SW		fine, rainy.
20	62	29 8	SW	.47	steady rain, warm and moist.
21	60	29 15	SW		fine sunny day.
22	50	29 11	SW	.37	brisk wind, showers.
23	47	29 15	SW		sunny day.
24	62	30 3	SW		beautiful sunny day.
25	45	30 6	SW		fine day.
26	45	30 5	NE		fine warm day.
27	64	30 5	N		warm.
28	61	30 5	NE		sunshine and wind.
29	64	30 4	NE		ditto.
30	61	30 4	NE		bright day ³ .

OBSERVATIONS, ¹ Thunder very near.—² Total eclipse of the moon, clear.—³ Leaves fall.

AVERAGE PRICES of CORN, from September 13, to September 18, 1784.

WheatRyeBarleyOatsBeans										COUNTIES upon the COAST.
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
London	6	0	3	0	3	0	2	7	3	3	Essex	6	0	3	6	2	10	2	6	3	6
COUNTIES INLAND.
Middlesex	5	9	3	7	3	4	2	8	3	9	Suffolk	6	0	3	1	2	9	2	5	3	1
Surry	6	2	3	7	3	2	2	7	4	7	Norfolk	6	0	2	10	2	6	2	4	7	0
Hertford	5	11	4	4	4	3	2	8	4	2	Lincoln	6	1	3	1	3	4	2	2	3	4
Bedford	6	2	3	8	3	3	2	5	3	10	York	6	2	3	10	3	6	2	3	4	1
Cambridge	6	4	3	6	0	0	2	4	3	2	Durham	6	10	4	7	3	7	2	4	3	10
Huntingdon	6	1	0	0	0	1	2	5	3	9	Northumberland	6	3	4	3	3	5	2	3	4	3
Northampton	6	6	4	3	3	5	2	3	3	6	Cumberland	6	4	4	6	3	6	2	10	5	2
Rutland	6	9	4	4	3	10	2	9	4	1	Westmorland	7	2	4	6	3	5	2	4	5	1
Leicester	6	7	5	1	3	10	2	4	3	11	Lancashire	6	7	0	0	0	0	2	7	4	8
Nottingham	6	3	3	11	3	6	2	4	4	0	Cheshire	6	6	4	6	3	0	2	3	0	0
Derby	6	6	0	0	0	0	2	5	4	7	Monmouth	5	9	0	0	3	5	1	11	0	0
Stafford	6	3	0	0	3	6	2	2	4	3	Somerset	5	8	3	6	2	7	2	1	3	9
Salop	6	5	4	1	3	10	2	0	4	2	Devon	5	9	0	0	2	7	1	8	0	0
Hereford	5	10	0	0	2	2	1	10	0	0	Cornwall	6	1	0	0	3	0	1	10	0	0
Worcester	6	5	0	0	3	2	2	5	3	6	Dorset	6	2	0	0	2	8	2	5	4	0
Warwick	6	5	0	0	3	3	1	11	3	6	Hampshire	5	7	0	0	2	10	2	5	3	9
Gloucester	6	2	0	0	2	9	2	0	3	8	Suffex	5	10	0	0	2	11	2	4	0	0
Wilts	6	3	4	2	3	1	2	8	4	1	Kent	6	3	0	0	3	1	2	6	3	5
Berks	5	11	4	0	3	6	2	7	3	6	WALES, Sept. 6, to Sept. 11, 1784.
Oxford	5	11	0	0	0	0	2	5	3	7	North Wales	7	3	5	5	4	7	2	5	5	5
Bucks	6	0	0	0	3	8	2	4	3	7	South Wales	6	8	4	11	4	2	1	10	5	7

 A Correspondent, on reading the Characters in our list, assures us that there are none such in A. S. Cary of Macky, preserved at Oxford, and written in his life-time. This copy given by Bp. More to Bp. Tanner, who left it, with other MSS. to the Bodleian Library.

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For SEPTEMBER, 1784.

BEING THE THIRD NUMBER OF VOL. LIV. PART II.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 2.
THE annexed plate exhibits a view of the wooden aqueduct near Bush-hill, in the parish of Edmonton, made 1608 for the conveyance of the New River, where the natural level of the ground was unfavourable. This being the only one now remaining (for a similar aqueduct at Highbury, near Islington, was taken away, and replaced by a bed of clay, about six years ago); I thought a representation of it would not be disagreeable to your readers, especially as preparations for removing this also are now actually going forward under the direction of Mr. Mylne, Surveyor to the New River Company.

The length of this wooden trough is 660 feet; its height and depth five. It is tied together by imposts 7 inches by 3, and uprights 8 inches by 4, and 6 feet high, like buttresses, resting on brick-piers 2 feet and $\frac{1}{2}$ high, not equidistant, in number 80; and between every pair of these are as many more, like imposts and uprights, resting in fills of like dimensions on the basement timbers of the frame.

This trough passes over a stream, which, rising on Enfield Chace, runs under the road beneath a stupendous arch of brick, 15 feet high to the crown, and 3 wide, paved at bottom with brick. (Of this a separate plate shall be given in our next magazine.)

Over the point of this arch was this coat of arms cut in stone. On a pile 3 griffins heads, and the hand of Ulster. Crest, a hand issuing out of a coronet. Above this, on another stone,

THE FRAME AND LEAD WERE RAISED
ONE FOOT HIGHER,
ANNO DOM. 1725.

This arch is now continuing under the intended road: for the water is to flow on the present road when properly banked up, for which purpose a hill contiguous is cutting down. This alteration is expected to be three years in hand, to give the more time for the new made channel and road to settle. The house seen over and behind the trough was the residence of Abraham Cressey, many years an industrious and faithful servant of the Company, in overlooking their men within a certain department; and he is now provided with a house on the hill above.

Mr. Pennant* says, "The representative of Sir Hugh Middleton left a widow in distressful circumstances. Sir Hugh left a number of shares of his river to the Goldsmiths Company, to be divided among the poor men; but as the husband of this poor woman happened not to be of the company, the representative of the greatest benefactor London ever had, is, I trust, through ignorance of her case, permitted to linger away her days in cruel penury." All my enquiries, Mr. Urban, of the clerk and several members of that eminent company, have not been able to discover this poor woman. I will, therefore, hope she is better known to the governors of the New River Company; for whom Sir Hugh's skill and public-spiritedness provided such ample incomes.

The house seen at the right corner is the Green Dragon public house, where penny-post letters are received. The wall on the left-hand incloses the garden of the late Samuel Clarke, Esq; deceased, since purchased, with the house, by Mr. Blackburne. The buildings in front are temporary sheds for the workmen.

Yours, &c. D. H.

* Hist. of Wales, II. 30.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 3.
IT is well known to many of your readers what offence was given in the beginning of this century, by an altar-piece erected in the church of St. Mary, White-chapel. In this painting by W. Fellowes, representing the last supper, Judas the traitor was drawn sitting in an elbow-chair, dressed in a black garment, between a gown and a cloak, with a scarf and white band, a short wig, and a mark in his forehead between a lock and patch, and so much of the countenance of Dr. Kennet, that, under it, in effect, was written, The dean the traitor. It was generally said, that the original sketch was for a bishop under Welton's displeasure; which occasioned the elbow-chair. But the fears of a scandalum magnatum rising before the painter's eyes, leave was given to drop the bishop, and make the dean; which he did as well as he could. The print of it in the Society of Antiquaries library is accompanied with four manuscript lines by Mr. Maittaire:

To say the picture does to him belong,
 Kennet does Judas and the painter wrong.
 False is the image, the resemblance faint:
 Judas compared to Kennet is a saint."

The preface to a sermon, preached on the occasion by Dr. Welton, the rector, 1714, intitled, "Church - Ornament without idolatry vindicated," gives an account of the whole affair. By way of defence, Dr. Welton republished "The case concerning setting up of images, or painting of them, in churches, writ by the learned Dr. Thomas Barlow, late bishop of Lincoln, upon his suffering such images to be defaced in his diocess; wherein it is disapproved and condemned by the statutes and ecclesiastical laws of this kingdom, and the book of homilies, &c. Lond. 1714." 8vo. First printed in Barlow's "Cases of conscience. Lond. 1692." 8vo.

It was found expedient to remove the picture, which is supposed to be the present altar-piece of the abbey-church at St. Albans, where tradition ascribes it to Sir James Thornhill. P. Q.

MR. URBAN, Lawriston, Sept. 1.
IT would be obliging if any of your correspondents would communicate a biographical account of the famous projector of the Mississippi Scheme, Mr. Law, of Lawriston; and, if possible, of his descendants, who make a great figure in France at this day. Or, at least, any intelligence in what books, or from what persons, information concerning that family could be got, will be thankfully received. XIMENES.

On the Post and Postage of Letters; and on the Privilege and Modes of Franking Letters.

WHEN any thing falls into disuse, or is required to be performed in a different manner from what it has been, the original method soon becomes forgotten, and after a few years is often very difficult to be ascertained.

It seems to be the province of the antiquary to endeavour, that those who shall live after him may have the knowledge of such variations continued to them by his pen.

Many things, at the time when they are in general use, appear trifling, and unworthy to be even noticed; which, in a few years after they cease to be performed, become matters of curious enquiry.

This is happily not the case with things of real importance; they will always find some one who will transmit them to posterity, though it frequently happens to matters, at the time of their use, of no seeming consequence to the generality of mankind; but to the curious investigator of the customs and manners of former ages, every mean of continuing the knowledge of these seeming trifles is acceptable; and both the person who records, and the publication which admits the account, will hereafter receive the thanks of the ingenious and inquisitive, however insignificant they may appear to the present generation.

It seemed necessary to premise thus much in excuse for what I shall now offer; first, relative to the post and the different rates of postage of letters within the kingdom of England; then, to the privilege and modes of franking letters.

On the Post and Postage of Letters.

THE scheme of a General Post Office for the conveyance of letters was originally set on foot by the Parliament in 1643, on a plan proposed and executed by Mr. Edmund Prideaux, chairman of a committee for regulating the postage of inland letters in 1642; who, on being appointed post-master in 1644, first established a weekly conveyance of letters into all parts of the nation.

In 1657 a regular General Post Office was erected by the authority of the Protector and his Parliament, when the rates of the postage of letters were the same as those continued at the Restoration, which, with those that have been since enacted by various Acts of Parliament in different reigns, are arranged in the following table.

RATES

RATES OF POSTAGE IN PENCE FOR ANY DISTANCE.
Act and Dates.	LETTERS.	Not exceeding one Post stage.	Above 1, not exceeding two Post stages.	Not exceeding 80 miles, but above two Post stages. 5 G. III.	Above 80 miles, but not exceeding 150 miles. 24 G. III.	Above 150 miles.
1657 12 C. II ch. 35. 1660.	{ Single Letter = 1 Sheet Double Letter - Packets of Letters - Packets of Writs, Deeds, &c. per ounce -	— — — —	— — — —	2 4 proportionably. 8	3 6 proportionably. 12
9 Ann. ch. 10. 1710.	{ Single Letter = 1 Sheet Double Letter - Packets of Letters - Packets of Writs, Deeds, &c. per ounce -	— — — —	— — — —	3 6 proportionably. 12	4 8 proportionably. 16
5 G. III. ch. 25. 1764.	{ Single Letter = 1 Sheet Double Letter - Treble Letter - An Ounce - And so on in proportion.	1 2 3 4	2 4 6 8	3 6 9 12	4 8 12 16
24 G. III. ch. 37. 1784.	{ Single Letter = 1 Sheet Double Letter - Treble Letter - An Ounce - And so in proportion for every Packet of Deeds, Writs, or other Things.	2 4 6 8	3 6 9 12	4 8 12 16	5 10 15 20	6 12 18 24

12 C. II. ch. 37. f. 8. Ib. f. 18. No person whatsoever was allowed to set or employ any post whatever for conveying of letters, under a penalty of £5. and £100. a week so long as such person should employ such post, though letters to and from the two universities might be conveyed as before.

9 Ann. ch. 10. f. 3. 31. No persons were to carry letters, except carriers, &c. with goods; though to and from the two universities, they were allowed to be sent and received as formerly.

Ib. f. 39. This additional postage was to continue only for 32 years, namely, from 1711 to 1743, when the old rates were again to take place: but this part of the act was repealed in 1716, 3 G. I.

Ib. f. 40. No letter was to be opened, embezzled, detained, or delayed, under the penalty of £20. except by an express warrant under the hand of one of the principal secretaries of state; for refusal of paying of the postage, or for want of a proper direction, (Ib. f. 30.) and debts due for postage not exceeding £5. were to be recovered before justices of the peace, in the same manner as small debts.

5 G. III. ch. 25. f. 19. 7 G. III. ch. 50. f. 3. All persons intrusted by, or employed in, the Post Office, who shall embezzle any money received for the postage of letters, or destroy such letters, or advance the rate of postage, not accounting for it, shall be guilty of felony. And if any person employed in the Post Office shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any letter, or packet, containing any bank bill, &c. &c. or should steal and take away the same, out of any letter or packet, he shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy.

7 G. III. ch. 50. f. 1. If any person shall rob any mail of any letter, packet, or bag, or should steal, take any letter or packet from out of any mail or bag, or out of any Post Office, or house, or place for the receipt or delivery of letters, although the same shall not appear to be a taking from the person, or on the highway, or in a dwelling-house, or out-house belonging to a dwelling-house, and although it should not appear that any person was put in fear, he shall nevertheless be guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy.

24 G. III. ch. 37. f. 3. 4. No letter is to be rated higher than a treble letter, unless unless it weighs one ounce. Every ounce to be rated as four single letters, and so in proportion for every $\frac{1}{4}$ ounce above one ounce, reckoning each $\frac{1}{4}$ as a single letter.

Foreign letters, suspected of containing prohibited goods, may be opened before a magistrate, and the goods destroyed, and the letters sent to the commissioners of the customs. If no goods be found, then the letters are to be sent as directed.

The letters were originally conveyed in a leather bag, or mail, by a boy on horse-back, at the rate of six miles an hour.

Afterwards small light carts with one horse, driven by a boy, were contrived on most of the great roads for the carriage of the mail; and with those which set out from the General Post Office a guard often attended, as the mail, being generally rich, from the number of bank bills, &c. enclosed in the letters, was sometimes robbed, though the robbers, when taken and convicted, always suffered death, and were usually hanged in chains near the spot where the robbery was committed.

The post-boys who carry the mail have always [or rather used to have] a horn, which they blow on occasion of pursuit of robbers; or as a signal for any persons to make way who may obstruct their journey on the road; or on coming near their houses of call, or Post Offices, to announce their approach. It is likewise of great use if they lose their road in the night.

In August, 1784, a new plan for conveying the mails on the great roads was contrived, and first adopted on the road from London by Bath to Bristol.

The officers of the Post Office contracted with the proprietors of a stage-diligence, which was constructed so as to contain four inside passengers, the driver, and a guard; and to be drawn by four horses, to carry the mail safe, and with the utmost dispatch.

The scheme seems so exceedingly good, that there is very little doubt but that it will be generally established to every city and large town in the kingdom, as at allotted offices on these great roads post-boys on horse-back will be always ready to take and convey the different bags from London, &c. to the proper offices near each great road, and be thence again in time to return them by the same conveyance on its way to London, &c.

The General Post Office in London, from its establishment in 1660 to the present time, stamped every letter which came into it with the month and day of the month with black ink in a circle,

This method is used by no other office; but from the beginning of the reign of Queen Anne the Post Offices, in capital cities and large towns, stamped the name of such city or town on their letters with black ink. This is now done by every Post-Office in the kingdom; some using red, but most of them black ink*. Every office likewise puts a figure on the direction denoting the postage.

By several late legal determinations, the post-masters in every post-town are to deliver all letters and packets in the body of such towns, free of all expence, except the established postage, at the houses of the persons to whom they are directed. And it appears to me that every post-master, who demands any sum above the established postage on the delivery of any letter, becomes subject to the following clause of the Act of 7 G. III. ch. 50. s. 3. "If any person employed in any business of the Post-Office shall advance the rate of postage upon any letter or packet, and not duly account for the money by him received for such advanced postage, he shall be deemed guilty of felony."

It being a custom in many post-towns for the persons who carry the letters out to claim an halfpenny above the established postage, I have inserted the above as a caution to them, and as an information to those to whom the letters are delivered.

On the Privilege and Modes of franking Letters.

I DO not find that the House of Commons, which originally established the Post-Office, claimed any privilege of sending letters from themselves free to others, or of exempting those which they received from payment of the postage. But in 1660 the House of Commons claimed the privilege of letters coming free of postage to and from members of parliament; though afterwards they dropped the claim, upon a private assurance from the Crown, that

* This is an excellent improvement, and many important causes have been determined by it. EDIT.

On the Privilege and Mode of franking Letters.

this privilege should be allowed the members of both houses, and accordingly, a warrant was constantly issued to the Post Master General, directing the allowance thereof to the extent of two ounces in weight.

When this claim of franking letters was first allowed by the King's warrant to the members of both houses of parliament after the Restoration, the method was for the member, if a peer, to write his title only; if a bishop, his christian, or contraction of his christian name, with the title of his see; and if a commoner, his christian, or contraction of his christian name, and surname, usually at the left hand corner of the directed side of the letter, though sometimes on the other parts of the direction, with the word Frank, above, before, or after the title or names, as

Frank

Frank

Norfolk.

Edward Norwich.

Frank Ralph Hare. John Hobart Frank.

The word Frank was afterwards almost entirely disused; and the word Free, written in the same manner, either above, before, or after the title or names, supplied its place, usually also on the left hand corner of the directed side of the letter, as

Free

Free

Townsend.

Wm. Norwich.

Free Jacob Asley.

Wm. Cook Free.

For some years after this privilege was allowed, I have seen no franked directions but what were upon the real letters written and directed by the member who franked them; I cannot however say, that there were no letters from the first allowance, either only directed, or only franked by the members; of this, however, I should be glad to be informed; as likewise (if there were none originally) of the time at which this extension of the privilege of franking blank covers first took place.

I have examined a collection of original letters with post-marks from the year 1669 to 1700; but most of those which were franked were entirely written and superscribed by the person who franked them; the first, which I found only franked, was written and directed by Joseph Usher, agent to the Earl of Clare; on business relative to the then late Duke of Newcastle's funeral, and was dated Aug. 5, 1691; and, what is somewhat remarkable, it is franked on the right hand corner by the Earl: thus,

Clare Frank.

The abovementioned modes of frank- ing comprehend, I believe, the chief variations used during the last century, and likewise in some degree during the reigns of Queen Anne and King Geo. I. though franked covers were then commonly given, and cautions by some members used in their signatures.

In 1715, the annual postage of franked letters would have amounted to the sum of £23,600.

In the reign of George II. members became very cautious in what manner they wrote their titles or names on those covers which they only franked, and gave away, leaving the direction to be written by the person who had procured their signature, as many forgeries and frauds had been attempted; by writing promissory or other notes, &c. over their titles or names, artfully erasing the word free.

One remarkable fraud of this kind was attempted on a frank of Dr. Hoadly when bishop of Winchester, by a clergyman of the county of Suffolk, to whom he had sent franked letters, who wrote a note for a very considerable sum of money over his lordship's signature, cut off the directed part of the letter, carefully erased the word free, and then pasted the remaining part of the cover with the frank and note written over it upon another piece of paper, in order that the doubling of the original franked cover, and the rasure, might not be so readily observed. See a full account of this transaction, vol. XXVII. p. 593.

Noblemen and commoners then used various methods to prevent these impositions.

The peers in different ways, either connecting the word Free with their title, drawing a line through their signature, or confining it between two lines; thus,

Free Grafton.

Free Cornwallis

Free Orford.

Many commoners took the precaution of writing the word Free between their christian and surname; sometimes drawing a line through them; and sometimes confining them between two lines: thus,

Thomas free de Grey.

Free Aug. Murray.

Free C. Firebrace.

Others wrote the word free with their christian name over their surname: thus,

Free John

Turner.

The

The clerks in the secretary of state's office, and in the post office, were permitted to frank votes and news-papers by allowance from their respective principals; and if any person counterfeited the name of any member on a direction, he was liable to be called up to the bar, and there receive the censure of the house.

In 1763, the annual postage of franked letters would have amounted to the enormous sum of £170,700.

The above, I believe, were the various methods used in franking letters till the year 1764. 4 G. III. when an act of parliament passed confirming the privilege of franking, but requiring the whole superscription to be written by the member franking it, unless disabled by bodily infirmity, and then by a person of his appointment, whose name must be given in to the post master general.

The difficulty of writing any note, &c. over the name being now somewhat greater, the members became less cautious; and the peers in general subscribed only their title, some drawing a line through it, and others placing it between two lines, omitting the word free: thus, Reichford.

Bristol Town/bend.

I knew a cautious nobleman who franked his letters on that part of the cover which was between the town or place to which it was directed, and the county.

Commoners also sometimes omitted the word free, and only drew a line through the initial of their christian and surname, or confined them between two lines: thus,

C. Bacon C. Town/bend.

It should be observed, that many peers and commoners wrote their names on franks in a different manner from what they did when they wrote them in their own private character, using flourishes and other devices as marks of distinction.

By this act of the 4 G. III. in 1764,

All letters directed from or to the King;

All letters directed to any member of either house of parliament, at any of the places of his usual residence, or at the place where he should be at the time of the delivery thereof, or at the house of parliament, or the lobby of either house;

And all letters directed to the officers of the Treasury, Admiralty, War Office, General Post Office, Secretaries of State, Paymaster General of the Forces, Clerk of the Parliaments, Clerk of the House of Commons. or upon his Majesty's service, (indorsed by the proper officer, and sealed with the seal of the office) were allowed to go free.

Printed votes or proceedings in parliament, and printed news-papers sent without covers, or in covers opened at the sides, signed on the outside by any member of parliament, or directed to a member at any place, whereof he should have given notice to the Post Master General, were likewise permitted to go free,

The clerks in the offices of the Secretaries of State, Post Office, being licensed by the Secretaries or Post Master General respectively, were allowed to continue to frank votes and news-papers as heretofore, provided they were sent without covers, or in covers open at the sides. But if any paper, or other thing, were enclosed in such printed paper, or any writing were thereon, except the superscription, then the whole was to be charged with postage.

And if any person counterfeited the hand writing of any person in the superscription, in order to avoid the payment of postage, he became guilty of felony, and was to be transported for seven years.

The General Post Office, from the year 1764, stamped the word Free with a greasy red colour, which penetrated the paper, on the face of every franked letter which came into that office, to prevent the same frank from being used a second time; a trick often practised before, either by scratching out the Post Office mark on the back of the letter, or by doubling it in a different way.

The other Post Offices likewise stamped every franked letter with the name of the office on the face of it.

The revenue of the Post Office being still greatly diminished by the immense number of franks which passed through it, the following restrictions relative to franking letters by members of parliament took place on Saturday the 1st of August, 1784, under the act of the 24 G. III. ch. 37. by which it was enacted; that,

S. 7. "No letter or packet sent by the post should pass free, unless the whole superscription, upon every letter or packet so sent, shall be of the hand writing of the member directing the same, and shall have endorsed thereon the name of such member, together with the name of the post-town from which the same is intended to be sent; and the day, month, and year, when the same shall shall be to be put into the Post Office; the day of the month to be in words at length, and the whole to be of the hand writing of the member; and also unless every such letter or packet shall be put into the General Post Office, or other Post Office, or into any receiving house, or place, appointed by his Majesty's Post Master General for the receipt of letters and packets to be forwarded by the post, on the day of the date put upon such letter or packet.

And no letters or packets, directed to any member of either of the two houses of parliament of Great Britain, shall be exempted from paying the duty of postage, unless such letters or packets as shall, during the sitting of any session of parliament, or within forty days before or forty days after any summons or prorogation of the same, be directed to any such member at the place where he shall actually be at the time of the delivery thereof, or at his usual place of residence in London, or at the house of parliament, or the lobby of the house of parliament of which he is a member.

S. 8. And all persons, who by virtue of their offices are authorised to send and receive letters, votes, proceedings of parliament, and printed newspapers duty free, may continue to do so under the same restrictions as members of parliament.

S. 9 If any person shall, from and after the end of this session of parliament (29 August, 1784), forge or counterfeit the hand writing of any person whatsoever in the superscription of any letter or packet to be sent by the post, in order to avoid the payment of the duty of postage, or shall forge, counterfeit, or alter, or shall procure to be forged, counterfeited, or altered, the date upon the superscription of any such letter or packet; or shall write and send by the post, or cause to be written and sent by the post, any letter or packet, the superscription or cover whereof shall be forged or counterfeited, or the date upon such superscription or cover altered, in order to avoid the payment of the duty of postage, knowing the same to be forged, counterfeited, or altered; every person so offending, and being thereof convicted in due form of law, shall be guilty of felony, and shall be transported for seven years.

In consequence of this act, the Post Office has recommended it to the members of both houses of parliament, to write the name of the post-town and the date in words at length on the top of the superscription of their letters, that it may be distinct from the direction underneath; but has given no recommendation how the title or names should be placed.
GENT. MAG. September, 1784.

As this is omitted, I will take the liberty to recommend the following method, as not only the shortest, but the most effectual, to prevent any forgery of a bill or note over the title or name, without being obliged to make a rasure, which will always be visible by holding it up to the light: thus,

{ Norwich, 1784. }
{ Townsend. }
{ Thirty first August. }
{ East Dereham, 1784. }
{ J. Wodehouse. }
{ Sixth September. }

Having thus brought down these accounts to the present time, and noted the principal alterations made at different periods, I must now close this essay; leaving it to some future antiquary to inform posterity of such alterations and improvements as may hereafter take place; hoping that the readers of this paper will excuse me for having taken up a few minutes of their time on a subject, which, though some of them perhaps will think a trifling one, yet others, I hope, will esteem neither useless nor unentertaining. N.

MR. URBAN,

Sept. 6.

FROM the various constructions of the late Act of Parliament on qualified persons killing game by licence, it is astonishing the framers of it have not vouchsafed to step forward, and explain what at present seems to stand in so much need of their assistance.

Some say it has a meaning, while others doubt it. For my own part, I profess myself to be of the former description; and, on a presumption that it has one, I will, with submission to the great wisdom of its authors, endeavour to explain what seems naturally to arise from its particular object and express terms. Its object being, therefore, evidently to raise a sum of money by licence on qualified persons killing game, such persons only, for evading the payment of such licence, are subject to the penalty of 50*l.* The terms are expressly confined to qualified persons; and to suppose that unqualified ones, of whom there is not the least mention in the whole Act, will incur an increased penalty, is as ridiculous as to suppose that the horse-tax was intended to comprehend a tax on air-balloons. From this it must clearly appear, that all former Acts respecting unqualified persons remain undisturbed, and that qualified persons only are the objects of this law. Yours, &c. R.

Remarks on the Spider, and his Air Balloon.

MR. URBAN,

Sept. 16.

THE very extraordinary performance I saw yesterday in the Artillery Ground put me upon sending you the inclosed, and, if you think it will afford any amusement to your readers, please to insert it in your next Magazine, as the spiders ascend, as I have often seen myself, in the month of October. A new set of words is wanting to express the wonderful discovery of Montgolfier. It is degrading to the aerial passengers to describe their gliding in the air by the terms of navigation; the flight of birds comes nearest to it. The word aërostation (weighing the air), which the French have adopted, does not seem very happy, either in sound or meaning. T. H. W.

Many of the inventions and discoveries of men may be traced in similar performances of other animals; the Nautilus sails; Beavers are carpenters; the Martin, or Martlet, builds walls, and turns arches; the Gymnotus Electricus gives the electrical shock; Spiders not only weave, but some of them, with a Balloon made of their web, ascend into the air exactly on the same principles with the present aerial adventurers. As this circumstance of Spiders flying with Balloons has not probably been known, or observed by many of your readers, some account of their method of ascending may not at this time be unacceptable. About the year 1668 Lister informed Ray, that he had seen Spiders dart out of a web, which, being lighter than the air, carried up the Spiders with it. Hulse also acquainted Ray, that he had observed the same; but Lister is by no means willing to give up the honour of the discovery.—The controversy may be seen in length in Ray's Philosophical Letters.

Lister, in his Historia Animalium Angliæ tres Tractatus, says, "what seems incredible, and of which there is no mention among the ancients or moderns, is, that young spiders of a moderate age and size (for I have never observed old ones in the air), commit themselves, by the help of a

"thread, to a gentle breeze, and ascend
"into the air towards the highest "clouds: this is very certain, they "were carried out of my sight, altho'
"I went up a very high tower on purpose to observe them."

In a letter to Ray, Lister says, "Spiders first dart out a line of web, roll it up round, then dart more line, and continue rolling it until they find that they have discharged a sufficient quantity to form a proper ball for their purpose."—He says, "they have also another wonderful property of returning their web into their body again at pleasure."

The philosopher seems as much delighted with the performances of his Spiders, as he would have been to have seen Blanchard or Lunardi ascending. His words, in a letter to Ray, are, "Si mecum fuisses mense Septembri, jucundum diffinno spectaculo te beâssim." "If you had been with me in September, I could have blessed you with this most delightful sight." The webs of flying Spiders, collecting together, form the substance called Gossamer, which, in calm weather in autumn, sometimes falls in amazing quantities. Chaucer, who was a great observer of nature, mentions Gossamer as one of the phenomena unaccounted for:

"As fore some wonder on the cause of thundir,
"Onn ebb and fode, on gossamer, and mist,
"And onn all things, till that the cause is
"will * " The Squier's Tale.

Had Lister been informed of the following passage in Hesiod's Works and Days, he would not have asserted so positively that he was the first person who saw spiders fly.

"Τη γὰρ τοι νῦν νηματ' αἰσιποτητος
"αραχνης,
"Ηματος ἐκ πλεον." Ver. 777.
"Then the Spider flying in the air spins
"his webs at noon."

I am aware that the translators, rendering this passage according to their own notions, say, suspended in the air; but αἰσιποτητος (either from αἰς, the air, and ποταμαι, I fly; or, as Scaliger says, from αἰρῶ, I lift up, and ωρν, flight,) means flying in the air. Hesiod has, elsewhere, κυκλοι αἰσιπο-

* Shakespeare also mentions it:

"Hadt thou been ought but gossamer, feather, air," &c. K. Lear, act IV. sc. 6.
And Molly Leapor styles it,
"Th' autumnal threads that round the "branches flew."

rai, which they properly translate high-flying swans.

But, to relieve some of your readers, who care very little either for spiders, or verbal criticisms, permit me to insert part of a stanza from a foreign poet of the last century, who, imitating Horace, rises boldly in his aerial flight:

"Me quoque desides

"Tranare nimbos, me Zephyris super

"Impune pendere, et sereno

"Calliope dedit ire celo."

These are glowing lines, and yet I dare place those of our own bard by the side of them:

"Thou art

"As glorious to this fight, being o'er my head,

"As is a winged messenger of heaven

"Unto the white-upturned wond'ring eyes

"Of mortals, that fall back to gaze on him,

"When he betrides the lazy-pacing clouds,

"And sails upon the bosom of the air."

MR. URBAN,

Sept 9.

AFTER all that has been said and written respecting the late creation of the earldom of the county of Leicester, shall I transgress too much on your patience, or on that of your readers, by calling their attention again to the same subject, and by making some remarks on the genealogy of De Ferrars, as given in your Magazine for June last?

William Earl of Ferrers and Derby is there said to have married Margaret, eldest daughter and coheir of Roger Earl of Winchester, and is stated to have obtained, by that marriage, the earldom of Leicester; but in this there is a notable mistake, or misrepresentation, which seems to annihilate the claim of the family of De Ferrars to that earldom. The following genealogy is from Burton's History of Leicestershire.

Rob. Blanchmaines, 3d Earl of Leicester, left 1 son and 2 daughters.

Rob. Fitzparnell, 4th Earl of Leicester, died 1206.
f. p.

Amice, married to Simon de
Montfort, in right of his wife
E. of Leicester, in whose family
the earldom remained.

Margaret, married to Saer de Quincey, Earl of Winchester, had
by him

Arabella, mar. to Sir R. Harcourt.

Roger E. of Winchester, who left 3 daughters.

Eliz. de Quincey, mar. ried to Alex. Comin,
Earl of Bucquan.

Helen, married to Alane Lord Zouch, of Ashby.

Margaret, the youngest daughter (who, in the De Ferrars pedigree, is called the eldest), mar. to William de Ferrers, Earl of Derby.

John E. of Bucquan, d. f. p.

Alexander, E. of Bucquan.

Alice, married to Henry Lord Beaumont, in her right Earl of Bucquan.

Catherine, married to David Earl of Athol.

Margaret, married to the Earl of Ross.

From this marriage were descended Ld. Visc. Beaumont, and Th. Beaumont, of Thrinkston, Esq. living in 1677; and there seem to have been other descendants, viz. the families of Lovell, Stapleton, and Norris.

No claim to the earldom of Leicester rests, or was ever supposed to be, in the descendants of Margaret, wife of Saer Earl of Winchester, the common ancestor of all the above families (except that of Montfort). But if any should be, it must be proved that there are no descendants from the families of Beaumont, Lovell, Stapleton, Norris, Athol, and Ross, before the family of De Ferrars can make their claim.

The earldom of Leicester was held by Simon de Montfort, in right of his wife Amice, daughter of the 3d Earl of Leicester, and sister of Margaret, Countess of Winchester; in his family it continued till the battle of Evesham, when Simon, his second son, who had succeeded to the earldom by the cession of his elder brother, being slain, and the family attainted, it reverted to the Crown, and was given to Edmund, second son of Henry III. It continued to be a royal title till the time of Henry IV.; and from that period it lay dormant till 1564, when Robert Dudley was was created Earl of Leicester by Queen Elizabeth. He dying without issue, it was given, in 1618, by King James I. to Sir Robert Sydney, Viscount Lisle, in whose male descendants the claim is certainly vested.

This letter must not be understood to mean any reflection on the present respectable representative of the family of De Ferrars, nor as an attempt to diminish aught from the splendour of his descent. He is by no means a party in the present question. It seems very apparent that he did not consider himself as the legal claimant of the ancient earldom of Leicester, which the zeal of your correspondent would represent him to be, nor was considered as such by the royal donor; for he was created Earl of the "county" of Leicester, and the ancient Earls took their titles from the "town." No offence is intended to him, and surely none can be taken.—A literary contest concerning the very ancient title of Buckingham certainly could not give umbrage to the modern Earl of Buckinghamshire. This letter, I hope, will be the means of reconciling a considerable difference between two very respectable publications, and will consequently rectify an error either in Burton's Leicestershire, or the Gentleman's Magazine.

X.

MR. URBAN,

Sept. 9.

PERMIT me, through the channel of your excellent repository, to perpetuate the memory of a man who obtained the highest reputation in his profession—a man universally confided in, and who never wronged a single confidence. His integrity was so great, that men of all ranks coveted his friendship. His professional knowledge made him the envy of most of his contemporaries; and his works, which he left behind him, carry the highest authority with all the judges, being perpetually quoted in their determinations. Every lawyer will confirm this account, when I mention that great luminary of the law, Nathaniel Pigott, Esq.; of whom I wish your ingenious and learned correspondents to make fuller mention—He flourished in the present century; and, with an unsullied character, acquired an extensive fortune. Happy would it be for mankind in general, if more such characters were maintained in the profession! As a conveyancer, he was more generally consulted than any other of his time. For his great probity and conscientious way of thinking, the highest placed their trust in him. He was indefatigable in his studies, and settled more conveyances than fall to the lot of others. There are extant of his a folio edition of Precedents, and a Treatise on Fines and Recoveries. The latter no man has attempted to correct or alter. It has passed divers editions. He would have been an ornament to the first seat in the law; but, being of the Roman Catholic persuasion, he could not receive those appointments which otherwise would have been the consequence of his learning and excellences. He was a member of the honourable Society of the Middle Temple; and died universally regretted on the fifth day of July, 1737, (see vol. VII. p. 451. of your work). He left one son and two daughters. The former a man of deep knowledge, whose philosophical publications have been numerous; and many of them are to be met with in different volumes of the Philosophical Transactions. The daughters devoted themselves to a religious life at the English Convent at Brussels. The elder, I am informed, is now the lady abbess. The youngest died, some years since, of a decline. Accomplished to the highest degree, and of a frame most delicate, perhaps few surpassed her in personal charms; and of her it may justly be said,

"Grace was in all her steps, heaven in
"her eye;

"In all her gestures dignity and love!"

She is said to have contracted a regard for a gentleman who visited her at the convent, and to have repented too late that she had renounced the world. Mr. Pigott usually resided, when he retired from business, at Whitton, where he died, and was interred in Twickenham church, where a monument is erected to his memory, on which is inscribed the following epitaph:

"To the Memory of
Nathaniel Pigott, Barrister at Law,
Possessed of the highest Character
By his Learning, Judgment, Experience, Integrity.

Deprived of the highest Stations
Only by his Conscience and Religion,
Many he assisted in the Law,
More he preserved from it.

A Friend to Peace, a Guardian of the Poor,
A Lover of his Country.

He died July 5th, 1737; aged 76 Years."

Mg.

MR. URBAN,

Sept. 10.

A GENTLEMAN of very extensive literature, and of great and profound knowledge, especially in the history and antiquities of his country, made to me the following observation: "I think," said he, "by what I can observe of the Editors of the Gentleman's Magazine, since they have altered and enlarged their plan, and by what appears as to the manner in which they conduct it in that part which relates to antiquities, we are approaching very near to something which hath been much wanted in this country, A REPOSITORY, to which may be sent, and in which may be collected, for public reference and use, all the scattered accounts of facts, and of observations on facts, respecting the history and antiquities of our country. There are many notices which have been repeatedly given and made, and again lost and forgotten; many which lie in obscurity, out of which they can never emerge, for want of some such Register or Repository, wherein to place them.—I think," continued he, "that the part of the Gentleman's Magazine which the Editors have allotted to this subject is approaching to something so near to this, and is, if I mistake not, furnished with papers by some such literary correspondents, that I wonder they have not as yet hit upon this idea. A publication of this nature, and in this form, might, in time, become one of the most respectable as well as the most useful collections which the Antiquary or Historian could have to refer to."—This observation made the greater impression on my mind, as I have, for some time, with regret, observed, that the Society of Antiquaries of London have continued their publications through six quarto volumes, without any selection, any plan of arrangement, or any system of profitable order; a mere miscellaneous Magazine of treatises, memoirs, memoranda, letters, fragments, and extracts of letters, of all degrees of authenticity and authority. If they had divided their publications into parts, giving extracts of the minutes of their proceedings at their sittings as to their pursuits of knowledge; if they had given lists (as of a kind of Repertory) of the materials and articles of information which they have, and do, from time to time, receive, but which lie as yet unexamined and for discussion, with a state of Desiderata; and 3dly, in a distinct part by itself, such treatises, memoirs, or letters, as go in form to the investigation and discussion of any subject of antiquity; the world would judge more respectfully of them as a learned body than they do at present.

The Society, by the learned members who compose it, by the collective learning of its Council, is capable of all this. Yet so it is, that from want of some system of proceeding, some plan and arrangement, the Society, as a body, has not reached that degree of utility of which it is capable; has not had that merit with the public which it deserves; has not attached to its administration and its labours that respect which is due to its institution.

Indolence, not to be disturbed in its quiet way of going on to nothingness; pride, not to be interrupted or interfered with; and an oligarchy incommunicable, and not to be controled, hath been the spirit and the ruin of many literary societies. Those who esteem and regard the Society of Antiquaries as I do, will hope that no such temper and spirit will ever enter into it. They will trust that no such ever can.

However, as its publications are as they are, you, Mr. Urban, as Editor of a work professedly intituled A Magazine, have the ground free and open to you to form and publish a Register of the discoveries, or any other communications, which men of learning, not professed antiquaries, but engaged in other studies, and other branches of literature, may transiently make; or such notices and communications as antiquaries, deeply versed in these matters, may suggest in this way, although they are not in the habits of writing and making treatises. You have open to you the making one part of your Magazine A REPERTORY of Antiquity, a Register of Communications and Notices of Discoveries, of Matters as yet undescribed, Points as yet unexplained, or not hitherto discussed: such a Register and REPERTORY of Antiquities as will, in its progress, grow up to one of the most useful Magazines, of this species of knowledge, which is any where to be met with. In the forming such a Repertory, facts must be cautiously admitted, as to the authenticity of them; judiciously selected, as to the use and importance of them; and scientifically arranged, so as to be easily referred to, and applied to all the useful purposes for which history is written, and the knowledge of past times is studied. The Editors of this part of the Gentleman's Magazine have shewn themselves equal to this. And one cannot but have observed that many of the correspondents who have already sent accounts and communications of matters of antiquity are, some of them, gentlemen thoroughly versed in these studies; some of them who, although in these communications they remain anonymous, are authors of very respectable publications in this branch of literature.

When you have once announced to the publick that you mean to form one part of your Magazine into such a Repertory, and that you will carefully register, in their due order, and publish, in their due course, all such notices and communications as shall be sent to you; if, at the same time, you point out to the publick, in some such form as follows, the nature of the materials which will form parts of this store and treasure of information, you will soon find your correspondents increase; correspondents in every degree and quality suited to administer to so useful an institution. Notice of such an institution will excite and call forth the attention of people to such matters or things as may accidentally occur, or be discovered. Many a curious matter has been lost by being neglected in the very moment of its being found; has remained in obscurity from being unnoticed; and from the person, with whom the possession of the thing or matter of information may lie, not knowing where to communicate it; or from its being laid aside, and again buried in oblivion, through want of its being somewhere, in some order, on some decided plan, registered, after it hath been communicated.

When once you give public notice of this your REGISTER, correspondences, such as mean simply to give notice of matters or things newly discovered, or of matters or things long since discovered, but as yet unnoticed, will flow in to you from all quarters. Your Magazine, by its affording easy access to such correspondences, and by its periodical publication, is the best suited for the institution of such a REGISTER and REPERTORY.

The following, or some such description of the sorts of materials of which it will consist, will point out to your correspondents the nature of the correspondence.

Notice and information of matters or things respecting ancient topography, or geography; of changes and alterations which the face of any country hath undergone in its mountains, rivers, ports, harbours, particularly, as far as may be collected from history, record, or tradition, or traced by any vestiges of antiquity; of the drowning of any country; of eruptions; of countries becoming drained from failure of waters which before flooded them; of the growing of soil, as marshes beyond the ancient sea-shores and banks, or of fens within land; the changes of the courses of rivers, and the apparent effect of them; ancient accounts of tides, where they differed from the present state of things.

Accounts and information of the ancient inhabitancy in its successive inhabitants, by colony or conquest; remains of their mode of living and dwelling; Britons; Scots; Picts; Saxons; Anglo-Danes; Normans; their respective peculiarities as to the point of inhabitancy; the progress and improvements in house-building, as to the materials and form; remains of public dwellings and inhabitancy; Pictish, British, Roman, Saxon, Norman, Gothic, Moorish, or Arabesque, or of the beginnings of the introduction of the Grecian and Roman architecture; of pavings, tessellated, brick, tile, plaster, or the introduction of wood-flooring; of ceilings, and specimens or accounts of ancient painted ceilings or walls.

Specimens or accounts of ancient furniture, worthy of notice, so far as it may tend to mark the change of manners, or the progress of what is called Refinement and Fashion.

Specimens or accounts of cloathing, cookery, brewery, confectionary, in general; the table of medicines, which may tend to illustrate the changes and progression of customs, or may recall to memory any thing useful, which may have been lost, or disused from mere caprice and love of change, perhaps for the worse, of which many instances will occur, and some very material ones might here be specified.

Any thing which may recall to memory ancient modes of farming in tillage or grazing, used and useful under former circumstances of the country, and which, though now disused, may become again useful, should the country, by loss of foreign trade, or oppression of taxes, and an emigration or decrease of inhabitants, fall back, in any degree, to its former state.

The ancient modes of internal carriage, by land or by water; herein of river and canal navigation from the time of the Romans. There is a curious clue by which this investigation may be carried back to much earlier times. Notices and information of marine carriage; as also of the progress of marine architecture, and of the nature of the ancient marine navigation.

All notices, or specimens, of ancient mechanics, and mechanic trades and handicrafts; ancient tools (as, for one instance, how and when the chissel succeeded the adze in working stone); of ancient machines, which, though now disused in practice, may not be wholly unuseful, at least to be known; accounts of ancient manufactures, and specimens of their fabrics.

Accounts, or any specimens, of the refined arts in jewellery, embroidery, knitting, and frame-weaving; statuary, painting, and engraving; particularly the illuminator's art.

Ancient music; psalmody; musical instruments; poetry; and stage plays.

Any thing which may give precedents or explanations of our constitution under the Saxons or Danes, or of the revival of it in later times.

State of our constitutional customs, and our modes of the administration and execution of law, and in the usage and maintenance of rights. The state of these matters as found in the law courts, and other jurisdictions, either general and public, or peculiars of local courts, such as ampts, bailliaiges, loes, and other inferior leets and jurisdictions. Any accounts marking, at various periods, the state of our military, and our art of war; our arms, defensive and offensive; our artillery, before and since the use of gun-powder. I should here mention our ancient mode of fortification, but that Mr. King, in his very curious and very learned Dissertation on Ancient Castles, has almost exhausted that subject.

Local and town customs, anciently established, distinguishing those which were grounded in wise policy from those which are derived from the caprice of insolent feudal despotism.

States, at various periods, of our internal trade, &c. &c.

State, at various periods of times, of our internal trade, markets, and marts; of our external commerce and navigation; places to which we traded; manner in which such was conducted; articles of such commerce in each place respectively.

Heraldry; such as marks the alliances and descendants of our Sovereigns, which in part comes under the head of Diplomatic Information; such as marks the history of any family or person, having any reference to the clearing-up any point of history.

Notices of any materials which lie buried in unnoticed places of record, in the treasuries of courts, churches, chapters, or libraries; materials which remain obscure and unnoticed in the several places of our public records.

Articles of biography, respecting the lives of men of any description; of such who have been of any use during their lives, or by their works; of men whose conduct or fate in life recorded, may become useful examples, encouragement, or warning to others.

If the forming such an institution as above suggested may tend to promote useful science and real knowledge in this branch of literature, the writer of this paper, without any predilection between the Archæologia or your Magazine, and totally above all concern of interest in your work, will be happy to have been the instrument of suggesting the plan, and will, from time to time, give his assistance in promoting it.

MR. URBAN,

PERMIT me, through the channel of your most useful Magazine, to submit to the consideration of the Literati my own thoughts on a certain passage in the Works of Horace. In 2 Ep. ii. 15. we find -

"In sculis latuit metuens pendentis habera."

The common interpretation of which is, "He secreted himself through fear of the scourge, which hangs up on the stair-case." Might not one be inclined to think, by the position of the words, we ought rather to read, "He secreted himself under the stair-case," &c.; as perhaps the stair-case may be thought a more likely place for the slave to hide himself in, than for the scourge to be hung upon?

Yours, &c.

R. W.

MR.

Sept. 5.

MR. URBAN,

July 15.

AMONG the titles of a certain great Duke, in the Red-Book, I observe that of Vice Admiral of all America. Is it possible that his Grace should still retain that empty honour? If he does, it is, I suppose, on the same principle that our Monarch is styled King of France, and his Catholic Majesty King of Algiers.

Another question or two I wish to have resolved, viz. On what plea our Royal Dukes (more Germanico or Regio) sign themselves by their Christian names, William, Henry, &c. and not by their titles, like other Peers? This signature surely is regal, or, at least, princely, and, as such, should be confined to his Majesty and the Prince of Wales. It was first introduced, I apprehend, by the late Duke of Cumberland, and when there was no other Royal Duke, no other William, it was attended with no inconvenience, no equivocque. But now, when there are some young princes nearly of age, who have the same Christian names as their uncles, if they sign in the same manner, I should be glad to know how one William, or Henry, in a protest, or any other instrument, is to be distinguished from another? Of the former name there are now three, a brother, a son, and a nephew of his Majesty, for the latter, it seems, is always styled Prince William, though, as a Duke is our highest English title, the Duke of Gloucester's son can (properly speaking, and that by courtesy) be only Earl of Connaught (his father's second title), just as the Duke of Norfolk's is Earl of Surrey. For the same reason, his Royal Highness's daughters, can only be Ladies, not Princesses, a title, which seems exclusively appropriated to those of the King. And thus, which seems a case in point, the two daughters of James II. when Duke of York, though he was heir presumptive to the crown, were never styled Princesses, but only the Lady Mary and the Lady Anne. And I think I can remember, that the daughters of the late Prince of Wales were at first only styled the Ladies Augusta, Elizabeth, &c. Titles of honour, it is well known, do not descend (by courtesy, I mean) farther than to the sons or daughters of peers, unless perhaps we except the eldest grandson*: there-

* Thus, when the old Marquess of Lothian was living, his son was styled Earl of fore the grandson and granddaughter even of a Duke, as such, have no place; and their fathers being Right Hon. only by courtesy, their children cannot properly be styled Hon. a distinction peculiar to those of Peers. For the same reason I should conceive that the son or daughter of a Royal Highness is, properly speaking, only Highness, and whether that should be continued through all succeeding generations, however remote from the throne, I should be glad to know. In France, the Duke of Orleans, as first Prince of the Blood, is, I apprehend, always styled Royal Highness—but quere whether his son, the Duke of Chartres, be Royal or Serene?

Yours, &c.

CRITO.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 17.

AS you thought the account I sent you of the Holly worth inserting in your entertaining collection, I trouble you with some strictures on the Beech.

T. H. W.

FAGUS sylvatica Linnæi; in Saxon Bocce, or Boc-treow; in Danish, Bog; in Swedish, Bok.

The Beech is by far the most beautiful tree our island produces; the foliage of the Lime bears but a faint resemblance of it, and therefore the Beech is much preferable to cultivate in ornamental plantations, and particularly in parks, where the mast in fruitful years will be very serviceable to the deer, but the Lime furnishes nothing towards their subsistence. Beeches thrive best on calcareous hills, and abound on the vein of chalk which runs from Dorsetshire, through Wiltshire, Hampshire, Surrey, Sussex, and Kent, and branches out into Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire; but they are also to be found in almost every county in England.

The foliage is so elegant, that Swift, who seems to have taken but little no-

Ancram, and his grandson (the present Marquess) Lord Newbattle:—and thus the late Marquess of Granby's son (the present Duke of Rutland) was styled in his grandfather's life-time Lord Roos, but the younger son (though Marquesses' sons, when their fathers are Peers, are all titular Lords) was only Mr. Manners, till the King called him Lord Robert; and the present Duke of Bedford's brother (the late Marquess of Tavistock's younger son) was only Mr. Russell, till by a like favour he became Lord John.

rice

tice of inanimate nature, was struck with its appearance: his expression is, "observe how sparkish a periwig adorns the head of a Beech." At present this resemblance is by no means obvious, whatever it might be in that author's time, when our ancestors wore enormous cloaks of artificial hair.

Though we have recommended this tree to be planted for ornament, yet great care should be taken to weed it out of the woods where Oaks thrive; for want of this precaution we have seen woods of Oaks which have been of less value by several hundred pounds from the intrusion of Beeches among them.

There is a custom in several countries of using the leaves of this tree instead of feathers in a bed, and Evelyn approves of them much, from his own experience. They have certainly this to recommend them in preference to feathers, that they may be often changed at little or no expence. It may be proper to observe, in respect to cleanliness and health, that the feathers in a bed are the only parts of it that are never cleaned or changed.

It is remarkable, that in the last year (1783), in which there was an unusually large crop of acorns, scarce any Beech-mast was to be found in many districts; this will be a favourable circumstance to deer and swine, for when both these trees bear plentifully one year, they are generally destitute the next.

Probably the warm countries may have Beech-mast which would furnish oil regularly, but there its use is superseded by the Almond and the Olive. Nature seems to have distributed vegetable oil to the southern climates, and animal to the more northern. Our summers are too uncertain to be depended on for furnishing a regular succession of Beech-mast; Linæus says, it scarce produces any oil in Sweden. Most trees will grow farther north than they will produce perfect fruit.

In the year 1714, Aaron Hill, not being aware of the uncertainty of either the quantity or perfection of Beech-mast in this country, proposed a scheme for making oil from it, by which immense riches were to be acquired: this scheme, though it proved abortive, should not be confounded with the bubbles that succeeded it, for Hill appears to have been a man of probity, but was misled by his sanguine temper. He says, that a bushel of mast will produce two gallons of oil: we believe it must be a very favourable year to produce that quantity in this country. Among the intended applications of the profits of this visionary scheme, one was to pay off the national debt, which, the projector says, was "so prodigious an incumbrance;" at that time about sixteen millions; alas!

GENT. MAG. Sept. 1784.

Though Hill's project did not succeed, which in some measure might be owing to the expensive manner in which it was set on foot, it should not absolutely be determined that this oil may not be made to advantage in favourable years; as it appears, that in Bretagne, which is little more than three degrees south of the vein of chalk in this kingdom, it is the practice of the peasants to supply themselves with this kind of oil.

The plant Buck-wheat (polygonum Fago-pyrum) is evidently so called because its triangular seeds resemble Beech-mast, or, as Gerard calls it, Buck mast. Whether the number of Beeches in Buckinghamshire gives name to that county, is doubtful; but the assertion in Gibson's edition of Camden, that "this shire is always spelt Backingham, with an u, in most of our ancient records," is certainly erroneous, for the title to the chapter of this county runs constantly Bochinghamschire, or Bochinghscire, Domesday-Book; but the orthography of those times is so vague that little can be deduced from it.

The remarkable passage which occurs in Cæsar's account of Britain, "Materia cujusque generis, ut in Gallia est, præter FAGUM, atque abietem," disturbs every reader of his Commentaries who renders Fagus a Beech tree, as it is evident that Cæsar must have marched with his army through the Beechen woods of Kent, whether he passed the Thames or the Medway; but if Cæsar by Fagus meant the same tree as Vitruvius, the difficulty is surmounted, for Vitruvius in the following passages classes Fagus with other kinds of Oaks: "Cerrus, suber, Fagus, quod parva habent mixtionem humoris et ignis et terreni, aeris plurimum, pervia raritate humores penitus recipiendo, celeriter marcescunt." De Arch. lib. ii. c. 9. "Namque de cerro, aut Fago seu Farno, nullus ad vetustatem potest permanere." Lib. vii. c. 1. In the first quotation, Fagus is enumerated among the sorts of Oak improper for building; in the second, Fagus is synonymous with Farnus, the meaning

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 14

I AM fond of dipping into old neglected books, in search of curiosities which escape the eye of common observation. The following piece, not for its merit, but for its singularity, deserves preservation, as it exhibits, in the quaint style of an age more remarkable for pedantry than good learning, the characteristics of a branch of the minstrel profession.

It is extracted from a small duodecimo, entitled, Cures for the Itch, by H. P. dated 1601; containing a miscellaneous collection of Poems, Characters, Epigrams, and Epitaphs; but written without any marks of genius or taste, and fit only for the chaotic regions of oblivion.

Yours, &c.

H. LEMOINE.

Character of a Ballad-maker.

"Is a kind of Owle or Batt that flyeth in the night, and dares not his deformities should appeare by day: Hee's one that, from first shamelesse desperate become of late to bee more impudent, sets this last rest up for his latest refuge. His Primum mobile of ragged ancestry sprang from the patchings of some paltry Poet; whence learning how to rime unreasonably, makes this the Mainc-Mast of his occupation. His choicest plots or grounds to worke upon, are drawn most commonly from theeves and murderers, or such notorious malefactors, as puts him in great hope to purchase forty-pence. His highest ambition he aymes at, is, to be intituled, The Times Intelligencer, or Nuncius of Newes at the second hand. The Punckes late Ballad of the new Bridewell * was his chiefe master-piece that purchast him perhaps a coblers paire of boots ouer and aboue his vsuall bargaining. Hee spends most part of his time in's bed, partly for sauing charge of botching, but chiefly devising what were best to write on, when no one calls on him for whats to pay: Omnia mea mecum, &c. may very rightly be verified in him that hath no riches more then what he weares, and comes to him commonlie by deed of gift. The Alewife is inforst to trust him weekely, and that without all hope of hauing ought vnlesse some Ballad chance to be composed vpon some dismall or doleful accident as may be sung to the tune of welladay. If any thing happen to helpe besides, it must accrew from the next Sessions, provided there be some to trauel westward, on whom he is to make that recantation as if himselfe were the Theame he writes on. No massacre or murder comes to him amisse, but brings sufficient matter for inuention. Wherein he shewes himselfe so nimble, that if any witch bee by chance condemned, hee'l haue a ballad out in print before such time as she goes to Tyburne: wherein all her confession and the manner of her death shall be described by way of Prophecie; witnesse the famous witch of Edmonton, condemned at New-gate about foure years past. No Printer deales with him that loues his credit, but must be thereunto induc'd for want of worke, and then the Presse begins to sweat when monstrous newes comes Trundling in the way; His greatest volume done in Folio is to bee purchast but for two brasse tokens, which either you may please to light Tobacco with, or sacrifice to A-iax for purgation. In briefe, the summe of all his practices is but to shift him sometime in cleane linnen, that he appeare not louzie to posteritie, and so I leaue him."

MR. URBAN,

I Have deferred saying any thing to the fact of Fox-gloves coming up on a sandy common, where the furze had been burnt (p. 326.) in hopes that some of your correspondents might have given a solution to it. For my own part, I am of opinion, that our knowledge is very much confined to fact and experiment; that in many cases we have not made sufficient advances, to give any solution at all of natural phænomena; and that many of the solutions now generally received, are unsatisfactory, and, in an improved state of science, will be rejected.

Such facts as your correspondent mentions have been formerly brought in support of that most unphilosophical doctrine of equivocal generation *; a doctrine which is now dismissed to those obscure regions where dwell fate, chance, occult qualities, the fortuitous concourse of atoms, and the like senseless things, which are the disgrace of science, and serve but as a cloak to ignorance. Indeed, nothing can be more illogical, than to produce our own ignorance, or the difficulties arising from it, against a law which generally obtains. And yet the Deist does this, when he rejects Revelation, because there are some things in it which he cannot account for: the Atheist, when he disbelieves the being of God, because he cannot fully comprehend his nature and attributes.

* This doctrine has lately been revived by Mr. Jackson in Thirty Letters, &c. reviewed in Vol. LIII. p. 332.

* Q. If yet to be met with

Thus much being premised, I beg leave to mention two known facts, of the same kind with that which is recited by your ingenious correspondent.

In the Isle of Ely, whenever any of the fen ditches are scoured, the common mustard (Sinapis nigra Linn.) comes up in vast abundance upon the bank where the mud or new earth is thrown. It is the common notion of that country, that the earth is full of these seeds, and that nothing more is requisite for them to vegetate, than to have this earth brought to the surface in a loose state. The oily nature of these seeds, preserving them a long time from rotting, may perhaps be thought to give countenance to this opinion.

A second fact, approaching much nearer to the case of the Fox-gloves, is this. After the great fire of London in the last century, the ruins were covered with the broad-leaved Hedge-Mustard (Sisymbrium Iris Linn.); a plant which, though generally little noticed, is not uncommon among rubbish, and on walls in the neighbourhood of London. In this case, as well as in that of the Fox-gloves, we cannot have recourse to the solution given above; fire unquestionably destroying seeds, instead of bringing them into a state of vegetation. Fire, however, prepares the ground for the reception of seeds; partly by destroying the grass and other plants which had exclusive possession; and partly by loosening the texture of the earth, and developing salts favourable to the nutriment of vegetables. Thistles, and other plants with downy seeds, generally first take possession of such tracts; and in this case we are at no loss to account for the phenomenon. In other cases, where the wind is not an adequate cause, we have recourse to birds and other animals for the transport of seeds; though the seeds of Fox-glove, being very small and light, might possibly be driven by the wind.

P. B. C.

MR. URBAN,

IN reply to a civil question which I asked, (p. 256.) of your correspondent, T. H. W.* he directs me (p. 486.) to answer a string of questions to myself: from whence, if I am not mistaken, I am to conclude, that the Scotch Fir, Box, and Yew are plants of foreign growth, that have been imported into England like vines, peaches, &c. and like them have sometimes risen spontaneously. I do not see why I might not draw the same conclusion of the Holly as well as of the other three.

Mr. Miller, however, says, that the Pinus rubra is called Scotch Pine (vulgarly Scotch Fir), from its growing naturally on the mountains of Scotland.—Mr. Evelyn affirms, that Box trees rise naturally at Boxley in Kent in abundance, and in the county of Surrey. And Mr. Miller expressly says, that the Yew-trees grow naturally in England.

I know there is a diversity of opinion concerning which of our trees are indigenous, and which not. In many cases this cannot be determined with any degree of certainty, and therefore each party may very well retain its own sentiments. For my own part, when a tree or other plant is found in a wild state; propagates itself spontaneously without any assistance from art; and, if it was originally introduced, there is no tradition of the time when, but it has had possession antecedent to all history or memorials—I look upon this as indigenous.

There was probably a time when this island of ours, now so fertile, had neither tree nor plant upon it. And there certainly was a time when, like other uninhabited, or thinly inhabited, countries, it was almost one continued forest. What trees were first planted by the hand of Nature, it is now hard to say; and whether what Horace observes with respect to words, may not be true also of these——

“Multa renascentur quæ jam cecidere, cadentque

“Quæ nunc sunt in honore.”——

Thus much for the question.—As for the correction, I heartily ask pardon of your correspondent. I set up no claim to correct; and he certainly has a right to go on his own way.—I must, however, observe, not for his information, but that of others who choose to be informed, that Linnæus kept the Holly in his fourth class, though it has the characters of the twenty-third, not for the benefit of students, but because this illustrious Naturalist was more solicitous to preserve the natural genera entire, than the classes of his artificial system. There are several species of Ilex, of which the Holly is one; had Linnæus placed this in the class Polygamia, where it ought to be, according to the rules of his system, and left the others in the class Tetrandria, it might have been commodious for students, but it

* Signed T. A. W. in p. 21. and 256; but T. H. W. in p. 486.

it would have torn a natural genus in pieces. Linnæus's rule in this and the like cases is, to leave the species under their natural genera; and for the benefit of students, to insert the name only in its artificial place, if I may use the expression, in the general table which precedes the class. But, as there is only one species of Ilex growing wild in England, I think Mr. Hudson not only justified, but right, in placing it in the class Polygamia.

That a novice in Botany may find some difficulty, and even be misled, in arranging this and other plants, which, besides hermaphrodite flowers, have male, or female, or both, I allow. If he stumbles first upon a tree bearing hermaphrodite flowers, he will of course search for it in the class Tetrandria, and there he will find it in any of Linnæus's works. But if, instead of Linnæus, he should make use of Hudson's Flora Anglica, not finding it in that class, it will put him upon a more accurate examination; when, perceiving that the antheræ are generally effete, he will suspect that there may be male flowers; but not seeing any upon the tree which he has already met with, he examines other trees, 'till perhaps he finds one which bears male flowers only. He is now no longer at a loss, as knowing that, according to the laws of the artificial system, a plant that, besides hermaphrodite flowers, bears male, or female, or both, ranges under the class Polygamia, and accordingly there he finds it in Mr. Hudson's book, and also in the table at the head of the class in Linnæus's Systema Vegetabilium.

Thus the Holly may be ascertained in Linnæus's System as easily, I think, as in those of Tournefort, Ray, or Haller. In Gerard or Parkinson, I know not any other mode of finding it, but by turning patiently over the leaves, or looking in the Index. If, after all, there be any perversion in putting the Holly in the class Polygamia, thou canst not say I did it; for its character was first announced in the Philosophical Transactions. Mr. Miller has observed that it should be placed in the class Polygamia; and Mr. Hudson has actually put it there.

It would certainly ill become me to imagine that I understand the system of Linnæus better than, or even as well as, the late illustrious author of it. But, having studied it between 30 and 40 years, and having publicly taught it more than 20, I may without arrogance range myself on a line with the other persons whom your correspondent has mentioned.

For the same reason it may be presumed that I know what is meant by diocious plants, of which the Holly is not one. Diocious plants are such as bear male and female flowers only, on distinct individuals of the same species. Polygamous plants are such as have hermaphrodite flowers always, and accompanied by male or female flowers, or both, either on the same individual, or on distinct individuals of the same species.

After all, I beg leave to say that I think your correspondent's dissertation (p. 21.) very ingenious; and that I was much satisfied with his emendation of the famous song in Shakspeare.

P. B. C.

MR. URBAN,

HAVING lately been favoured with a sight of five very capital paintings of subjects in the East India Company's territories, I cannot forbear gratifying your readers with some account of them.

They are the work of Mr. W. Hodges, who accompanied Capt. Cook in his second voyage 1772, and has since undertaken a tour to the East Indies, and has chosen for specimens of his skill:

The city of Agra, two views;

The mausoleum of the Emperor Akbar at Agra;

The palace of the Nabob of Oude;

The fortrefs of Gwalior, deemed impregnable till surprised and scaled by the English, 1780.

The city of Agra, capital of a province of that name on the river Semaria*, a branch of the Ganges, was founded in 1566, by Sultan Akbar, grandfather of Aurengzeb. It is larger than Dehli, and has more houses of the great lords and nobility, but is not walled, nor are the streets so regular or spacious.

The mausoleum of Akbar, who died after a reign of 50 years in 1605, was erected by his son Jehan Guir. Bernier† neglected to describe it, preferring to it the magnificent tomb which Shah Jehan his grandson, who removed the seat of empire from Agra to Dehli, erected in a splendid garden in the same city, to the memory of his beautiful consort Taje Mehalé; which, Mr. Frazer says, cost 60 lacks of rupees, or £75,000: a vast dome of white marble, supported by four great arcades, three open, and the fourth closed by the wall of a saloon and gallery, where the Mullahs read the Alcoran daily in honour of the deed. The centre of these arcades is enriched with tables of white marble, in which are set great Arabic characters of black marble. The whole building is covered with jet, jasper, and various other precious stones, set in variety of patterns; and the pavement is formed of squares of black and white marble. Under the dome is the tomb in a small apartment, opened but once a year, and inaccessible to Christians: Shah Jehan himself was buried in it*.

* Ganges; Bernier.

† Vol. II. p. 89—96.

The tomb of Akbar is composed of various arches exactly resembling what we call the pointed Gothic; and on each side behind it rise two pillars of white marble, I think, fluted, and surrounded by galleries and embattled.

The fifth represents the once impregnable fortress of Gwalior, surprised by Major Popham, Aug. 4, 1780, 900 miles from Calcutta, and since yielded by treachery to the Mahrattas. It is a long range of fortifications on a long insulated rock, appearing at a great distance, and was the place of confinement for deposed princes, and other unfortunate obstacles to ambition. A drawing, by J. Hickes, was sent over, and engraved at Governor Hastings's expence, by Hearne and Byrne, and published by Col. J. Rennel, pr. 10s. 6d.

In the committee-room at the E. India House are drawings of the following places in the Company's territories:

The mausoleum of Leir Shah.

A choultry for travellers.

South entrance of Seringham pagoda.

The rock of Trichinopoly.

The choultry of Seringham.

The bath at Chillimbrum.

The east face of Madura.

The rock of Virra Mally.

Some of your correspondents may be induced to give you a better account of all these.

ANTIQUARIUS LONDINO-INDICUS.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR query, p. 501, when the office of champion was removed from Tamworth to Scrivelsby, may be answered from Sir W. Dugdale's Warw. p. 1134. 2d edit.

Baldwin de Freville exhibited his claim to be the king's champion at the coronation of Richard I.; but Sir John Dimock, being then his competitor, carried it from him, by judgement of the then constable and marshal of England, in regard he was possessed of the lordship of Scrivelsby, which, by better authority than Freville could produce, appeared to have been held for divers ages by that service; and that the Marmions had the said office as owners thereof, and not in right of Tamworth Castle, it being descended to Dimock with Scrivelsby, from an heir female of Sir Thomas Ludlow, knight, husband of Joan, youngest daughter of Sir Philip Marmion, who died 20 Edw. I. (MS. in Offic. arm. H. 13. f. 321. Esc. 23. Ed. III. Fin. levat. term. Mich. 1 Hen. VI. Linc.) By the pedigree of Marmion, in Dugdale, Ib. p. 1135, Joan was the only daughter of Sir Philip by his second wife.

MR. URBAN,

I Herewith send you some account of the Italian Poplar. I am sensible that it is far from perfect, and should be obliged to any of your correspondents who would make it more so, by supplying the deficiencies, and by that means encouraging the cultivation of a tree both ornamental and useful.

T. H. W.

Observations and Enquiries concerning the Lombardy, Po, or Italian Poplar.

The Italian Poplar has been known but a few years in this country, although at present it is become such a favourite tree in the environs of London, that almost every house is ornamented with it. Whether it is a different species, or only a variety of the Black Poplar, has not yet, I believe, been ascertained; its foliage can scarce be distinguished from that tree; but its manner of growth is very different. The Italian rises, like the Cypress, into a sharp cone; and the Black Poplar spreads the surface of its branches nearly into a semi-circle. It is extraordinary, that a tree so easily to be procured as the Italian Poplar, and cultivated without the least difficulty, should have escaped the observation of Ray, Wheeler, and many other botanists and travellers who had visited Italy, and turned their thoughts to ornamental gardening. It may not be improper to observe, that this, like other aquatic trees, thrives best near the water, but will not succeed, if the roots are constantly, or too long covered with it; many plantations in watery places have been lost for want of attending to this circumstance.

Lord

* Frazer's Hist. of Kouli Khan, p. 25.

Lord Rochford introduced this tree from Turin about twenty-five years ago, in the form of small cuttings. I have measured his trees at St. Osyth, in Essex, and find the largest to be nearly five feet in circumference, three feet from the ground, and, by conjecture, seventy or eighty feet in height. There were originally about thirty trees, but nearly half of them have been removed. It does not appear that his Lordship had any intention of applying them to useful purposes.

This tree, like the rest of the poplars, according to the Linnæan system, is diœcious, (i. e. having male bloom on one plant, and female on another). The only tree I have seen in bloom was a male, and, as it is increased by cuttings, it is not improbable that there is not a female plant in the kingdom; but some of your correspondents may perhaps be able to ascertain this circumstance. Besides the quickness of its growth, which so particularly recommends it, scarce any tree is planted large with equal success. The cuttings of this poplar seem to produce the quickest pole for hops of any tree; but whether it will bear crowding close enough together to be advantageous, or spring again like other coppice wood, cannot yet be known, it having been hitherto planted only for ornament.

As there has not been time to make many observations on this tree, since it has been in the hands of the public, it may not be improper to add some extracts from an account published* by an inhabitant of Burgundy, where this poplar has been cultivated many years.

"The Italian Poplar requires no care, or attendance, and flourishes on the banks of rivers, and in places that will produce nothing else. It thrives most in marshes, which will not without great expence bear corn, or make pasture ground; and it grows with such great quickness, that in fifteen years it is larger and taller than any other sort of poplar is in thirty; some of the Italian have in twelve years been six feet in circumference, full eighty in height, and in fifteen years were fit to be felled as timber. A plantation of an (English) acre of this tree would pay the proprietor in fifteen years about one hundred and fifty pounds sterling." This is a very advantageous crop considering that there is little, or no expence after the first year. "This Poplar grows so fast, that it will in fifteen years be equal to a thriving Oak of one hundred and fifty. So that whilst an Oak is felled once, Italian Poplars may be cut ten times. Neither are all the merits of this tree confined to its growth; the many excellent qualities of the wood make it also very valuable. It is worked with great ease, is pleasant under the tool, without knots, and is equally good for joiners, carpenters, or cartwrights work. Very serviceable beams of a considerable length, and planks of all dimensions, are made of it. This wood may likewise be wrought into very flexible shafts for carriages, and even stocks, or fellies for wheels; also it is very proper for the masts of ships, which we so much want in France, and which we are now obliged to procure from abroad at a great expence. This tree would likewise be a great resource to this province (Burgundy), where the scarcity of timber for building increases daily; and the advantages that would accrue to the state from it would be inestimable." The writer adds, that in two years cuttings would make trees ten or twelve feet in height, and eight or ten inches in circumference at the bottom. He also proposes a scheme for nurseries in every province, that the plants may be distributed through the kingdom.

This tree flourishes more in Burgundy than in England, probably because Burgundy is nearly in the same latitude with the northern parts of Italy, where this poplar seems to be indigenous; the extent of its growth from a cutting at a village in Hampshire, in eight years, is forty-three feet in height, and two feet two inches in circumference, two feet from the ground. A small tree, planted near London nine years ago, is now two feet ten inches in circumference, three feet from the ground, and full forty-five feet in height. But after making proper allowances for the difference of climate, and perhaps also for the sanguine expectations of a native of Burgundy, there is little doubt but that this tree may be cultivated to advantage in England, either as underwood, or as a kind of timber, exclusive of its elegant foliage, and singularly beautiful appearance, which recommend it for ornamental plantations.

Persons in advanced life need not feel themselves restrained by the disheartening reflections that arise in planting trees of slower growth. In a few years their cuttings of this poplar will be real trees; "et dubitant homines serere?"

* By Monsieur Bolet, printed at Dijon, 1766.

BIOGRAPHICAL ANECDOTES OF THE
LATE LEARNED ABBÉ WINKELMAN.

(Continued from p. 575.)

"IN the middle of September I go to Naples, and thence, with a draughtsman, into Sicily to Girgenti and Catana, where there are many Greek earthen vases, 700 in the hands of Prince Bucari, and the rich Benedictine convent. Perhaps I may make something of my little voyage: for much remains unobserved by the Italian monk*, and the learned Dutchman†.

The 2d volume of Martorelli's "Antichita Napolitana," intitled "Gli Euboeici," contains an infinite fund of knowledge, and a new species of criticism.

1759. "M. Stosch declared himself my friend the moment I came to Rome, and continued so till his death, and introduced me to Card. Albani. Stosch's collection of precious stones, antique pastes, and some modern impressions from the rarest stones, exceeds 2500, exclusive of the cameos. The king of France's cabinet cannot be compared with it. The famous Barberini collection is a treasure which neither I, nor any body, nor the possessor himself, know any thing of. Card. Albani once saw something of it when he was a young man, but never could get a second sight of it; for the stones are done up in bags, and not even mounted: yet the cardinal knows that among them there are 80 with the names of the artists. I cannot undertake a catalogue raisonnée of Stosch's collection now in the hands of his residuary legatee, M. Murell, son of his sister, who married Professor M. of Berlin. I am to have the inspection of Card. Albani's precious library and cabinet of antiquities as soon as I get to Florence; and I have thoughts of a little voyage to Greece. The Etruscan stones are the scarcest.

"How did the ancient horsemen mount their horses? As we do now, it will be said; and for this purpose there were stones by the road sides. But it appears, by those between Terracina and Capua, that these stones were not high enough for that purpose: and what would they do in an open field, or in battle? They had a rest on their spear to help them; and they mounted, not as we do on the left side of the horse, but on the right. This piece of information we get from two intaglios in the Stosch cabinet. We there see too, that the arivys of Homer,

Il. E. 728. to which the reins hung, were not semicircular, as Clarke, after an old scholiast, translates it, but shaped like a steel spring.

"The voyage to Greece would take at least a year; for not an island must be left unvisited. Elis must particularly be examined, since no modern traveller has explored it. Fourmont tells us, he was recalled just as he was on the borders of that country 1728.

"In Pompeii, 1768, they found in an apartment of the gymnasium, which is to be the winter's search, a skeleton of a horse in harness, well preserved, except the wood of the saddle, which was rotten: by the side of this room, in another, was the skeleton of a warrior, with his helmet on; and the body of a woman in a garment bordered with gold. It will not be easy to get a description of all these discoveries, even from the court of Naples, as there is no one equal to the task. In the fifth volume of the Herculanean Museum, which contains the bronze busts, are such gross mistakes, that I cannot help noticing them in the new edition of my History of Art. Such also is the effect of jealousy, that I was not allowed to make a sketch of a fine and informing statue, found after a violent shower at Baia, where are buried treasures of antiquity, which no one is allowed to dig for, though it cannot be repaired without being previously explained.

From his letters to the Baron Reidesel.

"Nicolo Castellani, of one of the best families at Florence, who was in my time but 16, but is now at his full growth, has lost much of his beauty. He is certainly but little known, for the Florentine women find no beauty but in the inanimate countenance of an Englishman. The purest and most fixed ideas of beauty must be formed from works of marble, among which must be reckoned the head of a young Faun, with two small horns in front, lately found, 1763. It is now in the possession of Cavaceppi; but all soon become the property of some Englishman, for who will or can pay for it but an amateur of that nation? For it were found all the pieces wanting in the great marble vase of the villa Albani, representing the labours of Hercules.

"Vasari, in his Life of Raphael, speaks of a pretended portrait of that painter, or rather of Bindo Altoviti, to be seen in the latter's house at Florence. This is enough to convict the Florentines of ignorance on this subject. I think they will not attempt to contradict the writers who

* Fazelli.

† D'Orville. Elsewhere he says of him that "he was but a divine."

GENT. MAG. Sept. 1784.

who were personally acquainted with Raphael, as it is certain Altoviti was. In a little time Benvenuto Cellini* will scarce be known at Florence itself.

“A Mosaic of four delicate figures in masks, playing on various instruments, two palms high and wide, with the name of an artist, unknown before, Dioscorides of Samos, in black characters.

“The best thing in the palace Grimani is a statue of M. Agrippa, engraved by Pococke, in his Description of Europe, II. p. 212. pl. 97. The collection is said to have come from Greece; but I believe they were collected here by the cardinal of that name.

1763. “I had the honour to read before the pope and a numerous assembly, for which I had his holiness’s ordinary benediction, my Dissertation on a work representing the death of Agamemnon: the designs are all by Casanova, who is to be at all the expence, and they must be good.

“They expect at Florence the King of England’s brother, the Duke of York, whom I shall probably accompany at Rome. I hope he will have more perception than the Duke of G[ordon], or I shall make a poor figure. They will shew him all suitable honours as brother to the Elector of Hanover. I have talked with him, but had nothing else to do with him, for he would not see any thing; and staid but twelve days at Rome. There were 200 coaches at the feast which the cardinal gave him.

“They have discovered a gate of Pompeii; and, since this event, the number of workmen is increased from 8 to 30.

“A number of ancient inscriptions on marble have been used for corner stones at Ulric’s Gate at Augsburg.

“Among the English at Rome are Lord Spencer and his lady, with a great suite. She is the handsomest woman of her nation that I ever saw before; but there are many women at Rome as handsome.

1764. “Jenkins, the English painter, has a cameo, the head of Caligula, with the name of the artist Dioscorides (see above), which is one of the finest cameos I have seen in a thousand. Those in the palace Piombino are the largest and finest collection in Italy.

“They are now digging in the city of Pompeii, and have found two magnificent buildings, the court of one entirely Mosaic. You see also the city gate. On one side are tombs and semicircular steps (gradins); and on the other a great subasement of 25 palms, on which was probably placed an equestrian statue; for as the city suffered by an earthquake before the eruption of Vesuvius, it was partly depopulated, and they had time to carry away the valuables, even the paintings from the walls of rooms, and many bronze hinges. In a villa, near Naples, was found in my presence, Feb. 28, 1764 another Mosaic, like that before described, with the same artist’s name, Dioscorides of Samos. I shall add these particulars to the second edition of my Herculanean Discoveries, which will probably appear next Michaelmas.

1764. “Jenkins has found, I know not in what house at Rome, a Venus, that surpasses all the other Venus’s, even that at Florence; and is worthy the chisel of Praxiteles†. It represents a young girl at full growth; and is so well preserved, that it wants only two fingers. Montagu writes to me from Aleppo, that he could see nothing in Egypt because of the narrow roads of the Arabs.—Stosch is gone to Constantinople, and writes, that this celebrated Montagu has carried off the wife of the Danish consul at Alexandria. He sent him away for Holland, or rather persuaded him to settle his affairs. Some months after his departure, Montagu produced a letter, informing him of his death, and married his wife, whom he now carries with him into Syria. But the Danish resident received news that the consul was very well in the Texel. Montagu wrote to me from Alexandria, and I have taken his advice about my Essay on Allegory, which will shortly go to Dresden to be printed, but without

*A. Lessing could no where in Italy meet with the original edition of this great artist’s Two Treatises on Statuary, Florence, 1568, 4to. The 2d edition, Florence, 1731, has a good preface, with many curious anecdotes of his life and works; and a short piece of his on the Principles of the Art of Drawing. His Life by himself was printed at Naples, 1730, 4o, written with great fire and spirit, and full of anecdotes, both of the state of the art and the history of his own time.—A copy of the Treatises above-mentioned was sold in Mr. Crox’s sale last year for 10s. 6d. The late Mr. Cole used to lament the melting down a fine basin and ewer of Cellini’s among the plate at King’s College, Cambridge, to substitute others of more modern fashion. EDIT.

† Q. Is this the fine Venus dug up in Monte Caelio, 1761, of which see Archæol. l. 1. 335—336, where is a letter about it from Jenkins himself? EDIT.

my name. You have perhaps seen my life and character printed separately*. It is the work of a poor miserable ignorant pedant, from whom nothing better can be expected; he had but a slight acquaintance with me till I went to Saxony, and mistakes even these facts. The English Royal Society at Gottingen have chosen me one of their members 1765. The count de Linden is influenced by a mercantile motive in his proposal†, which I cannot accept. As to the life of Hedlinger, I had indeed promised old Fuesli to write a preliminary discourse for it; but as I cannot judge of this artist's merits by three little medals sent to me for that purpose, I withdraw my promise. The fourth volume of the Herculaneum pictures will be published. I have not quarrelled with good father Della Torre, as I know, by his own verbal declarations to several persons. He wishes, however, to drop our correspondence, because I have offended the court by my "Letter on the Discoveries at Herculaneum." Two scandalous pieces have appeared against that work; one by my pretended friend the Marquis Galiani. But they do so little credit to the age and the court, that it is positively said Tannucci has suppressed the whole edition.

"I write to day to Wilkes at Geneva, to which place he came from Naples. He denies all the story of his carrying off the dancer Corradini. I cannot help mentioning his mistaken judgement. This Englishman has no better knowledge of this nation than from the French, whom he has seen in Italy, and has made no acquaintance with any man of merit. Montagu will be here in a few days; but as he fears his scandalous behaviour at Alexandria may be known, he desired a room for a few days among the Maronite monks, to whom I introduced him, that he may be perfectly incognito; but this was refused him. He wrote to the abbot, that he wears a long beard, and has an Arab for his servant.

"Your account of your Sicilian expedition has given me a stronger desire to undertake this journey than all I ever heard. Byres and his companion did not find the same hospitality as you; and I can easily guess the reason, if it be true. For a being so silent, so restless, and so weak, would not induce me to offer him my house and my table, and all the English in general indulge an aversion to this nation.

"I have entirely disengaged myself from the Vatican, and have declared that I will no more receive the wretched rewards bestowed at Rome.

"A young merchant of Marseilles, who has spent some years at Constantinople, with a good collection of books, and has run over Greece, offers to contribute all in his power to my undertaking a voyage thither. He is perpetually representing the great beauties he has seen there, and wishing me to see them‡.

Acknowledging Mr. Reidesel's offer of the journal of his voyage into Sicily, [which was printed and translated into English, by Dr. Forster, 1773, 8vo.] he says, "I have received from a friend the first volume of the Academy of Sciences of Palermo, in which is an antiquarian tour in Sicily, by a person of some consequence in the country; but it is as meagre as that of Fourmont, in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. I wish for drawings of some of the finest earthen vases that you have seen; but this will be very hard to obtain for want of a draughtsman||."

1767. He speaks of a book which he had presented to Lady Orford, in return for her protection against the Marquis Tannucci at Portici. Afterwards he adds, "My lady trifles; I know not the price, and I do not sell what cost me nothing. But Freeman should have paid me two sequins, while he maintains, in a letter to Jenkins that I have made him a present of it. I wish it was in my power to give it to this lady with all the corrections and additions I have made in it. I beg she will accept it, such as it is, as a mark of my attachment.

"If any thing can be considered as perfect, my History of Art will be so.

"I received yesterday a very friendly

* Intituled, "Abridgement of the History of the Life and Character of M. le President and Abbé Winkelman, Rome, 1764," in French, without place, an 8vo leaf. In the preface, it is said, that these memorandums were taken from the Literary Mercury of Altona, where they were inserted by the rector Paalzou, of Seehausen, formerly Winkelman's colleague in that city.

† To print all W's works at his own expence, with as many plates as he desired.

‡ This was certainly M. Guys, of whom we have literary works much esteemed.—The 2d edition of his "Voyage littéraire de la Grèce," enlarged to four vols. 8vo. with the addition of other works, and cuts, was published at Paris 1733.

|| This want we may hope to see supplied in the course of Mons. Houel's curious "Voyage Pittoresque de la Sicile," of which only 14 numbers are yet imported.

letter from John Wilkes, at Paris, in which he tells me, that his "History of England from the last Revolution," will probably appear next year. He has not yet forgot his fair one: who, he tells me, is supposed to be at Genoa.

"I am pleased at the arrival of Mr. Hamilton at Rome, and to see somebody with whom I can converse to the purpose about antiquity, and who does not perpetually throw in scruples of conscience and theological considerations, as a certain person of our acquaintance.

"I long to see the eastern part of Sicily, if Prince Bucari will give me leave to draw some of his vases; for I flatter myself the Benedictines of Catana will permit me.

"The celebrated Baron Bielefeld of Berlin has offered to undertake the sale of my work in Germany, and I shall send him 50 copies.

"The king of Prussia has written to me by M. Catt his thanks for my books and the letter that accompanied them, and his favourable opinion of my abilities, and how much he wishes to have me with him. Stosch had delivered to him my "Monuments," and all my other scratches.

"Reifflein thinks he has observed a fresh aversion to me rising among the blockheads [ignares] here. This must probably be ascribed to J, who has prejudiced against me a foreign minister, which is certainly the cause of Mr. Hamilton's coldness to me. I shall, however, write to Mr. Hamilton, to thank him as I ought."

VOL. II.

Speaking of one of his works, which he was printing 1758. he says, "I shall insert in the notes some passages in Greek from Plato and Aristotle. If we had good types. I would add more. Since the time of Robert Stephens, a good taste in this art is lost, and there is no more light and shade in these types. The abbreviations contribute to a beautiful form when executed with roundness and grace. In time I may print something in Greek. The Leipzig booksellers fancy their Constantine Porphyrogenitus is a masterpiece of Greek press-work. The Glasgow printers think the same of their types. But in my opinion the contour of this character is meagre and pitiful. There is a certain imperceptible height and hollowiness, which gives a grace to characters, which few people can attain, and which always shews the great master in all arts, as R. Stephens was in printing.

1758. "You reckon too much on me for your son in England. I am little known there, and I avoid that unhospitable nation as much as I can.

1761. "Two admirable ancient paintings have been dug up near Rome: the story of Erichon delivered in a basket by Pallas to the daughters of Cecrops, and a dance of three beautiful Bacchantes. An English traveller* thinks he has discovered a bust at Turin covered with unknown characters, the true Egyptian one, which have a great affinity with the ancient Chinese, and is printing something on the subject. There are arrived at Leghorn 20 great cases of Egyptian antiquities, which the king of Sardinia has dug up in Egypt.

"The temple of Apollo at Terracina, is not the church, but great pillars of white marble on a basement of the same.

"My friend, Giacomo Martorelli, is an arch pedant. His piece "De Theca calamaria," was suppressed for his indecent criticisms on Martorelli. The greatest compliment you can pay P. de la Torre, so well known for his knowledge in natural history, mathematics, and all arts and sciences, and for his excellent History of Vesuvius, is to ask him to shew you his medals. The fine Mercury has been sent to Camillo Paderni since my time; but I have formed an exact idea of it from his description. It has little roses in the form of buckles on the straps of his wings under his feet, though the straps are fastened upon the instep, as if to shew that the god was not made to walk, but to fly.

"Much caution is to be observed about gems at Venice. The cameos of Zanetti, described in a folio by Gori, are almost all modern.

"Giacomelli's beautiful translation of the Loves of Chaereas and Callichoë, 1756, kept me up a whole night reading it.

1761. "Mengs has been invited to Spain, as first painter to the king, with an appointment of 8000 crowns, a house, and a carriage, with the king's livery.

"I cannot procure you Strange's prints; for I do not believe he sells them; and I never spoke to him but once at the English coffee-house. Le Roi has been refused in a great work of Piranesi on Architecture, in Latin and Italian, which is all finished, except the portrait of the pope, to whom it will be dedicated. The price will be five sequins. I don't see how it is possible to speak of Pliny's country house, and its pretended ruins. I fear the work will be like that in folio on the same villa by an Englishman, whose name I don't recollect. Felebien has also written on the subject.

* Mr. Needham. This occasioned a literary controversy between him and Wortley Montagu. Esst.

"Count Caylus is mistaken, for want of sufficient information on the matter. I must know more than he, and all the artists at Rome; and what I advance thereon is not mere gratis dictum. Here he would be obliged to come to school again. My treatise on Beauty, for example, in 6 leaves, will not consist in mere conjectures, as time will shew.

"M. Diel, of Marseilles, died suddenly Aug. 1761, without discovering his secret to any, though many persons are endeavouring to find it out. Pacciaudi is at Naples, and setting off for Parma, to be librarian of the books that are to be bought, and director of the antiquities which are to be found. Card. Pallione's library consists, as they say, of 32,000 volumes; the pope has offered as many crowns, which he thinks too small a sum.

1762. "I have been at Portici, and have seen more than I expected; and heard many things that are made a mystery of. I have brought home many sheets of observations, which will help to form a work on Herculaneum, of which the outline is in my head. Many new observations and discoveries will oblige me to make a great change in my History of Art. The principal late discoveries are four most beautiful little pictures, which have been cut from some other place, and probably in Greece. They are the only Greek works I know, and I think them worthy the pencil of a great artist. Among near 30 plates are two ancient paintings, which have been found in a stolen manner, and smuggled hither. I have engraved them on two large sheets, and, though only outlines, being all that the draughtsman could get by a very great favour, they are admirably fine*.

"Here are now two Englishmen, who have undertaken great journeys. One is Adam, a simple squire, who maintains an able architect, a good engraver, and two draughtsmen, to accompany him to Greece. He has published, in many magnificent plates, the palace of Diocletian at Salona, with a description in English, which he has shewn me in MS. written as I should wish to have written it myself. The other is the Chevalier Montagu, M. P. and of the Royal Society of London, a gentleman of about 47, who spent some time in his youth at Constantinople with his father, the same whom Voltaire† mentions about inoculation. He is well made, and speaks the English language‡. He intends spending a whole year in Egypt and Arabia, particularly on the banks of the Red Sea, to make observations of all kinds. I have formed a great intimacy with him. He has begun to let his beard grow, and is soon to set out for Egypt, and stay two years. Mengs cannot stay in Spain, and his letters are filled with complaints. The great ceiling here is now about, 45 Roman palms square, is the apotheosis of Hercules, and will contain above 60 figures. I think he will go to England before he comes to Rome, where his wife has not the respect she requires. Every body lives here by working for the English.

"My letter on the discoveries at Herculaneum is just published. When the edition is sold off, I shall give a complete work on the subject. I have already begun to think of an "Allegory for Artists."

"Marc Antonio's prints are so scarce here, that they are worth their weight in gold. I wonder any are to be met with. Engravings find the best market in England. The English soon grow tired of what they carry home. They make presents of them, and then they are sold. Prints sell so dear here, that I have seen Raphael's Holy Family, by Dorigny, fetch 15 crowns. You may judge if these engravings are dear, since the king of Poland wants three complete collections of the works of M. Antonio, and his minister as many.

"The Mercury in the cabinet of Portici is certainly beautiful; but as it is of bronze, its rarity enhances its beauty, and makes it appear finer than a Mercury can possibly be, which can never equal the Apollo Belvedere, nor the Medicean Bacchus. If this figure could have warmed my fancy, I should not have neglected the opportunity of exercising it. If my friend at Portici had not watched me so close, I should have had more interesting matters to write about. You cannot conceive what it cost me to obtain leave to see the works underground; and I am sure this favour has been granted to none but myself.

"I expect the third volume of the Herculaneum paintings, in which the vain Pacciaudi is attacked in a violent manner, and very extraordinary for the civilized age we live in. Prince Fran-

* These are the fictitious drawings of two ancient paintings given by M. Casanova to W. who, in a letter to Hayne before cited, complains of the trick.

† In his Letters on the English nation. Letter XI.

‡ Was there any wonder in his speaking his own language?

cavilla did all he could to avert the terrible blow; but Tannuci was inexorable. He and I are at open war; and I shall go no more near him; for, notwithstanding our correspondence, he received me in such a manner, that nothing can engage me to go again.

"Here is a lord Baltimore, proprietor of all Maryland in Virginia, who has, in a manner, forced me to accompany him, though I can ill spare the time.

"Among new publications, I was told of an English book, intituled, "Elements of Criticism, by Henry Home †, Edinb. 3 vols. 1762," as a master-piece; and on reading the dedication to the King, wherein the author insures to himself the approbation and esteem of his readers, I concluded it contained much new matter, but I find only the jargon of a little metaphysical reasoning. The chapter on Beauty might as well have been written by an inhabitant of Greenland. I see more than ever that Nature works no greater miracles in England, than among us; and that, as well as among us, the public there are not competent judges, as may be seen by the magnificent and indifferent work of Turnbull on Ancient Painting. The English will never be true connoisseurs in art; and neither we nor our grand-children shall ever see the arts forsake Italy to settle in Great Britain, as some Englishmen flatter themselves. I have pointed out, or at least attempted to point, the physical causes in my History of Art.

"The Augustines bought, 1763, the library of C. Pallionei, for 30,000 crowns; and the king of England (il Re di la) has got Card. Alexander's collection of prints for 14,000 crowns. There are no prints left in Rome, except in the Bracciano palace. We must comfort ourselves with Raphael's pictures, which cannot be taken from the walls.

"Card. Albani treated with Card. Furratti for his two centaurs, with the master's name on them; but it is in reality to place them at the entrance of the Museo profano of the Vatican. 6000 crowns have been offered already.

"M. Casanova has sold his great drawing after Raphael at St. Peter's in Montorio for 350 crowns, to my Lord Baltimore, who is to send it as a present to the king of England, to be placed at Hampton-Court, with the cartoons of Raphael."

"About a fortnight ago, I planted there my Lord [Baltimore], who was become insupportable to me: one of those wretched splenetic Englishmen, who are out of humour with every thing; a man about 40, who married a daughter of the duchess of Bridgewater's, by whom he has no children, though he has by other women, one of whom accompanies him. I think the other Englishman's fellow traveller into Switzerland will do better to appeal to his journal than to himself. We know how this sort of people travel.

"I know the king of Prussia's treasure by the "Thesaurus Brandenburgicus" of Beger, who kills his readers with an insipid pedantic dialogue. The first thing to be done at Berlin, is to declare, in the civilest terms, that the Marquis d'Argens is a downright blockhead: such people are a disgrace to learned societies.

"As to the pretended picture of Lot and his two daughters, by Raphael †, I do not believe he painted this subject, except in the Vatican. It is such a Raphael as Gozkofsky the King's painter sold at Rome, which is an abominable cheat. The St. Jerom half length, which he sold, is an execrable copy. Princes will and should be cheated. The head of Lot can never be well enough coloured for Raphael.

1763. "I have deferred my voyage to Naples at the desire of three English lords, the Duke of Gordon with Lord Gordon his brother, and Lord Hope, to attend each of them about Rome. I have given each their day in the week, more out of respect to the Cardinal than from inclination; but at the end of a fortnight I broke with them; for not one of the three has any idea or taste for beauty. The first scarce shewed any signs of life while I was talking with rapture and feeling about the beauties of art among the ancients. I swore never to do this office for any but those who please me, and who I think deserve it.

"I have been named president of the antiquities of the apostolic chamber, at twelve crowns a month; yet my place requires that I should have an eye to all the antiquities that may be found in and about Rome. No person is allowed to dig for them on his own estate without my leave; and all that is found must be brought to me, so that nothing can escape me. My two assessors are to give notice to the Card. Camerlingue of all pictures

† Lord Kaims.

* When this picture of the Transfiguration was taken down from the altar to make a copy of it in Mosaic for St. Peter's church, Casanova obtained leave to make the drawing here mentioned.

† Engraved by Preßler, after Le Sueur.

71

Fig. 1. In M. Greene's Museum at Lichfield. See p. 671.

Gent. Mag. Sep. 1784

The Top

Fig. 2. Antique Grose at Giggleswick

Fig. 6. See p. 674.

Fig. 5. From D^r Gifford's Collection. See p. 672.

and marbles exported from the pope's dominions; and their decisions must be confirmed, or acknowledged, by me; and I must see all the boxes opened at the port. As my predecessor abbé Venuti, by his imprudence, sunk into such indigence, that he was obliged to turn Cicero to all foreigners, and lost the good opinion of all sensible men, I have made a vow to give no lectures but at my own apartments.

"I shall this summer translate my Treatise on Beauty into Italian. I am fully employed about my great Italian work; and drawings are making apace, but engravings go on slowly.

"Several interesting discoveries have been made here. Among others, a damaged head of a young Faun, which exceeds every thing in beauty. It is never out of my mind; and I dream of it all night. Such a pleasure surpasses the amusements of the most brilliant court for a month.

(To be continued.)

MR. URBAN, Lichfield, Aug. 8.
THE inclosed drawing (see Plate, fig. 1.) was taken from an ancient piece of sculpture in ivory, found, not long since, in Cannock Wood, in the county of Stafford, and now in my possession; it is three quarters of an inch in thickness, and carved on each side.

On one side there seems to be a representation of the Nativity; on the other, the Virgin Mary, crowned by Angels, and giving suck to the infant Jesus; the kneeling figure, I apprehend, is intended for one of the wise men offering gold, frankincence, and myrrh.

The figures are mutilated, as you may perceive by the drawing; the size corresponds with the sculpture, and the ornaments are exactly represented.

The opinion of your friends, relative to the antiquity and use of the above, will be very acceptable to yours, &c.

R. GREENE.

MR. URBAN, Settle, July 28.
EMBOLDENED by the general and ready admission you give to all the branches of useful correspondence, I once more send an account of some trivial antiquities in this neighbourhood, and which I apprehend have never yet been noticed by any author, they lying so remote from the road; and I hope they will meet with the approbation of the literati. The first (see Plate, fig. 2) is a curious antique cross, now standing near the church in the town of Giggleswick, but of what æra, is left to the learned to determine: however, its antiquity is undoubted; being used many years, before its erection, as a threshold, in an old house, and its beautiful Gothic head walled in. The house itself was ancient, and is now pulled down. It might probably belong to some monastery (though neither author nor tradition informs us of any being here), or perhaps might be set up in days of monastic splendour, amongst the numerous ones at those times in being.

Tradition, through the channel of the inhabitants of Settle, informs us, that some of the Giggleswick residents stole it from the base of the old cross at Settle, in order to prejudice the trial (see Gent. Mag. p. 259) concerning the antiquity of the market; but this is partial; and as it is an interested tale, the inhabitants of Giggleswick deny the assertion. This pillar is about five yards high; two yards are stuck in the ground, and walled up as a pedestal. I dare not assert whether it is Saxon or not.—The other figure is a coin, I suppose also inclosed, the legends and characters are very much defaced; however, it appears to be of the Edwards*.—An explanation, as to the age, antiquity, &c. of the above articles, will oblige yours,
W. F.

MR. URBAN,
AT Calow, in Pembrokeshire, at the end of the town (in the road) near the Castle, stands a very ancient cross, beautifully sculptured on either side with knots, frets, and other ornaments: it is near 12 feet high, and about 13 inches thick. In a square, on one side of the sculpture, are some characters yet legible, and here exactly copied (see plate, fig. 1.) the interpretation of which, from any ingenious gentleman, will be esteemed a favour.
Yours, &c. P.

* * * Another correspondent observes, that the Cicero we have promised, p. 574, (see Plate, fig. 4.) is a mere bauble of the last century, drawn, he believes, by Waring, and published in the "Museum Mazzuchellianum, 1750," 2 vols. folio; and a Third informs us, that the "Critical Essay, on Modern Medals" (see p. 568.) is not an uncommon tract.

* The coin is of Edward IV. Legend on the obverse,

EDWARD DI G. R. ANG. & FRANC.

Reverse,

POSUI DEUM ADJUTOREM MEUM.

CIVITAS EBORACI

see the coins published by the Society of Antiquaries, Tab. V. (some varieties in the inscriptions excepted.) EDIT.

MR. URBAN, Leicester-square.

YOUR having mentioned, p. 638, the death of Allen Ramsay, esq. reminds me of a letter in my possession, written by his father, the famous Scotch bard, [a bookseller,] to Mr. John Smibert, a portrait painter, who left England with Dean Berkeley, to settle in Bermudas. That project miscarrying, Mr Smibert went to Boston, married, and died. As the letter gives some account of Mr. Ramsay in his youth, it may serve to illustrate any future anecdotes of English artists, and not be unacceptable to both painters and poets.

JOHN GREENWOOD.

Edinburgh, May 10, 1736.

"My dear old Friend,

"Your health and happiness are ever an addition to my satisfaction. God make your life ever easy and pleasant—half a century of years have now row'd o'er my pow, that begins now to be lyart; yet, thanks to my Author, I eat, drink, and sleep as sound as I did twenty years syne; yes, I laugh heartily too, and find as many subjects to employ that faculty upon as ever; fools, fops, and knaves, grow as rank as formerly; yet here and there are to be found good and worthy men, who are ane honour to humane life. We have small hopes of seeing you again in our old world; then let us be virtuous, and hope to meet in heaven.—My good auld wife is still my bed-fellow; my son Allan has been pursuing your science since he was a dozen years auld—was with Mr. Hyssidg, at London, for some time, about two years ago; has been since at home, painting here like a Raphael—set out for the seat of the Beast, beyond the Alps, within a month hence—to be away about two years.—I'm sweer to part with him, but canna stem the current, which flows from the advice of his patrons, and his own inclinations—I have three daughters, one of seventeen, one of sixteen, one of twelve years old, and no re-waly'd dragle among them, all fine girls. These six or seven years past I have not wrote a line of poetry; I e'en gave o'er in good time, before the coolness of fancy that attends advanced years should make me risk the reputation I had acquired.

Frae twenty-five to five-and-forty
My Muse was nowther sweer nor dorty;
My Pegasus wad break his tether,
E'en at the shagging of a feather,

And throw ideas scour like drift,
Streaking his wings up to the lift:
Then, then my sail was in a low,
That gart my numbers safely row,
But eild and judgment gin to say,
Let be your sangs, and learn to pray.

I am, Sir, your friend and servant,
ALLAN RAMSAY."

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 21.

THE account given in p. 485 of the Roman monument, lately in the possession of my worthy friend Dr. Gifford, being inaccurate; arising, I apprehend, from some misrepresentation* of the gentleman who furnished you with it; I beg leave to submit the following history of it to your readers, and particularly to THE LONDON ANTIQUARY.

The stone alluded to was discovered, in digging a family vault, in 1776, in a burial-ground (then part of my leasehold) in Church-lane. Whitechapel, the end leading to Rosemary-lane. It lay near six feet under the surface of the ground, in a gravelly soil, flat, but not level, one edge being much sunk; the inscription uppermost: and under, or very near it, was a piece of ancient coin, which a spectator purchased for a trifle, but, on application made to him, would not part with it on any consideration. I immediately copied the inscription, and took it to the late Dr. Gifford, who desired I would send the stone to him, and he would give his opinion as to its value, and direct me to the best method of disposal. I accordingly sent it; and, the moment he saw it, he said, "it was a valuable piece of antiquity indeed! and much more curious than any thing of the kind in the British Museum;" and on that account advised me to present it to the Directors thereof. I consented to his proposal, leaving him to act as he thought proper. Some considerable time after, on making enquiry of the Doctor, he told me, "he had not done as he purposed; for he admired it so much, that, if I would give him leave to keep it while he lived, I should have it again at his death." The esteem I had for the Doctor, established by many years inviolable friendship, induced me chearfully to comply with his request; and, in consequence of my representing the above to the executors, since the Doctor's death, they in the politest manner returned the stone; which is for the present deposited, for the satisfaction of the curious, at Mr. Kneller's, undertaker, in the Old Bailey.

* I do not mean wilful; for as I was in 1776 pastor of a Baptist church in Black's Fields, Southwark, it is probable the mistake originated from that circumstance.

Yours, &c. J. LANGFORD.

••• The LONDON ANTIQUARY is much obliged to Mr. Langford for pointing out the history of this curious monogram. He has attentively examined the stone, and has sent Mr. Urban a delineation of it by a worthy friend, whose exquisite taste in drawing is among the least of his merits. See plate, fig. 5, which is to be read thus: "Dñs Manibus. Julius Vilius Miles Legionis 30. Anno 40 hic sepultus est. Caio Aurelio Flavio Attio Herede."—It is to be wished a drawing of the Coin could be as easily obtained.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 2.
NOTWITHSTANDING the industry and celebrity of its first projector, I will venture to affirm, that the Gentleman's Magazine stands now (with reverence to Mr. Cave be it spoken) upon a broader basis of reputation than in any preceding period of time. It is equally the repository of genius and of curiosity. On these considerations, I am induced to transcribe two very singular letters from two Prelates of the first-rate eminence, which may be arranged under the two-fold title of State-papers and Literary Curiosities.

1. Letter from Bishop CREW to King JAMES II.

To the KING's most excellent MAJESTY; the most humble and faithful advice of your Majesty's ever dutiful subject and servant the Bishop of DURHAM.

That your Majesty would be pleased to withdraw your protection of those Romish chapels, which are daily made the occasion of so much disturbance and mischief here, and, if continued any longer, I fear, will unavoidably endanger the peace and safety of this your great city, and consequently of your whole kingdom.

That the archbishoprick of York, which your Majesty hath been pleased to offer me, may be filled with some other more deserving person: and that your Majesty would be pleased to make another Dean of Christ Church in Oxford, instead of Mr. Massey, who is utterly incapable thereof by law: That the fellows of Sidney College in Cambridge, for whom I have so often moved your Majesty, may have leave to elect a new Master, in the place of Mr. Bassett (he being also unqualified on the same account), and to proceed on all other affairs relating to that Society, according to their original statutes and constitutions.

BENT. MAG. September, 2784.

That your Majesty would be pleased to call a free parliament so soon as may be, this being the only probable means for preserving your sacred person, for preventing the effusion of Christian blood, and for establishing your throne and government, both in church and state, upon sure and lasting foundations.

N. DURHAM.

2. Bishop SPRAT to the Right Honourable my Lords of his Majesty's Commission Ecclesiastical.

I most humbly intreat your Lordships' favourable interpretation of what I now write, that, since your Lordships are resolved to proceed against those who have not complied with the King's command in reading his declaration, it is absolutely impossible for me to serve his Majesty any longer in this commission: I beg leave to tell your Lordships, that, though I myself did submit in that particular, yet I will never be any way instrumental in punishing those my brethren that did not. For, as I call God to witness, that what I did was merely in a principle of conscience; so I am fully satisfied that their forbearance was upon the same principle. I have no reason to think otherwise of the whole body of our clergy, who, upon all occasions, have signalized their loyalty to the Crown, and their zealous affections to his present Majesty's person, in the worst of times. Now, my Lords, the safety of the whole Church of England seeming to be exceedingly concerned in this prosecution, I must declare, I cannot with a safe conscience sit or judge in this cause upon so many pious and excellent men, with whom (if it be God's will) it rather becomes me to suffer, than to be in the least occasion to their sufferings. I therefore earnestly request your Lordships to intercede with his Majesty, that I may be graciously dismissed from any further attendance at your board; and to assure him, that I am still ready to sacrifice whatever I have to his service but my conscience and religion. My Lords, I am your Lordships' most faithful and obedient servant,

THO. ROCHESTER.

THE

THE Editor having been favoured with the following letter from the noble founder of the Society of Antiquaries in Scotland, thinks he cannot pay a better compliment to the laudable designs therein held forth than by inserting it in this month's miscellany.

SIR, Kirkhill, by Edinb. Aug. 3, 84.

LITERARY correspondence being about to receive a heavy blow by a law relating to the privileges of Members of Parliament, which ought to have made an exception in favour of all Societies instituted for the purposes of science, literature, arts, and manufactures; I cannot think of allowing the few covers I have addressed to my learned friends, and to you, good Sir, in particular, to become waste paper, and have therefore made use of a leisure half-hour to send you some of our Scottish news in the republic to which we happily belong, and which consoles us in some measure for the distractions and the misfortunes in the political.

The Scottish Society of Antiquaries have not yet thought it prudent to hazard their infant reputation by the publication of any of the valuable papers which have been communicated since their institution, but are now preparing for a specimen of their budget in the course of next winter.

They propose to publish in quarto numbers, selecting only the most choice and interesting communications, and printing at the same time such state papers and letters as shall by the censors be judged sufficiently valuable, and keeping them in retentis until they shall become sufficiently numerous to form a separate volume. By this means they will avoid that farrago which too often appears in the Antiquarian Transactions, and which renders them less useful to the public.

The biographical numbers will be published also without any admixture of matter that does not tend to elucidate the lives of those illustrious or learned persons which compose the numbers so published; and it is thought that this mode of publication will enable the Society to satisfy the taste of their learned friends without loading them with the expence of purchasing what may not be to their palate or their purpose. These are my hints to the learned body, and will, I hope, meet with your approbation. I propose farther, that the chartularies of our religious foundations, with a copious index and glossary to each, be published in the same manner, and that a specimen of a short one shall be given in the course of the ensuing spring.

These chartularies I propose to accompany with judicious extracts from the Bullarium Romanum, for a copy of which I intend to apply to my ecclesiastical friends in the Rota at Rome. Forty volumes of this great work, begun by order of Pope Benedict XIV. have already been printed; and as I believe it has already reached the middle of the sixteenth century, no more will be required for the purpose of our ecclesiastical antiquities.

Parochial histories in Scotland, Gaelic topography, with maps, charts, and views of places, will form another separate department, and will have a more extensive demand in the literary market.

To this last part of my plan I propose to dedicate a room in our museum, fitted with a separate repository for each of the parishes in Scotland, in which is meant to be deposited a survey of each parish, accompanied with specimens of mines, minerals, and every thing that is politically useful to the community, and from whence future proprietors of the soil may be able to draw every information that can tend to their profit or local curiosity. I am proud of this adjunct; and, if it is executed, I flatter myself it will preserve me from the common consequences of the four grey stones covered with moss, and from the accusation of having had too little of the useful in the scope of my amusing research: valeat quantum valere potest.

As a specimen of what may be done even in this barren and neglected field of Antiquarian research, I shall mention, that in this parish, where I occasionally reside during the summer, I found lately, in digging a foundation for a pillar in the body of the parish church (Uphall in vicecomitat. de Linlithgo) the font and lapis fidei, stone of faith, of a very ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Katherine and the Blessed Nicholas de Strathbroke, which stood formerly near this house where I now write, which font has the date of the Millenium*, when reigned in Scotland; the Grüm King of the Scots, whose Christian appellation is, I believe, so where to be found, he having had a name like Caligula Caracalla Severus, and other Roman princes, which had well nigh obliterated all others; and certainly would, but for their being masters of the civilised world, and the objects of universal attention.

* See the plate, fig. 6.

I suppose this font of mine is the most antient remains of antiquity in Scotland which has a date; and, from the inscription, bearing the appellative of the reigning king, at least so far as can be judged from the initials* on one side of the font, which is octogonal, fixes the æra of that king of Scots foolishly Latinised by the great George Buchanan from Johannes Fordun Grimus.

The Stane of Faith is an octogonal stone perforated, of a size fitted to the reception of the hands and cubits of those who were sworn at the altar on covenants of all sorts among the ancient Gaëls and Scots; a custom coeval with the Druidical rites, and, from the Scriptures of the Jews, probably a primæval ceremony.

This Stane of Faith is probably of the most remote antiquity, and had been handed down from the earliest ages in this neighbourhood.

There is a Stane of Faith resembling this in the Islands of Orkney, if elsewhere I know not; but the most ancient covenants for the payments of money were formerly in this country prescribed, solutionem pecunie super lapidem in quodam ecclesiis nominatas, after the manner of the Jews above-mentioned.

Of these remains I propose to have an engraving for our Antiquaries; and it may excite others to explore such antiquities as may verify the race of our fabulously mangled kings of the Scots and Picts.

A groupe of our Antiquaries have undertaken to print a Catalogue Raisonné of the series of our Scottish money, and to accompany it with accurate plates, executed from the originals and original deeds of the Mint, Acts of Parliament relating thereunto, &c. and tables of weight, alloy, and comparative value with foreign money. This will be curious, as it will relate to an extinct kingdom, which grows every day more obsolete.—Your well-wisher, BUCHAN.

MR. URBAN,

Sept. 3.

IF you think it will not offend the exasperated Mr. Masters, you may print the following anecdote, which I send you in the hand-writing of Dr. Z. Grey, and which consequently hath not been transcribed from any paper, either in MS. or in print; appertaining to the Quixotic Rector of Landbeach.

Yours, &c. M. GREEN.

“Having been credibly informed, that Mr. Baker had been collated by Bishop Crew to the rectory of Long Newton, in the diocese of Durham, in King James the Second's time, I prevailed with the Curate of that parish to search the Register Book; from which he favoured me with the account following, viz.

“Mr. John Oliver, rector of Long Newton, died in February 1686, and was succeeded by Mr. Thomas Baker, fellow of St. John's College in Cambridge; who, refusing to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary at Candlemas, 1689, returned to his college again.—Mr. James Finny, M. A. of St. John's College in Oxford, chaplain to the Right Honourable the Earl of Burlington and Cork, afterwards D. D. and prebendary of Durham, was inducted into the rectory of Long Newton, on the 30th of January 1690.”

Z. S.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 31.

EVERY body knows the following most beautiful lines:

The man who fights and runs away,
May live to fight another day;
But he who is in battle slain,
Can never rise to fight again.

Will any of your poetical correspondents be good enough to point out the author? If they should say that Butler was the author, and that they are in Hudibras, which twenty to one but they will, they are requested to mention the page and the edition.

A wager was some time ago made at Brookes's, of twenty to one, that the above lines were in Hudibras, and Dodsley was referred to as arbiter. He laughed at the idea of a difficulty*, took down the volume, but could not find the place—nor is it yet discovered.

Yours, &c. AN AMATEUR.

* In the third part of Hudibras, Canto III. ver. 245 (Dr. Johnson's edition, vol. II. p. 91.) the following lines occur, whence the others have been probably formed by erroneous repetition:

“For those that fly may fight again,
Which he can never do that's slain;
Hence timely running's no mean part
Of conduct in the martial art.”

ED: T.

88. MR.

88. Mr. Sheridan's Life of Dr. Swift.(Concluded from p. 664.)

THE particulars of Swift's life being too well known to be recapitulated here, we shall confine ourselves to some passages that seem to us new, or are placed in a different light. As to the "Anecdotes of the Family of Swift," to which we are referred in the Appendix, Swift was so little acquainted with his own branch of it, as to style (p. 546) his great grandfather, "William Swift, the founder" of it, "towards the last years of Qu. Elizabeth, and during the reign of K. James I.;" though Thomas, the father of this William, by his monument, still extant, is known to have preceded him in the rectory of St. Andrew's in Canterbury, and to style this William also "a prebendary of Canterbury," which he never was. £. 100 a year, in land, possessed by his son Thomas, Mr. Sheridan calls "a good estate." — That Dr. Johnson should involve Swift's birth-place in obscurity seems surprising, as, in these "Anecdotes," Swift himself has fixed both time and place with precision, viz. "Dublin, Nov. 30, 1667." Mr. Sheridan calls Swift's father "the fourth son" of Thomas; Swift himself styles him "the seventh or eighth." Want of fortune, our author contends, kept him virtuous, and want of learning (at least that of the times) prevented his being lost in a college, or buried in a vicarage. From an anecdote, well authenticated*, the Meditation on a Broom-stick, we are told, was not originally intended by Swift to ridicule the great Robert Boyle, but only "to furnish occasion for some innocent mirth on Lady Berkeley's enthusiasm and simplicity of heart; and at the same time to get rid of the disagreeable task of reading to her writings, which were not to his taste." Swift was first known at Button's (Ambrose Philips told our author) by the name of The mad Parson, walking up and down for half an hour, or an hour, without speaking to any one, and then paying his money, and walking out — till one day he was observed abruptly to address a gentleman in boots with "Pray, Sir, do you remember any good weather in the world?" The country gentleman stared, and replied, "Yes, Sir, I thank "God, I remember a great deal of good weather in my time." "That is more," said Swift, "than I can say: I never remember any weather that was not too hot, or too cold, too wet, or too dry; but, however God Almighty contrives it, at the end of the year 'tis all very well." So saying, he took up his hat, and walked out. The prejudice conceived against Swift by Queen Anne, and not any neglect in the ministry, seems justly assigned as the obstacle to his preferment. This, no doubt, disappointed him of a stall at Windsor, and afterwards of the mitre at Clogher, when Dean Sterne, who had no friend but Swift, was purposely preferred to make room for him. Of his tenderness of heart and sensibility many instances are adduced, and those to the contrary, it is insisted, occurred only in his decline. Of these none is more striking, and more unlike his former self, than his behaviour to his friend Dr. Sheridan. As to Stella and Vanessa, we discover nothing new; with regard to neither, the Dean's conduct, extraordinary as it is, can be palliated or excused; as, whatever were his motives, this writer agrees with all others on the subject, that the lives of both these ladies were embittered, and their deaths accelerated, by his means. Vanessa, indeed, is rather an object of compassion than blame. She knew not, till too late, of her lover's marriage, if such it can be called; but knowing it, as he did himself, and knowing also his own peculiar constitution (by which only his singular conduct is here accounted for), with what views could he (thus circumstanced) "in the most explicit terms declare his passion?" — And what can we think of the "sensitivity" of a man who, strongly attached as he seems to have been to both, could, without speaking, sling a paper on the table of the one, which "proved" (as our author expresses it) "her death-warrant," and could "throw" the other, his beloved Stella, in her last illness, into unspeakable agonies, and "never see her more, for only adjuring him, by their friendship, to let her have the satisfaction of dying at least, though she had not lived, his acknowledged wife?" This seems to bear so much "harder on Swift's humanity," as Mr. Sheridan acknowledges, "than any other part of his conduct in life," that, had it not come from the authority of an eye-eye-witness, we could scarce have given it credit. And remarkable it is, that, in consequence of this cruel treatment, both these ladies immediately made their wills, and bequeathed their fortunes to strangers, or charitable uses. Yet this man was "addicted" (as he says himself) "to no kind of vice," and, as his biographer tells us, "lived in the constant discharge of all moral and christian duties." How it became his character, "as a dignitary of the church," to make "a mockery of so sacred a ceremony, to consider his marriage as a mere matter of form, intended only to satisfy some vain scruples (as they are here styled) of the lady," &c. we are not told. It is only said, "he might reconcile it to himself on motives of humanity." There let it rest—we only wish his humanity had been uniform. The romantic story that some have circulated, and others believed, and in particular a writer in our Magazine for November 1757, of Swift and Mrs. Johnson being too nearly related, Sir W. Temple being the father of them both, is here shewn, as it has been before by Dr. Delany, to be incredible. The Memoirs of Dr. Sheridan, many of them new, are an entertaining addition to the volume. One or two passages, that come home to the subject of this work, shall be selected.

* Told by Lady Betty Germaine to the late Lady Lambard (not Lambert), and by Lady L. to the author.

"The Doctor had not been long settled at Cavan [the free-school there] when Swift, who at that time knew little comfort out of his society, followed, in order to pass the winter with him. I was there at his arrival, and during the whole time of his continuance there. It grieved me much to see such a change in him. His person was quite emaciated, and bore the marks of many more years than had passed over his head. His memory greatly impaired, and his other faculties much on the decline. His temper peevish, fretful, morose, and prone to sudden fits of passion; and yet to me his behaviour was gentle, as it always had been from my early childhood, treating me with partial kindness and attention, as being his godson, often giving me instruction, attended with frequent presents and rewards when I did well. I loved him from my boyish days, and never stood in the least awe before him, as I do not remember ever to have had a cross look or harsh expression from him. I read to him two or three hours a day during this visit, and often received both pleasure and improvement from the observations he made. His intention was to have passed the whole winter there; but, as the Doctor was called up to town upon business during the Christmas vacation, Swift found the place desolate without him, and followed him in a few days. During this visit it appeared, in many instances, that avarice had then taken possession of him in a great degree. Dr. Sheridan had prevailed on the burgeses of Cavan to meet the Dean in a body at a place four miles distant from the town, to compliment him on his arrival. The Doctor told him, in return, he ought to invite them to an entertainment; with which, the Dean, after some time, though not without manifest reluctance, complied. He gave them a very shabby dinner at the inn, and called for the bill before the guests had got half enough of wine. He disputed several articles, said there were two bottles of wine more charged than were used; flew into a violent passion, and abused his servants grossly for not keeping better account. The servants ran away, and Dr. Sheridan, without speaking a word, went off, and left him to himself. This was the manner in which they always treated him, at that time, when he was in one of those fits, for the least opposition, or even the presence of those with whom he was angry, served but to increase his passion almost to frenzy. But when he had time to cool, he always expressed deep concern at his infirmity."

Of his peevishness and other infirmities more instances follow. But these may suffice. He was then, it must be observed, in the decline of life. No such excuse can be alleged for his former conduct.—Of all the charges made against him none seems to have obtained more generally than that of his having tacitly arraigned the wisdom and goodness of Providence in his Gulliver, by "making the nature of man odious, and the nature of beasts amiable."—Among others, Dr. Young and the late Mr. Harris have warmly expressed their concern and indignation on this account. To both these Mr. Sheridan replies at some length, and endeavours to shew that they have totally mistaken and misrepresented his intention, and that, instead of making one profelyte to misanthropy, that part of the work "may, on the contrary, be productive of much good." But what can we say of the prejudice of a writer who, for this difference of opinion as to the Yahoos and Houynhnms, can style such a character as Mr. Harris a "soi disant philosopher," and disparage his labours as "splendid trifles and useless metaphysics?"—Various other memoirs and anecdotes are added, collected from Dr. Delany, Mrs. Pilkington, and others; and the whole closes with his will.—Two prints are inserted, one of Dr. Swift, and the other of Dr. Sheridan.—We cannot help observing, that that this work (we speak at present only of the volume which contains the Life) abounds with errors, against which Mr. Sheridan should have guarded, as some of them affect the sense; viz. p. 188, "Earl of Stafford" for "Strafford;" not to mention the names of Hawksworth, Patridge, &c. constantly wrong spelt. Nor is the language so correct as might have been wished and expected.

89. BIBLIOTHECA TOPOGRAPHICA BRITANNICA. NO. XXIII. Containing the History and Antiquities of Hawsted, in the County of Suffolk. By the Rev. Sir John Cullum, Bart. F.R. and A.SS. 4to.

BESIDES "the revolutions of property, genealogies," &c. usual and unavoidable in such researches, this compilation contains such "sketches of ancient life and manners" as render it no less interesting to the "moral philosopher" than to the "topographical historian." The first place is assigned "to Natural History, on account of the divine origin of the objects which it embraces." The second "to the Church, as involving many particulars of a sacred and religious nature." And the third and fourth, "of course, to the proprietors of land, and its cultivation." Under the II^d head, "several religious customs and modes of thinking that prevailed in former times" are exhibited by extracts from some ancient wills, "evidently the manufacture of ecclesiastics." On the subject of "the custom (not yet quite abolished) of recording the funerals of persons of distinction in the Heralds College," it is observed, that "the last but one of these entries is for the late Duke of Kingston, in which it is certified, that his obsequies were performed with all due solemnity, "except the attendance of the officers of College of Arms to marshal the funeral, which, on account of his Grace's decease at Bath, and the great affliction of his most noble Dutcheſs, was not recollected by her Grace till too late to prepare the ceremonial. E. KINGSTON."—Among the rectors of Hawsted the author thus commemorates himself: "20 April, 1762. JOHN CULLUM, M. A. fellow of Catherine Hall, Cambridge: his father [Sir John C. bart. who died in 1774] patron. He was born 21 June, 1733, and educated at Bury School, whence he went to Catherine Hall, Cambridge; of which, after having taken

"the degrees of B. A. and M. A, he was elected fellow, 7 Dec. 1759. In March 1774 he became a member of the Society of Antiquaries; in December that year was instituted to the living of Great Thurlow, in this county; in March 1775 was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and in this year (1784) is, innocently at least, amusing himself in compiling the history, such as it is, of his native place."—The two last extracts from the Church Register are these: "1783. An act takes place in October, that imposes a tax of 3d. on the entry of every christening, marriage, and burial, except those of some poor persons, particularly circumstanced. A tax most vexatious to the clergy, and which, it is thought, will be unproductive to the state." "In April 1784 the bishop of the diocese, among other directions to his clergy, gave some very judicious ones relative to the proper keeping of parish registers—an object to which, in this diocese at least, episcopal attention was never before extended. I hope his lordship's care in this respect will be properly regarded, and that we shall never [again] meet with such entries as this: The son of Jankin the shepherd baptized."—III. Hawsted was given to the monastery of St. Edmund by K. Edward the Confessor. "The earliest principal lord of the village, that is specified as such in records, is EUSTACE FITZ-THOMAS, or FITZ-EUSTACE," who died 56 Henry III. From that family the manor of Hawsted descended to Midilton, Talmach and Bokenham, Clapton, and Drury, in whom also the other manor of Hawsted Hall united. A description of Hawsted Place, rebuilt, or greatly repaired, by Sir William Drury, who entertained Queen Elizabeth there in 1578, well illustrates "the taste and mode of living at that period." His son, Sir Robert, "patronised the learned and witty Dr. Donne, to whom and his family he assigned apartments in his large house in Drury Lane. . . . In 1612 (having lost his only surviving child) he made a journey to Paris, and persuaded Dr. Donne to attend him. It was there the Doctor saw the remarkable vision of his wife, who was at that time brought to bed of a dead child in England." Miss Drury (above-mentioned) who died at the age of 14, "is immortalised" by Dr. Donne, in some lines which "the Spectator, N^o 41, styles, by mistake, a description of his mistress." Tradition says, "that she was destined for the wife of Prince Henry, son of James I." A pleasing print of this young lady, by Basire, from an original picture (by whom is not said) is inserted. By the Wrays, Sir Robert Drury's nephews, to whom this estate descended, it was sold, in 1656, for 17,697l. to Thomas Cullum, Esq. alderman of London, who was created a baronet 18 June, 1660. "A street in London, where he had considerable property, destroyed by the fire, still bears his name." The author, who is the sixth baronet, is his great-grandson, by his second son, the elder branch having failed in 1720. — "The populousness and the poor of this parish" is a curious article. From the number of messuages 14 Edward I, near 500 years ago, it seems to have been nearly as at present. In the last 200 years, 1559 to 1781, if the registers have been accurately kept, the inhabitants have been doubled. What Sir John Cullum says on this subject is too judicious and consolatory to be omitted.

"In stating the increase of population in this place, I have no particular hypothesis to serve. I merely set down facts. Let abler political arithmeticians apply them in their full extent. Yet, from the above survey, I confess I do not find myself sunk into such despondency as to think that the nation is decreased a million and a half of inhabitants within a century, and is now reduced to four millions and a half.

"And here I cannot help expressing some surprise, though the population of the kingdom in general is of the greatest consequence to the state, and has exercised the pens of able calculators, who have differed from one another in a manner almost incredible. yet that government should still continue inactive in the dispute, which it might close with so much ease. If, for instance, in the year 1780, when the bishops received the king's commands to procure from the clergy a list of the Papists in their respective parishes, they had been also commanded to require the number of the inhabitants; these returns would have been as satisfactory as the former, and settled a point of the first importance in a short time, and with little difficulty. If there be good reason to suppose that the more chearful and sanguine calculators are also the most accurate, why not ascertain a fact that must make every friend to this country rejoice, and every enemy tremble? But, if the more gloomy and desponding ones be right, why not make us acquainted with our consumptive condition, that we may try every remedy for our relief?"

The increased population he very rationally ascribes to an improved agriculture, which necessarily employs many more hands. And though the poor rates have also increased alarmingly, "an increase of poor must necessarily, without any other cause, have brought upon the parish a very great additional charge. But if an improved agriculture has, in some measure, contributed to produce this evil, has it not also, it may be asked, brought with it, in some measure, an ability to support it?" "The revolutions in culture, the employments of the farmer, and the labours of the horse and ox," deduced from original accounts, leases, and rentals of the 13th and succeeding centuries, form another interesting chapter to those who "d disdain not the survey and delineation of rural life." From the chearfulness exhibited in the ancient harvest-days in the 14th century, when between 2 and 300 persons were employed in the fields at once, on little more than 200 acres, the violence and disorder of the succeeding century, apparent by the tenor of the leases, and the languid manner in which husbandry was then carried on, we descend to its present improved state, and also to the "personal and domestic comforts" of the farmers, which, in the close, are thus described:

"The farm-houses are in general well furnished with every convenient accommodation. Into many of them a barometer has of late years been introduced; a most useful instrument for the husbandman, and which is mentioned here as a most striking instance of the intelligence of this period. The teapot, and the mug of ale, possess jointly the breakfast-table; and meat and pudding smok on the board every noon. Formerly, one might see at church what the cut of a coat was half a century before; no such curiosity is now exhibited; every article of dress is spruce and modern."

The Appendix contains (in like manner) the Natural and Ecclesiastical History, Proprietors, Agriculture, &c. of Hardwick, an extra-parochial place, adjoining to the manor of Hawsted, of which the author is also proprietor, and inhabits the principal mansion, called Hardwick-House. The adjoining parishes are, Bury St. Edmund's, Horningsheath, and Newton. A custom still prevails prevails here (practised also, Dr. Borlase says, in Cornwall) of drawing a child through a cleft tree, in order to cure the rickets, or a rupture. But as, with our author, we have no faith in the process, we shall not describe it.

90. The Life of Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury. By William Gilpin, M. A. Prebendary of Salisbury, and Vicar of Boldre, in New Forest, near Lyminster. 8vo.

STRYPE having, with great fidelity and industry, portrayed this Protestant martyr at full length, that must be considered as the original, and this as little more than a copy in miniature; in which, however, the features cannot be reduced, and at the same time the likeness retained, but by the hand of a master. Equally disclaiming the "exaggerated praise" of Protestants, and the "undeserved censure" of Papists, which have been indiscriminately lavished on this great prelate, Mr. Gilpin has "endeavoured," he says, "to do justice as well to his failings as virtues," by freely blaming his "intolerant principles," and also "the delicacies and improprieties of his behaviour," (for which he always gives his reasons), and at the same time, with all these abatements, esteeming "him one of the first persons of the age in which he lived. His public life contains an important part of ecclesiastical history; and his private life an admirable lesson of clerical instruction. To this let the ministers of the gospel chiefly attend; and, instead of thinking too harshly of his failings, let us endeavour to bring as much seriousness, and real concern for Christianity, as he did, into all the duties and offices of religion."— Besides his acknowledged obligations to the labours and authority of Strype, this biographer has derived great assistance from the manuscript collections of the late Mr. Jones of Welwyn (the learned friend of Dr. Young), who, having once had the same design, favoured him with his papers near twenty years ago, now "deposited, agreeably to his last will, in the library of Dr. Williams, in Redcross Street, London." Their plans rather differed. Mr. Jones's view being "chiefly to explain the opinions of the archbishop;" Mr. Gilpin's "rather to illustrate his character."

Throughout that part of the reign of Henry VIII. in which Cranmer appeared in such a conspicuous light, rising so suddenly from a college fellowship, with scarce one intermediate step, to the first dignity of his profession, nothing does so much honour (what else does any honour?) to the private character and discernment of that cruel and rapacious tyrant as his constant attachment to the archbishop, of which there are many remarkable instances, to one of which Shakspeare, in his historical play, has adhered (as usual) with wonderful exactness. Our readers will immediately recollect Cranmer's attending at the council chamber-door, among pages and lacqueys, and, when admitted, confounding the lords, his accusers and judges, by producing the king's ring, as a well known token of his favour. Henry's behaviour on this occasion is thus graphically described:

"Striding haughtily round the room, and throwing an eye of indignation, first on one, and then on another, 'I thought,' said he, 'I had a discreet council; but I see I am deceived. How have ye handled here my lord of Canterbury? What made ye of him? a slave; shutting him out of the council-chamber among serving-men. I would have you to understand, by the faith I owe to God (laying his hand solemnly on his breast), that if a prince can be beholden to a subject, I am to my lord of Canterbury; whom I account as faithful a man towards his prince as ever was prelate in this realm, and one to whom I am sundry ways beholden; and therefore he that loveth me will regard him.' Having said this, he strode out; and left the lords endeavouring which should apologise to the primate in the highest strain of compliment."

Sir John Goswick, in like manner, was thus rebuked for arraigning the archbishop in parliament:

"Tell that varlet Goswick, that if he do not presently reconcile himself to my lord of Canterbury, I will punish him for the example of others. What knows he of my lord's preaching in Kent? Was not he, at that time, in Bedfordshire?"

And Sir Thomas Seymour, who had objected to the meanness of Cranmer's house-keeping, being sent, purposely, by the king, on a frivolous message to Lambeth, about dinner-time, and seeing the table spread, above and below, with princely hospitality, at his return acknowledging his error, "Ah! good man!" said the king; "all he hath

"he

"he spendeth in house-keeping: and
 "if he now keep such a table as you "say, it being neither term nor parlia"ment, he is meetly visited at such "times, I warrant you. But," added the king, assuming a severer tone, "I
 "know the bottom of all these falsties.
 "You want to have a finger in church "matters, do you? But you may set "your heart at rest: while I am king,
 "there shall be no such doings."—And to adduce one more instance, though prior to the above, the archbishop's bold protest against the act of the six articles, was so far from ruining him in the king's favour, that he sent some peers to dine with him at Lambeth, and comfort him (as he expressed it) under his disappointment. "My lord arch"bishop," said Essex, "you were born
 "in an happy hour. You can do no"thing amiss. Were I to do half of "what you have done, my head must "answer it:" a prophetic speech, as it afterwards appeared."

Among the "courtly stains" which blemish his hero, Mr. Gilpin includes, we think with reason, the first step which endeared him to Henry. His embarking so zealously in the business of the divorce, as it was certainly grounded on "reasons of state," not of conscience, with him at least; with regard to the queen and her daughter, was "base, ungenerous, and cruel;" and
 "the notoriety of the king's passion for "Anne Boleyn" considered, served to administer to his passions. "It is with "concern, therefore," adds our author,
 "that we see a man of Dr. Cranmer's
 "integrity and simplicity of manners,
 "acting so much out of character as to "compound an affair of this kind, if "not with his conscience, at least with
 "all delicacy of sentiment, and to pa"rade through Europe in the quality
 "of an ambassador, defending every "where the king's pious intentions."—
 His acting a part also in that scene of barbarism, cruelty, absurdity, and injustice, Anne Boleyn's death, cannot be palliated.

If Strype be too prolix, the present biographer is sometimes too concise.—
 Thus, though "the queen's* incon-"tinence" is mentioned p. 85, and,
 p. 110, in Henry's last illness, "the "queen†" is introduced sitting "for "hours on her knees before him, dress"ing the offensive ulcers of his legs," it is not said who those "queens" were, nor have their marriages been previously mentioned. "He stripped the see of "Canterbury," says our author, "dur"ing Archbishop Cranmer's time, of "1501. of annual rent." Much more considerable surely were these rents; 5031. 14s. 5d. say Mr. Hafted* and others. — With regard to the archbishop's unwarrantable persecution of Joan Bocher and George Paris, in Edward the Sixth's reign, not only his consenting to it, but even persuading the young king to concur, Mr. Gilpin says, "Let "the horrid act be universally dis-

 "claimed. To palliate is to partici"pate. With indignation let it be re"corded, as what, above all other "things, has disgraced that religious "liberty which our ancestors, in so
 "many other respects, so nobly pur"chased."—From this unpleasing view we hasten to contemplate the archbishop's patronage of those persecuted reformers, Martyr, Bucer, Ales, Phage, and Alasco, of the learned Sleiden, Leland, &c.; and his correspondence with Erasmus, Osiander, Melancthon, and Calvin. "His foreign correspondence
 "indeed was so large, that he appoint"ed a person, with a salary, at Canter"bury, whose chief employment it was "to forward and receive his packets." In the course of this Life, several instances of Mr. Hume's dissingenuity are occasionally remarked, particularly his condemning the XVIIIth article of our church, as consigning the heathens, however virtuous, to eternal perdition,
 when, in truth, as Mr. Gilpin observes,
 "it does not, in any shape, even hint
 "at them, the article barely asserting,
 "that no religion can promise salvation
 "to mankind, except the Christian;
 "which is so far from damning Pagans,
 "that it virtually implies, Christ died
 "for them as well as for us." Cranmer's being prevailed on, by Edward
 VI. and the judges, to take a new oath, excluding the princess Mary from the throne, is here justly styled a "discre-
 "ditable affair, over which the friends
 "of his memory with they had any "veil to throw." "The king," it is added, "was then laid aside, with little "ceremony, as an incumbrance." For

* Catherine Howard.

† Catherine Parr.

GENT. MAG. September, 1784.

* History of Kent, vol. I. p. 340.

the suspicion, here conveyed, of poison, we question whether there are any sufficient grounds. On the dark scenes of the succeeding reign, and the sad catastrophe of this unhappy prelate, embittered by his recantation, that deplorable instance of the weakness of human nature, we wish not to enlarge — meminisse piget “ They, who look into themselves, must pity him, and wish to throw over him the skirts of that tender veil with which the great Friend of mankind once screened the infirmities of the well-intentioned : the spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak.”

The character, here drawn, of this extraordinary man, with which his Life concludes, both public and private, as a reformer and as a minister of the gospel, does credit to the judgment and impartiality of the compiler. His grace's industry and attention, his professional learning, memory, and casuistry, his candour, liberality, and openness to truth, his indulgence (with the exceptions abovementioned) to the opinions of others; his extreme caution, the sweetness of his manners, and the composure of his temper (qualifications essential to a reformer), his truly apostolical humility, his mildness and placability, his hospitality and charities, are all set in a just, and therefore in a shining light.—As to the cavils of the Papists against him, “to obviate all these,” as Mr. Gilpin well observes, “would be to enter into the general argument against them. His apostacy, his marriage, and his opinions are questions all of common controversy. On the particular miscarriages of his life I have every where touched as they occurred; and have by no means spared them, when they appeared to deserve censure. The general objection, which seems to bear the heaviest upon him, is founded on the pliancy of his temper. Saunders, one of the bitterest of his enemies, sarcastically calls him Henricianus; and his friends indeed find it no easy matter to wipe off these courtly stains. Without question, many instances of great condescension in his character strike us; but a blind submission to the will of princes was probably considered among the Christian virtues of those days.

“ On the other hand, when we see him singly, and frequently, oppose the fury of an inflamed tyrant; when

“ we see him make that noble stand against bigotry in the affair of the six articles, or when we see him the only person, who durst inform a passionate and jealous prince of the infidelity of a favourite wife*, we cannot but allow there was great firmness in his character; and must suppose that he drew a line in his own conscience to direct him in what matters he ought, and in what matters he ought not, to comply with his prince's will.”

Though no new facts (as before observed) are here related, or can now be expected, yet the manner in which the known facts are stated, and the reasoning which they occasion, often give to antiquity the grace (as it were) of novelty. And the name of Gilpin, already well known in ecclesiastical history, will derive new lustre from the work before us.

Mentioning, in a note, p. 61, a copy of Tindal's Translation of the New Testament, picked up by one of the late Lord Oxford's collectors, on whom, in return, he settled 20l. a year for life, sold by Osborn to Mr. Ames for 15s. only, and again by Langford, in May 1760, for 14 guineas and a half, he has not heard (he says) “in whose hands it is now.” Probably he may, by this time, know that it was then purchased by the late Dr. Gifford, who has bequeathed it, with his MSS. &c. to the Baptist Academy at Bristol †.

Two very striking passages shall now be selected.

Comparison between Luther and Erasmus.

“ The writings of Erasmus, as far as appears, introduced the first idea of systematic reformation into England. This reformer was a man of a very different temper from Luther; and yet, in his way, perhaps he contributed as much to discountenance the corruptions of the Romish church. Luther, fearless in the path of truth, was animated, rather than daunted, by opposition. Erasmus, cautious and respectful to authority, shrank from danger, and sought truth only in the regions of tranquillity. Luther, in vehement language, talked of extirpating error, root and branch. Erasmus wished only to open the eyes of men, and to leave them by degrees to reform themselves: he satisfied himself with exposing what was wrong; but did not presume to point out what was right. Luther's opposition ran ever in the form of fierce invective, or serious argument. Erasmus, though always in earnest, chose commonly to cloath his sentiments in ridicule. Luther was remarkable for the boldness of his measures, and a course of intrepid action; while Erasmus, trusting to his pen, never ventured abroad as the champion of religion; but defended it from his closet, and the art of printing getting then into use, his opinions soon made their way into the different parts of Europe.

* Queen Catherine Howard.

† See p. 458.

"Thus it happened, through the providence of God, that these two men, though in different ways, were equally adapted to the work of reformation. If Luther were the more spirited reformer on the spot, Erasmus was better qualified to make proselytes at a distance. If Luther's rough and popular address were better suited to the multitude, the polished style and elegant composition of Erasmus found easier access to the gentleman and the scholar."

Comparison between Archbishop Cranmer and Laud.

"Both were good men—both were equally zealous for religion—and both were engaged in the work of reformation.—I mean not to enter into the affair of introducing episcopacy into Scotland, nor, to throw any favourable light on the ecclesiastical views of those times. I am at present only considering the measures which the two archbishops took in forwarding their respective plans. While Cranmer pursued his with that caution and temper which we have just been examining; Laud, in the violence of his integrity (for he was certainly a well-meaning man), making allowances neither for men, nor opinions, was determined to carry all before him. The consequence was, that he did nothing which he attempted; while Cranmer did every thing. And it is probable, that if Henry had chosen such an instrument as Laud, he would have miscarried in his point; while Charles, with such a primate as Cranmer, would either have been successful in his schemes, or at least have avoided the fatal consequences that ensued. But I speak of these things merely as a politician. Providence, no doubt, over-ruling the ways of men, raises up, on all occasions, such instruments as are most proper to carry on its schemes, sometimes by promoting, and sometimes by defeating, the purposes of mankind."

The late "Dr. Baker," of Cambridge, mentioned in the preface, p. v, we suppose should have been "Mr. Baker," the antiquary and nonjuror.

It is remarkable that Cranmer, reproaching two of his bosom friends, Thorndon and Barber, for their treachery, used this expression: "If such men as you are not to be trusted, there is no fidelity to be found. I fear my left hand will accuse my "right." The biographer might have observed, as he did of a speech of the Earl of Essex (quoted above), that this also was "prophetic." How Cranmer's right hand afterwards offended, and was accused, if not by his left hand, by himself, we need not mention.

91. Captain Cook's last Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, &c. &c. (Continued from p. 600.)

WE will now place, in one point of view, all those passages which relate to the celebrated native of Otaheite, as they form a distinct episode, in which, though he acts an inferior, yet it is an interesting part; premising, that Capt. Cook was ordered, in his instructions, "to land him at such of the Society Isles as he should choose, and to leave him there."

"Omai left London (June 24, 1776,) with a mixture of regret and satisfaction.—When we talked about England, and about those who, during his stay, had honoured him with their protection or friendship, I could observe that his spirits were sensibly affected, and that it was with difficulty he could refrain from tears. But, the instant his conversation turned to his own islands, his eyes began to sparkle with joy. He was deeply impressed with a sense of the good treatment he had met with in England, and entertained the highest ideas of the country, and of the people. But the pleasing prospect he now had before him of returning home, loaded with what, he knew, would be esteemed invaluable treasures there, and the flattering hope, which the possession of these gave him, of attaining to a distinguished superiority amongst his countrymen, were considerations which operated, by degrees, to suppress every uneasy sensation; and he seemed to be quite happy when he got on board the ship.

"He was furnished, by his Majesty, with an ample provision of every article which, during our intercourse with his country, we had observed to be in any estimation there, either as useful or as ornamental. He had, besides, received many presents of the same nature from Lord Sandwich, Mr. * Banks, and several other gentlemen and ladies of his acquaintance. In short, every method had been employed, both during his abode in England, and at his departure, to make him the instrument of conveying to the inhabitants of the islands of the Pacific Ocean the most exalted opinion of the greatness and generosity of the British nation."...

"Although we do not think that there is a great similarity between our manners and those of the Spaniards, it is worth observing,

* Now Sir Joseph.

that

that at Teneriffe Omai did not think there was much difference. He only said, that they seemed not so friendly as the English; and that, in their persons, they approached those of his countrymen."...

"At New Zealand, Omai, whom the natives must have remembered seeing on board the Adventure, when her boat's crew were massacred in Grass Cove, whose language was a dialect of their own, and who perfectly understood all that they said, was made use of as our interpreter to enquire into their circumstances.... Kahoorā, the leader of the party who cut them off, having visited us three times, without betraying the smallest appearance of fear, Omai at last pointed him out, and solicited me to shoot him. Not satisfied with this, he addressed himself to Kahoorā, threatening to be his executioner if ever he presumed to visit us again.

"The New Zealander paid so little regard to these threats, that he returned, the next morning, with his whole family, men, women, and children, to the number of twenty and upwards. Omai was the first who acquainted me with his being alongside the ship, and desired to know if he should ask him to come on board. I told him he might; and accordingly he introduced the chief into the cabin, saying, 'There is Kahoorā; kill him!' But, as if he had forgot his former threats, or was afraid that I should call upon him to perform them, he immediately retired. In a short time, however, he returned; and seeing the chief unhurt, he expostulated with me very earnestly, saying, 'Why do you not kill him? You tell me, if a man kills another in England, that he is hanged for it. This man has killed ten, and yet you will not kill him; though many of his countrymen desire it, and it would be very good.' Omai's arguments, though specious enough, having no weight with me, I desired him to ask the chief, Why he had killed Capt. Furneaux's people? At this question Kahoorā folded his arms, hung down his head, and looked like one caught in a trap; and, I firmly believe, he expected instant death. But no sooner was he assured of his safety, than he became cheerful. He did not, however, seem willing to give me an answer to the question that had been put to him, till I had, again and again, repeated my promise that he should not be hurt. Then he ventured to tell us, That one of his countrymen having brought a stone hatchet to barter, the man, to whom it was offered, took it, and would neither return, nor give any thing for it; on which the owner of it snatched up the bread as an equivalent, and then the quarrel began."...

"For some time before we arrived at New Zealand, Omai had expressed a desire to take one of the natives with him to his own country. We had not been there many days, before he had an opportunity of being gratified in this; for a youth, about 17 or 18 years of age, named Taweiharooa, offered to accompany him; and took up his residence on board. I paid little attention to this at first, imagining that he would leave us when we were about to depart, and after he had got what he could from Omai. At length, finding that he was fixed in his resolution to go with us, and having learned that he was the only son of a deceased chief, and that his mother, still living, was a woman much respected here, I was apprehensive that Omai had deceived him and his friends, by giving them hopes and assurances of his being sent back. I therefore caused it to be made known to them all, that if the young man went away with us, he would never return. But this declaration seemed to make no sort of impression. The afternoon before we left the Cove, Tiratoutou, his mother, came on board, to receive her last present from Omai. The same evening she and her son parted, with all the marks of tender affection that might be expected between a parent and a child, who were never to meet again. But she said she would cry no more; and, sure enough, she kept her word; for when she returned the next morning, to take her last farewell of him, all the time she was on board she remained quite cheerful, and went away wholly unconcerned.

"Another youth, of about nine or ten years of age, named Kokoa, went with Taweiharooa, as his servant. He was presented to me by his own father, who, I believe, would have parted with his dog with far less indifference. The very little clothing the boy had he stripped him of, and left him as naked as he was born. It was to no purpose, that I endeavoured to convince these people of the improbability, or rather of the impossibility, of these youths ever returning home. Not one, not even their nearest relations, seemed to trouble themselves about their future fate. Since this was the case, and I was well satisfied that the boys would be no losers by exchange of place, I the more readily gave my consent to their going."...

"Omai was sent ashore at the island Watecou*, as Mr. Gore's interpreter. He was asked, by the natives, a great many questions concerning us, our ships, our country, and the sort of arms we used; and, according to the account he gave me, his answers were not a little upon the marvellous. As, for instance, he told them that our country had ships as large as their island, on board which were instruments of war (describing our guns), of such dimensions that several people might sit within them; and that one of them was sufficient to crush the whole island at one shot. This led them to enquire of him what sort of guns we actually had in our two ships. He said, that though they were but small, in comparison with those we had just described, yet, with such, as they were, we could, with the greatest ease, and at the distance the ships were from the shore, destroy the island, and kill every soul in it. They persevered in their enquiries to know by what means this could be done; and Omai explained the matter as well as he could. He happened luckily to have a few cartridges in his pocket. These he produced. The balls, and the gunpowder which was to set them in motion, were submitted to inspection; and, to supply the defects of his description, an appeal was made to the senses of the spectators. One of the chiefs had ordered the multitude to form themselves into a circle. This furnished Omai with a convenient stage for his exhibition. In the centre of this amphitheatre, the inconsiderable quantity of gunpowder, collected from his cartridges, was properly disposed upon the ground, and, by means of a bit of burning wood from the oven where dinner was dressing, set on fire. The sudden blast, and loud report, the mingled flame and smoke, that instantly succeeded, now filled the whole assembly with astonishment; they no longer doubted the tremendous power of our weapons, and gave full credit to all that Omai had said.

* In lat. 20° 1' S. long. 201° 45' E.
were

"This day, it seems, was destined to give Omai more occasions than one of being brought forward to bear a considerable part in its transactions. The island, though never before visited by Europeans, actually happened to have three strangers residing in it; and it was entirely owing to Omai's being one of Mr. Gore's attendants, that this curious circumstance came to our knowledge.

"Scarcely had he been landed upon the beach when he found, amongst the crowd there assembled, three of his own countrymen, natives of the Society Islands. At the distance of about 200 leagues from those islands, an immense unknown ocean intervening, with such wretched sea-boats as their inhabitants are known to make use of, and fit only for a passage where sight of land is scarcely ever lost, such a meeting, at such a place, so accidentally visited by us, may well be looked upon as one of those unexpected situations with which the writers of feigned adventures love to surprise their readers, and which, when they really happen in common life, deserve to be recorded for their singularity.

"It may be easily guessed with what mutual surprise and satisfaction Omai and his countrymen engaged in conversation. Their story, as related by them, is an affecting one. About twenty persons in number, of both sexes, had embarked on board a canoe at Otahete, to cross over to the neighbouring island Ulietea. A violent contrary wind arising, they could neither reach the latter, nor get back to the former. Their intended passage being a very short one, the stock of provisions was scanty, and soon exhausted. The hardships they suffered, while driven along by the storm they knew not whither, are not to be conceived. They passed many days without having any thing to eat or drink. Their numbers gradually diminished, worn out by famine and fatigue. Four men only survived when the canoe overset, and then the perdition of this small remnant seemed inevitable. However, they kept hanging by the side of their vessel, during some of the last days, till Providence brought them in sight of the people of this island, who immediately sent out canoes, took them off their wreck, and brought them ashore. Of the four who were thus saved, one was since dead. The other three, who lived to have this opportunity of giving an account of their almost miraculous transplantation, spoke highly of the kind treatment they here met with. And so well satisfied were they with their situation, that they refused the offer made to them by our gentlemen, at Omai's request, of giving them a passage on board our ships, to restore them to their native islands. The similarity of manners and language had more than naturalised them to this spot; and the fresh connections which they had here formed, and which it would have been painful to have broken off, after such a length of time, sufficiently account for their declining to revisit the place of their birth. They had arrived upon this island at least twelve years ago. For I learnt from Mr. Anderson, that he found they knew nothing of Capt. Wallis's visit to Otahete in 1765; nor of several other memorable occurrences, such as the conquest of Ulietea by those of Bolabola, which had preceded the arrival of the Europeans. To Mr. Anderson I am also indebted for their names, Orounoute, Otirreroa, and Tavee; the first, born at Matavai, in Otahete; the second at Ulietea; and the third at Huaheine.

"The landing of our gentlemen on this island, though they failed in the object of it, cannot but be considered as a very fortunate circumstance. It has proved, as we have seen, the means of bringing to our knowledge a matter of fact, not only very curious, but very instructive. The application of the above narrative is obvious. It will serve to explain, better than a thousand conjectures of speculative reasoners, how the detached parts of the earth, and, in particular, how the islands of the South Sea, may have been first peopled; especially those that lie remote from any inhabited continent, or from each other."

The above is one instance, among many, of the philosophical and religious deductions which this truly Christian Hero draws, on every proper occasion, from his researches and discoveries —

Rising from Nature up to Nature's God.

Had

Had Capt. Cook not been educated in a profession, had he not been the first of navigators, his talents and abilities must have distinguished him as a man of science; though not cultivated by literary pursuits, his language and composition, it may be added, are both correct and elegant; he was so well qualified to relate, as well as to execute, that few scholars, at ease in their studies, could excel, even as a writer, this great voyager in his cabin, combating the winds and waves, and alternately directing his ship, and informing the world. But to return.

"The language of Watceoo was equally well understood by Omai, and by our two New Zealanders."—These are some "links of the latitudinal chain," as Mr. Marsden* expresses it, "that general language, which is found to prevail in, and to be indigenous to, all the islands of the Eastern Seas, from Madagascar to the remotest of Captain Cook's discoveries."—Since he wrote, "the discovery of the Sandwich Islands, in this last voyage," as Dr. Douglas observes, "has added some links to the chain." And in some notes he has traced the inhabitants of the Ladrões, or Marianne Islands, and those of the Carolines, to the same common source; and, as "a striking picture of the amazing extent of this Oriental language," has inserted an enlarged and comparative table of their humerals.

"Omai, who was with me [on Palmerston's Island], caught, with a scoop net, in a very short time, as much fish as served the whole party on shore for dinner, besides sending some to both ships. And it is but justice to him to say, that, in these excursions to the uninhabited islands, he was of the greatest use. For he not only caught the fish, but dressed these, and the birds we killed, in an oven, with heated stones, after the fashion of his country, with a dexterity and good humour that did him great credit."

"Omai, who was a great favourite with Feenou [one of the chiefs of the Friendly Islands], and with these people in general, was tempted with the offer of being made chief of this island [Middleburgh, or Eooa], if he would have staid among them; and it is not clear to me, that he would not have staid, if the scheme had met with my approbation. I own, I did disapprove of it; but not because I thought that Omai would do better for himself in his own native isle."

A reflection here of Captain Cook's is too striking and humane to be omitted:

* History of Sumatra; p. 166.

"While I was surveying this delightful prospect, I could not help flattering myself with the pleasing ideas that some future navigator may, from the same station, behold these meadows stocked with cattle, brought to these islands by the ships of England; and that the completion of this single benevolent purpose, independently of all other considerations, would sufficiently mark to posterity, that our voyages had not been useless to the general interests of humanity."

(To be continued.)

92. The Antiquity, Use, and Excellence of Church Music. A Sermon preached at the Opening of a new Organ in the Cathedral Church of Christ, Canterbury, on Thursday, July 8, 1784. By George Horne, D. D. Dean of Canterbury, and President of Saint Mary Magdalen College, Oxford. 4to.

THIS discourse, which has already been cursorily mentioned in our account of the gala that occasioned it (p. 552), is an elegant panegyric on sacred music.—After tracing it from the earliest times, from those who handled the harp and organ, in the Mosaic history, through the Jewish dispensation, to the advent of Christ, and the establishment of the Christian Church, the Dean proceeds as follows:

"With us, of the Church of England, indeed, it ceased, for a short period, in the last century. By the sectaries of that day organs were holden in abomination; and the fury of an enthusiastic zeal, which seems to have been dear as well as blind, destroyed many capital instruments. It is observable, however, of Milton, though so warmly engaged against the church, that his taste got the better of his prejudices; for in one of his smaller poems he speaks of cathedral service—as it ought to be spoken of, and in a manner truly worthy of himself†. It is much to the honour of the members of the Kirk of Scotland, that many of them have lately subscribed liberally towards the erection of an episcopal chapel, with an organ, at Edinburgh. The votaries of presbytery not only bear the sound of the organ, but, I believe, have adopted it in some of their own places of worship in England. O might all their other prejudices die away, and vanish in like manner!

"The objections, in short, of any account, urged against choral music, are pointed at

* A horse and mare, a bull and cow, a boar, 3 sows, 2 rabbits, and goats, were left at Tongataboo (or Amsterdam); and a ram and 2 ewes at Eooa (or Middleburgh); besides those at the Society and Sandwich Isles.

† "But let my due sect never fail," &c.

Il Penseroso.
the

the abuse which has been sometimes made of it, and to which, like all other good things, it is at all times liable. Great care, therefore, should be taken to keep the style of it chaste and pure, suitable to holy places and divine subjects. . . . The light movements of the theatre, with the effeminate and frittered music of modern Italy, should be excluded, and such composers as TALLIS and BIRD, GIBBONS and KING, PURCELL and BLOW, CROFT and CLARK, WISE and WELDON, GREENE and HANDEL, should be considered (and it is hoped they always will be considered) as our English classics in this sacred science."

After quoting several passages of the Psalms, and Revelations xix. i. &c. admirably set by Goldwin, Blake, Wise, Aldrich, Clark, and Blow, the preacher thus appositely introduces the late Commemoration of Handel :

"Before such a scene, and such a band, [as that in the last passage abovementioned] every human performance must shrink and fade away in the comparison. A performance, however, has lately been exhibited, and to our honour, has been exhibited in Britain (its sound still vibrates in the ears of many who hear me), which furnished the best idea we shall ever obtain on earth of what is passing in heaven. It did justice (and that is saying very much indeed) to a composition of the great master, to which may be applied the observation of a learned writer upon a chorus in an anthem penned by the same hand, that 'nothing less is suggested by it to the imagination than all the powers of the universe associated in the worship of its Creator *.'

"Music then has always been used in the church, and with good reason. May it continue to be so used, and to produce its proper effects! In England, choral service was first introduced in THIS CATHEDRAL, and the practice of it long confined to the churches of Kent, from whence it became gradually diffused over the whole kingdom. Here may it breathe its last—but not till time shall expire with the world! Violated no more by sacrilegious hands, may this august and magnificent fabric remain, in perfect beauty, through all the generations of mankind that are yet to come, a monument of the piety of our ancestors, and a witness to that of our posterity! May thanksgiving, and the voice of melody, like that of this day, be evermore heard in it, till, the veil being done away which parts the visible from the invisible world, the choirs of heaven and earth shall unite before the throne!"

Our encomiums on this eloquent composition are agreeably superseded by a poetical panegyric which appeared in July Mag. p. 535, and with which we sincerely concur. The profits of the sale (if any) are to be applied towards the relief of the numerous and much-distressed orphan family of the late Rev. Mr. Smith*, a convert from Popery, and author of Errors of the Church of Rome detected, &c. 1778.

93. A Familiar Epistle to Thomas Lamb, Esq. Mayor of Rye, in Suffex; supposed to be written about Three Years ago, and occasioned by a Wager concerning the present John Earl of Sandwich; in which are interspersed several Remarks, both moral and political, on the Manners and Characters of the present Age; together with a novel Species of Criticism on Music and many of its Professors. By Major Henry Waller. 4to.

94. A Rump and Dozen; being the Conclusion of the above. By the same. 4to.

THE wager which occasioned these fanciful poems respected the age of the noble Earl. The Mayor, being the loser, wrote a letter in rhyme to one of the party, a general-officer, desiring to change the place of entertainment from the Red Lion Inn, where it had been ordered, to his own house—from a Lion, says our author, to a Lamb. This letter the General gave to the Major, and thus he has answered it. He is, no doubt, a man of humour, knows the world, and, we doubt not, is an excellent companion over a rump and dozen. And though his poetry is certainly a farrago, it is the farrago of a poet, who, whenever he attempts a more daring flight, the flight perhaps of heroic poetry, will succeed better than in these more familiar effusions of his Muse.—The Ghost, and his Gotham, were certainly not the best parts of Churchill's works; and yet Churchill, when he soared on the broader wings of poetic daring, surpassed all his contemporaries.—We shall select, from the second effort of the Major's Muse, his Character of the late Lord Granby.

"And bring to mind that fatal day
Which our lov'd Granby snatch'd away!
What heart so callous but would melt
At such a loss as we all felt!
Him, as he pass'd, each soldier bless'd;
He cherish'd all, he none oppress'd!
His honest visage knew no guile,
Nor could put on that sawning smile,
By which, you'd think, . . . would fain
Make you believe—he felt your pain.
As to compassion he ne'er shuts
His bowels, who's no room for guts!"

* Sir John Hawkins.

* See p. 152.

So, from that breast, pity can't steal,
Which never yet was known to feel!
But why that frightful picture draw,
When Granby stands without a flaw?
At least, each fault he did possess,
Rose from some virtue in excess.
Pierc'd with the piteous tale of grief,
When wretches sought of him relief,
His eyes large drops of pearl distilling,
He'd give—till left without a shilling!
What most his manly heart-strings tore
Was, when he felt, and found no more.
He, under his benign command,
To honour led each willing band.
He never met with just rebuke
From Brunswick's truly gallant Duke:
But, when that hero show'd the way,
Was proud and eager to obey.
Tell me too, where you read in story,
Of one who pointed to more glory;
Who, with less force, compell'd to yield,
And drove vast armies from the field.
Ask you for proof? I'll only call
That signal morn at Williamstown,
When more than thrice his numbers fled,
With their two marshals at their head,
And Mosby's prov'd that squadrons cou'd,
When well led on, pass through a wood;
Whilst the same zeal through others ran,
To charge the foe—as they began."

It is evident, from the tenor of both these poems, that Major Waller is a staunch friend to the liberties of his country; a circumstance which cannot fail to recommend this brave veteran's Muse to every good Whig. Nor have the friends of the present Minister any reason to be offended with him, as the Major compliments Mr. Pitt in strains of the warmest panegyric. The Dilettanti in music, we are informed, have pronounced upon the musical critique, which appears in the first part of his work, in terms of very favourable approbation. And we are much mistaken if the professors in the science of scavoir vivre will not be as highly pleased with those pages of his second poem which so very scientifically treat on the pleasing subject of modern good-living.

An extempore Song, which has fallen in our way, penned by the same sword-arm, may be seen in p. 535. It was really produced extempore, having been written only a few hours before dinner, on the day the son of Sir Christopher Whichcote, of Lincolnshire, attained the age of twenty-one years, and was sung by Lady Whichcote, to the tune of Come, come, my good shepherds, our flocks let us shear, &c. the natural simplicity of whose style it very much resembles.

95. Testacea Minuta Rariora nuperissime detecta in Arena Littoris Sanduicensis. A Gul. Boys, Arm. S. A. S. Multa addidit, et omnium Figuras, ope Microscopii ampliatas, accurate delineavit, Geo. Walker. A Collection of the Minute and Rare Shells lately discovered in the Sand of the Sea Shore near Sandwich. By William Boys, Esq. F. S. A. Considerably augmented, and all their Figures accurately drawn, as magnified with the Microscope, by George Walker, Bookseller, at Faversham. 4to.

MR. BOYS, on examining with his glasses the sand of the shore near Sandwich, discovered in it a considerable number of minute shells, altogether new to him. At the instance of Mr. Jacob, of Faversham, Mr. Walker has prosecuted the discovery, by separating the shells from the sand, small portions of it being placed, when dry, under Dr. Withering's botanical microscope, afterwards enlarging each shell with the greater magnifiers of Cuff's microscope for opaque objects, and Wilson's pocket one, and then drawing them as here exhibited in the plates. Besides satisfying, in this undertaking, his two friends abovementioned, the author has received the approbation and assistance of the Duchess Dowager of Portland, and Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. P. R. S. to whom the work is inscribed. He has not only examined the sand from Sandwich, but the sediments of various parts of the shores from thence up to Faversham, and the Isle of Shepey, the neighbouring ditches, boggy places, woods, &c. The arrangement is Mr. Jacob's; the classification that of Linnæus, in a retrograde course. The species of shells in the three plates are, "the Worm-shell, the Toothshell, the depressed Snail, the produced Snail, the Top-shell, the Whilk, the Volute, the Dipper, the Chambered Nautilus, the Muscle, the Scale, the Cockle, the Acornshell, the Sea Urchin, and the Star Fish;" 90 figures in all.—On the same plan Plancus published, in 1739, An Account of the Minute and Rare Shells discovered at Rimini, on the Coast of the Adriatic Sea, where they are much more abundant; and Mr. Baker has observed, "that shell-fish are objects that have as yet been very slightly examined by the microscope, and therefore the serious enquirer into Nature's secret operations may here be certain of discovering beauties which at present he can have no conception of." Treatise on the Microscope, p. 244.

96. Epitome of Philosophical Transactions. Vol. LXXIII. For the Year 1783. Part II. 4to. (See vol. LIII. p. 946.)

ART. XVII. On the proper Motion of the Sun and Solar System; with an Account of several Changes that have happened among the fixed Stars since the Time of Mr. Flamsteed. By William Herschel, Esq. F. R. S.

After giving his reasons for suspecting "that there is not, in strictness of speaking, one fixed star in the heavens," and adding a short account of the changes in them since Mr. Flamsteed's time, Mr. Herschel here collects the result of his three reviews of the heavens under a few general heads, in the following articles:

I. "Stars that are lost, or have undergone some capital change since Flamsteed's time."—Of these he enumerates 15; viz. 3 in Hercules, 3 in Cancer, 1 in Perseus, 1 in Pisces, 1 in Hydra, 2 in Orion, 2 in Coma Berenices, and 2 in Draco.

II. "Stars that have changed their magnitudes since Flamsteed's time." Of these 40.

III. "Stars newly come to be visible." Of these 11; viz. 1 near Lacerta's tail-end, 1 in Perseus, 1 near the head of Cepheus, 1 in Gemini, 1 in Equuleus, 2 in Sextans, 1 between Cancer and Hydra, 1 in Hercules, and 2 in Bootes; though, as he allows, that "it is not easy to prove a star to be newly come," on their new appearance he lays no great stress. But these and many other changes in their magnitudes, &c. "cause (he adds) a strong suspicion, that most probably every star in the heaven is, more or less, in motion," and, of course, "that our sun, with all its planets and comets, that is, the solar system, is no less liable to such a general agitation as we find to obtain among all the rest of the celestial bodies." The "method of detecting the direction and quantity of the supposed proper motion of the sun" is afterwards pointed out by some geometrical deductions, which, by being applied to some known facts, give "some reasons to guess which way the solar system is probably tending its course." But this a diagram only can fully explain.—Mr. Herschel divides his "Observations on the Sympatical Parallax of the fixed Stars" into 3 principal zones, which he "can now furnish (he says) with a complete set of double stars," viz. about 340 in the three.—He then explains the deviations of the planets from the law which all other stars seem to obey; applauds Mr. Michell's idea of the stars being collected into systems; gives a table of the stars which agree with this assigned motion of the solar system, and of those which do not, &c. For the application of his theory we must refer to the article, the whole of which is curious.

ART. XVIII. Some Experiments upon the Ochra friabilis nigro fusca of Da Costa, Hist. Foss. p. 102; and called by the Miners of Derbyshire, Black Wadd. By Josiah Wedgwood, F. R. S.

This earth, or substance, which was first collected by Mr. Wedgwood, many years ago, "in a hollow way near Winstler, in Derbyshire," has been rendered "a subject of curiosity" from "the extraordinary circumstance of its taking fire upon being slightly mixed with linseed oil, first discovered by accident in 1752, at Mr. Bassano's, a painter in Derby;" and now "has a better claim to our attention" from its being "employed, in considerable quantities, and very advantageously, as an oil colour, in ship and house-painting." From these experiments (nine in all) it appears, "that it should not be classed amongst the Ochres not acted upon by acids; that it may, with as great propriety, be called Manganese as Ochre; and that 22 parts of this mineral contain nearly two of indissoluble earth, chiefly micaceous, 1 of lead, about $9\frac{1}{2}$ of iron, and the same quantity of manganese."

ART. XIX. Mémoire sur la Manière de préparer, avec le moins de perte possible, le Sel fusible d'Urine blanc, et pur, et l'Acide phosphorique parfaitement transparent. By the Duke de Chaulnes, F. R. S. Presented by Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. P. R. S.

This process will interest those only, curious as it is, who are adepts both in chemistry and French, as it is not translated.

ART. XX. Experiments for ascertaining the Point of Mercurial Congelation. By Mr. Thomas Hutchins, Governor of Albany Fort, in Hudson's Bay.

These experiments were made by the direction of the Royal Society, and in pursuance of two similar methods suggested separately by Mr. Cavendish and Dr. Black, in 1781 and 2. Albany Fort is in latitude $52^{\circ} 14'$ North, and 82° West longitude from Greenwich.—

The five first were made as directed, "in order to obtain the point of congelation." The two next were also made in the manner directed, "to endeavour to ascertain the greatest contraction mercury is capable of."—Then follow two experiments, made in a different manner, by Mr. Hutchins's own suggestion; and, lastly, an account of mercury frozen in the open air, without the aid of any artificial cold, "which will be found to corroborate (he says) the preceding experiments, and determine the exact point of congelation to be at 40° below the cypher;" and this, as Dr. Blagden observes, (in Art. XXI.) "is a degree of cold not exceeding that which sometimes occurs in the Northern parts of Europe, and frequently in the more rigorous climates of Asia and America."

ART. XX. Observations on Mr. Hutchins's Experiments for determining the Degree of Cold at which Quicksilver freezes. By H. Cavendish, Esq. F. R. S.

The design of this paper is to explain some particulars in the apparatus sent by the author to Mr. Hutchins, "the intention of which does not readily appear; and also to endeavour to shew the cause of some phenomena which occurred in his experiments; and point out the consequences to be drawn from them."—Among other things, "as it appeared from the examination of the thermometer G, after it came home, that -40° thereon answers to $-38\frac{2}{3}$ on a thermometer adjusted in the manner recommended by the Committee of the Royal Society, it follows, that all the experiments agree in shewing that the true point at which quicksilver freezes is $38\frac{2}{3}$, or, in whole numbers, 39° below nothing." And "all these experiments prove, that quicksilver contracts or diminishes in bulk by freezing; and that the very low degrees to which the thermometers have been made to sink, viz. -448° and -450° , are owing to this contraction, and not to the cold having been in any degree equal to that shewn by the thermometer."

ART. XXI. History of the Congelation of Quicksilver. By Henry Blagden, M. D. F. R. S. Physician to the Army.

In Part I. it appears, that Professor Braun, at the suggestion of Dr. Zeiher, first established this important fact at Petersburg, in December 1759, by breaking the bulb of his thermometer as soon as he found the quicksilver immovable, and thereby obtaining "a solid shining metallic mass, which extended under the strokes of a pestle, in hardness rather inferior to lead, and yielding a dull, dead sound, like that metal."—Other experiments of the like kind were made at Göttingen in January 1774; at Albany Fort, by Mr. Hutchins, in January and February 1775; at Rotterdam, by Dr. Bicker, and at Northampton, by Dr. Anth. Fothergill, in 1776; by Mr. Hutchins again, in 1781, with the "brilliant success" above-mentioned; by Dr. Guthrie, at Petersburg, in 1783; and, lastly, in the same winter, by Mr. Cavendish, at Hampstead.

In Part II. it is shewn, that "quicksilver has very frequently become solid by natural cold," particularly in Siberia in December 1734, though Professor Gmelin, finding the quicksilver in his thermometer reduced to -120 of Fahrenheit's scale, mistook that for a measure of the temperature, when in truth it ceased to be so as soon as it was congealed, it being in consequence contracted.—Many other instances follow of a similar degree of cold, and consequently of a similar deception, except in M. Törnsten, in Sweden, who, though his thermometer fell to -116° , ascribed its descent, ignorant as he was of the cause, rather to "a diminution, than an increase, of the cold." And now we know that "the real cold probably very little exceeded -39° , or the degree of mercurial congelation." Thus, by Mr. Hutchins's experiments, besides the information obtained relative to quicksilver itself, this, and several vulgar prejudices as to the difference between cold climates, &c. have been corrected.

ART. XXII. Experiments relating to Phlogiston, and the seeming Conversion of Water into Air. By Joseph Priestley, LL. D. F. R. S.

Some of these experiments tend to prove that phlogiston is the same thing with inflammable air; that alkaline air is the compound, and inflammable air, or phlogiston, the more simple substance of the two. There are other experiments relating to the seeming conversion of water into air, and the re-conversion of air into water, some with various liquid substances, thrown into the form of vapour, and others to ascertain the influence of the external air, which could not have been made, we are here told, sold, without Mr. Parker's incomparable lens.

ART. XXIII. Description of an improved Air-Pump, and the Account of some Experiments made with it. By Mr. Tiberius Cavallo, F. R. S.

Though almost every part of the air-pump was improved by Mr. Smeaton, the principal imperfection of the best air-pumps, which prevents the air in the receiver being rarefied above 600 times, was never removed till the invention of that here described. This improvement, for which we are indebted to Mr. Jacob Barnard Haas, philosophical instrument maker, in consequence of an attempt made by Mr. Cavallo, consists in lifting up the valve at the bottom of the barrel, and shutting it again at pleasure. This instrument has various other advantages, here enumerated.—The whole is illustrated by plates, and a description; and annexed is an account of some experiments made with it, principally to determine how far it can rarefy the air. By the pear-gage, as it is called, when examined by it in the usual manner, “it appeared that the pump exhausted so far as to retain * within the receiver less than the 1000th part of the air it contained before the exhaustion.”

ART. XXIV. (misprinted XXIII.) Extract of a Letter from the Rev. James Augustus Hamilton, M. A. to the Rev. Nevil Maskelyne, D. D. F. R. S. giving an Account of his Observation of the Transit of Mercury over the Sun, of Nov. 12, 1782, observed at Cook's Town, near Dungannon, in Ireland.

This observer here states his general apparatus and results. The first external contact he dates at 2h. 21' 45" apparent time, and the internal contact at 2h. 27' 43". His longitude is 26' 35" W. (nearly); his latitude 54° 38' 20".

ART. XXV. Methodus Inveniendi Lineas Curvas ex proprietatibus Variationis Curvaturæ. Auctore Nicolao Landerbeck, Mathes. Profess. in Acad. Upsaliensi Adjuncto.

This paper contains seven theorems, which cannot be abridged, nor will they be understood but by algebraists.

ART. XXVI. A Series of Observations on, and a Discovery of, the Period of the Variation of the Light in the bright Star called Algol. By John Goodricke, Esq.

These observations, dated from York, exhibit a regular and periodical variation in Algol, or β Persei, (the bright star in the head of Medusa,) of a nature hitherto, it is supposed, unnoticed. Its remarkable increase is mentioned in Du Hamel's Hist. Reg. Scient. Acad. * to have been observed by Maraldi, in 1694, (but not in 1692, or 1693,) “appearing as a star, sometimes of the 4th, sometimes of the 3d, and sometimes of the 2d magnitude;” but this is all that Mr. Goodricke “can find concerning its variation, after the most diligent researches.” On Nov. 12, 1782, between 8 and 9 at night, it appeared to him of about the 4th magnitude; “but the next day it was of the 2d magnitude, which is its usual appearance.” On Decemb. 28 following, at 5½ h. in the evening, it was again about the 4th magnitude; but at 8½ h. it was increased to the 2d. In this observation his friend Mr. Edward Pigott agreed. Several very particular observations, as to the brightness and magnitude of Algol, follow, from an attentive comparison of which it appears, “1. that this star changes from the 2d to about the 4th magnitude in nearly 3 hours and a half, and from thence to the 2d magnitude again in about the same space of time; so that the whole duration of this singular variation is only about seven hours; and, 2. that this variation probably recurs about every two days and twenty-one hours.” These observations were continued from Nov. 12, 1782, to May 3, 1783, and neither Mr. Goodricke nor Mr. Pigott ever found any variation from this theory. “Whether this singular phenomenon is always the same, or whether it occurs only some years, and ceases entirely in others (as may be presumed from the account of Maraldi); and whether, in this case, it recurs in regular periods of time, or otherwise,” is submitted to future discussion. On the cause of it Mr. G. hazards this conjecture: that it may perhaps be owing “either to the interposition of a large body revolving round Algol, or some kind of motion of its own, whereby part of its body, covered with spots, or such like matter, is periodically turned towards the earth.”

With the Presents made to the Society, and the Names of the Donors, the volume (as usual) concludes.

* Lib. IV. § 6. c. VIII. de rebus Astronomicis, ann. 1695. p. 362.

97. Fox's Martyrs; or, A New Book of the Sufferings of the Faithful. 8vo.

THESE "Martyrs" are not those of John Fox, but of Charles James, this book being nothing less nor more than a collection of the names and anecdotes of those members of the last House of Commons, 90 in all, who lost their seats by their adherence to the Coalition.—That they are larded with some truth and some humour, two or three specimens may shew, e. g.

"SIR GR—Y COOPER, of Gogar, Baronet; for I wish to be accurate; and it is impossible I can err in copying the service (Anglice, verdict) of a Scotch jury, upon the validity of this gentleman's lineal succession (when he was secretary to the Treasury) to the late Sir Andrew CUFAR, of Gogar, in the county of Mid-Lothian.

"Oh! mighty Cæsar, dost thou lie so low?
"Are all thy titles, glories, honours, spoils,
"Shrunk to this little measure? Fare thee
"well!"

"W—M H—NG—A.

"If it be true, as has been reported, that a Great Personage expressed some degree of displeasure upon hearing that her secretary had served the place of Footman to a discarded Minister on his triumphal retreat from the Westminster Address, we must allow for the feelings of honest repentment in the electors of St. Mich—l, when the news reached them that their worthy representative had, on that same memorable occasion, held the very dignified situation of Coachman. To that employment they have left him; and though Orkn—y has elected the Principal, and Kint—re the *Footman, yet C—row—ll has rejected the Coachman of Mr. Fox."

Among other discoveries, this writer has found that the real name of the late member for the University of Cambridge, Mr. M—nfield, or M—nsfield, wants "that one letter which alone
"makes the difference between him
"and the first oracle of the law."

"H—PH—Y ST—RT.

"Good phrases are surely, and ever were, very commendable. Obliged! it comes of obligo; very good; a good phrase †. That is, when a man is, as they say, obligated! or, when a man is—being—whereby—he may be thought to be obligated, which is an excellent thing." 1 HEN. IV, 2d Part, Act 3.

This writer means to raise a laugh—and so far he has succeeded. But farther we say not.

98. An Essay on Laborious Parturition; in which the Division of the Symphysis Pubis is particularly considered. By William Osborn, M. D. &c. &c. 8vo.

THE main purpose of this Essay is to controvert, and finally to overturn, the necessity of performing the operation of dividing the symphysis pubis, in any case, or under any circumstances whatever. All that has been said or written on the subject, either in recommendation of, or in opposition to, the operation, are very candidly and ingeniously considered by the author of this Essay; and there is also detailed an history of all the known cases wherein the operation has been performed. In the course of the work a very curious and important case is related, which fell immediately under the care of our author, wherein delivery was happily effected by the crotchet, though the pelvis measured only "the very small space of "one inch and three quarters at the utmost, and in the widest part, and that "only on one side of the projecting sacrum; while the space between it and
"the symphysis, and on the other side,
"barely amounted to three quarters of
"an inch;" a space much less than has commonly been thought necessary in which to perform the Cæsarean operation, or the division of the symphysis pubis.

The good sense and candour, which appear in every part of this work, shew our author to be equally the polite gentleman and the intelligent practitioner; and we hope, and doubt not, it will be carefully perused by every gentleman who may be liable to perform obstetrical operations.

* "In the person of Mr. Ad—m, one of the footmen; the other being Mr. N—th."

† "See this gentleman's advertisement in the Morning Herald of March 31, wherein he tells us, that he shall think himself obligated to bend to the purposes of the county of D—t; and concludes with a magnanimous promise, that he will be chosen no where else. Whether he means, that it is one of the purposes of this county that he should not be elected to another seat, we do not know; but we are unwilling to imagine the freeholders can be so cruel and ungenerous, after rejecting him themselves, as to wish to preclude any other body of men from restoring to the House of Commons that eloquence and those abilities of which this advertisement gives so striking a specimen."

TO MISS SEWARD,

ON THE INJUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN MAGAZINE TO HER LATE POEM, LOUISA.

THOU, to the tones of whose enchanting
lyre,
In varied sweetness as they flow,
Heroic Grief, and elegant Desire,
With pity weep, with passion glow;
Fair Muse of Albion! thy sweet lays are such,
Nature and Taste alike approve;
And the heart, melting at thy magic touch,
Is lost in wonder and in love.

Witness what charms, in thy bright colouring drest,

LOUISA sweetly sad display'd,
When the firm youth, too cruelly distress'd,
Resign'd but to deserve the maid!

E'en rival bards allow thy wide-spread fame
Is built upon the base of truth;
Parental † feelings consecrate thy claim,
And dead must be the heart of youth

That moves not to the motions of thy mind;
As dead as that rude censor's taste,
Who, crawling o'er thy page in ignorance blind,

With reptile slime its bloom defac'd.

O mean attempt of Rage and Impotence!
To pour, with a licentious tongue,
Polluted comments on the purest sense
That ever Virgin-Muse has sung!

O SEWARD! thou whose fair and liberal
soul

Sheds lustre on the poet's name,
Heed not thy foul detractor's venom'd scroll,
A spider in the shrine of Fame!

Repton, Derbyshire. W. B. STEVENS.

MR. HAYLEY ON MISS SEWARD'S LOUISA.
IMPROMPTU.

TWO names, the pride of English song,
Divided sway possess;
Two lovely rivals, they have long
Rul'd every gentle breast.

Where is the heart that EMMA's pain
Has not with pity fill'd?

At ELOISA's fiery strain
What bosom has not thrill'd?

To match these soul-subduing names
Behold a third appears!

With all their force LOUISA claims
Our praise, our love, our tears.

* There is an epithet misprinted in Miss Seward's Sonnet in our last, p. 613. It should be "Peru's mild Genius."

Miss S. disclaims the verses, about a Lover and a Friend, supposed to be either her's or Mrs. Cowley's. Surely they are not in Miss S.'s manner. EDIT.

† Alluding to Eugenio's sacrifice to filial piety objected to by the critic.

O Sensibility! sweet power!
To thee, thou friend of earth!
And Genius, thy bright paramour,
These sisters owe their birth.

Immortal as their parents, these Shall foil base Envy's arms,
And, like the Sister-Graces, please
By their congenial charms.

Like them this triple group shall reign,
As archetypes of art,
And to the end of time maintain
The homage of the heart.

Earbham, May 15.

ON SEEING THE GENERAL AND JUST OPINION OF MR. HAYLEY'S POETIC PRE-EMINENCE DISPUTED IN THE NEWS-PAPERS.

RISE, kindred Dunces, from your drear
abodes, [goads!
Where Folly nurs'd you, and where Envy Rise! till your dirty numbers equal those Who hurl'd at Pope's bright verse their murky prose!

So ye perchance shall rouse th' unwonted ire,
That lacks no spark of Wit's transcendent fire,
When her indignant powers, in lightning-blaze,

Arm with resistless bolt great Hayley's lays.
Rise! that another Dunciad swift may save Your groveling tribe from dark Oblivion's wave!

So shall the brilliant favourite page of Fame
To Time's last limit bear each reptile name.

E X T E M P O R E
ON THE SHOOTING TAX.

WHAT must I, a poor curate, pay a guinea a year
For shooting a partridge?—'Tis terribly dear:
Impossible! 'tis so.—O syc, Billy Pitt;
Most cruelly hard you've my poor crupper bit:
This dread tax pray remove, Sir, and tax servant-girls,
You'll get money enough if you tax all their curls.

ON THE CANDLE AND WINDOW TAX.

Said to be written by a Westminster Scholar.

GOD said, Let there be light—and lo,
It instant was, and freely given.
To every creature under heaven;
Says P——, I will not have it so—

Darkness much better suits my views;
Let darkness o'er the land diffuse.
Henceforth I will that all shall pay
For every light by night or day.

He said, and, as he'd been a God,
The venal herd obey'd his nod.

MR. URBAN,

Bristol, Aug. 20.

THE following jeu d'esprit is much admired at this place, and, as I think it deserves a much better fate than such fugitive

give pieces usually meet with, I solicit a place for it in the poetical part of your valuable miscellany. Z.

TO MR. C—T—BY.

Ne sis ancillæ tibi amor pudori, &c.

MORACE, BOOK II. ODE IV. IMITATED.

SMIT with a spider-bruher's face,
Think not thy passion a disgrace,
Nor look so d—'d dejected;
Where is thy ancient valour fled?
Nay—never blush, and hang thy head,
Like Bobadil detected.

When Cupid wills his darts to fly,
From corner of a cookmaid's eye,
The stoutest may be taken;
And whilst she stirs the kitchen fire,
Kindling her cheeks, and his desire,
His heart may melt like bacon.

Then bluth not at th' ignoble flame,
Heroes of old have done the same,
Tho' great within the trenches;
Achilles*, Ajax†, and the Czar‡,
Softened the rugged brow of war
In private with their wenches.

Courage, dear boy, return once more,
Leave not Cindrilla to deplore,
Whom thy sweet air bewitches;
Her mop, her brush, neglected lie—
She can nor make or bake a pie—
Scarte see to wash her dishes.

Wilt thou no more frequent the green?
With folded arms no more be seen,
Thy own sweet person viewing?
O how she longs to see thee there,
With wrinkled boot, and turn'd-up hair,
Tho' to her own undoing!

And then to hear thee talk so fine,
Of horses, w—s, and where to dine,
In neat set phrase so charming—
Cindrilla swears her heart is won,
That she's resolv'd to be undone,
And give her mistress warning.

The misses may be pert and sneer,
But servants, tho' in common geer,
Stuff gowns, and coarser jacket,
May yet conceal as fair a skin,
Be as provocative to sin,
And make not half the racket.

Besides, who knows, thy love may be
Of noble blood, in low degree,
Tho' now with scarce a rag on;
Some fairy, envious of her worth,
Doom'd her to labour from her birth,
Sprung from renown'd Pendragon.

Come then to thy Cindrilla's arms,
Bedizen'd in her Sunday charms,
No gaudy silks and fattins;

But new-starch'd cap, and tuck'd-up gown,
With red and white that's all her own,
Stuff petticoat, and pattins.

Pardon, if in these lyric lays
I trumpet forth Cindrilla's praise,
Her beauty tho' uncommon;
With fourscore years upon my head,
Thou hast but little cause to dread
A poor infirm old woman.

ON SEEING A MOURNING RING IN MEM-ORY OF THE REV. WILLIAM GOST-LING, ORNAMENTED WITH A CHRYSTAL URN INCLOSING A BRAIDED LOCK OF HIS HAIR.

WHEN I survey this emblematic urn,
This briefly comprehensive tale peruse,

Remembrance wakes my soul to soft concern,
To grateful elegy my plaintive Muse.

O narrow shrine! and is this chrystal stor'd
With all that frugal piety could save?
Yet shall affection prize this scanty board, Snatch'd from the crowded coffers of the grave.

Behold his reverend locks, that vie with snow,
In silver tissue curiously disspread!
Yet how much more becoming did they show
Beneath the velvet covering of his head!

On that fair brow, as open as his heart,
Which every social tie could comprehend,
To worth or science equal aid impart,
A hospitable universal friend.

Where is the glistening eye, the courteous
smile,

The comely countenance, the vocal tongue,
Whose lively tales could fleeting time beguile,
Instruct the old, and captivate the young?

Decrepid age and racking gout conspir'd
To break his firm composure, but in vain:
Oft have I mark'd his features, and admir'd,
Serenely smiling in the face of pain.

Careless the fetters of disease he bore,
While memory led his active mind to stray Through Gothic piles in search of ancient lore*,
And rescue sacred ruins from decay.

Still fancy views him, still I seem to spy
His lamp, his book, his posture, form, and dress;

Beside him filial care, with watchful eye, Watching his uncomplaining wants to guess.

Thus, to his name and honour'd image, still
A living tablet shall affection raise,
Above the sculptor's art, or painter's skill,
Or the vain words of monumental praise.

J. S†. 1778.

* Britons.

† Teemessa.

‡ Catherine, the wife of a Swedish ser-jeant.

* Walk through Canterbury.

† See pp. 285, 6.

Mr. URBAN,

THE following Satire was translated so long ago as 1744, by the famous Dr. KING of Oxford, and corrected by Mr. Mendez. Why it never was published, is of no consequence, if you think it worth your acceptance now.

Yours, &c.

M. GREEN.

JUVENAL, SAT. I. IMITATED.

WHILE from the press the swarming legions rise,
Deafen the ear, and darken all the skies;
While the gay triflers, with themselves at strife,
Now praise her Grace's*, now the laureat's
While not content, tho' mark'd a foe to wit,
The mighty writing Mævius scribbles yet,
A wholesale dealer both in prose and rhyme,
Fruitful as Nile, prolific from his slime!
I may, I must unlace my little store,
And swell the number with one blockhead more.

Is there a place where shirtless poets meet?
I hear the clangor as I pass the street;
The raving bard reads out his painful lays;
Too short are winter nights and, summer days.

This paints his mistress, and delighted sips
Ambrosial fragrance from her ruby lips.
Another, whom the love of glory warms,
Sings the loud clarion, and resounding arms.
Some take down Flaccus shorter by the knee,
And some, O Tasso, are as kind to thee.
Bards good or bad will all their works recite;
In this alone both Swift and Ralph unite.
From tutors free, and like a colt untame,
I kindle with the epidemic flame.

Now, now, behold me on the dangerous brink,

Just launching boldly on a sea of ink;
See how, quick, springing to the growing line,
Th' obedient words assist my just design.

Yet know you why I make this bold essay,
And tread the dangers of the thorny way?
Ask not the cause. Yon beggar's brat but seen, (Whose jests are impious, and whose wit obscene)

Resolves the question. Now, in guilty pride,
While lords salute him, see the miscreant ride:
Have we not seen thee at thy morning stand,
The bright japan and footstool in thy hand,
Cringing to footmen as they pass'd the Mews,

At night a vile attendant on the stews!
When dotage marries for a neighbour's good;
Or lust incestuous fires a brother's blood;
When the falsewife forgets her vows of truth,
And melts to rapture with the faithless youth;

When sons of earth by arts flagitious rise,
Till the puff'd toad rejoices at his size;
And, snatch'd from dungeon to the height of power,

The weed exulting nips the generous flower;

* Dutchess of Marlborough's and Colley Cibber's "Apologies," then just published.

Say, shall the Muse deny the pointed song,
To rescue Virtue from oppressive wrong?
Observe yon lawyer! know you whence he rose?

The bar, alas! would scarce afford him cloaths;
No honest service rais'd him an estate,
No merit recommends him to the great;
Yet bent to smooth the rougher paths of life,
Th' obliging husband lends his beauteous wife.

Can crimes enormous spot a guilty age,
And the just bard withhold his honest rage?
See, lost to shame, and sunk in all that's base,
Insidious Decius shows his hated face.
Their fatal error shall young spendthrifts feel,
Estates absorb'd by his devouring seal;
Nor tears nor prayers shall make the knave relent,

Nor beauty charm so much as ten per cent.
Hide, hide, ye villains of inferior size,
For giant crimes now open to our eyes.

Of grooms and footmen yon gay train behold,
Whose pompous liveries shine with plunder'd gold;

Gold, which directs their venal master's tongue;

Th' exhausted province proves how great her Ask you what racks they for the wretch prepare?

What wheels to torture, or what beasts to tear?
To keep up forms, a slender fine they lay,
Less than a turnpike takes one summer's day;
Eluded justice mourns her fruitless aim;
Unhurt in pocket, he despises fame:
Revenge in vain displays her bloody arm;
The guilt of greatness can the laws disarm:
In virtue's spite his ill-got wealth he keeps,
Nor sheds one tear though a whole nation weeps.

Are these not crimes that ask an iron hand?
Can soft encomiums weed a burthen'd land?
When guilt thus triumphs, who can time afford

To praise a mistress, or to daub a lord?
Say, shall the verse in senseless measure play,
And strew her myrtles o'er the flowery way,
Near limpid fountains idle notes prolong,
In fruitless strains, and folly-flowing song,
Rehearse the prowess of the wandering knight,

The castle's terrors, and the giant's might,
While kings, and dwarfs, and palfreys crowd the plain,

The motley birth of a distemper'd brain?
Let such as aim to win polluted bays,
Who owe their rise to prostituted praise,
These arts approve; whene'er I wake the string,

Be mine the glory, not to sooth, but sting,
Till every crime the honest lash shall dread,
And vice in shades conceal her purple head.
Soft, soft, young driver, lest some cart you meet,

Like darted lightning hurl you from your seat.
With how much sleight he thuns th' opposing cart!

I want a coachman, and I like your art.

Whence

Whence the bent brow? Thy cloudy visage clear;

O me unhappy, I've provok'd a peer!
Pardon, young Phaeton, I found no trace
To know thy birth, or guess thy noble race;
Mind, mind thy reins, or some unlucky stone While thus thou threat'st my neck, may break thy own.

Another villain:—let the wretch proceed,
And keep the wealth for which he forg'd the deed:

Be riches his; content he ne'er shall find,
That soft companion of the honest mind.
Skill'd in each baneful herb's prevailing power,

The cunning wife anticipates her dower,
Mixes the venom in her husband's bowl,
And from the body drives the struggling soul;
The deathful art each copying female tries,
And every male throughout the quarter dies;
The bloated corpse soon joins its kindred clay,
And the bold murd'ress triumphs o'er her prey.

Fly then, each heaven-born virtue, from the fight,

Seek the calm fields, or on some cottage light.
See! golden favour, on her regal car,
Reads this loud lesson to her sons from far:
"Would you prevail, indulge each kind deceit,
"Shun dangerous truth, or hope not to be
"great,

"Teach the form'd heart to hate whom you
"carest,

"Nor fondly keep a friend—when in distress.
"And thus, protected by my watchful care,
"Deserve a halter, and you gain a star."

Too true the spoke, for naked Merit lies,
Shivering and cold, expos'd to wint'ry skies.
Where rising piles their marble arms unfold,
Where gleams the silver, and where flames
the gold,

See parasites resound their lord's applause,
And haughty greatness dare the slighted
laws;

Of honour guiltless, yet above reproach,
Hence Edgumbe's title, and hence Janssen's coach.

Then, Indignation, raise thy Gorgon head,
And on my soul thy subtlest poison shed.
If genius warm not, rage will make me
write,

Like Duck, a poet in Apollo's spite.
No knave so mean, but I will drag to light, Though, like a mole, the villain shun the light.

Though courts protect him, I'll the fiend disclose,

'Tis great, 'tis honest, to provoke such foes.
But hark what noise quick sounding shakes
the board! [hoard:

View the pale crowd, and see the shining
The fatal dice-box rattles in my ear,
Whole forests fall, and houses disappear.

Think, think, young spendthrift, e'er you make the set,

A ruin'd tradesman clamours for his debt,
And ere too late the sallying dice you send,
What plagues, what ruin, on the cast attend.

Vain the reproof, each admonition vain;
All virtues sink beneath the thirst of gain.

Patience, kind heaven! Among that crew of knaves,

That tribe of villains, pleasure-serving slaves,
See you not one who might respect command,
The dreadful engine rattling in his hand?

O learning, wisdom, whither are you run!
See how you're wrong'd by an ungrateful son.
Weeping I turn from so abhor'd a sight.—

But, warm for virtue, when her cause you
fight,

And to the world the shameless list declare, Forget, my Muse, that Chesterfield was there.

(To be concluded next Month.)

R E P A R T E E.

TO A VERY INGENIOUS LADY, WHO ASKED, "WHETHER HYPOCHONDRI-ACISM IS NOT AN AFFECTION OF THE MALE SEX ONLY?"

See the Epigram in our last, p. 616.

AND is my friend so much inclin'd
To have the bounds of HIP defin'd;
To see resolv'd, (and, pray, what then?)
Whether 'tis not confin'd to men?

I answer, (and I do't in pain,
For married men will still speak plain)
That Hip, or Vapours, (they are one)
May affect either sex, or none;
And when in women they appear,
They often last throughout the year.

Bridgnorth.

C.

MR. URBAN,

DRYDEN has somewhere said, that the following turn could not be retained in a translation in the same number of lines:

*Si nisi quæ formâ poteris te digna videri,
Nulla futura tua est, nulla futura tua est.*

Ovid. Sappho ad Phaon.

Take two instances to the contrary:

1.

If but to one that's equally divine,
None you'll incline to, you'll to none incline.

2.

If, save whose charms with equal lustre shine, None ever thine can be, none ever can be thine.

Both these were by the late Corbyn Morris, Esq. Commissioner of the Customs.

On the "Imitation of JESUS CHRIST" by THOMAS à KEMPIS.

MY joy! prefer'd to every book beside,
My sole companion, and my faithful
guide;

Next to th' unerring word of God, teach thou Thro' this life's maze the ways of peace to know;

Direct my wandering steps, and steer my course,

Thro' virtue's paths, to virtue's only source.
Bu. back.

D. W.

PRO-

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

(CONTINUED FROM P. 624.)

Having stated the terms of the loan, Mr. Pitt proceeded to lay before the House the state of the unfunded debt, which amounted, as has already been noticed, to the sum of fourteen millions; six millions six hundred thousand pounds of which he meant to fund. More than this, in one year, upon mature consideration; it would, he said, be dangerous to bring to market; but, that the creditors of government might have no reason to complain, he proposed that the remainder of the unfunded debt should bear an interest of 4 per cent. He was at some difficulty to determine the best mode of funding the 6,600,000*l.* whether by loan or by subscription. If by loan, we should have the money-lenders, with all their arts of finess, to contend with. But if by subscription, those only who had already trusted government were to be persuaded that it would be for their interest to continue that trust, which he undoubtedly meant that it should. It was therefore his idea to propose to the Committee to create a new 5 per cent. stock, irredeemable either for a time, or till 25 millions of the old funds should be liquidated, and to estimate that stock at 93*l.* In the settlement of this new stock he saw that regard ought to be had to the dates of the debts due to the several creditors. Their pretensions were by no means equal. The sum which he proposed to fund would bring down the navy debt to the end of June 1782; and by dividing it into three classes, the principle of equity might be very nearly retained. The first class should include the creditors of so long standing as June, July, and August, 1781; and, in consideration for the time, he proposed to take those bills at par, by which the holders would have a profit of 8 per cent. By the equalising rule, therefore, the next class, containing the next three months, should be taken at a discount of 4 per cent. The next three months at a discount of 5 per cent. and so on at a discount of 1*l.* more for every three months, till the period already mentioned should be closed. The interest to be paid on this new stock he computed at more than 313,060*l.* annually; but he trusted that the period was at no great distance when, instead of borrowing, we should begin to liquidate the national debt, to which the increase of the sinking fund, now that peace was fully established in every part of his Majesty's dominions, would liberally contribute. [Here Mr. Pitt entered into a very flattering investigation of the great things that might be effected, and the projects that were under consideration, in order to carry them into execution. These, he said, he but just mentioned, that gentlemen might turn the subject in their minds.] He then adverted to the sum at present to be raised, which he acknowledged to be of such magnitude as to affect both rich and poor. It was an awful and an alarming business, which required the most serious attention and assistance of the House. But, what added still to the distress, the old taxes had not answered the estimate for which they were granted. However, there was reason now to hope that, as the blessings of peace flowed through the land, and every where opened the channels of commerce in their course, the increase of wealth would enable the people in general to bear their proportion of taxes without being over-pressed by the burden. He did not dare to hope that the taxes he was about to propose were unexceptionable. Such as they were, he should submit them to the candour of the House, and should be glad to embrace lighter, if any such were offered. His principal view was, he said; to make them general, so that they might be productive. And,

1. He had considered that every man wore a hat; a small tax, therefore, upon hats would raise a large sum. Six pence upon coarse hats, and two shillings upon fine, would scarce be felt by the different classes of wearers, yet he would take it at 150,000*l.* At this hat-tax every man in the house clapped his hand to his head.

2. Thinking, as he did, that both male and female were alike interested in the support of government, he would propose, by way of equalising the burthen, a tax on RIBBONS and GAUZES. He supposed 25,000 looms in ribbon-weaving, but stated that only 19,000 were employed in that branch. The whole annual product, on a moderate calculation, would amount to 71 millions of yards, and more. This, at a penny a yard, with the gauges, would produce 120,000*l.* at the least.

3. The next article, he said, he almost trembled to name. This was COALS; which he afterwards gave up.

4. A tax upon horses, with an exception to those employed in the carrying trade, and in agriculture. This, he owned, was a favourite object of taxation with him, as none of the poorest class of people would be affected by it, meaning neither to include horses employed in trade, or in agriculture. Every farmer, he supposed, kept a saddle-horse for his pleasure. On that supposition he calculated 14 spare horses on an average in each parish, amounting in all to 140,000, which, with horses employed in carriages for pleasure only, would make the the number, 200,000. A tax of 10*s.* upon each of these would produce 100,000*l.*; and, to ascertain the payment of the tax, he proposed a stamp. [This set the whole House in a roar.] Recollecting himself, he said, he did not mean to stamp the horse or his rider, but some conspicuous part of his furniture.

5. He next proposed an additional excise on printed and stained linens, and calicoes. These articles, he said, were now 20 per cent. cheaper than during the war, and cotton was also much cheaper; he therefore proposed an additional duty of about 20 per cent. which, he said, would

would produce 120,000*l.* without any additional expence in collecting.

6. Candles were the next object he would submit to the consideration of the House. He owned that an additional duty on candles would affect the poor as well as the rich, but in so small a degree as scarce to be felt by either, being only one halfpenny per pound, and yet, by the universal use, would produce more than 100,000*l.* He had been well informed that the consumption of the cottager in the year did not exceed 10*lb.*

7. The next object he had in view he believed no gentleman would oppose, and that was, Licences to be granted to the venders of exciseable commodities. This the commissioners of excise had recommended, and the capital dealers in that branch had requested. This he stated at 80,000*l.*

8. A tax upon bricks and tiles had been long talked of, and would, no doubt, be productive. The rage for building was now universal. It had been stated that more than 205 millions of bricks had been manufactured for years in the neighbourhood of London only, and it would be but reasonable to suppose as many more in the rest of the kingdom. These then, at 2*s.* 6*d.* the 1000 only, added to the like number of tiles, would, he observed, produce 50,000*l.*

9. As the preservation of the game was a favourite object with sporting gentlemen, he thought it would tend greatly to that end if no qualification to kill game should be admitted in a process in any court of law, except that qualification had received the stamp of office; for which stamp the person qualified should pay one guinea. This, he supposed, would produce 30,000*l.* [It has since been advanced to two guineas.]

10. An additional duty of one third more than the present duty on paper. This, being a heavy article, which could not be smuggled, and consequently the manufacturer could not be undersold, he thought could well bear this addition. He rated it at 18,000*l.*

11. The last imposition the Minister now proposed, was a tax on hackney-coaches.— This, he said, would be readily paid, as the profits must be great from the repeated applications for licences. He should therefore propose an additional duty of 5*s.* per week on each, which, on 1000 coaches, would produce just 1000*l.* per month.

All the above taxes have already been recapitulated in our Magazine for July, p. 554; but, as some of them have been changed, and others added, a more correct list shall be given in its proper place, after all are settled.

On the Minister's sitting down, several gentlemen were ready to rise; but

Mr. Fox first caught the eye of the Speaker, not, he said, to enter into any debate on the various articles of taxation proposed by the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, as that would come more properly when the several bills should come before the House; but only to make such observations as occurred to him in the course of his speech: and, first, he thought it the duty of every Minister, in making any loan for the publick, to have in view the best terms possible. The Rt. Hon. Gent.'s funding so great a part of the navy debt was a step that would do him honour. But funding at high interest was destructive to trade, as there would be few, who could make 5 per cent. on government security, that would lend their money to private individuals. He wished to know what was to be the situation of the bill-holders who did not chuse to subscribe. He wished to know this, to enable him to judge of the extent of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman's plan. It was, he said, a melancholy thing to think of, that the Rt. Hon. Gent. in collecting taxes to pay the bare interest of the national debt, had been obliged to have recourse to articles so materially affecting our chief manufactures; but, what was still more to be lamented, the prospect before us was much for the worse. The almost insupportable load of taxes, added to the enormous debt, precluded all hope of equitable redemption. He observed, that the Rt. Hon. Gent.'s calculations were for the most part merely ideal; for instance, the article on ribbons, founded on the population of this country, being 7 millions, and estimating the consumption at 71,136,000 yards, was allowing ten yards to every soul; and as one half are males, of course it would be 20 yards for every female, from the hour of her birth to the day of her death. With respect to the deficiency of the taxes complained of, he feared that deficiency would increase, notwithstanding the flattering picture the Rt. Hon. Gent. has held forth of the increasing wealth flowing from the blessings of peace.

Mr. Pitt, to the question put by the last speaker, replied, that if the bill-holders did not chuse to subscribe, they must wait till Parliament could find ways and means to pay them.

E. of Surrey observed, that hats were a considerable article of export; and he wished to know if a drawback was to be allowed the exporter. The duty on coals he thought excessive, and ruinous to several manufactories. In that on horses, if all intended for agriculture were to be exempted, much fraud and collusion would take place; and as to that on printed linens, he was sure the trade was not in a condition to bear it. Ireland was our rival in it, and would reap all the benefit. The tax on bricks was a good tax; and that on qualifications he approved.

Sir J. Wrottesley execrated the coal tax.— He could never consent to a tax that would be the ruin of the most useful class of men in the kingdom.

Sir M. W. Ridley declared himself in the same strong terms.

Sir J. Johnson thought the present game laws infamous, arbitrary, and oppressive; and approved of the tax on sporting gentlemen, who who, in his opinion, should pay twice as much as the game-keeper.

Mr. Dempster thought the time for objections was when the bills were brought in; yet he could not help observing, that the tax of 10l. on brewers would destroy itself, and act as a monopoly. It would throw all the trade into a few hands, and effectually suppress all the rest. That on calicoes he disapproved, because it was to be raised in direct contradiction to the doctrine advanced the other day, namely, to lessen the duties to make them productive.

Mr. Pitt, to the objections made to the coal tax, replied, that exemptions would certainly be made to large and uncertain manufactories, in conformity to the stated maxim never to tax raw materials.

Mr. W. Stanhope remarked, that in the article of coals there must be so many exemptions, that what was left would be no object of parliamentary concern.

Sir Geo. Turner lamented that trade should always be the object of taxation of every administration, while the luxuries of life escaped unnoticed. Opera-houses, theatres, amphitheatres, houses of entertainment, and places of dissipation and public amusement, were fit places of resource in times like the present; but no minister had ever turned his thoughts to bring them in aid of the national finances. He expressed his utter dislike to most of the taxes, though he saw the necessity of raising the money.

Almost every member who spoke reprobated the coal tax; but the question being put on several resolutions, they were all severally carried without a division.

Thursday, July 1.

The order of the day being read, for the second reading of the Irish Postage Bill,

Mr. Eden was curious to know of the Secretary [Orde], who brought it in, what he thought would be the extent of the loss to the revenue if the bill should pass into a law?

Sec. Orde replied; not near 2000l. as the number of letters from Ireland to privileged persons in England were much greater than those from England to privileged persons in Ireland. The bill was read, and ordered to be committed.

Sir Tbo. Dundas rose, to acquaint the House with the distressing famine that raged in Shetland, and the northern islands of Scotland; and therefore moved, that a committee be appointed to inquire into the same, and make their report to the House.

Mr. Speaker rose, to take the opinion of the House on the motion, as he doubted whether any precedent existed of a committee being appointed on the mere motion of a member, without any petition being previously presented.

Mr. Dempster cited one in point. He assured the House, upon his honour, that when the last letters came from Shetland, men and cattle were dying for want of food; that, if the famine raged to that degree then, it was much worse now, and called for the most immediate assistance; that the Shetland Islands contained upwards of 20,000 persons, employed in the fishery, who were now involved in the deepest distress.

Mr. Pitt wished the motion to be altered, as it assumed a fact of which there was at present no proof before the House.

After some little altercation, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Gilbert brought up the report of the committee of ways and means for raising the supplies.

Mr. Pitt rose, and in a very candid manner apologised for troubling the House on the subject of the tax upon coals, which he found was chiefly complained of when first proposed. He only requested gentlemen to suspend their opinion till the bill was brought in, when, he was not to be bigoted to it, but that, if the objections were of weight, his mind was open to conviction, and he should be ready to make such alterations as should then appear to be necessary.—The report was then read, and the taxes particularised as follow:

COALS.		£.	s.	d.
Per ton		0	2	0
Per chaldron		0	3	0

CANDLES.		£.	s.	d.
On all tallow candles, per lb.		0	0	0½

BRICKS and TILES.		£.	s.	d.
On every 1000 of bricks		0	2	6
On every 1000 of plain tiles		0	3	0
On every 1000 of tiles under 10 inches		0	1	6
On every 1000 of paving tiles		0	3	0

HATS.		£.	s.	d.
Every hat made of mixed materials		0	2	0
Every hat made of felt		0	0	6

PRINTED LINENS, &c.		£.	s.	d.
Printed silks and linens named in Great Britain, per yard		0	1	6
On square silk handkerchiefs		0	0	4
On all cotton stuffs		0	0	3
On all linens and stuffs		0	0	3

RIBBONS and GAUZE.		£.	s.	d.
On every 12 yards of ribbon one-third of an inch broad		0	0	1
Ribbons more than one-third, and not three-fourths of an inch in width, per yard		0	0	0½
Ribbons above three-fourths wide, and not more than two inches and an half in breadth, per yard		0	0	0½
Ribbons exceeding two inches and an half in breadth, per yard		0	0	1
Silk gauze, every yard square		0	0	3
Gauze exceeding one yard square, per yard		0	0	4
Plain gauze, per yard		0	0	2
Plain gauze, exceeding one yard in width, per yard		0	0	2

LICENCES.		£.	s.	d.
For a licence to makers of mead		1	0	0
To dealers in brandy		5	0	0
From 5l. on common brewers to		20	0	0

	£.	s.	d.
To all rectifiers of spirits	5	0	0
To makers of vinegar for sale	10	0	0
To makers of sweets (except mead)	5	0	0
To makers of low wines	10	0	0
To corn distillers	50	0	0
To maltsters	2	0	0
To hop planters, whose plantations are two acres or more	2	0	0
To tallow chandlers	1	0	0
To soap makers	2	0	0
To paper makers	2	0	0
To callico printers	10	0	0
To starch makers	5	0	0
To wire drawers	2	0	0
To tanners	5	0	0
To tawers (dealers in white horse leather)	1	0	0
To dressers of skins in oil	2	0	0
To curriers	2	0	0
To vellum and parchment makers	1	0	0
To glass makers	10	0	0

SPORTSMEN, &c.

Persons qualified to kill game to register their qualifications, and to take out a certificate, with a stamp

1 1 0

Game-keepers, deputed, to take out like certificate

1 1 0

PAPER.

One-third of all the present duties on all kinds of paper made in Great Britain.

HACKNEY COACHES.

On every hackney-coach in London, Westminster, &c. per week

0 5 0

HORSES.

Saddle-horses, and horses for coaches, chaises, landaus, berlins, &c. per annum

0 10 0

Mr. Jaliffe objected to the tax on coals, as materially affecting the poor, who would thereby be reduced to great distress.

Mr. Stanhope insisted, that, in whatever shape it should be moulded, it would never go down.

Sir M. W. Ridley apologised for some hasty expressions on the former debate; but as the Minister had so politely prayed the House to wait till the bill was brought in, he would not oppose the resolution in the first instance.

Sir W. Canningham saw it in so odious a light that, if he was sure of being single, he would divide the House against it.

Sir H. Mackworth stated, that provisions were so dear in many parts of the country, that the poor might be said to be nourished by the warmth of the fire. Deprive them of that comfort, and they must literally starve.

Mr. Sheridan hoped that Sir W. C. would not persist in dividing the House, as he possibly might find Scotland exempted.

Mr. Marshall wished it might be permitted to go one step farther. He, however, objected strongly against the licence to hop-planters. It would not affect the wealthy, but totally annihilate the little planters. The duty was already as much as the planters could bear.

Sir J. Wrottesley was certain the tax upon coals could never be mended; but he was, notwithstanding, for giving it fair play.

Mr. Dewar was of the same opinion; but, were it a tax upon Bibles, he would bear what could be said in its favour.

E. of Surrey said, the hon. Bart. [Sir W. C.] should not divide the House alone, for he would support him.

Mr. Hussey thought the tax upon coals oppressive, and so was that on candles. It was said, that the last would affect the poor but little; yet, when it was considered that the poor had but little to spare, it then became grievous. He approved of the tax upon horses, and wished that the whole loan had been made on an interest of 5 per cent, and that the whole of the navy-bills had been funded.

This brought on a tedious, though perhaps an interesting, debate about money matters, which could only be entertaining to those concerned.

Ld. Mason spoke in favour of a 5 per cent. loan, and was sanguine in his opinion that 200 millions of the national debt might be paid off in 52 years, by means of a million a year solely appropriated for that purpose, and vested in the hands of proper trustees.

On the resolution for laying a duty on candles being read,

Sir James Johnstone desired to know if the contrager, who groped his way to bed with his farthing tallow, was to pay; and the duke, who ranted all night in the full blaze of meridian light, with his wax-candles, was to go scot-free?

Mr. Rose (Secretary to the Treasury) stated to the House, that it was in contemplation to lay an additional duty on wax-candles, but the consumption was so confined, and the raw material so scanty in this country, that it was scarce possible to draw the line.

On the resolution for laying a duty on bricks being read,

Sir James Johnstone wished to have slates included, but was told it was too late, as the motion must originate in a committee of ways and means.

On the resolution for laying a duty on coals being read a second time,

Sir W. Canningham said, he was determined to divide the House, and the question being put, the numbers were, for the resolution 154, against it 2, most of the members waiting to see the bill before they wholly rejected it.

Frid. 9, July 2.

Lord Ongley took the oaths, and his seat in the room of Mr. St. John. At the same time an order of the House was dispensed with, and a petition received from the electors of Bedford, complaining of an undue return in seating Ld. O. in the House, instead of Mr. St. John.

Mr. Chanc. of Excheq. delivered from his Majesty a petition which had been laid at the foot of the throne, stating that a famine raged in the Shetland Islands, and praying speedy relief. Ordered to be taken into consideration on Monday.

The

The House then resolved itself into a committee, Mr. Gilbert in the chair.

Chanc. of Excheq. rose, and acquainted the House with the heads of the bill which he intended to offer for relief of the East India Company, and which he said were three.

1. Respecting those debts which were immediately due from the Company to the public.

2. Respecting the arrears of duties due to the customs, and for which some longer indulgence must be given.

3. Respecting the bills drawn on the Company to such an amount as to endanger the credit of the Company, and affect materially the interest of the public.

An additional subject of investigation was, the dividend of 8 per cent, allowed by Parliament to be made to the proprietors.

On these heads, he said, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the Company of merchants trading to the E. Indies.

He then referred to the report of the Select Committee appointed to examine into the Company's affairs, as stated by the Directors, which did not appear to him, he said, in that desperate black-looking situation, in which they had been represented some time ago; but, on the contrary, in so favourable a way that, with a well-regulated economy, they might be retrieved. He considered indeed the acceptance of bills, in direct disobedience to the commands of that House, as highly criminal; but at the same time declared, that neither the promise of the Treasury, nor the promise of the House of Commons, were obligatory on the public to pay them. But that matter he considered as foreign to the object he had in view, which was, to endeavour to persuade Parliament to stretch forth her aiding hand to enable the Company to discharge all her obligations, of what kind soever, with her own property. What he most sincerely wished Parliament to do was, to permit the Company to have the mercantile government of their property in India, and to enable them to act with vigour in their several presidencies there. This would soon reinstate them in opulence, and enable them to be valuable friends and profitable subjects to this country. He therefore moved for leave to bring in a bill for granting relief to the India Company, by repitting the payments due to government, by permitting the Company at home to accept bills drawn from India, and by establishing regulations respecting their dividends.

Mr. Francis observed, that the bills already under acceptance amounted to 4,819,000*l.* and he wished to know from the R. Hon. Gent. how far the bill moved for went to bind this country to the payment of that enormous sum.

Mr. Pitt, in reply, said, he was, as he had before stated, decidedly of opinion, that the nation was not bound to pay those bills. But this subject he thought of a delicate nature, and wished to defer entering into particulars till the bill was read.

Mr. Fox observed, with respect to the payment of the bills, that in law the public certainly were not bound, but in honour they were. It was childish, therefore, to fritter away a plain matter by law, and to skulk from the spirit of the obligation under colour of law chicanery. The question was now plainly this, Was or was not this country, by implication, bound to pay the acceptances drawn from India under the sanction of this House?

Mr. Dundas supported the idea of the Minister, and went over the same ground.

Mr. Fox replied, that those who combated on that ground would find it unfortunate ground, and ill bottomed.

Mr. Jenkinson observed, that Parliament had often widened and narrowed the credit of the Company, but had never considered itself as bound to pay the Company's debts.

Mr. Francis, if that was the case, insisted that a clause should be inserted in the new bill, expressive of the sense of the House, that individuals might not be misled. The Right Hon. Gent. had admitted that prodigality had reigned among the Company's servants abroad; and how, he said, could that House be assured that the same prodigality would not still be continued? He adverted to the conduct of Mr. Hastings. Mr. Hastings, he said, was an ingenious gentleman, a man of great sense, but one who was generally deceived in his calculations. He pointed out to the House one instance of his inconsistency. In one of his letters Mr. Hastings said, "He had not drawn for any sum to support the war;" yet, in the account, it appeared there remained unpaid 3,416,000*l.* for the Bengal establishment. He did not say this because the Hon. Gent. was not present, (and he was sure Mr. H. would give him credit for speaking as freely to his face); but, were he inclined to misrepresent him, he knew he could have his cause well defended, as he was not without his representatives in that House.

Mr. Placairn rose in justification of the Governor General of Bengal, who, he insisted, in spite of malice and detraction, had saved to Great Britain all that was valuable in that part of the world. He called on the Minister to bring forward his promised bill. Our affairs there wore no very pleasing aspect; but their embarrassment originated with ourselves. Their government wanted vigour, wanted responsibility, wanted spirit. Transfuse these qualities into their deliberation, and every thing will wear a new face. He adverted chiefly to the situation of the army. This was at present wholly without system. There were troops of the Company, and troops belonging to his Majesty. The army was consequently without union, and without a head. Its operations were apt to clash; and its measures so ill concerted as frequently to defeat the very purposes to which they were directed. To give the army effect, it was therefore necessary to enlarge its authority; and he particularly recommended the restoration of discipline pline in the army, as one of the principal regulations to be attended to in the new bill. He adverted to several other abuses, which he pointed out with equal candour and ability.

Mr. Pitt rose, just to apprise the House that he should bring in his regulating bill on Tuesday.

Mr. Scott thought himself pointed at by Mr. Francis, and denied that he was any man's representative in parliament. He represented the borough of West Looe, and by virtue of that representation was a representative of the collective body of the British empire, whose interest he had as much at heart as any member of that House. He endeavoured to prove the present distress and indigence of the Company as a natural consequence of the American war, from the baneful tendency of which the wars in India have derived their origin. He then entered fully into the present state of the Company's finances, insisting upon it, that, with the relief prayed for, the Company, in the short period of a six years peace, would not only be enabled to discharge its debts, but have a balance of 157 lacks of rupees in its favour. As to Mr. Hastings, he declared, upon the best authority, that he wished to be recalled, and was ready to return whenever a successor should be appointed.

Lord North allowed the American war to have many sins to answer for; but, if it had fair play, the sin of ruining the E. I. Company must be imputed to a quite different cause, the rapacity and profligacy of its own iniquitous servants. As to Mr. Hastings, it was rather singular that neither the House of Commons nor his friends could recall him; though it was the express order of the one, and the wish of the other, that he should be recalled.

Mr. Smith (chairman of the Company) endeavoured to make the Company's affairs appear with a good face.

Mr. Eden stated the particulars omitted by the Directors in their report; by which he would have it believed, that, instead of a balance in hand of 157 lacks of rupees at the end of six years, the Company would be eight millions in debt. He followed Mr. Fox, and insisted that the public were bound in honour to see that the creditors of the Company were paid the bills that were accepted under cover of the House.

Mr. Atkinson rose in defence of the Company, and endeavoured to convince the House that they had nothing to fear from the non-payment of the Company's bills; that the five millions and a half, nearly, of floating stock, that were coming home, would more than answer all that were necessary to be paid for the present; and what was now wanted of parliament was no more than one friend would do for another in like circumstances. There had been times when the Company had assisted Government; and, as the old adage is, he thought one good turn had always deserved another.

Mr. Fox, in reply, said, the Company had done every thing in their power to ruin him, and, by the same rule of retaliation, they could not expect that he should favour them. The present question was for a bill to relieve them. The Rt. Hon. Gent. ought first to have brought in his bill to regulate them; for, if the same profligate set of servants were to be continued, all that Parliament could grant would be no more than, as an Hon. Gent. had said on a former occasion, a cup of water thrown into a full sea. As the Company was now modelled, he might with truth and justice consider it as a sink of corruption, imbecillity, dereliction, and every thing that was base; and he did not think himself justifiable in granting one shilling of his constituents' money towards their support [here was a horse-laugh at the word constituents]. He was aware, he said, of the cause of their mirth; but, as he had been told that every member was a member of the people at large, he had as much right to boast of constituents, though those for Westminster had been injuriously denied him. He then proceeded to answer the calculations on which the friends of the Company had grounded their defence, and particularly the estimate of 3,300,000*l.* as the annual amount of the Company's sales for six years to come; which he insisted was an erroneous calculation. He minutely adverted to every argument that had been urged, and remarked, as rather curious, a letter received in 1783 from the Company's servants, in which they say, "they shall obey the Company's orders, and send home no more raw silk;" yet the Hon. Gent. who spoke last had talked of a great quantity of raw silk that was coming home in four ships, and formed the most valuable part of the whole cargo. He sarcastically spoke of Mr. Hastings and his representatives; justified his own East India Bill, and gave some broad hints to the Minister, to leave as little power as possible in the hands of those nominal servants of the Company, who in fact were the masters.

Mr. H. Dundas closed the debate, which had been carried on very pointedly till one in the morning; when, on the question being put, it passed without a division.

Monday, July 5.

The order of the day, for the second reading of the bill for the more effectual prevention of smuggling, being read,

Mr. Eden rose, and pointed out many errors, as well in the wording those clauses which he thought necessary, as in introducing others, which to him appeared objectionable.

Other gentlemen joined in correcting other errors; and the bill, being in several instances amended, was read a 2d time and committed.

The House in committee on the relief to be granted to hat-makers.

Mr. Brook Watson moved, "That the exportation of hare-skins, rabbit-skins, or wool dyed or dressed, be discontinued;" which was agreed to. He then moved, "That Turkey goat-skins and goats-wool be allowed to be imported duty-free;" which was likewise agreed to, and the committee broke up.
" be

Leave was given to bring in a bill for continuing the commissioners of accounts another year.

The House went into a committee, the Marquis of Graham in the chair, on the distressed situation of the inhabitants of the Shetland islands; and, on the motion of

Mr. Dampier, That a supply of 500 quarters of barley, amounting to 650l. and 40 tons of biscuit, amounting to 680l. be sent to Shetland for the relief of the distressed poor, the same was rejected for want of form, but afterwards granted.

Thursday, July 6.

Ordered, That there be laid before the House, "An account of the supply sent from Bengal to Madras." This was done at the instance of Major Scott, who moved to bring it forward for two reasons; one, because it would appear that above 7,290,000l. had been sent, for the support of the war, from Bengal to Madras and Bombay, in five years; the other, that it would tend to convince gentlemen how capable Bengal was of paying off its present incumbrances in case of a continued series of peace, if only for the short period of five or six years.

Mr. Pitt then rose, to introduce his long-expected bill for the better regulation of the government in India. In an animated speech of near three hours, he went over the outlines of his bill, in order to convey to the House an idea of its principle, and the many articles of abuse to which it was to be applied. In stating the magnitude of the subject, he adverted to the vast accession of power which the wealth of India had for a series of years added to the empire of Great Britain; how much our former opulence was owing to the prudent management of our commercial concerns; and how much our future hopes depended on the judicious regulations that were now to be introduced for the future government of that country. Among these, the interest of the inhabitants, in his opinion, had the first claim on the humanity and the justice of Parliament; and he should, he said, be happy to have it in his power to carry into execution the leading principles of that plan which he had once before had the honour to present to that House, in order to establish a system which might enable us to fetter ambition, and diminish the lust of power and of riches, which had grown up to such an height of extravagance and oppression among the servants of the East India Company, as called for the immediate interposition of the legislature to check and restrain. He was not, however, so sanguine as to hope that such a system could be carried into effect with that vigour and energy as might be expected, were the executive power to be trusted with those who preside on the spot; but, as that would be dangerous, and, as far as it had been tried, had been found ruinous, all that could be done was, to endeavour to approach as near as possible to the means that was most likely to answer the purposes for which the bill was intended.

His first care, he said, had been to guard against that influence which the patronage of the East was supposed to afford, and to destroy that absolute power of acting without controul, by which the servants of the Company had with impunity exercised the most atrocious acts of speculation, plunder, and oppression. To provide against the enormities of this local influence, it was necessary to secure obedience to the orders from this country.

Another point to be obtained was, to abolish extortion, if possible by the Company's servants; but, to accomplish this end, great care must be taken that nothing should be inserted that could in any degree affect commerce. The extension of commerce proportionably increased the splendor of the empire.

In considering the degree of controul, and in whose hands that controul should be placed, it naturally occurred to his mind, that the concerns of commerce were very different from the affairs of government; and that the merchant and the statesman had their distinct pursuits; he therefore meant that both the one and the other should share in the executive government; the Company so far only as commerce should be concerned; and certain commissioners to be appointed to superintend the whole.

Here Mr. Pitt entered into a political discussion on the nature of private charters, how far they ought to be held sacred, and how far they might be infringed for the general good. If, he said, the law could be altered, and the charters new-modelled, with the concurrence of those concerned, surely every man would prefer that mode, rather than by violence to enter upon and confiscate the property of individuals, in direct opposition to their acknowledged rights. He adverted to that balance of power in our constitution which gave it a superiority over every other constitution, and applied this to that balance which it was necessary to preserve in reforming the rights of our territorial possessions in the East. The Company, he thought, had a just claim to the management of their commercial concerns; but, in giving them that management, care was to be taken that no power of controul in any other branch should be vested in their Directors. He again enforced the necessity of narrowing, as much as possible, the power of patronage, and for that purpose he meant to have it separate from the executive power. With respect to the executive power, he meant to have it vested in a board of commissioners, which should have authority to control as well as superintend. Acts were to originate with them in the first instance, over which the Company were to have no right to alter or repeal. In the appointment of this board, the Crown should nominate; but the persons who were to be chosen were to be such of his Majesty's Privy Council as had sine-cure places, and who, having nothing else to do, might devote their whole time to the service for which they were to receive their salaries. Hence the complaint of procrastination would be obviated, as those commissioners were to be made answerable for neglect; and, as they were not to be entrusted with patronage, the Company would still retain their consequence, though the board might have the power to recall.

Here the Minister entered into a comparison of the merits of the two bills, that of Mr. Fox, and this of his own, shewing the vast superiority of the latter over the former, as well in the nice regard that had been paid to the rights of the constitution on the one hand, and the due subordination of the Company to the executive powers of government on the other.

As to the government abroad, he meant, he said, that it should be a system of unity; that it should have great powers; but that those powers should derive their force from, and act in immediate concert with, those at home. The seat of government he meant to be placed at Bengal, and the council to be nominated by the Company, the Commander in Chief only excepted, who was to be appointed by the Crown. With respect to the administration of that government, much must be left to the discretion of the Governor and Council. Wars and alliances might be absolutely necessary before order could be obtained from home; but this must be always at the peril of those who should presume to engage in them.

The situation of the princes of the East, and the situation of the natives, were objects of great concern; but could only be come at by enquiry on the spot. Under the head of investigation, the disputes between the Nabob of Arcot and the Rajah of Tanjore were to be investigated and determined, as were likewise the debts due to and by the Company, which were to be settled and liquidated by the strictest rules of justice and equality.

As to the establishment in India, it received the strictest investigation. And, for that purpose, the most accurate return should be made of every appointment civil, military, and maritime, and no more servants be sent out till that return was obtained.

He had already, he said, hinted at the acceptance of presents. These he thought poisonous weapons in the East, and seldom failed of carrying venom to the heart. This he meant to have restricted, and any trespass to be considered as a high misdemeanor, and, next to disobedience of orders from home, to be punished as the most infamous crime.

Persons high in office, civil, military, and maritime; sent out to India had; no doubt, the object of gain in view; but, he trusted, they had, besides, a more laudable ambition, the ambition of serving their country with honour, and of rendering strict justice to those over whom they were to preside. These officers, should they act otherwise, will go with their eyes open, and no doubt be aware of the dangers in the road before them.

But the last and most important object of his bill, he said, was the institution of a new tribunal of justice, for the punishment of Eastern delinquents, who, unfettered by the common modes of evidence, and unshackled by the usual practice of trials at law, should proceed, in a summary way, to administer justice on their oaths; and, being both judges of the law and the fact, should finally pass sentence, without appeal, according to the rules prescribed for the punishment of offences and misdemeanors, and the punishment to be carried into execution accordingly. If a fine was to be mulcted, they were to enquire into the estate of the delinquent, and by what means acquired; and if a wrong schedule be produced, or any concealment attempted, he was then to be punished accordingly. A series of years, he owned, had in this free country established a mode of trial by jury, to which the people at large looked with the most inquisitive and piercing eye, as their unalterable and permanent birth-right. An absolute necessity, however, (as there did not exist in our laws a power to bring Eastern delinquents to speedy justice) required, either that this mode should be dispensed with, or that we should give up India entirely. In the constitution of this tribunal, there was to be something of the impartiality of chance, mingled with the discretion of choice. It was to consist of a certain portion of judges, peers, and commoners. The judges to be occasionally balloted for; the peers and commoners to be permanent. By this means he hoped that intrigue, favour, and corruption, would be effectually avoided.

These, he observed, were but the outlines of his plan, which he had endeavoured to enlarge and improve, and, as far as his abilities would reach, to make perfect, for the consideration of the House. The task had been long, laborious, and irksome; but he had persevered, he said, with the greater alacrity, as he knew the justice of his country required it, and the duty he owed his sovereign obliged him to the performance. He begged pardon of the House for taking up so much of their time, and concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill "for the better regulation of the government of India."

Mr. Fox begged leave just to acquaint the House, that he differed in almost every principle principle which the Right Hon. Gentleman had insisted on in prefacing his motion; but, as a sight of the bill would enable him to speak with greater precision, he should reserve what he had to offer till the bill itself was produced; wishing only to know for the present, whether the three principal heads of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman's speech,

The regulation of the Company at home,
The regulation of the Company abroad,
The judicature to punish offenders, were intended for three bills, or to be included in one?

Mr. Pitt in reply said, it was his intention to comprise all in one bill, and to bring it in on Friday.

On the motion for leave being put, the same was agreed to, and the House broke up.

Wednesday 7.

Lord Beauchamp moved for the third reading of the insolvent bill.

Mr. Paulet rose to oppose it, on the ground, that the decline of public credit was manifestly accelerated by such frequent deviations from the security of the laws. A former bill of this nature had recited, that acts of this nature were inexpedient, dangerous, and cautiously to be resorted to. Such language from the legislature implied an encouragement to men in trade, to extend that credit which a strict execution of the law ought to secure. This measure was then evidently an injustice, against which, he said, he would take the sense of the House.—On a division, the ayes were 39, noes 6.

Much altercation and little business the rest of the day.

Putting off the hearing on the Bedford election, and combating the principle of the commutation tax upon windows, gave rise to warm replies and rejoinders; but produced no other effect than to divert the house.

Thursday July 8.

On the order of the day being read for the third reading of Sir A. Lever's Lottery Bill,

Mr. Hussy rose to oppose it, on the ground of impropriety. He cited, as instances, in support of his opinion, two lotteries of the same kind, namely, that granted to Messrs. Adam, and that granted to Mr. Coxe, which, he said, were both of them frauds on the public.

Mr. Eden and Mr. Orde both thought it cruel to crush the bill now that it had gone so far; upon which, the question was put, and the bill passed.

The House then went into a committee, Mr. Parry in the chair; when

Sir J. Wrottesley moved, "That the sums now in the hands of the Receiver of the land tax for Staffordshire, amounting to 3140l. raised by county-rates by fines for not complying with the militia act, be applied towards building a county goal."

This was strongly opposed, on the ground, that if the county of Stafford was to have this money given them back, to be applied to their own uses, instead of a punishment, it would be a reward. And the counties of Sussex, Nottingham, and others under the same predicament, would expect the same indulgence, besides causing murmuring among those counties who had complied with the act. These reasons were thought of weight, and the motion was rejected.

Geor. Mac Sept. 1784.

Mr. Pitt then rose, he said, to remove any doubt about the proper application of the money, and moved for leave to bring in a bill, to compel the different Receivers of the land-tax to pay into the treasury, for the use of the public, all such money, so raised, as they are at present in possession of; which fully met the approbation of the House, and Mr. Pitt and Sir John Wrottesley were ordered to prepare and bring it in.

Mr. Pitt, in a very handsome speech, in which he gave the House great credit for their candour, delivered his reasons for the motion he was going to make, which however was not meant to preclude him from resuming the tax another year; and then concluded with moving, that so much of the resolution of the house on Thursday last, as related to laying a duty on coals, be discharged.

Sir Joseph Mordaunt was sorry the motion was general. He thought at least, that a duty should be laid on coals exported.

Other gentlemen returned thanks to the Rt. H. Gentleman; and the house appeared much gratified. The motion was put, and agreed to. After which,

Mr. Burke rose, and apologised for not pursuing any farther the charge against Sir Elijah Impey, who, on a former motion of his, was recalled from India (see vol. LII. p. 74.) He adverted to the information, given by Mr. Pitt a few days ago, of the return of Sir Elijah. which, he said, must be done not merely as a piece of news, but rather with a view to ground some proceeding against him; and as it might be expected, from certain circumstances, that he should take the lead in that business, he begged leave to decline it, and that for the same reason as the Rt. Hon. Gentleman had thought proper to give up the coal tax, namely, from a certainty of not succeeding in it. But that might not be the case of the Rt. H. Gentleman, who, he thought, as minister of the crown, was bound to do it.

Mr. Pitt, in reply, said, that as on the former occasion he had no concern in the recall, he would now have no concern in the prosecution. So the matter dropped.

Friday 9.

Mr. Gilbert brought up the report of the committee of ways and means, relative to coffee and cocoa. The report was read, viz.

"That all the present inland duties on coffee and cocoa do cease.

"That 6d. per C. lb. be charged on all coffee the growth of any of the British Colonies in America and the West Indies; and 2s. and 6d. on coffee the growth of any other place.

"That

control as well as superintend. Acts were to originate with them in the first instance, over which the Company were to have no right to alter or repeal. In the appointment of this board, the Crown should nominate; but the persons who were to be chosen were to be such of his Majesty's Privy Council as had sine-cure places, and who, having nothing else to do, might devote their whole time to the service for which they were to receive their salaries. Hence the complaint of procrastination would be obviated, as those commissioners were to be made answerable for neglect; and, as they were not to be entrusted with patronage, the Company would still retain their consequence, though the board might have the power to recall.

Here the Minister entered into a comparison of the merits of the two bills, that of Mr. Fox, and this of his own, shewing the vast superiority of the latter over the former, as well in the nice regard that had been paid to the rights of the constitution on the one hand, and the due subordination of the Company to the executive powers of government on the other.

As to the government abroad, he meant, he said, that it should be a system of unity; that it should have great powers; but that those powers should derive their force from, and act in immediate concert with, those at home. The seat of government he meant to be placed at Bengal, and the council to be nominated by the Company, the Commander in Chief only excepted, who was to be appointed by the Crown. With respect to the administration of that government, much must be left to the discretion of the Governor and Council. Wars and alliances might be absolutely necessary before order could be obtained from home; but this must be always at the peril of those who should presume to engage in them.

The situation of the princes of the East, and the situation of the natives, were objects of great concern; but could only be come at by enquiry on the spot. Under the head of investigation, the disputes between the Nabob of Arcot and the Rajah of Tanjore were to be investigated and determined, as were likewise the debts due to and by the Company, which were to be settled and liquidated by the strictest rules of justice and equality.

As to the establishment in India, it received the strictest investigation. And, for that purpose, the most accurate return should be made of every appointment civil, military, and maritime, and no more servants be sent out till that return was obtained.

He had already, he said, hinted at the acceptance of pretents. These he thought poisonous weapons in the East, and seldom failed of carrying venom to the heart. This he meant to have restricted, and any trespass to be considered as a high misdemeanor, and, next to disobedience of orders from home, to be punished as the most infamous crime.

Persons high in office, civil, military, and maritime; sent out to India had; no doubt, the object of gain in view; but, he trusted, they had, besides, a more laudable ambition, the ambition of serving their country with honour, and of rendering strict justice to those over whom they were to preside. These officers, should they act otherwise, will go with their eyes open, and no doubt be aware of the dangers in the road before them.

But the last and most important object of his bill, he said, was the institution of a new tribunal of justice, for the punishment of Eastern delinquents, who, unfettered by the common modes of evidence, and unshackled by the usual practice of trials at law, should proceed, in a summary way, to administer justice on their oaths; and, being both judges of the law and the fact, should finally pass sentence, without appeal, according to the rules prescribed for the punishment of offences and misdemeanors, and the punishment to be carried into execution accordingly. If a fine was to be mulcted, they were to enquire into the estate of the delinquent; and by what means acquired; and if a wrong schedule be produced, or any concealment attempted, he was then to be punished accordingly. A series of years, he owned, had in this free country established a mode of trial by jury, to which the people at large looked with the most inquisitive and piercing eye, as their unalterable and permanent birth-right. An absolute necessity, however, (as there did not exist in our laws a power to bring Eastern delinquents to speedy justice) required, either that this mode should be dispensed with, or that we should give up India entirely. In the constitution of this tribunal, there was to be something of the impartiality of chance, mingled with the discretion of choice. It was to consist of a certain portion of judges, peers, and commoners. The judges to be occasionally balloted for; the peers and commoners to be permanent. By this means he hoped that intrigue, favour, and corruption, would be effectually avoided.

These, he observed, were but the outlines of his plan, which he had endeavoured to enlarge and improve, and, as far as his abilities would reach, to make perfect, for the consideration of the House. The task had been long, laborious, and irksome; but he had persevered, he said, with the greater alacrity, as he knew the justice of his country required it, and the duty he owed his sovereign obliged him to the performance. He begged pardon of the House for taking up so much of their time, and concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill "for the better regulation of the government of India."

Mr. Fox begged leave just to acquaint the House, that he differed in almost every principle principle which the Right Hon. Gentleman had insisted on in prefacing his motion; but, as a sight of the bill would enable him to speak with greater precision, he should reserve what he had to offer till the bill itself was produced; wishing only to know for the present, whether the three principal heads of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman's speech,

The regulation of the Company at home,

The regulation of the Company abroad,

The judicature to punish offenders, were intended for three bills, or to be included in one?

Mr. Pitt in reply said, it was his intention to comprise all in one bill, and to bring it in on Friday.

On the motion for leave being put, the same was agreed to, and the House broke up.

Wednesday 7.

Lord Beauchamp moved for the third reading of the insolvent bill.

Mr. Paulet rose to oppose it, on the ground, that the decline of public credit was manifestly accelerated by such frequent deviations from the security of the laws. A former bill of this nature had recited, that acts of this nature were inexpedient, dangerous, and cautiously to be resorted to. Such language from the legislature implied an encouragement to men in trade, to extend that credit which a strict execution of the law ought to secure. This measure was then evidently an injustice, against which, he said, he would take the sense of the House.—On a division, the ayes were 39, noes 6.

Much altercation and little business the rest of the day.

Putting off the hearing on the Bedford election, and combating the principle of the commutation tax upon windows, gave rise to warm replies and rejoinders; but produced no other effect than to divert the house.

Thursday July 8.

On the order of the day being read for the third reading of Sir A. Lever's Lottery Bill,

Mr. Hussy rose to oppose it, on the ground of impropriety. He cited, as instances, in support of his opinion, two lotteries of the same kind, namely, that granted to Messrs. Adam, and that granted to Mr. Coxe, which, he said, were both of them frauds on the public.

Mr. Eden and Mr. Orde both thought it cruel to crush the bill now that it had gone so far; upon which, the question was put, and the bill passed.

The House then went into a committee, Mr. Parry in the chair; when

Sir J. Wrottesley moved, "That the sums now in the hands of the Receiver of the land tax for Staffordshire, amounting to 3140l. raised by county-rates by fines for not complying with the militia act, be applied towards building a county goal."

This was strongly opposed, on the ground, that if the county of Stafford was to have this money given them back, to be applied to their own uses, instead of a punishment, it would be a reward. And the counties of Sussex, Nottingham, and others under the same predicament, would expect the same indulgence, besides causing murmuring among those counties who had complied with the act. These reasons were thought of weight, and the motion was rejected.

GENT. MAG. Sept. 1784.

Mr. Pitt then rose, he said, to remove any doubt about the proper application of the money, and moved for leave to bring in a bill, to compel the different Receivers of the land-tax to pay into the treasury, for the use of the public, all such money, so raised, as they are at present in possession of; which fully met the approbation of the House, and Mr. Pitt and Sir John Wrottesley were ordered to prepare and bring it in.

Mr. Pitt, in a very handsome speech, in which he gave the House great credit for their candour, delivered his reasons for the motion he was going to make, which however was not meant to preclude him from resuming the tax another year; and then concluded with moving, that so much of the resolution of the house on Thursday last, as related to laying a duty on coals, be discharged.

Sir Joseph Marubey was sorry the motion was general. He thought at least, that a duty should be laid on coals exported.

Other gentlemen returned thanks to the Rt. H. Gentleman; and the house appeared much gratified. The motion was put, and agreed to. After which,

Mr. Burke rose, and apologised for not pursuing any farther the charge against Sir Elijah Impey, who, on a former motion of his, was recalled from India (see vol. LII. p. 74.) He adverted to the information, given by Mr. Pitt a few days ago, of the return of Sir Elijah. which, he said, must be done not merely as a piece of news, but rather with a view to ground some proceeding against him; and as it might be expected, from certain circumstances, that he should take the lead in that business. he begged leave to decline it, and that for the self-same reason as the Rt. Hon. Gentleman had thought proper to give up the coal tax, namely, from a certainty of not succeeding in it. But that might not be the case of the Rt. H. Gentleman, who, he thought, as minister of the crown, was bound to do it.

Mr. Pitt, in reply, said, that as on the former occasion he had no concern in the recall, he would now have no concern in the prosecution. So the matter dropped.

Friday 9.

Mr. Gilbert brought up the report of the committee of ways and means, relative to coffee and cocoa. The report was read, viz.

"That all the present inland duties on coffee and cocoa do cease.

"That 6d. per C. lb. be charged on all coffee the growth of any of the British Colonies in America and the West Indies; and 2s. and 6d. on coffee the growth of any other place.

"That

"That 6d. per C. lb. be charged on all cocoanuts, the growth of the above. That 1s. 6d. be charged on all cocoanuts the growth of any other place."

Mr. Pitt brought in his India Bill, which was read once; and he observed, that, as it might be printed by Monday, the second reading might be appointed for Wednesday, which was agreed to.

Mr. Dempster then rose, in defence of his friend Sir Elijah Impey. He was sorry he was not in the house when the affair came on the day before. He thought the office, which that judge had accepted under the governor, a very useful office, and wished that, so far from its being criminal to accept of it, it might be continued in the new bill; and that Sir Elijah, or any of the judges of the Supreme court, may be empowered to accept the office of judge of the Suder Dewanny Adawlet Court, without resigning their former offices. (To be continued.)

T H E A T R I C A L R E G I S T E R.

HAY-MARKET.

- August 30.* The Beggar's Opera—Genius of Nonsense.
31. Noble Peasant—Hunt the Slipper.
Sept. 1. Young Quaker—Son-in-Law.
2. The Two Connoisseurs—Genius of Nonsense.
3. Noble Peasant—Hunt the Slipper.
4. Two Connoisseurs—Agreeable Surprise.
5. Lord Ruffel—Peeping Tom.
7. Two Connoisseurs—Ditto.
8. The Spanish Barber—Ditto.
9. The Fox—Ditto.
10. Two Connoisseurs—Ditto.
11. Young Quaker—Ditto.
13. Hamlet—Ditto.
14. Two Connoisseurs—Son-in-Law.
15. Noble Peasant—Peeping Tom.

DRURY-LANE.

- Sept. 16.* West Indian—Trip to Scotland.
18. Provok'd Husband—All the World's a Stage.
21. Hamlet—The Irish Widow.
23. The Stratagem—Harlequin Junior.
25. The Beggar's Opera—Ditto.
28. The Jealous Wife—Ditto.
30. Clandestine Marriage—The Quaker,
COVENT-GARDEN.
Sept. 17. As You like It—Cross Purposes.
20. Hamlet—Harlequin Rambler.
21. The Chances—The Poor Soldier.
22. Love in a Village—Positive Man.
24. Belle's Stratagem—The Musical Lady.
27. Othello—Harlequin Rambler.
28. Zara—Catherine and Petruchio.
29. Henry IV. Part I.—The Musical Lady.

F O R E I G N I N T E L L I G E N C E.

Vienna, Aug. 2. THE general hospital of this city, erected and endowed by the munificence of our august sovereign, was opened on the 10th ult.; on the front of which is the following inscription: "Saluti & Solatio Aegrorum. Josephus II. 1784."

A grand balloon, weighing 2600lb. weight, and carrying four persons, was launched here on the 25th ult. It rose a considerable height, and descended on the opposite side of the Danube, in sight of innumerable spectators.

On the 3d of August the Court of Constantinople received certain advice that an earthquake had, on the 18th of July, nearly destroyed the city of Ezerghan, on the confines of Armenia, with the loss of 6000 inhabitants. Among the sufferers was Sultman, Bashaw of Erzerum, lately promoted to that government, who, with his suite of 300 attendants, had reached as far as Ezerghan, of whom only 12 escaped.

And on the 5th of August, the North wind remarkably high, a fire broke out in the quarter of Constantinople called Chiremit Mabalasi, which continued burning for 26 hours, and consumed about ten thousand houses. Gaz.

Smyrna, Aug. 5. It is calculated that the plague, which has lately raged here, has carried off, within these three months, 16,000 Turks, 2800 Jews, 460 Greeks, 400 Armenians, and near 100 Catholics. — At Magnesia and Kerkagatt, from whence our cotton is brought, the mortality has amounted to more than 30,000.

Affairs abroad begin to wear a very serious aspect. All Europe is now in commotion. France seems to pay little regard to her engagement with Great Britain; and the States of Holland to pay less. These two powers have changed the ancient system; and the Emperor, disregarding both, is resolved to open a channel of commerce to his subjects, that threatens the humiliation of their High Mightinesses, who are in danger of falling a sacrifice to their own internal divisions. They have offended the Prussian Monarch, and are at variance with their own Stadtholder. Their trade to the Indies, which raised them to opulence, and gave them consequence, is falling off; and, if his Imperial Majesty is permitted to share in it, cannot long support their haughtiness. All these are strong indications of a falling state.

The ultimatum of his Imperial Majesty has at length been declared to their Ministers at the Court of Brussels.

I. An entire free navigation on the Scheldt, sine quâ non.

II. A free navigation to the East and West Indies. And

III. That the ports of Frederick Henry, Liefenhock, Kruischus, and Lillo, be forthwith dismantled and demolished.

To their demands their H. Mightinesses, by way of answer, charge the Emperor with a breach of treaty. By that of Munster, in 1648, his predecessor Philip IV. not only confirmed the independency of the Seven United Provinces, but also the possession of all the places they then held, with such barrier towns as were then assigned; and at the same time renounced for ever, for himself, his heirs and successors, all pretensions to such lands and places as they should hereafter conquer, without infraction of the said treaty; confirming the charters of the East and West India Companies of Holland in their utmost latitude, never to be infringed upon any pretence whatever.

Add to this, that by the Barrier Treaty, in 1715, between the Emperor, the King of Great Britain, and the Republic, it is expressly stipulated, "That, for the preservation of the Lower Scheld, and the communication between Brabant and Dutch Flanders, his Imperial Majesty cedes to the States General the villages and polders of Doel, St. Anne, and Kentineffe." This was also confirmed in the treaty of 1778, with this addition, "That the territory of their High Mightinesses shall extend between the forts Perle and Liesenhoeck, to the half way, at equal distance between the two forts."

And as to the free navigation to the East and West Indies, it is stipulated, by the Treaty of Vienna, March 16, 1781, between his Imperial Majesty and the King of Great Britain, "That the Emperor, as head of the House of Austria, shall prohibit all commerce through the Netherlands to the Indies, reserving to himself, however, the liberty of sending thither two ships, which may bring back their cargoes to Ostend, to be there disposed of."

The Emperor's requisition, therefore, was no sooner made known to the States General then assembled, and honoured with the presence of the Stadtholder, than orders were given to all the officers of the land forces to hold themselves in readiness to march with the troops under their command, on the first notice; and to Vice-Adm. Reynst to oppose the passage of any Imperial ships on the Scheld, on any pretence whatever.

The resolution of the States of Holland and West Friesland, with respect to the Duke of Brunswick (see p. 628), has been strictly put in execution within the territories of the said States, by his dismissal from the command of the regiment of Dutch guards who are in the pay of the States of Holland.

On the requisition of the Emperor being laid before his Most Christian Majesty at the Court of Versailles, the King expressed his satisfaction at this fresh instance of the Republic's confidence and regard; and at the same time recommended moderation, wishing their High Mightinesses to refrain from measures that may hurt the dignity of the Emperor; and if their H. Mightinesses had any overtures to make, and were willing to entrust his Majesty with the same, he would with pleasure impart them to the Emperor, and use his good offices to have them taken into immediate consideration.

By the Treaty of Munster, in 1748, the territory ceded to the Dutch comprised the lands on both sides the Scheld, from its entrance into the German Ocean to within 4 or 5 miles of the walls of Antwerp, which was at that time a city of the greatest trade in Europe; but the bigotry of the times and the intolerant spirit of the inhabitants prevailing, the trade of Antwerp began to decline, and that of Amsterdam and Rotterdam to rise upon its ruins. In this situation, the Dutch, foreseeing that Antwerp, in some future period, might again recover her vigour, sunk large ships, filled with stones, in the channel that led to the city, to obstruct the navigation; and built four strong forts on the banks of the river, to prevent the passage of vessels of burden without their permission. The present Emperor, intent upon improving the trade of his subjects, demands the demolition of these forts, and the free navigation of the river Scheld. The points to be discussed are thus brought into a very small compass:

1. Whether, by possessing the lands on both sides, the Dutch have a right to obstruct the free navigation of the river to cities or towns out of their jurisdiction? And

2. Whether the obstructions which they have thrown in the way, and the forts which they have built to render these obstructions effectual, may not be demolished and done away without breach of those treaties on which their High Mightinesses place their chief dependence?

It is reported, that the Emperor has prohibited the importation of English stuffs into any part of his dominions; on the ground that the acts made against smuggling will be detrimental to the trade of his subjects in Flanders.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

A letter from an officer at Sawandrove, 30 miles from Bangalore, dated in November last, gives a deplorable account of the situation of the prisoners, whom the fortune of war had thrown into the power of the enemy. A party of 20 officers and 30 soldiers were lately sent, chained in pairs, from Bangalore up Sawandrove, where they were cast into a miserable shed, so thinly covered with straw as hardly to keep out the rain; their subsistence was only 4x cash and a seer of rice for each officer a day; the common men were reduced to half this allowance. One hundred and sixty cash go to a rupee, the seer a very small quantity, old, and as black as ink. The water was shocking, and tasted as if mixed with oil. Happily, they had among them some pagodas, and the boys being allowed to cut wood, necessity taught them to boil their water, and by mixing it with allum they made it drinkable.

On the great question between the Company and the army, as to the plunder of Chyrt-Sing, Sir W. Jones has given an ultimate decision in favour of the Company. This is the most important decision that has ever been confirmed in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Bengal; and will probably be attended with the happiest consequences, as that system of rapacity and plunder, which has hitherto disgraced the annals of that country, will now in all probability be broken and done away.

The letters received by the Warren Hastings Indiaman, from Bengal, give a very favourable report of the present state of affairs in that presidency. The Gov. Gen. has made a journey to Lincnew, where the Vicer has paid his arrears, and enabled the Governor to pay the Company's troops at Oude up to the month of January last; that the Vicer had received the Governor with great cordiality, and had assured him that all the payments should punctually be paid at the stated periods. These letters add, that the troops, that had served at Guzzerat during the war, were returned and reduced. In a march of 1100 miles through the Marratta country, there was not the least complaint against a single soldier, and the troops have received the thanks of the Governor and Council for their good behaviour. Six regiments of Sepoys are likewise disbanded.

Three days after Mr. Hastings left Calcutta, a paper of intelligence was received from Madras, which was instantly transmitted to him. It is said to have staggered him a little at first; but, being afterwards considered as a miserable trick to defeat his measures, he proceeded. The paper was as follows:

"Tranquebar, Jan. 31, 1784."

"Extracts of news arrived at Bombay on the 9th of January, in the Albany sloop of war, which left England the 26th of September, 1783,—called at St. Helena.

"Mr. Monckton, Governor of Bombay; Mr. Russel to succeed Lord Macartney.—Major Scott has at last opened his budget, and given in Mr. Hastings's resignation, who is to be created an Irish peer; Lord Macartney, Governor-General.

"Mr. Francis to be second in Council, to succeed Lord Macartney.

"No King's Commander in Chief. General Richard Smith to be third in Council at Bengal, and to command the troops.

"The King's regiments to be reduced in India. The men to have their choice to stay, or to return to England.

"The Governors of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, at liberty to retain any of the officers under the rank of Colonel that chuse to stay.

"Mr. Plumer to be President of Tanjore; Mr. J. Sullivan at the Nizam's Court.

"A new arrangement with the Nabob for a fixed sum per annum, on the payment of 12 lacks of pagodas in advance, and six per cent. secured to his creditors by siccars.

"Supposed that the present ministry would not stand.—Lord North and Mr. Fox have quarrelled.

"The Dutch treaty signed the 13th of September at Paris.

"A war certain between the Russians and Turks.—The Spaniards and French determined not to let the Russians come into the Mediterranean.

"Lord Thurlow, Chancellor again.

"A match to be settled between the Prince of Wales and Prince of Orange's daughter.

"Lord Bathurst and Lord Amherst dead.—The latter succeeded in his troop of guards by Lord Pembroke.

"Admiral Digby to command in India.

"Sir Thomas Rumbold's business seems to be over.

"Madras, Feb. 4, 1784."

AMERICAN NEWS.

By an act passed in the General Assembly of the province of Connecticut, for the encouragement of trade, it is declared,

"That foreigners, or native Americans, coming to reside in the cities and ports of Newhaven and New-England, on obtaining the certificates required for their admission, and also taking the oaths of allegiance and fidelity to the state, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of free citizens.—That persons of the above description, importing annually from Europe, Asia, or Africa, goods to the value of 3000l. sterling, or bringing into the said state 2000l. in money, shall, during the time of such importation and seven years ensuing, be exempted from assessments for faculty for the profits arising from such importation, so far as the revenue of the province or the United States are interested therein. And further that all vessels, employed four months in the year in the above commerce, shall be exempt from taxes. But no person who has adhered to the K. of G. B. during the late war, and has been guilty of plunder or murder, shall be entitled to the benefit of this act. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to militate against any order or regulation of Congress, or to countenance the slave trade."

Mr. Henderson, late Judge Advocate and Chief Judge in N. Carolina, is said to have lately purchased a track of land of the Cherokee Indians, of not less than 100 miles square, situate on the back of Virginia, and for soil, climate, and healthfulness, inferior to none on the American Continent. It is watered by the rivers Kentucky, Cherokee, and Ohio, and is peopling very fast.

The rage of ballooning has reached the American coast, and on the 17th of July one of an enormous size was launched at Philadelphia,

Philadelphia, which rose majestically, but when at a certain height it took fire and was consumed to atoms. It is not clear by the account in the papers whether any person was attached to it; if there was, he must have been saved by miracle, as his death is not announced.

Charleston, South-Carolina. Capt. Allen, who this day arrived here from Augustine, confirms the report, that the English are determined to oppose the landing of the Spaniards, on their arrival to take possession of that place.

From the Pennsylvania Gazette, of July 28, the following curious advertisement is copied:

"Just arrived, from Londonderry, in the brig Peggy. Capt. Stewart, A number of fine healthy men and women servants, and some smart boys, whose times are to be disposed of to the best bidders by the Captain on board, or by Cambell and Kingston on the wharf"—The Jews were formerly slaves to the Egyptians: and afterwards the Egyptians were slaves to the Jews.—There is nothing new under the sun.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

On the 30th of Aug. Mr. Dowling, printer of the Volunteers Journal, was taken up by order of the Lord Lieutenant, charged with high treason. The following paragraph, inserted in his paper, is marked by the Crown lawyers for the basis of the prosecution: "O Ireland! Ireland! unhappy Ireland! will you for ever bear with such tyranny! Are you asleep with arms in your hands? Arouse, for shame, support the justice of your cause. Let no station screen the guilty from your resentment. Pull those tyrants from the seat of power, and convince the world that Ireland must be free." Signed J. MURRAY. — Mr. Dowling was seized by Justice Graham, and committed to Newgate by Judge Robinson.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Mr. Tytler, of Edinburgh, having perfected an air-balloon, on the 27th of August last made a successful attempt to navigate the air. The balloon being filled at Comely Garden, he seated himself in his basket, and the ropes being cut, he ascended very high, and again descended very leisurely on the road to Restalrig, about half a mile from the place where he rose. He claims the honour to be the first person who has navigated the air in Great Britain. But see p. 711.

On the 3th instant William Anderson and James Paul, convicted of convoking the mob who in a riotous manner attacked the distillery at Cannon Mills (see p. 632), were whipped through the streets of Edinburgh, pursuant to their sentence. More solemnity was used on this than on ordinary occasions of the like kind. The military from the Castle, and the lord provost and city magistrates, attended to prevent disorders.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The following fact seems well attested. A child between five and six years of age, the son of Mrs. Roberts of Ipswich, in the night of the 14th instant, being in bed with a woman to whom he was entrusted while his mother was from home, dreamt that he wanted to go down stairs, and accordingly rose and got upon a chair, opened the sash, and fell into the street. The opening of the window awakened the woman, who rose, and looking out, thought she saw something like a lump lying upon the stones, and returning to the bed, she missed the child, and again looking out at the window, heard the child cry; and by the time she got down stairs, he was at the door, calling to her to be let in, without having received any other hurt than two slight contusions on his forehead, and the loss of 2 of his teeth. The window was 12 feet high.

PORT-NEWS.

At Hull, the Sarah and Elizabeth Greenlandman, Capt. Ray, arrived with the produce of two whales.—What is remarkable, one of the harpooners of the Henrietta struck a whale last season which run out 18 lines, each line containing 120 fathoms or 240 yards, being two miles, one half, and 80 yards; but after holding the fish for some time, the harpoon gave way, and the whale escaped.

His Majesty's ship Druid, on the 26th past, seized one of the Cawland-boats near Plymouth, that had been running goods from an Indiaman off the port. The boat had landed ten men, with each man a bale of muslin on his back, who ran with them towards Rampton. The Druid's people pursued, but too late. The smugglers had secured the property.

The Union revenue cutter, Lient, Scott, has been more fortunate. He has carried into Penzance the Fox smuggling cutter laden with 270 casks of brandy, 200 of Holland gin, 120 bags of tea, 16 large bales of muslin, and about 20 other small packages.

A lugger was likewise carried into Cornwall lately, laden with 600 tubs of brandy and gin, and a ton and a half of teas. This vessel, named the Speedwell, is so prime a sailer, that she is said to have made 32 trips to France before she was taken.

The Neptune revenue cutter has carried into Yarmouth a Dutch smuggling vessel, with 200 kegs of gin, 50 bags of tea, and a large quantity of ready-roasted coffee.

The Dorset cutter has carried a smuggling row-boat into Barnes-Pool, near Plymouth, laden with 6 tons of teas, and several casks of brandy.

But on the 1st instant (Sept.) 50 or 60 smugglers, armed with hangers and other offensive weapons, kept the custom-house officers at bay, and landed goods to the amount of 2000l. at Mulfen-Cove near Plymouth.—It is not a little singular, that all our late acts seem to counteract the intention for which they are passed.

On the 2d instant, the remains of Sir Eyre Coote, K. B. were landed at Plymouth, and received all the military honours due to so great a General. (See p. 716.)

A report was circulated at Portsmouth on the 11th instant, that a Danish ship with the plague on board lay off the island of Guernsey, and was put under quarantine; that she had been laden at Zante by false bills of health; and that whoever had ventured on board her was to be shot, if he came ashore before the limited time; but, as the Gazette has taken no notice of this fact, we hope the whole story is groundless.

On the 29th of June last, a most dreadful fire broke out at Port-au-Prince, on the island of St. Domingo, which consumed 150 houses in the most opulent part of the town; and reduced to ashes the Royal Magazine, with 30,000 barrels of flour. The damage is said to be not less than 30 millions of French money. This fire broke out in a tavern near the sea side, where some intoxicated sailors quarrelled, and in the scuffle threw a lighted candle among some combustibles, which instantly took fire, and communicating with other combustibles, set the tavern in a blaze, and that tavern the whole town.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

WEDNESDAY, September 1.

Were executed facing Newgate the following malefactors, John Codd for returning from transportation; Robert Moor for assaulting Mrs. Arabella Jeffries, and forcibly taking from her person a diamond hair-pin; Richard Edwards, for assaulting and robbing the Hon. Geo. Keith Elphinstone of his gold-watch and seals; William Holmes, for breaking into and robbing the house of Adam Hamilton of Endfield, and stealing plate, &c. James Napier, convicted in May sessions for assaulting the Hon. Albinia Hobart, and forcibly taking from her a diamond ear-ring; John Sherlock, for being concerned with others in rescuing from the officers about 150lb. of tea, after being seized by the excisemen. For this man the jury who tried him presented a petition to his Majesty for mercy, in which they represent, that his crime, in their opinion, "does not argue that barefaced wickedness, that extreme depravity of mind, which justifies the doom of a fellow-creature to an ignominious death."—The petition had no other effect than to confirm his sentence.

Morgan, who lies now in Newgate for the murder of Mr. Linton, is said to be most singularly penitent, and very communicative. He owns, that he was one of a numerous gang, who had formed themselves into a body, and assumed to themselves the name of the Resurrection Club; one of the articles of which was, that whoever refused, or should attempt to fly when stoppt, should be instantly cut down, or crippled; that, when robbed, if they moved from the spot till the robbers were out of sight, they were to be served the same; that whoever should prosecute, or appear as evidence against any of the gang, should be marked for vengeance; and these rules every member bound himself by the most infernal oaths to observe, and never to peach, but to die mute.

Thursday 2.

Was performed, for the first time, Mr. Hayley's "Two Connoisseurs," a comedy in rhyme, of which an account will be given in its place. It was well received.

Col. Fox, as representative of the late Lord Holland, paid into the Bank, for the use of government, the sum of 46,000*l*. This payment is said to have been made by a bill on the banking-house of Drummond.

Friday 3.

The lord mayor, sheriffs, and city officers, went in state, according to antient custom, to proclaim Bartholomew fair.

Monday 6.

The purser of the Warren Hastings Indiaman, Thomas Larkins, commander, came to the India-house, and reported the safe arrival of that ship from Coast and China; as did the purser of the Francis Indiaman, H. Gruebar, commander, from Coast and Bay.

And likewise the purser of the Lascelles Indiaman, Thomas Wakefield, commander, from Coast and China. These make 15 ships already arrived this year on the Company's account.

The Belmont Indiaman brought advice of a mutiny at St. Helena, of a very serious nature, owing to the garrison being put to short allowance. To this they refused to submit; and the greater part flew to arms; but, by the firmness of the governor, assisted by the officers, the insurgents were with difficulty subdued, and 103 of them found guilty of mutiny; ten of whom only were shot.—When the ten unhappy victims were upon their knees and blind-folded, they cried to the Governor for mercy. "O Governor! Governor! have mercy, Governor!" but it could not be granted. And the signal being given, the execution party fired, and nine out of the ten fell; the tenth, being shot thro' the shoulder, did not fall, but his brains were instantly blown out by the party in reserve. The other convicts stood in a body as spectators of the fate that had befallen their ring-leaders, and trembling for their own, when the Governor with great-good nature turned to them, and pronounced their pardon. In an extasy of transport, they fell upon their knees, and expressed their gratitude; but a corporal, who was afterwards charged with exciting the guard to desert on the night of the insurrection, was not allowed the honour to be shot, but was hung by the neck over the artillery-gun, as an incendiary, in sight of the whole garrison.

Tuesday 7.

A balloon that had been seized by the Excise officers on pretence of its being made of prohibited materials, was restored to the proprietors. It is to be launched from Lord Foley's gardens.

Being the anniversary of their Majesties' marriage, they received the compliments of the nobility on the occasion at Windsor.

In firing a cannon to give notice of the launching a balloon at the country-house of the Rev. Mr. H. Bate, in Essex, for the entertainment of his friends, a spark from the match fell upon a quantity of powder, which blew up, and scorched the faces of the coachman and boy in a frightful manner.

Thursday 9.

A young man, apprentice to a pawnbroker, was committed to prison, charged by his master with stealing diamond rings and other goods of great value. It appeared on his examination that he had lived for some time in the style of a man of fashion, keeping a lady and his valet.—He has since been tried and capitally convicted.

Wednesday 15.

The aerial voyage, which had been much talked of, and long expected, at length took place. It drew an innumerable multitude, of all ranks, together, to the ground from whence the balloon was to be launched, and many thousands occupied the eminences round the metropolis, where there was the least chance of seeing the object which had excited every one's curiosity. It was really curious to listen to the discourse, and to observe the different traits of so many vacant faces, who, though assembled, had no conception of what they came to see, or perhaps, more properly speaking, what they had pronounced beforehand was impossible to be seen. The notions and opinions of this motley multitude were certainly as various as their situations in life were different. The populace, who composed the far greater part of the company, were sure the thing could not be done by day-light, for no Christians could fly through the air, and Goblins and Sprits were not permitted to ramble abroad till the dead hour of night. The next class to these had very little more faith than their fellows; "they could not think as how it could be that a bubble could carry a man," and they feared the whole story was but "a bubble," and so they divin'd it would prove in the end. The middle ranks were doubtful, but not without hope. The more enlightened were anxious for the event, and were not without sharing in that concern which every sensible mind could not but feel for the issue of so hazardous an enterprise. Men of real science were otherwise affected; they were at rest as to the practicability of the expedition; but they could not help expressing, by their looks, the sympathetic concern they entertained, lest some untoward circumstance should intervene, to defeat, or even to delay the execution, either of which would have been equally fatal to the adventurer. While the thoughts and apprehensions of the subordinate classes were thus occupied, those of elevated rank, who look upon the life or death of an individual, and the good or ill success of an experiment, with equal indifference, and calculated only to kill time, and contribute to their amusement, diverted themselves with the bustle among the canaille, and laughed and talked of Lunardi as another Bottle Conjurer, whom all men went to see, though no man thought possible what he pretended to perform. Such were the different sentiments which a discerning bye-stander might discover among the people assembled on this occasion, till the hour of exhibition was elapsed. Then another scene presented itself. A buzz and a kind of hollow murmur ran through the numerous crowd. The mob were on tiptoe, ready to mount the cock-horse of their own sagacity, and to trample the impostor with all his apparatus into the earth, who had the outrageous impudence to tell them he could fly through the air. They knew very well he could fly no more than a cat: but he should fly no longer. Those from whom better things might have been expected waited only to be led on to do mischief; while the real friends to science trembled for the fate of a worthy man, whom they feared by some fatality had met with an unexpected disappointment. Even those giddy youths of highest quality whose elevated rank sets them above thought were seen for a while to suspend their levity, and to express concern; when on a sudden a cannon was heard (the appointed signal), and the machine was seen to move, but in a reeling course, expressive of some defect. A few moments passed in dreadful apprehension; from which, however, the friends of Lunardi were soon relieved, and the balloon was seen to rise, with all the majesty that heart could wish, to the astonishment of millions, who, scarcely open to conviction, beheld it with a kind of awful terror, which rather closed their lips in stupid silence, than prompted them to rend the air, as might have been expected, with joyful acclamations.

M. Lunardi having promised to gratify the curiosity of the public with an account of his progress; we think it our duty to that gentleman and the public, to suffer him to reap the fruits of his enterprise, without infringement by us; and, when he has profited by the liberality of the public, it shall be our province to preserve to future ages a genuine relation of this aerial excursion, the first that has been effectually made in Great Britain.

Thursday 16.

The sale of the E. I. Company's teas commenced according to notice given in the public papers, and was run up by a combination among the smugglers to such prices, as will rather lead to encourage than prevent smuggling.

smuggling. The Dutch, Flemings, Danes, and Swedes, who have all vast quantities of teas in hand, it is thought, joined the smugglers to make large purchases, with a view to forfeit the deposit, and to lock up the tea in the Company's warehouses till their own is sold; but, it seems, to defeat this iniquitous scheme, an order has been made, that, if not paid for, what remains at the end of the Company's sale shall be put up and sold again. The following are said to be the prices at which the teas sold: Very ordinary green at 2s. 9d.; good middling common from 3s. to 3s. 6d.; speck-leaf single from 4s. to 5s. 9d.; ordinary bloom 4s.; good ditto 4s. 9d.; fine 5s. to 5s. 10d. The buyers to pay the duty.

Came on, at the Old Bailey, the trial of the Hon. Col. Cosmo Gordon, for the murder of Col. Frederic Thomas in a duel, on the 4th of Sept. 1783. (see vol. LIII. p. 301.) The counsel for the prosecution produced two letters signed Cosmo Gordon; the first contained a direct challenge, which Col. Thomas declined; the other was a repetition of the challenge in more peremptory words, which the other accepted; in consequence whereof the challenger was slightly wounded in the thigh, and the challenged mortally in the belly. The duel was sufficiently proved; and the judge, in summing up the evidence, observed, that if the jury were satisfied that Col. Thomas was killed by Col. Gordon (no direct testimony being brought to settle that matter indisputably); the law was settled, and laid down: That he knew of no justification to put an end to existence but an attack made upon the person of another, such as a sudden stab, and a return made without time for the passions to cool, which might terminate in the death of the aggressor. He was bound by his oath, he said, to declare the law, and he had discharged his duty conscientiously. The jury had heard the evidence, and were the only proper judges whether to condemn or to acquit. The jury after ten minutes deliberation brought in their verdict NOT GUILTY.

Friday 17.

This day M. de Dreyer, Envoy Extraordinary from the K. of Denmark, had a private audience of leave of his Majesty.

Came on, at the sessions at the Old Bailey, the trial of Henry Morgan, for the wilful murder of Mr. Linton, late one of the musicians of Covent-Garden Theatre. (see p. 553). The confession, signed by himself before the magistrates at the public office in Bow-street, with other corroborating circumstances, being produced against him, he was found guilty; and the Recorder passed sentence of death on him immediately, to be executed on Monday, and his body to be anatomised.

Saturday 18

Advice was received, at the India house, of the safe arrival of the Lord Macartney Inchamau, from Coast and Bay.

Monday 20.

Morgan was executed, according to his sentence, on a scaffold erected before Newgate. In about a quarter of an hour after he had mounted, the Ordinary left him, and the malefactor continued singing the whole of the Sinner's Lamentation; and while he was repeating with an impassioned voice, "Oh, my God, forgive all my sins! Lord, have mercy upon me! Christ Jesus, receive my soul!" the platform dropped, and after a few convulsive struggles he became motionless. A woman and child then got upon the stage, and had their necks stroked with the hands of the dying criminal, from a vulgar notion of its curing wens.—It is remarkable, that this profligate fellow, not nineteen, a few weeks ago jumped off a barge in the river to drown himself, but was saved by some bystanders, who recovered him, and carried him home to his friends, who rewarded them indeed for their trouble, but added, that they would rather have given them five guineas to have let him had his humour. He at first confessed that he himself was the murderer, and would have taken the sacrament upon it; but, being asked by the sheriffs, just before he was going to be turned off, he solemnly denied it.

Wednesday 22.

Being the anniversary of their Majesties' coronation, there was a very numerous court at St. James's, to pay their compliments on the occasion.

Thursday 23.

By letters just received from Ostend, two vessels were then ready to sail from that port for Antwerp, laden with merchandize; they were to enter the Scheldt at the west mouth of that river, bearing the Imperial flag; and were directed neither to salute, lower the flag, or pay any kind of respect whatever, while they passed the Dutch forts, but to pursue their way, unless obstructed by superior force; in which case the Emperor reserves to himself the sole power of resenting any insults that may be offered to his flag.—Thus the dispute seems to be coming to a short issue. If the Dutch make no opposition, the point is given up. If, on the contrary, the ships are obstructed, war commences immediately.

The sessions ended at the Old Bailey, when 25 unhappy wretches, who had been capitally convicted, received sentence of death; THIRTY-TWO were sentenced to be transported; THIRTY-THREE to be kept to hard labour in the House of Correction; NINE to be whipt and discharged; eight imprisoned in Newgate; and SIXTY-FIVE discharged by proclamation; these, with those discharged from Clerkenwell, as already mentioned, form such a list of thieves as must make every man tremble for his safety, who is under the necessity of frequently visiting the metropolis.

At the same sessions the trial of William Ste-

Stevenson, a watchman, for the wilful murder of Sarah Scott, in Clerkenwell Bridewell, by shooting her with a blunderbuss, came on. It appeared, that, on a disturbance happening among the women, the prisoner fired through the wicket-gate of the prison without orders, he being the watchman of the outer gate, whereby the deceased was killed. Some doubts arose among the gentlemen of the law, on the power of keepers over their prisoners, which, in cases of insurrection, was acknowledged to be discretionary; the jury, on hearing the full evidence, brought in their verdict NOT GUILTY.

Friday 24:

Letters from Vienna are full of the honours and attention paid by the Emperor to the Comte de Hoya, (Rp. of Olinaburg); before whom his Imp. Majesty takes pleasure in passing his armies in review, his R. H. seeming to take much delight in military exhibitions. On review days, they are both on horseback by break of day.

Wednesday 29.

The following is the progressive increase of the Post Office revenue: In 1644, Mr. Edm. Prideaux (see p. 644) was supposed to collect about 3000l. per ann. In 1654, the Parliament farmed it to Mr. Manley at 10,000l. per ann. In 1664 D. O'Neal, esq; farmed it at 21,500l. In 1674, it was let at 43,000l. In 1685, it was estimated at 65,000l. In 1688, the amount was 76,318l. In 1697, it was 90,505l. In 1710, it was allowed to be 111,461l. In 1715, the gross amount was 145,227l. In 1744, the inland office amounted to 198,226l: total amount of both inland and foreign offices in that year, 235,492l. In 1764, the gross amount was 432,024l. and since that period it has nearly amounted to 600,000l.

During the month past, several memorable occurrences have been noticed. A poor woman died lately in the hospital at Aberdeen, and was buried in a church-yard in the neighbourhood. A company of young surgeons agreed with the grave-digger to set some mark on the grave as a direction for them; but some person, in order to disappoint the grave-digger's employers, moved the signal to another grave, that of a woman who had been buried about three or four months. The party came, and, directed by the mark agreed upon, dug up the grave, drew out the coffin, and carried it home. But upon opening it, a vapour like flame of brimstone came forth, and suffocated them in an instant. Two women also going past the room fell down dead. It is said that eleven persons thus perished.

A Swiss has been shewn at Vienna nine feet high. He lives upon vegetables and milk.

The following extraordinary account may be depended on as fact. About six years since a seafaring person was taken into the

GENT. MAG. September, 1784.

Asylum for Maniacs at York; during the space of five years and six months he never expressed any desire for sustenance, and was fed in the manner of an infant. The servants undressed him at night, and dressed him in the morning: he never spoke, and remained with his body bent all day, and was regarded by all about him as an animal nearly converted into a vegetable. About the middle of May 1783, he suddenly astonished the people round him with saying, "Good morrow to you all." He then thanked the servants for the care they had taken of him, and appeared perfectly sane. A few days after, he wrote a letter to his wife, in which he expressed himself with great propriety. On the 28th of May following he was allowed to leave the hospital, and return to his family; and has now the command of a ship in the Baltic trade, and is in the full enjoyment of perfect health, both in mind and body. This very singular case is attested by Dr. Hunter of York, F. R. S. in a letter to Dr. Percival of Manchester, and by the servants now at the Asylum in York.

The Kitty came up with a large body of ice in Davis's Straits, on which were some dogs of the country, among them were four with harness on, and a bitch with four young puppies. They were in a starved condition, and suffered themselves to be taken on board very quietly, one excepted, which was so fierce, that the crew were under the necessity of killing it. They were brought safe to Shields.

In a ploughed field in the neighbourhood of Glasgow has been found the aureus of didrachmi of the Emperor Otho. This coin is in the highest esteem among antiquaries; but its being found in a field near Glasgow wants confirmation.

About the middle of the month, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after mistaking his road from Edgcombe to Wimbledon was mistaken for a smuggler, and fired at by a farmer, at whose house he called to enquire his way. Providentially he received no hurt.

REMARKABLE TRIALS.

On the 19th of June last, came on to be tried, in the Court of Exchequer at Guildhall, as important a question as perhaps ever came before a jury to be decided. The trial lasted 22 hours, and the jury were one hour in bringing in their verdict.

Mr. Lee, in laying before the jury the case of Capt. Sutton, undertook to prove that the conduct of Commodore Johnstone, in suspending his client, and putting him under arrest, was not only unjustifiable, but a malicious effort of a superior officer to ruin the reputation of his inferior. Capt. Sutton wanted no eulogium to raise his merit. He was a tried seaman. And in the action at Port Praya fought bravely against dreadful odds, and had dearly earned those fruits of his labour, of which, by the malice of his Commander, he had been stripped by his suspension. The learned counsel insisted, that, had he not been influenced by personal resentment, he ought to have tried the plaintiff immediately at sea, instead of taking him aboard in the expedition to the Cape, and bringing him imprisoned to England. He laid the damages at 30,000*l.* for the imprisonment, and loss of a proportionable part of the prizes taken in the expedition from M. Suffren.

h. s

To prove the fact advanced by the learned counsel, Sir William Burnaby, Capt. Piggo, Capt. Clements, Capt. Hands, and several other officers were examined for the plaintiff, by Mr. Lee, Mr. Erskine, Mr. Peckham, and Mr. Fielding, whose testimony went fully to exculpate Capt. Sutton's conduct on the day of action, and to prove that a court-martial might have been held at sea. By consent of the court, the Commodore himself was permitted to cross examine the witnesses to nautical manœuvres; and though he frequently met with many mortifying replies, he preserved an equality of temper throughout that astonished the whole court. He particularly asked one Captain, whom he had in a manner compelled to declare his opinion of the action, and who expressed his disapprobation of it in pointed terms, whether that was always his opinion, and whether he had not, in a conversation he held with him immediately after the action, declared it was as brilliant an action as ever he remembered. The Captain admitted this; but added, the moment he was made acquainted with all the circumstances, he saw it in a very different light; and that ever since he had thought differently, and should ever think so as long as he lived.

The master of the Elizabeth tender, whose business it was to observe and repeat signals, swore that the ship answered the Commodore within half an hour. On which Mr. Lee called for the original letter from Commodore Johnstone to Lord Hillsborough, in which an account is given of the action, and in which Capt. Sutton is said to have disobeyed the signal for three hours. This letter, he contended, was a clear conviction of malice. The production of this letter was strongly opposed by the defendant's counsel; but at last was agreed to be read, when it appeared that much of it had been omitted in the Gazette.

The Attorney-General began the defence of the Commodore, by observing that the cause had been managed more like an enquiry into the conduct of his client, than to the decision of a plain question, which was simply this, whether Capt. Sutton had or had not obeyed the orders of his superior? and, whether the Commodore had or had not maliciously put him under arrest? His learned friend, Mr. Lee, had not, he remarked, opened a word respecting the acquittal of Capt. Sutton by a court-martial in England, though a most material part of the case. He cordially agreed with his learned brother, that a more important cause never came before a court. It regarded the discipline of the whole navy, most essentially. The question was no less than whether a commanding officer, by the acquittal of every inferior who to him appeared a fit subject of arrest, is to be pestered with actions for damages? It was a real and consequential question. There would be an end of all discipline in the navy, and army, if the plaintiff succeeded in this cause. Who could government get to command in hazardous expeditions, if he were liable to be called upon in a civil court of justice? He appealed to the jury, if they could conscientiously determine, that there was no ground for superseding Capt. Sutton? The court-martial took eleven days in the enquiry, and to the same tribunal Capt. Sutton ought to have applied. It was, a very unfit subject for an English jury.

He called officers to combat the professional opinion of the officers examined in behalf of the plaintiff.

Mr. Lee replied to the arguments of the counsel for the defendant; and the judge, being quite worn out with fatigue, made only a few remarks, and left the weight of the evidence on both sides to the consideration of the jury, which was special, who brought in their verdict with 5000*l.* damages. The Barons of the Exchequer, however, have since given judgment on a rule obtained by the Attorney-General to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside as against evidence. The Lord Chief Baron, after having reported the evidence, and stated the law as it applies to such actions, declared it to be his opinion, that the verdict ought to be set aside as against evidence, for that there was no proof of malice, but clear proof of a probable cause. He therefore expressed his satisfaction that a motion had been made for a new trial, for that he was dissatisfied with the former verdict. The other Barons (having delivered their opinions seriatim to the same effect) entirely concurred with his Lordship; and by the unanimous opinion of the court the verdict was set aside, as a verdict against evidence.

Bill of Mortality from Aug. 31, to Sept. 21, 1784.

Christened.	Buried.
Males 701 } 1392	Males 583 } 1177
Females 690 }	Females 534 }
Whereof have died under two years old 422

Peck Loaf 2*s.* 6*d.*

5	2 and 5	72	50 and 60	78
	5 and 10	49	60 and 70	87
	10 and 20	40	70 and 80	52
	20 and 30	89	80 and 90	20
	30 and 40	109	90 and 100	4
	40 and 50	95	100

P. 557, for Adm. Buckle dying at Wandsworth in Essex; read Banstead in Surrey.

P. 637. col. 1. l. 8. for "Sir John Morgan," r. "John Morgan, esq."

BIRTHS.

Sept. 2. DUCHESS of Beaufort, a son.
13. Hereditary Princess of Baden, a prince.

MARRIAGES.

LATELY, at Kingston, near Portsmouth, George Daysh, esq; to Miss Eyer.

At St. Hilary, near Marazion, Cornwall, a girl who goes by the name of the Irish Fairy, being only 34 inches high. She has travelled some years in company with a man who calls himself the Irish Giant (see the 11th inst.), and both together exhibited a striking contrast. The heart of a young man, a dealer in Manchester goods, was inflamed by this female at Totness, whence he pursued her to Marazion, where he persuaded her to leave her gigantic companion.

Rev. Sir George Booth, bart. rector of St. George's in the East, to Miss Rose, of St. John's-square, Clerkenwell.

At Edinburgh, Il Marchese Rondinini, an Italian nobleman, to Miss Elizabeth Renney, an Irish lady, and second cousin to the Earls of Huntingdon, Granard, and Mordaunt.

Mr. Harlow, to Miss Hitchborne, niece to Mr. Alderman Bates.

Edward Reeve, esq; of Lincoln's-inn, son of the late Dr. R. to Miss Reynardson.

Mr. Abraham Walbank, of Chalford, co. Gloc. attorney-at-law, to Miss Wagstaffe, of Worcester.

In November last, at Calcutta in Bengal, Capt. Alex. Tod, in the East India Company's service, to Miss Charlotte Braere, daughter of the late Col. Bruere, governor of Barbadoes.

30. Mr. George Hibbert merchant, to Miss Fooncreau, eldest dau. of Philip F. esq.

Rev. John Lane, of Hammesmith, to Miss Impey, daughter of Michael I. of the same place.

Sept. 1. Mr. Richard Price, of Milk-street, to Miss Robinson.

2. At Broxbourn, Herts. Mr. Almon, late bookseller in Piccadilly, to Mrs. Parker, widow of the late Mr. P. printer of the General Advertiser, who died May 7. See p. 397.

Rev. Mr. Lloyd, of Ipswich, to Miss Mary Lambert.

Mr. Henry Field, apothecary in Newgate-street, to Miss Baron.

T. G. Lynch, esq; to Miss E. P. Jeffon.

3. Rev. Dr. Pretyman, prebendary of Westminster, and private secretary to Mr. Pitt, to Miss Maltby, dau. of Thos. M. esq; of Germans, Bucks.

4. Mr. Costeker, woollen-draper in Cornhill, to Miss Mullens.

Sir John Brewer Davis, knt. of Hawkhurst, Kent, late a captain in the W. Kent militia, to Miss Tattertail, second daughter of the rev. Mr. T. See p. 718.

7. At Spitalfields church, Mr. John Fellows, jun. of Nottingham, to Miss Pearson.

Moses de Castro, esq; late of Madras in the East Indies, to Miss Menendez da Costa, daughter of Mr. Hanael Menuez da Costa, of Devonshire-sq.

Rev. Saunders William Miller, of South-Stoneham, Hants, to Miss Maria Hawkins.

8. Rev. Dr. Counce, to Miss Chatterau.

9. R. P. Arden, esq; his majesty's attorney-general, to Miss Wilbraham Bootle, eldest dau. of R. W. B. esq.

Sam. Bird, esq; of Park-Mill, to Miss Anna Maria Wayne, daughter of Wm. W. esq.

John Mumford, esq; of Sutton at Honey, Kent, to Miss Leigh, only daughter of the late Mr. Serjeant L.

10. Peter Prevost, esq; to Mrs. Harford.

Mr. John Walker, coal-merchant, of the Bell Savage-yard, Ludgate-hill, to Miss Coffin.

11. Edward Anderson, esq; eldest son of Sir W. A. bart. to Miss Catherine Plumer, of Lillinghall, Yorksh.; and on the same day, the rev. G. W. Anerson, to Miss Plumer.

Mr. Des Cotes, of Great Winchester-st. merchant, to Miss Demel, daughter of the late rev. Mr. D. of his majesty's Dutch chapel at St. James's.

Mr. Noah Slee, of Cooper's court, Cornhill, to Miss B. Lynd, of the same place.

By special licence, at Wilsch, Mr. O'Burne, the Irish Giant, to Miss Mary Anne Colston, of Merton Sea-End, near Spalding.

12. Mr. Richard Heavside, jun. factor, of Bishopsgate-street, to Miss Eliz. Varcher, of Paneras.

13. Mr. Courtier, merchant, of Ludgate-street, to Mrs. Simmons, of Hammesmith.

14. Rev. Mr. Wilmshunt, of Malden, to Miss Clompton.

16. John Forster, esq; secretary to the commissioners of American claims, to Miss Eliza Brockman, second dau. of the late rev. Ralph Drake Bart of Beauchough, Kent.

Mr. Smith, attorney, to Miss Sarah Sellow, only daughter of the rev. Mr. S. minister of St. James's, Clerkenwell.

17. Archibald Paxton, esq; of Buckingham-street, Strand, to Miss Harriet Gill, dau. of W. G. esq; alderman of Walbrook ward.

21. By the archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, Daniel Ryam Mathew, esq; to Miss Elizabeth Dering, second daughter of Sir Edward D. bart.

23. Edward Broadley Burrow, esq; of 1st troop of horse-guards, to Miss Buchanan, of Bromley, Kent.

At St. Bride's, W. Mottier, esq; of Lisbon, to Miss Perry.

At Cheltenham, Montagu Wilkinson, esq; of Little Bookham, co. Surrey, to Miss Harriet, eldest dau. of the hon. Henry H. brother to the E. of Buckingham.

25. At Southampton, Inglett-Forster, esq; of Dawlish, co. Devon, to Miss Sanders.

26. Mr. Edw. Sourbrook, to Miss G. C. A. Denny.

DEATHS.

LATELY, Mr. John Chamberlain, of Greenwich, Rev.

Rev. — Griffith, M. A. rector of Handsworth, dioc. York, and of Elington, dioc. Lich. and Cov.

At Drig, Cumberland, in her 103d year, Elizabeth Taylor,

At Brunswick, Sir James Buchanan Riddell, of Riddell, bart. of his majesty's first regiment of foot-guards, who was unfortunately drowned in attempting to bathe in the river. His title and estates of Riddell and Sundon devolve to his only brother, now Sir John R.

At Edinburgh, Mr. Jas. Cochrane, printer.

His Serene Highness Prince Charles Augustus Frederic, only son of the Duke of Deux-ponts, after a very short illness,

Mr. Hunt, lately elected master of the ceremonies for the assemblies at Bristol, in the room of the late Mr Plomer.

At Wern, Shropsh. aged 110, Mary Jones.

March 10. At Hinckley, the rev. Tho. Noble, many years rector of Wolvey, co. Warw. and prebendary of Wolvey in the cathedral of Lichfield. Mr. N. for several years resided at Leicester Grange, near Wolvey Heath (formerly the seat of Sir William Parkyns, the famous conspirator against King William), where he kept a boarding academy for young gentlemen. He has left 100l. for beautifying Wolvey church, which (the writer of this article can testify) is in great need of it. There are some fine old monuments remaining, but they are shamefully neglected.

July 28. At Naples, Lady Murray, dau. of John Callender, of Craigforth, esq; and wife of Sir W. M. bart.

Aug. 17. At Worcester, aged 29, Mrs. Thresher, wife of Mr. T. surgeon, one of the people called Quakers, much lamented by her friends and acquaintance, for in her they have lost a worthy member of society, highly distinguished for clearness of understanding, accomplishments of education, amiable manners, and benevolence of heart. Such indeed was her philanthropy, such her unlimited charity, that about three years ago she formed a design of going to Jamaica, the residence of her mother, with a view to procure the freedom of her mother's Negroes, and to instruct them in the principles of the Christian religion, for which instruction she was well qualified; but the great commotion of public affairs frustrated her noble design. However, we are informed, she has requested her husband that, if the said Negroes be liberated at her mother's decease, he will pay the premium to the island for such liberation, if any should be then required. In the year 1778 she obtained the gold medal of the Society in London for the encouragement of Arts and Commerce for an original painting adjudged by that learned body worthy of such honour.

20. Aged 85, Mrs. Elizabeth Hilton, sister of the late Marmaduke H. esq; of Austin-Friars.

23. At his house near Edinburgh, Col. John Macpherson, in the East India Company's service.

25. Aged 82, Mrs. Rebecca Bannister, mother to Mr. Charles B. comedian.

26. At Oxford, rev. Charles Mortimer, D. D. rector of Lincoln College.

27. Upon the circuit, at Wrexham, co. Denbigh, Henry Hall, esq; many years his majesty's attorney general for that county, and the counties of Montgomery and Flint.

At Huntingdon, Capt Robert King.

At his seat at Alderley, co. Gloc. Math. Hale, esq; barrister at law, and great grandson of the late illustrious lord chief justice Hale. By his death the male line of the family is extinct.

28. M^{rs} Dalrymple, eldest daughter of the late Sir James D. of Hailes, bart.

James Brookes, esq; of Holborn.

29. At Tottenham, aged 70, Edward Tyson, esq; receiver general of the county of Leicester, and formerly partner with Sir John Cartwright, knt. haberdasher. He was first-cousin to the late Dr. Tyson, of Queen's-sq. who left his fortune between him and his sister Mrs. Udney, and 500l. to each of his daughters.

Mr. Jaques, master of the Westminster tavern and coffee-house.

In High-street, Marybone, Peter Romilly, esq.

At Bath, Mrs. Bathurst, wife of the rev. Robert B. of Linton, Hants.

30. Mr. Godman, surgeon in Old-street, aged 84.

At Wargrave, Berks, the rev. — Darling, vicar of Wargrave and Waltham St. Lawrence, in that county.

31. Near Glasgow, of an inflammation in his bowels, Nathaniel Gordon, of Whitehill, esq.

Sept. 1. In Pall Mall, Mr. White, tea-dealer.

2. Mr. Savill Reade, late of Copthall-court, Mr. John Couthurst, master of the academy at Layton-stone.

This morning, at ten o'clock, the remains of Sir Eyre Coote, K. B. were landed at the Jetty-head, in the dock-yard, the Bombay-castle firing 21 minute guns. The corps of marines formed a line to the dock-gates, drums beating a point of war, colours flying, music playing a solemn dirge. The officers saluted the hearse as it passed them. In Fore-street, two companies of royal artillery, the 39th and 40th regiment of foot, received the body, forming themselves into divisions of six a-breast, the grenadiers and light infantry taking the lead. They then proceeded thro' the towns of Dock, Storehouse, and Plym-outh, through the glens to the gates of the citadel, where the lieutenant-governor, Campbell, received the body with every mark of respect. The two battalions and artillery formed on the parade, before the governor's house; the grenadiers and light infantry, in four divisions, escorted the hearse to the chapel, the troops presenting their arms, the drums beating, and music playing; 19 minute guns were fired during this ceremony.

and the body was deposited in the chapel with great solemnity and respect, till the 7th, when it proceeded for West Park, the family seat, in Hampshire, and was thence removed, on the 14th, for interment in the parish church of Rockwood, a sermon being preached by the rev. Mr. Hulse, the Company's chaplain.

4. Near Liverpool, Mr. Joseph Younger, one of the proprietors of the theatre-royal in that town, and of the theatre in Manchester; and for five-and-twenty years past belonging either to the theatre-royal of Drury-lane or Covent Garden. He was the son of a gentleman of fortune, and bred to the law, under Mr. Cox, of Hatton Garden; but, early in life having a strong inclination for the stage, he made different experiments in the theatrical line at York and Edinburgh; from whence he, in the year 1758, was engaged by the late Messrs. Barry and Woodward, who at that period opened their new playhouse in Crow-street, Dublin. His abilities as an actor were not very extensive, but the soundness of his judgement, and the integrity of his heart, procured him the esteem and affection of all who knew him. From Ireland he was engaged as prompter to the theatre royal in Covent Garden; an office which he filled with great reputation. On the disputes between the managers, in 1778, having attached himself to Mr. Colman, on that gentleman's leaving the partnership, he retired to a country situation, from whence, about three or four years since, he was, by Messrs. Sheridan, Ford, &c. invited to be deputy manager of the theatre royal in Drury-lane, in which capacity he gave constant proofs not only of an extensive knowledge of the business of the drama, but of the most liberal disposition to serve his distressed brethren. He was interred, by his own desire, at Sefion, about five miles from Liverpool, which place he much frequented, when in the country, for the sake of fishing, a diversion he was very fond of. If this gentleman's character in life was shaded by a few of those faults from which the frailty of human nature is never entirely exempt, let it be remembered, that the grateful hearts of the many fatherless and widows left behind, will long regret the loss of their kind patron and benefactor, who relieved with no sparing hand, nor patronized with a lukewarm heart.

At Padstow, Cornwall, George Prideaux, esq; eldest son of Humph. P. esq; of that place.

At Esher, Surrey, Mr. Ebenezer Bramble, many years master of the academies at Brentford and Isleworth.

Relict of Lord William Campbell.

In Bloomsbury-square, Mrs. Wyatt, widow of Richard W. of Horsted Keynes and Twyford, in Sussex, esq; and only daughter of the late Mr. John Banks, of Islington: her husband died two months before, leaving two sons, Richard, who succeeds to the family estates, and Thomas.

At Teignmouth, where she had been for the recovery of her health, the lady of Adm.

Whitwell.

5. At Bath, of an inflammatory fever, Miss Linley, daughter of Mr. L. manager of Drury-lane theatre. Her death is a loss almost irreparable to the musical world. Those who remember her performance at the Oratorios will join in this opinion. The union of a sweet voice, correct judgement, extensive compass, and, above all, beauty of mind and person, distinguished this much-lamented maid, and her character will be dear "While memory holds a seat in this distracted globe."

6. At Biggleswade, Bedfordshire, Mr. Gen. Alexander Stevens, author of the celebrated Lecture on Heads, and of many other humorous pieces. Mr. S. was one of the most singular characters this or any other country ever bred: as an actor, his merit was below mediocrity; yet by an extraordinary effort of genius he acquired not only fame but affluence. He is the first instance that can be produced of the same person, by his writing and reciting, that could for the space of four hours entertain an audience. His Lecture upon Heads, though attempted by several good actors, failed of producing the laugh excited when delivered by Stevens. After exhibiting it with great success all through England, he visited America, and was well received in all the capital towns; at Boston his reception was far beyond what he expected; he was apprehensive that the gloom of bigoted presbytery would prevent the humour of his Lecture from being relished, but crowded audiences for the space of six weeks convinced him of his error; at Philadelphia his reception was equally flattering and profitable. After an absence of two years he returned to England, and soon after paid a visit to Ireland. It cannot be wondered that Stevens and his Lecture were admired by a people remarkable for their humour. His lecture, in the course of a few years, produced him near 10,000*l.* the greater part of which melted from his hands before his death. He was the author of our best classical songs, and of several poetical pieces of merit. The first idea of his lecture he got at a village where he was the manager of a company, and met with a country mechanic, who described the members of the corporation with great force of humour; upon this idea Stevens improved, and was assisted in making the heads by his friend, who little imagined what a source of profit he had established. Mr. Stevens, some years before his death, lost the use of his faculties. The writer of the greater part of this account received his information on the subject from Mr. S.

7. At Clapham, Mr. John Dray, surgeon, of Dover.

8. At Hackney, aged 78, Mrs. Eade, relict of the late Jonathan E. esq; of Walthamstow.

9. Mr. John Wright, of Northumberland-st. coal-merch.

Hon. J. Smith Barry, of Belmont, Cheshire; uncle to the Earl of Barrymore.

At Luton, Bedfordshire, Sir Charles Leighton, ton, bart. M. P. for Shrewsbury.

Dropped down dead in Rathbone-place, as he was getting out of a postchaise, Mr. Charles Hunt, attorney, of Percy-street, and late of Enfield.

This afternoon Mrs. Spiers, many years mistress of a toy-shop in the cloisters, near Christ's hospital, threw herself into the New River, near Sadler's Wells. She was taken out of the water while yet some faint signs of life were discoverable, and put to bed at the King of Prussia's Head, where one of the assistants to the Humane Society persevered a considerable time in means for her recovery, but without effect. On Friday evening the coroner's jury sat on the body, and brought in their verdict, Lunacy.

11. At Bath, in her 92d year. Mrs. Pocklington, relict of the late Admiral P. and mother to Mrs. Demville.

12. The rev. James Tatterfall, M. A. rector of Streatham, and St. Paul's, Covent Garden, aged 72 (both in the gift of the Duke of Bedford).

13. Near Daventry, the rev. Ellis Jones, vicar of Staverton, co. Northampt.

14. Mrs. Bellis, relict of Geo. Bellas, esq; late of Doctors Commons, who died July 12, and sister of the rev. Mr. Billingham, of Framley, co. Hants.

At Kinnelgwyd, Brecknockshire, Mr. Edward Price, well known for his researches into the vegetable creation; a relation of William Price, painter of the beautiful window of Merton college, of whom Mr. Walpole speaks so handsomely as to his taste in ornaments.

At Cambridge, of a paralytic stroke, aged 61, Mr. James Essex, F. S. A. Those who have made Gothic architecture their study, as well as those who on a superficial view cannot help being struck with its stupendous efforts, will for ever regret the irreparable loss of this great master of that science, whose modesty was equal to his abilities. The repairs and improvements of King's college chapel at Cambridge, of Ely and Lincoln minsters, planned and conducted by him, will be a lasting monument of his skill, if the public should never be indulged with his drawings, armeasurements and observations on the first of these admirable specimens of that style of building; not to mention his improvements of several colleges in Cambridge, and of Maddingley, the seat of Sir John Hinde Cotton, bart. in that county; and his repair of the tower of Winchester college chapel; as well as innumerable instances of his friendly assistance. His proposals for publishing the plans and sections of King's college chapel, in fifteen plates, with remarks and comparisons, may be seen in Brit. Topog. vol. I. p. 237. All that were actually published of his writing were "Remarks on the antiquity of different modes of brick and stone buildings in England." Architect. vol. IV. p. 73. "Observations on Lincoln cathedral," ib. 149;

and, "On the origie and antiquity of round churches, and of the round church at Cambridge in particular," ib. vol. VI. p. 163; and "On Croyland abbey and bridge," which forms the XXIIId number of the "Bibliotheca Topogr. Britann." (See p. 525) He was preparing further remarks on the rise and progress of his favourite science, in its various parts, which death intercepted. His designs for the new building of Bene't, King's, and Emmanuel colleges, Trinity hall, and the public library, at Cambridge, were engraved, 1719. 1741. 1743. 1748. 1752. The first of these drew him into a controversy with the historian of that house, who disputed his claim to the design, and obliged him to publish "A letter to his subscribers to the plan and elevation of an intended addition to Corpus Christi college in Cambridge. Cambridge, 1748-9," 8vo. which effectually closed the dispute. Mr. E. had made himself master of the ancient site of Cambridge, his native town, where his father had followed the business of a carpenter with success many years. His mother died in her 84th year, four months before him. He married the daughter of Mr. Thurlbourne, an eminent bookseller of that town, by whom he has left one daughter.

15. Suddenly, Mr. Yarrow, one of the proprietors of the pearl ash manufactory at Little Chelsea.

D. Appleton, esq; of Hocstreet, Waltham-stow, corn-factor. He had been confined as a lunatic in his own house several years; and, during the absence of his keeper, took the opportunity to cut his throat.

16. At Penn, co. Bucks. in the 67th year of his age, Lt. Gen. William Haviland, colonel of the 45th regiment. He was an officer distinguished for his very long and able services, having spent his whole life in the army; for his father being an officer, he was born while the regiment was on duty in Ireland. He himself acted as a lieutenant, under Lord Cathcart, at the memorable siege of Carthage; and afterwards with Vernon at the conquest of Porto Bello. He then served as aid-camp under General Blakeney during the rebellion in Scotland. In the subsequent war, from the beginning of hostilities, he served in America, where he had a separate command, and by his exertions and success received the particular acknowledgements of Lord Amherst, who has ever since honoured him with his friendship. A singular genius for mechanics enabled him to concert measures for passing the Rapide, and the fertility of his resources in other unusual circumstances made him very efficient (under his distinguished commander) in contributing to the success of the English arms in America. In the same war he acted as second in command at the conquest of Martinico, and in a very high one at the Havana; so that having had the good fortune through life to be placed in the most conspicuous scenes of action, on chosen services, and with the most eminent men, men, he acted in such a manner as even among them to attain a high reputation for courage and ability. When the last war broke out, he was put on the staff, and, after being a short time at Whitehaven, he was entrusted with the command of the western division of the island during the whole time the French invasion was expected, and there continued till the end of the war. The station was important, and the service delicate, there he had the happiness to preserve perfect harmony between the regular forces and militia, which, by the prudent disposition of his troops, and exact discipline, he performed the more substantial functions; he maintained the dignity of his situation by a style of life which became the service of his sovereign. His life was open to the navy as well as the army; and by the extent of his hospitality, and the force of personal character, which was cordial, plain, informed, and unaffected, he did much to facilitate the national service in a country little enured to the burden of arms, and when so many principal gentlemen were drawn away from their occupations and amusements. The same disposition followed him through life. To his own regiment he was a kind father, and to the younger officers of it his house was literally a home. The consequence however is, that in a long course of years, overlooking many opportunities of emolument, but none of benevolence, though he always maintained a just economy, he has left his family in very narrow circumstances; for the sole reward of all his services was a marching regiment on the Irish establishment, which was bestowed on him very late in life, and with a constitution harassed and broken, not less from the variety than from the length of his services.

18. At Hetherset, in his 72d year, Mr. Dan. Hogher, a considerable farmer, who acquired a handsome fortune with an unblemished character.

At Lymington, aged 45, Mr. Edward Goodwin, proprietor of the extensive salt-works carried on that shore.

19. In Kingsland road, Capt. John Forbes, late in the East India Company's service.

At Bath, Mr. Moore, who for some years past kept an academy in that city, and whose death is a loss to the rising generation. For the honour of the theatre, and theatrical men, he was some time on the Bath stage, which he quitted for purposes to which he was better qualified; but in both stations he was admired and esteemed as an ingenious man, and highly valued for his honesty, integrity, and humanity.

21. In Clifford's Inn, Christopher Donaldson, esq; late one of the agents for government in the province of Virginia.

In St. Martin's-lane, Richard Hazard, esq;

22. Mr. Wherlings, hay salesman, and master of the Bear and Ragged-Staff inn, West

London. Stefan Cohen de Ascido, head priest of the Portuguese Jewish synagogue.

23. At Stratford, John Cowell, esq; bread-merchant, of Water-lane, Tower-Str.

24. In Bishopsgate-street-without, Mr. Judd, one of the common councilmen of Bishopgate ward.

25. At his seat at Shurdington, co. Gloucester, Robert Lawrence, esq.

26. James Wilkes, esq; of Greenwich.

GAZETTE PROMOTIONS.

JOSEPH Frederick Waller Delbartes, esq; Lieut. Gov. of the island of Cape Breton in America.

Sir James Harris, K. B. sworn of the Privy Council.

Thomas Lord Sydney, Right Hon. W. Pitt, Right Hon. H. Dundas, Thomas Lord Walsingham, Right Hon. Wm. Wyndham Grenville, and Constantine John Lord Mulgrave of the kingdom of Ireland, appointed his Majesty's Commissioners for the affairs of India.

George Crauford, esq; his Majesty's Commissioner to treat with the Commissioners of the Most Christian King, pursuant to the Definitive Treaty of peace; and Henry New Delrhympse, esq; Secretary to the said Commission.

ECCLIESIASTICAL PREFERMENTS.

REV. Geo. Daviet, Cranfield R. co. Bedford, worth 400l. per ann. was Wm. Frank, dec.

Rev. John Ord, R. of the Burghs, co. Norfolk, one of the Prince of Wales's chaplains in ordinary.

Rev. Wm. Gretton, M. A. vicar of Saffron Walden and Littlebury, domestic chaplain to Lord Howard of Walden.

Rev. — Hammond, domestic chaplain to the Earl of Orford, vice Mr. Say, of Swaffham, dec.

Rev. Tho. Daraford, M. A. prebendary of Chichester.

Rev. James Ord, Whitfield R. near Newcastle upon Tyne.

Rev. — Nind, Wargrave and Waltham St. Lawrence VV. co. Berks. vice Mr. Darling, dec.

Rev. W. Taylor, M. A. Brecon Ash R. co. Norfolk.

Rev. James Bennet, B. A. Dennington R. co. Suff.

Rev. Dixon Hosier, Titchshall with Godwick R. co. Norfolk.

Rev. John Hewitt, perpetual curacy of Walcot, co. Norfolk.

Rev. W. Browne, licensed to in Framlingham, Suffolk, son of Hycham, kne.

Rev. — Marshall, curate Liptrott.

Rev. Joseph Gilberts, V. and Harnham chap. co. Wil Barber, dec.

CIVIL PROMOTIONS.

RT. hon. Thomas H. of Shrewsbury.

722 Meteorological Diary for October, 1783.—Average Prices of Corn.

October Days.	Thermom.	Barometer. Inch. 20ths	Wind.	Rain. roths of inch.	Weather.
1	62	30 2	NE	2	thick fog, sunshine.
2	63	30 1	NE		fog, sun, cloudy.
3	64	30 0	E		thick fog, warm sunny day ¹ .
4	59	29 18	SW		cloudy morn, sunny day ² .
5	57	29 14	SW		showery.
6	61	29 12	W	.23	warm showers.
7	55	29 14	SW	.53	cloudy, sun, frost.
8	58	29 5	NE		white frost, clouds.
9	38	29 4	E	.3	hoar frost, cool day ³ .
10	44	29 4	SW		frosty, pleasant day ⁴ .
11	54	29 5	SE		warm morn, sun.
12	52	29 19	SE		dew, sunny day.
13	53	30 1	E	.9	sunny morn, rainy.
14	52	30 6	SW		great fog in morning, sunny.
15	52	30 6	SW		hazy and cloudy.
16	56	30 7	SW		great fog still, sunny day ⁵ .
17	46	30 5	NE		cloudy.
18	54	30 4	NE		thick fog all day.
19	55	30 2	SW		cloudy and mild.
20	54	30 0	SW		small rain, cloudy ⁵ .
21	50	29 18	SW		cloudy, sun.
22	56	29 16	SW		warm clouds, and wind.
23	42	29 18	NW		mild.
24	46	29 14	SW	.14	rainy day.
25	42	29 14	SW		fog, cloudy.
26	39	29 16	W		fair and bright ⁶ .
27	50	29 12	SW	.10	sun, clouds, and rain.
28	42	29 14	SW		sunny, bright, and cold.
29	53	29 16	SW		fair.
30	42	30 2	W		sun and bright.
31	53	29 18	SW		fair, cloudy.

OBSERVATIONS. ¹ Acorns innumerable.—² Bright meteor.—³ Bright night, Hale.
⁴ The grapes are large this year.—⁵ Very warm.—⁶ Gathered the last grapes and kidney beans.
 * "The fading, many-colour'd wood-
 "Shade deepening under shade, the country round
 "Imbrown."

AVERAGE PRICES of CORN, from October 11, to October 16, 1784

Wheat Rye Barley Oats Beans					COUNTIES upon the COAST.
s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	s.	d.	s.	d.
London	5	9	3	3	1	2	7	3	3
COUNTIES INLAND.
Middlesex	5	9	0	0	2	1	2	7	3
Surry	5	10	3	8	3	1	2	5	4
Hertford	5	10	0	0	3	4	2	8	4
Bedford	5	7	3	7	3	1	2	4	3
Cambridge	6	1	3	3	3	1	2	3	3
Huntingdon	5	3	0	0	2	1	1	2	3
Northampton	5	11	3	10	3	2	2	1	3
Rutland	6	3	0	0	3	9	2	3	3
Leicester	6	6	4	3	3	6	2	1	4
Nottingham	6	2	3	10	3	7	2	4	4
Derby	6	6	0	0	3	6	2	5	4
Stafford	5	10	0	0	3	0	2	2	4
Salop	6	1	4	5	2	1	1	1	4
Hereford	5	9	0	0	2	7	1	9	0
Worcester	6	3	3	5	3	0	2	5	3
Warwick	5	6	0	0	3	1	1	10	3
Gloucester	6	2	0	0	2	10	2	1	3
Wilts	6	0	0	0	2	8	2	5	4
Berks	5	11	4	3	3	0	2	6	3
Oxford	6	1	0	0	3	1	2	5	3
Bucks	5	7	0	0	3	0	2	2	3
Essex	5	7	3	9	3	1	2	6	3
Suffolk	5	10	3	2	2	1	1	5	3
Norfolk	6	1	2	10	2	10	2	5	0
Lincoln	5	10	3	1	3	2	2	0	3
York	6	1	3	11	3	5	2	1	4
Durham	6	2	4	6	3	3	2	1	3
Northumberland	5	11	4	0	2	10	2	3	4
Cumberland	6	2	4	6	3	6	2	7	5
Westmorland	6	9	4	5	3	5	2	2	0
Lancashire	6	5	0	0	3	10	2	6	4
Cheshire	6	0	4	3	3	0	2	0	0
Monmouth	6	1	0	0	2	9	1	9	0
Somerset	5	6	3	0	2	7	2	2	3
Devon	5	5	0	0	2	7	1	6	0
Cornwall	5	10	0	0	2	8	1	7	0
Dorset	6	1	0	0	2	8	2	3	4
Hampshire	5	7	0	0	2	8	2	3	3
Suffex	5	8	0	0	2	9	2	1	0
Kent	6	3	3	2	3	4	1	6	3
WALES, Oct. 1, to Oct. 9, 1784
North Wales	6	5	4	9	3	8	1	11	5
South Wales	6	2	4	4	3	4	1	8	5

723

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For OCTOBER, 1784.

BEING THE FOURTH NUMBER OF VOL. LIV. PART II.

MR. URBAN,

O^r 4.

HE annexed plate represents the curious brick arch over which the New River is conveyed in its wooden trough near Bush Hill, as described in your last Miscellany. Over the point of the arch are the arms of Sir Hugh Middleton: On a pile 3 wolves' heads counter-changed; Crest, a hand displayed issuing out of a coronet. The inscription on the face of the arch sets forth, that it was rebuilt 1682, when Henry earl of Clarendon was governor of the New River Company. This Henry was the second earl of Clarendon, being eldest son of the chancellor and historian, and lord lieutenant of Ireland 1685, and died 1709. Our modern peerages are full of every little distinction they can collect, even to that of F. R. S. Perhaps this inscription alone records a distinction of the present subject. This coat and inscription (together with the abutments here represented) are at present taken down, for the purpose of continuing the arch over the current before-mentioned, near 80 feet, with a crown 27 inches in thickness, that it may carry the new channel and road. It is not a little to the credit of the surveyor, that he employs, in this work, all the old materials he can amass, in preference to modern bricks, removing them from under the wooden frame; and causes the old terras to be dried and pounded, to mix with the mortar; thus manifesting both skill and good management; to which may be added his contrivance in giving the new-made road time to settle gradually.

Sir Hugh Middleton left issue one son, William, who married, and had issue. William's eldest daughter, Elizabeth, married Mr. John Grene, and died in childbed, Dec. 9, 1675, leaving two sons, Giles and William, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Katharine. Her epitaph in Enfield church, where she was buried, may be seen in your vol. LII. p. 74, where the arms of Middleton are misrepresented, being as here given, O. on a pile V. 3 wolves heads O.

Mr. Grene lived in a house on the North side of Tuckey Street, Enfield, now inhabited by Mr. Justice Coleman, and great part rebuilt since it was sold by Mr. G.'s heir. One of his daughters married Mr. Hunt, whose son Charles was an attorney, and dropped down dead, as you announced in your last month's Obituary, p. 718, and was buried in Mr. G.'s vault, leaving, by his wife, younger daughter of Mr. North, an eminent brewer in London, a son, at Lincoln's Inn, and a daughter.—In the house before-mentioned was a portrait of Mr. John Grene, in the dress of the last century. To this house was annexed, by faculty, a pew in Enfield church, to continue their property so long as any of the family remained in the parish. I should suppose some other branch of the Middleton family is the reduced object alluded to by Mr. Pennant.

On the site of the old house, in your former plate, is building a circular one of three stories, for the residence of Mr. Ellis, clerk of the works.

D. H.

M^r.

* Not griffins, as in our last; where, for Samuel, read William, Clarke. On this stone the wolves heads are Azure or Sable.

MR. URBAN, O^R. 9.
HAVING it in my power to comply with the request of your correspondent who, in p. 652, has furnished me anecdotes, and has addressed himself to the publick at large for more, concerning the late Nathaniel Pigott, Esq. I here subjoin the following particulars relating to that learned and respectable man.

Being, as already said, of the Roman Catholic religion, his father sent him, young, to the English College of Saint Omer's, for his education. There he distinguished himself by early and promising proofs of his future merit and excellence. On his return from thence to England, he gave himself up entirely to his favourite study of the law. In a short time he was admitted, by a flattering unanimity, a member of the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple. He soon became an object of public attention, and as soon commenced his reputation for the nicest honour, strictest integrity, and most profound learning; which daily increased, and which he carried, unsullied, to the grave. Under thirty years of age at the time of the Revolution, his opinions had the greatest weight with the leading Roman Catholics of that period. Although faithful to his king, to whom he had sworn allegiance; and although, by the expulsion of that prince, his most sanguine expectations of preferment were forever blasted*; he was moderate, and, on all occasions, endeavoured to check the intemperate zeal and violent animosities of those unhappy times. Of his conciliating principles a multitude of instances might be adduced; but it is spared the length of this relation may be unsuitable to your publication. Let it suffice to add, that in those times of convulsion he was equally esteemed, respected, and trusted, by men of all parties. With his years the number of his friends increased; they were numerous, and in the highest stations. Many letters are still existing from the Lord Chancellor Harcourt to him; in which an unbounded confidence in his honour, and reliance on his professional opinions, appear. He died, as your correspondent observes, on the 5th of July, 1737; and the epitaph, from his monument, is correctly copied. But he seems to be in the dark as to the author of the epitaph. It was written by Mr. Pope, who at that time lived at Twickenham, about a mile from Mr. Pigott's villa at Whitton, where Mr. Pope visited, and frequently dined. As every thing relating to our great poet must interest the curiosity of your readers, I shall subjoin some particulars relating to the epitaph, more especially as they will shew the anxious attention he paid to, and the solicitous care he took of, every expression, and even every word, which came from him. On the death of Mr. Pigott the first epitaph was worded thus:

“To the Memory of Nathaniel Pigott, an ornament to his profession, to which he gave more honour than he derived from it.

Possessed of the highest reputation, in it by his learning, judgment, experience, integrity; precluded from the highest stations only by his conscience and religion.

Many he assisted in the law;
 more he preserved from it.

A

friend to peace, servant of God,
 guardian of property, lover of his country,
 He died July 5, 1737, aged 76 years.”

Mr. Pope, a few days after, sent the epitaph thus altered:

“To the Memory of Nathaniel Pigott, Barrister at Law;
 who gave more honour to his profession than he derived from it.

Possessed of the highest character
 by his learning, judgment, experience, integrity,
 Deprived of the highest stations
 only by his conscience and religion,

Many he assisted in the law;
 more he preserved from it.

A friend to peace, guardian of property, and protector of the poor;

 a servant of God, and lover of his country,
 He died July 5, 1737, aged 76 years.”

And with this epitaph he sent the following note to one of the family:

“SIR,

“This is the inscription I would prefer to that I gave you, upon further consideration. Pray let Mr. Schemakers engrave it as it here stands. The words underlined must be in small capitals. Your affectionate servant,

A. POPE.”

This amended epitaph did not, however, entirely satisfy the nice and scrupulous poet; for, a few days after, he sent it again altered, and in the manner it appears on the monument, and as printed in your last month's Magazine.

On the 23d of September, 1726, Mr. Pope made a present to Mr. Pigott of his Iliad and his Odyssey, in ten volumes quarto, splendidly bound and gilt,

* At that time an offer was made to him, and he had accepted the offer, of being appointed solicitor-general.

Oxford Marbles.—Phosphoretic Matches, their Use.

gilt. The latter had been printed by Bernard Lintot, in the course of the preceding year. On the first page of it were written the following verses :

“The Muse this one verse to learn’d Pigott “addresses;
“In whose heart, like his writings, was “never found flaw;
“Whom Pope prov’d his friend in his two “chief distresses,
“Once in danger of Death, once in danger
“of Law.”

Once in danger of Death alludes to an accident. On Mr. Pope’s return home, one evening, he was overset by Mr. Pigott’s coach-man: luckily, it happened near the house. Immediate assistance was given; and Pope, a little cut by the glass, but otherwise unhurt, was conveyed back again*.

The present Mr. Pigott, F. R. S. who lives at York, is not his son, as your correspondent, by mistake, says, but his grandson. This gentleman is in possession of the different epitaphs and the Homers, with the verses inscribed, and the note above-mentioned, all written in Mr. Pope’s own hand.

Yours, &c. &c.

MR. URBAN,

I AM sorry that your correspondent, P. Q. (see p. 494.) in visiting the Oxford marbles, did not see the inscription on the statue, which was some time ago described in your Magazine. There he most certainly might have seen it; for the letters are as legible as they were the day when they were first cut. The statue is one of those (No 5.) which are called in the Guide Roman Emperors; and “whose originality,” as your correspondent observes, is there “questioned.” It may be proper to add, what I have been told since I sent the account, that the statue in question was formerly called by some learned men Q. F. Maximus; the inscription having been read by them, so as to make the whole nothing more, than the name of the artist: Ægidius Morettus Romanus faciebat. Ægidius Romanus is the known name of the general whom I supposed the statue to represent; but what other Morettus there was whom, according to the above, the sculptor thought it necessary to distinguish himself; or why, omitting the name of his hero, he should have distinguished himself so particularly; I do not know. The inscription itself seems to be divided into two columns, separated each other by the strap of the statue, which is something more than three inches in breadth, and rises half an inch above the surface of the base in which the letters are cut. I give the words as they stand on the statue, that readers may judge for themselves.

* Pope, alluding to this accident, in his XIXth Letter to Swift, dated “Nov. 16, 1726,” says, “His two least fingers of one hand hang impediments to each other, like useless dependents, who only take up room, and never are active or assistant to our wants: I shall never be much the better for them.” And Swift, in his answer, expresses his concern.

ÆGIDIVS. () IOB
ROMANVS () FAC

The line from Miss Sewar’s elegant poem Louisa (see Geog. p. 500.), would have had, I think, sufficient degree both of emphasis and harmony, had the elision been “Then, as the innocent eyes to “while,” &c.

As it stands at present, the Caractacus does not justify it. A similar one that occurs in Comus:

“Impostor, do not charge me “nature,
“As if I would her children
“riotous.” V. 762.

MR. URBAN,

I Consider your monthly publication not only as a Magazine of knowledge in the several branches of literature, but also as the proper vehicle to announce whatever discoveries are for public utility.—The Phosphoretic Matches have not been sufficiently commended; nor have I as yet offered a eulogium on their great convenience on many occasions, which I need not enumerate. I owe this open acknowledgement for the benefit and assistance I experienced from the use of them, and sincerely wish it may prove of private interest of the makers and contributors of this useful invention, however long it may have been brought into a familiar service. The assistance of one of these little matches extricated myself and company from an unlucky accident, on the 10th of postilion and three horses out of the stable having been thrown down in the last hour of the night, the carriage was obliged to be cut to release the without the help of the matches, which lighted the lanthorn-candles, we could not so soon have repaired our damages, nor proceeded on our journey. They are now reduced in price, having purchased mine of a German traveller, at a coffee-house near the Hay-Market, for the small price of eighteen pence a dozen, inclosed in a tin case.

Yours, &c. OBSERVATOR.

MR. URBAN, Deal, Oct. 7.

THE following extract of a letter from Sittingbourn to Mr. B. Cornwell, No 198, Fleet Street, having appeared in Lloyd's Evening Post, and several other papers, you are requested to give an edition of it, with a note.

"SIR,

"A very particular regard to the interest and happiness of my fellow-creatures, in thankful gratitude for a restoration to health from the most excruciating pains that ever tormented the human frame, obliges me to desire you to convey to the publick a knowledge of the blessings and comforts I received from the ORIENTAL VEGETABLE CORDIAL. Disorders of a most serious nature deprived me of every sensitive faculty. Thus debilitated and enervated, I was the pity of my neighbours, who all endeavoured to revive me, and had physicians from every quarter of the country, without relieving me in the least; and the continuance of my affliction brought on me internal pains no medicine could assuage. But, persuaded of the efficacy of the VEGETABLE CORDIAL, I have taken six bottles; my spirits are restored, my digestion improved, and I now enjoy health, with more real complacency and ease, than I remember. I still adhere to a dose every other day, by which I find my appetite in the most perfect restoration, and myself in the greatest composure. If the publication of this will serve mankind, you have my leave to advertise it,

I am, Sir, your very humble servant,
DANIEL STORER.

Curate of Sittingbourn, Kent.
Sittingbourn, Aug. 13, 1784."

NOTE.

"On reading this testimony, I doubted the truth of it; on making enquiry, I found it to be false. I ground this assertion on the authority of Mr. Evans, the worthy and resident vicar of Sittingbourn. He assures me, that the Rev. Daniel Storer is a stranger to himself; and, as far as he knows and believes, to his parishioners also. As a man in office, I feel an obligation to detect such impositions as fall within my department, and, where they affect the publick, publickly to expose them. I think it right too to vindicate the good fame of the physicians of the county of Kent from an aspersion implied, and which comes with an ill grace even from a pretended clergyman, as graduates in physic are not in the habit of taking fees from curates.

W. BACKHOUSE, Archdeacon of Canterbury."

MR. URBAN, Oct. 14.

MR. GIBBON, in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" (chap. XX.), calls the "Labarum an obscure, though celebrated name, which has been vainly derived from almost all the languages of the world;" and more he justly says of its obscurity in note 33 of the same chapter. I am afraid that an attempt to give the etymology of a word which has baffled so many etymologists before, will carry the appearance of a presumption ill becoming a person very moderately versed in literature; but yet, as no prior elucidation of this term has been in the least satisfactory, mine can be no worse, or deserve less attention.

All seem agreed that something of importance was concealed in the term "Labarum," which conveyed mystical allusions fit for their researches, and an adequate reward for the complete but painful discovery made of its true signification by the curious. Now what circumstance was of greater moment in the life of Constantine than his removal of the seat of empire from Rome to Byzantium? And, as that design was not to be completed until no competitor in the monarchy was left, an allusion to that design may, in my opinion, be very probably meant by him to be involved in the name given to that standard, under which he subdued all competition. If this be allowed me, and perhaps it easily may be, I think the initial letters of this great design (as expressed in the Latin language) will thoroughly develop this cabalistical union of elements, and bring to light its most natural import. Take, therefore, the words "Legionum Aquila Byzantium" "Antiqua Roma Urbe Murabit;" which fully express the design of Constantine, as well as its accomplishment; for for these words are of unexceptionably classical purity: and, as the tutelar Aquila of the Roman legions was always supposed to be fixed in the capital, any city, to which that was removed as its permanent residence, must immediately become the capital of the empire. The initials of the above words form the term in question, "Labarum." I shall add no more, and submit my humble attempt to the candid examination of you and your readers.

Yours, &c. DAMMONIENSIS.

MR. URBAN,

FROM the year 1641 to the present period, all that Bishop Wilkins wrote concerning his secret and swift messengers, flying, &c. was looked upon as the wild imaginations of a crack-brained man*; and Pliny, the naturalist, has been coupled with him; when we read of his alluaging the violence of the waves; yet Dr. Franklin has proved beyond a doubt, that a spoonful of oil will smooth an acre of water; and Wilkins's flying chariot has now been frequently travelled in; and, therefore, now is the time to observe what he has said upon the subject more than a century ago, which is as follows: "But, among all other possible conveyances," says the Bishop, "through the air, imagination itself cannot conceive any one more useful than the invention of a flying chariot, which I have mentioned elsewhere; since, by this means, a man may have as free a passage as a bird, which is not hindered either by the highest walls, or the deepest rivers and trenches, or the most watchful sentinel; but of this, perhaps, I may have occasion to treat more largely in some other discourse." And accordingly he does observe, in another work, (both very scarce,) "That there is a great difference between the several quantities of such bodies as are commonly upheld by the air, not only gnats and flies, but also the eagle, and other fowls of vast magnitude. Cardan and Scaliger do unanimously affirm (and this," says he, "is almost as wonderful as the flying chariot), that there is a bird among the Indians, of so great a bigness, that his beak is often used to make a sheath or scabbard for a sword."—Adding, "That the main difficulty would be in raising the chariot from the ground, near unto which the earth's attraction is of the greatest ef-

* See his "World in the Moon."

"Acacy; for when once it is aloft in the air, the motion of it will be easy."—There is no reason, therefore, to doubt the truth of the artificial dove contrived by Archytas, nor the iron fly made by Rhegiomontanus, of which Dubartas wrote thus:

"Once, as the artist, more with mirth than meat,
Feasted some friends whom he esteemed great,
From his learn'd hand an iron fly let out,
And having flown a perfect round about,
With weary'd wings return'd unto her master,
And, as judicious, on his arm he plac'd her."

I cannot conclude without again observing, that Bp. Wilkins, in his Mathematical Magick, insists upon the practicability of a flying chariot, and is at a great deal of pains to answer the objections that can be urged against it. If, therefore, the first traveller was a foreigner, the first projector was an Englishman. It is now past all doubt, that a well-constructed balloon, under the direction of a cool deliberate passenger, is less liable to an accident than a common post-chaise; for it may be so governed as not to pass too far from the earth, or to experience any, or very little, difference of atmosphere.

AN EARTHLY WANDERER.

MR. URBAN,

IT is generally agreed, that the fairest way to explain a doubtful word, or expression, is, to see how the author has used the same word, or expression, in other parts of his works. By this test I am of opinion that Fagus, in Virgil, is the Beech, and not any species of Oak. The characters of lufuncis (Georg. I. 173), and of spreading (Ecl. I. 1. and Georg. IV. 366), agree with either of these trees; which, in woods, have the first, in detached situations the second, of these qualities. But there are three uses for which Virgil describes Fagus as fit, which, I think, clearly point it out to be the Beech. First, for making of cups, in Ecl. III. 36*; secondly, for plough and cart timber, Georg. I. 173, and III. 172; and, thirdly, for writing upon the bark, Ecl. V. 13†. Thus, of six places in which Virgil mentions Fagus, in two of them it may be, and in the other four it probably is, the Beech. I conclude, therefore, that, in the seventh place‡, where he talks of

* Pocula fagina.

† ——"In viridi nuper quæ cortice fagi Carmina descripti"

‡ Georg. II. 71.

engrafting Fagus upon the chesnut, he means the Beech there also, however absurd the practice may appear to us at this day. Yours, &c. P. B. C.

Great Britain, or any other work which gives any intelligence of this philosophical and learned Countess. As I doubt not that there are some English literati much better informed in this particular, I shall be glad to receive from them the account we want, which will be sure to reach us by the Gentleman's Magazine *. F. S.

MR. URBAN, Berlin, Aug. 19.
A Singular book, full of obscurities and paradoxes, was printed at Amsterdam, 1690, in 12mo, with this title: Opuscula Philosophica, quibus continentur principia Philosophiæ antiquissimæ et recentissimæ de Deo, Christo, et Creaturâ, i. e. de Spiritu et Materiâ in genere, &c. Opusculum posthumum, et linguâ Anglicanâ Latinitate donatum. In the Preface it is said, "Opusculum hoc conscriptum fuit ante annos haud ita multos a Comitissâ quâdam Anglicanâ, feminâ ultra sexum eruditâ, Latine Græcæque litteraturæ peritissimâ, inque omni philosophandi genere quam maximè versatâ." Notwithstanding all my enquiries, I have not been able to procure any farther intelligence of this female author. Unless it be some words of our great Leibnitz, who says, in a German Literary Journal, published at the beginning of this century, in which he had a great share, "This lady [the author of the Opuscula Philosophica] is the Countess of Conarway [Countess Conway], sister to the Chancellor Heneage Finch, as he remembers to have heard from M. Helmont." And the same Leibnitz writes, in a letter to Tho. Burnet (Op. T. VI. p. 233), "he [Helmont the son], who was a particular friend of the Countess of Konna-way, has told me the history of that extraordinary lady."

Here then is an "extraordinary lady," remarkable for her history, and equally distinguished by her birth and learning, who yet remains hitherto absolutely unknown, at least in our country. I have not by me either the last edition of the Biographia Britannica, by Dr. Kippis, or Ballard's Memoirs of the Ladies of

MR. URBAN, Oct. 3.
H A V I N G collected, occasionally, such tracts as fell in my way, descriptive of the ELIZABETHAN Progresses, with the Pageants and Devices exhibited before the Queen at the mansions of the Nobility, I am persuaded that, if they were uniformly republished, with illustrations, they would be favourably received by the public. Such a volume is now actually in the press; but, as I could wish to make it as complete as is possible, I take this mode of requesting your valuable correspondents to communicate such "Progresses" or "Pageants" of that reign as they may happen to possess; which shall be thankfully acknowledged, and returned with care; or, if more agreeable, shall be purchased. Among those which are already procured are, the two at Kenelworth, those at London, Biffam, Sudley, Ricort, Elvelham, New Windsor, and Cowdry. Two also of Norwich (Churchyard's and Wood's, both printed by Bynnenman,) are now before me; but that "with a map of Norwich by John Day" (see British Topography, vol. II. p. 12), the substance of which is said to have been transcribed in Hollinshed and Blomfield (if such a one was ever incorporated into one pamphlet, of which I have great doubt) is still among the desiderata; as are all the following articles, which Churchyard expressly mentions as his own:

1. "The Book given her Majestie at Bristol, where I made the whole Devices."—

* In our Peerage Books, this lady, Anne, is mentioned as the second daughter of Sir Heneage Finch, Recorder of London and Speaker of the House of Commons in 1605, 4th son of Sir Moyle Finch, bart. by the Countess of Winchelsea. Her eldest brother, Heneage, was Lord Chancellor in 1675, and created Earl of Nottingham in 1681. She was first wife to Edward Earl Conway, who, dying without issue in 1683, devised all his estates, both in England and Ireland, to Popham Seymour, and, after his death (which happened in 1699), to Francis Seymour, younger sons of Sir Edward Seymour, Bart. of Bury Pomeroy, Wilts. They both took the name of Conway, and the latter, created in 1703 Lord Conway, both of England and Ireland, was father to the present Earl of Hertford and Gen. Conway. More of this accomplished lady we know not, but, with our Prussian correspondent, wish to know. A correspondent to whom we communicated this article while printing, inclines to believe this lady was Catbarine, 2d wife of this Edward Earl of Conway's father, daughter of Giles Hueriblock, of Ghent in Flanders, and widow of one ——— Fosse, a merchant in London. See Dugd. Bar. II. 453. Her being a foreigner better suits with her Latin philosophical tract, and is no reflection on the English ladies her contemporaries. EDIT.

This (as appears by Wood, I. 317.) was printed in 1575, at the end of Churchyard's "Chippes, containing several Labours. Part 1." Qu. if Part II. was ever printed?

2. "The Devises of Warre and a Play at Awstley [Osterley in Middlesex], her Highness being at Sir Thomas Gresham's."

3. "The Commedy before her Majestie at Norwich in the Fielde, when she went to dinner to my Lady Gerningam's."

4. "The whole Devices, Pastimes, and Plaies, at Norwich, before her Majestie." [Perhaps the same with that printed under the title of "A Discourte of the Queenes Majesties Entertainment in Suffolk and Norfolk," &c. sans date.]

5. "The Devises and Speeches that Men and Boyes shewed at their many Prograces." [This is particularly wanted.]

6. "The Book called a Handfull of glad-some Verses to the Q. M. at Woodstocke."

As the above request, Mr. Urban, is made much more with a view to the gratification of the Public than to any private emolument, I am sure you will readily give it a place; and I make no doubt but your kind correspondents will open their literary stores, and contribute their quota to the fund of general entertainment. I am aware that the Progresses to Oxford and Cambridge are related in Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, but should be glad to find them in a separate publication, especially as the first is said to be incorrectly reprinted.—The communications that this letter may produce, if addressed to the printer of your Magazine, will find their way with safety to Yours, &c. J. N.

P. S. As matter of antiquarian curiosity, I send you a KNIFE of the Elizabethan age, which probably was a present in one of her Progresses, as the date on it is 1584. The arms (a bend ingrailed between 2 cottises quartering fretted, on a chief 3 stars; crest a phoenix,) and initial letters (M. T.) I am in hopes some heraldic friend will be able to appropriate. (See them in our miscellaneous plate, fig. 1.)

MR. URBAN,

OCT. 4.

SINCE I read the curious anecdote of Dr. Welton's altar-piece, in your last, p. 644, a friend has shewn me another copy of the picture, with the following couplet:

Falleris, hæc quite pingi sub imagine credis:

No. similis Judas est tibi; poenituit.

The painter's name was "Jac. Fel-lowses."

Ximenes, in the same page, will find some account of Mr. Law, in "Recreations historiques, critiques, morales, GENT. MAG. October, 1764.

"& d'erudition. Paris, 1767." 12mo.

P. 682. Tindal's Testament was purchased, at Ames's sale in 1760, by Mr. John White, of Newgate Street, at the price mentioned, and, some years after, sold by him to Dr. Gifford for 20 guineas, as mentioned in p. 458.

Your curious repository, Mr. Urban, may possibly preserve the following slight particulars, which I doubt not but many of your readers will be glad to see snatched from oblivion. They are copied from original MSS. of the last century.

In 1668 there was a lottery of books, in which were 16,840 tickets. The prizes to be advertized in the Gazette, as soon as ready. Among the books were several "Imperial and Royal Bibles," Tempest's Ovid, Æsop in folio, with a second edition of Æsop of Mr. Ogleby's own invention, and the China book, both excellent books, never yet extant, the whole impression being vended this way, and never like to be printed again.

Pierce Tempest lived next door to the Eagle and Child, in the Strand, over-against Somerset House Water Gate. In an order to him, from York, dated Aug. 1692, he is directed to send "2 dozen of 4d. prints, 1 dozen of 9d. ones, and one dozen of 12d. ones, which (his correspondent says) he would have postures, but none of your bawdy ones." See more of him in Granger, II. 551. 4to.

The following short letter, addressed "To Mr. Adam Barker," was written by an executor to the famous Hobbes, who had formerly been employed as his amanuensis:

"Hardwick, July 9, 1700.

"MR. BARKER,

"According to your earnest desire, I have sent you some of Mr. Hobbes's own handwriting, towards the latter end of his time; but it is not fit to shew to any body; for his hand was so much given to shaking, for many years before he died, that he was ashamed his writing should be seen, so burned most of his own hand. With my kind respects, I remain your very loving friend,

JAMES WILKINSON."

MR. URBAN,

I HAVE sent you a Scale of Natural Beings, which I should be glad any of your correspondents would improve or correct. If any one is offended at finding the monkey so near to ourselves, I beg he would observe, that we consider man here merely as an animal, not as a rational or moral being. Swift gave much offence by his Voyage to the Houyhnhnms, because his design was totally misunderstood; and our unbounded folly and selfishness make us offended at whatever is designed to correct our vices or failings. P. B. C.

Gave

A SCALE OF NATURAL BEINGS.

MAN.	Shell Fish.	Slate.
Orang-Outang.	Scorpions.	Stones.
Monkeys.	Moths.	Figured Stones.
QUADRUPEDS.	INSECTS.	Crystallisations.
Flying Squirrel.	Gall Insects.	Salts.
Bat.	Toenia, or Tape-Worm.	Vitriols.
Ostrich.	Polypes.	Metals.
BIRDS.	ZOOPHYTES.	Semi-metals†.
Water-Birds.	Sensitive Plants.	Sulphurs.
Amphibious Birds.	VEGETABLES.	Bitumens.
Flying Fish.	Liverworts.	Earths.
FISH*.	Mushrooms.	Pure Earth.
Eels.	Truffles.	Water.
Water Snakes.	LITHOPHYTES.	Air.
Serpents.	Asbestos.	Fire.
Naked Snails, or Slugs.	Talc, Gypsum, Selenites.	Substances more subtila.
Snails.

MR. URBAN, Noel Street, Oct. 23.

YOUR correspondent, who imagines he has discovered "a notable mistake or misrepresentation" in the Genealogical Table of the Family of De Ferrars (see Sept. Mag. p. 651), has both mistaken and misrepresented his author Burton, in whose Description of Leicestershire, p. 37, is a pedigree of the Quincies Earls of Winchester, from which your correspondent has given an extract, in which he has misrepresented the original, by inserting the word youngest; whereas Burton has not specified either the youngest or eldest of the coheirs; and has placed Elizabeth (who really was the youngest) before her sisters, merely for the purpose of making the line of descent more uniform than it would have appeared if he had placed those coheiresses according to their priority of birth; of which there is another instance in the pedigree of Boiville, p. 273, and again in that of Nele, p. 224, besides others, where he has placed the daughters before their brothers, to whom they became heirs.

To prove that Margaret, who married the Earl of Derby, was the eldest daughter and coheir of Roger de Quincy, Earl of Winchester, the following authorities may be sufficient.

Camden's Britannia, in Hampshire, speaking of the said Roger Earl of Winchester, says, "He married the eldest daughter and one of the coheirs of Alan, Lord of Galloway in Scotland, and had by her three only daughters; the first married to William de Ferraris, Earl of Derby, the second to Alan de la Zouch, the third to Comine Earl of Buchanan in Scotland."

Milles, in his Catalogue of Honor, p. 875, says, "Margaret, eldest daughter and one of the heirs of Roger Quincy, Earle of Winchester," &c. And at p. 957, speaking of the issue of Roger Earl of Winchester, "Margaret, eldest daughter and coheir [wife] of William de Ferrars Earle of Ferrars and Derby, who by her had the barony of Groby in dowry; Hellen, second daughter and coheir, wife of Alan Lord De la Zouch, of Ashby De la Zouch, in Leicestershire; Elizabeth, third daughter and coheir, wife of Alexander Comyn, Earle of Buchhaine."

Brooke's Catalogue of the Nobility, p. 240, mentioning these coheiresses, says, "Margaret, the eldest, was married to William de Ferrars, Earl of Derby, with the barony of Groby; Hellen, the second daughter, was married to Alan Lord Zouch, of Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire; and Elizabeth, the third daughter, was

* Whales, and other cetaceus fish, form the connecting link between quadrupeds and fish; as frogs, toads, and other reptiles, do between quadrupeds and serpents.

† Zinc is the connecting link between the metals and semi-metals; and black-lead, or wadd, connects these with the sulphurs. Innumerable points of union of the same kind may be observed in all parts of nature.

"married to Alexander Comyn, Earl of Buchan in Scotland." So Vincent asserts.

Dugdale's Baronage, vol. I. p. 688, has, "Roger de Quincy, Earl of Winchester, departed this life 25 April 1148 Henry III. leaving issue, by Helles, his first wife, three daughters, his heirs, viz. Margaret, the wife of William de Ferrars, Earl of Derby; Elizabeth, married to Alexander Comyn, Earl of Bouhan in Scotland; and Ela to Alan la Zousche."

To these might be added, the authority of several ancient and authentic MSS. should the above be not fully sufficient to prove the correctness of the Genealogy in your Magazine for June last. Yours, &c. B. L.

P. S. I have seen a copy of Burton's Leicestershire, with MS. notes of the last century, in which these coheirresses are numbered 3. 2. 1. with a pen.

MR. URBAN,

IN regard to the fable or story of Bellerophon, who, in my opinion, was thought, by some of the ancients, to have ascended into heaven, though not by all, and then cited, in proof of it, a passage from an anonymous author, who wrote ἡρώδης ἀριστοῦ (see vol. LIII. p. 751), your learned correspondent P. Q. endeavours to invalidate that evidence, by observing (see p. 495) that the quotation "explains away the ascent of Bellerophon into heaven [by making it] to be only a flight thither by astronomical contemplation." I reply, and, as I trust, both to yours and the gentleman's satisfaction, that a physical or moral interpretation of a fable always supposes such fable to have been currently received in the country, since otherwise it would be the explanation of nothing, and not a foot to stand upon. Very many theological and mythological particulars have had physical or moral meanings put upon them by the later Greeks, and such glosses as clearly demonstrate to us that such particulars had been formerly believed, as the very passages in Homer or Hesiod, or any other mythological author concerning them, do. Wherefore, when the anonymous Greek author tells us the flight of Bellerophon into heaven was to be understood in a figurative sense, and only meant that this hero had been a great astronomer, his passage fully proves the point I wanted to establish, viz. that in his country the common opinion was, that Bellerophon had literally ascended thither. The consequence is, that my argument is substantial, and the proof sufficient to the purpose it is adduced for, though the anonymous Greek author is pleased to give the fable of Bellerophon's ascent a refined allegorical turn. Yours, &c. T. Row.

MR. URBAN,

AS Mr. Hasted has not preserved the inscription on a plain marble tablet set up over the South door of Westerham church to the memory of Gen. Wolfe, I send it to you.

JAMES, son of Colonel EDWARD WOLFE, was born in this parish Jan. 2, 1727, and died in America, Sept. 13, 1759.

CONQUEROR OF QUEBEC.

Whilst George in frow bow his laurel'd head,

And bids the artist grace the soldier dead,
We raise no sculptur'd trophy to thy name
Brave youth! the fairest in the list of fame!
Proud of thy birth, we boast th' auspicious year;

Struck with thy fall, we shed a general tear;
With humble grief inscribe one artless stone,
And from thy matchless honour date our own.

I Decus! I nostrum!

I could wish your correspondent from Montrose would be more particular as to the various superstitions which he says there are concerning the Rantry or Roddan-tree. He will probably confirm the elucidation of the passage in Macbeth, which I saw lately, and I thought I had seen it in your Miscellany, but I cannot find it there. The passage I mean is where the witch mentions the sailor's wife speaking to her.

"Strive thee witch!"

This has puzzled the commentators; but is explained by saying that the Rauntree, or Rantry, is in the North considered as a preservative against witches, and that this was probably written

"I've Rauntree, witch!" or,

"A Rauntree, witch!"

that is, you cannot come near me, cannot hurt me, I have Rauntree to protect me.

It is to be hoped this gentleman will favour you with some more synonyms.

Yours, &c. S. H.

MR. URBAN, Berkshire, Aug. 16.

GIVE me leave to communicate to T. C. my approbation of the plan he has suggested for promoting the knowledge of natural history. I think, with him, that his scheme will be of great use, and and it will also be the means of recording, in your work, for the information of posterity, the present denominations of various birds, beasts, &c. &c. that, perhaps, a hundred years hence, will be totally changed. It is not in my power to give him much assistance; but I will contribute something towards encouraging his design, by collecting a few appellations of the nature he mentions, as are local in this County; at present I will only observe, that ox-eye is a common name for the greater tom-tit here; and that the two lesser ones, besides the general name of tom-tit, are known, one by the appellation of blue-bottle, and the other by that of tom-tub; the former of these names takes rise from the blue head of that bird, and the other from the shape of the tom-tub's nest, which is built nearly in the form of a cask. I refer T. C. for further particulars of these birds; to Albin's Natural History, where they are all three very exactly delineated, only he must take notice that it is an hen ox-eye that Albin has drawn, the cock being somewhat different. The plates are Nos 46, 47, 48.

Perhaps the sumart is the animal we know here by the name of the stout, though very improperly called so, being, I believe, the smallest beast we have except the mouse: it partakes of the nature of the weasel, and is said to be equally inimical to poultry; it is preyed on by the cats in common with other vermin.

I suppose Moggy-with-the-many-feet is our hundred-legs, or the mille-pedes.

Yours, &c.

RAYMUND.

MR. URBAN, Montrose, July 24.

PLEASE to make the following amendments on the letter I sent you relative to Scotch and English names.

After the bird land-rail, corn-craik, [see p. 506.] insert: "Lapwing with us the teuchat."

At the bird clocheret say, "or stone-chatter." And after the insect horn-golach add, "This last is, I believe, in England, called the earwig." T. C.

 These amendments came not to hand till the former letter was printed. We now add the following additional corrections.

P. 506, col. i. l. 41, for "The Great Turn," read "The Great Tern."

— l. 45, for ορομαλο-ποταί, read ορομαλο-ποταί.

— l. ult. for "and Havour Crows,

"Hoody Crows, and Corbies, correspond with the English Crows, Ravens, &c." read "and bow our Crows, Hoody Crows, and Corbies, correspond with the English Crows, Ravens, &c."

The sumart, I assure you, is a much larger and fiercer animal than the weasel. Whether it be the pole-cat, I have not yet been able to learn. T. C.

MR. URBAN,

OZ. 20.

A LOVER of antiquity begs that your learned correspondents will answer the following query: Who was the Lord Ross mentioned in Shakespeare's play of Richard II. who joined the Duke of Lancaster (afterwards Henry IV.), with Lord Willoughby, against the King? Lord Willoughby was certainly Willoughby of Eresby; but who was Lord Ross? R.

MR. URBAN,

OZ. 8.

ABOUT the year 1770, two children (twins), supposed to be the sons of some person of fashion, were sent to the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL by an eminent physician and man-midwife, lately deceased, who paid with them the sum of 200l. One of these children died at the age of five years; the other became insane about a year and a half ago, and was admitted into ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, from whence he was lately discharged uncured. If the father or mother of this poor boy be still living, and this account should chance to reach them, the writer of it indulges himself with the pleasing hope that it may be the means of inducing them to seek out and relieve so melancholy an object.

A CONSTANT READER.

MR. URBAN, Jamaica, May 18.

FROM your regard to literary justice, I assure myself you will not be displeased at my requesting you to inform the public, that the epitaph on Mr. Zachary Bayly, given in your Magazine for 1781, p. 39, as the production of Dr. Goldsmith, was written by Dr. Hawkesworth †. I inclose a corrected copy of that epitaph, and of another, on the same monument, by the same hand.

Yours, &c.

T. W.

* The sumart is undoubtedly the pole-cat. See Ray's Collection of Northern Words. It is still in use. R. G.

† This circumstance has been already pointed out by a correspondent in vol. LI

NEAR

NEAR this place lie the remains of the Honourable ZACHARY BAYLY, Esq.
Custos and chief magistrate of the precinct of St. Mary and St. George, and one of his Majesty's Honourable Privy Council in this island, who died Dec. 18,
1769, in the 48th year of his age.

He was a man to whom the endowments of nature rendered those of art superfluous.
He was wise,
without the assistance of recorded wisdom;
and eloquent,
beyond the precepts of scholastic rhetoric.
He applied not to books, but to men;
and drank knowledge not from the stream,
but the source.
To genius,
which might have been fortunate without diligence,
He added diligence,
which, without genius, might have commanded fortune.
He acquired wealth with honour,
and seemed to possess it only to be liberal.
His public spirit was not less ardent than his private benevolence.
He considered individuals as his brethren,
and his country as a parent.
May his talents be remembered with respect,
his virtues with emulation!

Here also lies,
mingled with the same earth, the dust of
NATHANIEL ZACHARY EDWARDS, his nephew,
in whom distinguished abilities,
and an amiable disposition, assisted by such an example, gave the promise of equal excellence; when,
on the 28th of January, 1771, in the 20th year of his age,
he paid the debt of nature.
His surviving brother,
BRYAN EDWARDS,
inscribes this stone,
as a memorial of his Gratitude, Affection, and Esteem.

MR. URBAN, Oct. 10.
AS the winter approaches, I shall have leisure to digest the notes that have lain by me some time for want of an opportunity to digest them; and,
with your leave, will pursue my plan of pointing out curiosities in London that are not sufficiently known, by beginning with GERARD'S INN HALL.

This Hall, where Mr. Gisors, when Lord Mayor of London, used to transact the business of the city, is now made use of as a cellar to an Inn, known by the name of Gerard's Hall, in Basinglane. You descend 18 steps in that part belonging to the Inn, that lead you to the entrance of the Hall, which is a curious building, having a stone roof supported by pillars, and a floor paved with extraordinary hard white bricks.

The length of the Hall, in that part of the Inn, is about 18 feet, and the breadth about 21 feet. The roof, in perspective, resembles much that of a church.

There are 9 pillars in this part of the building; 7 of which are fixed, and serve as supporters to the walls, and 2 central ones, that measure about 3 feet in circumference.

The pillars are about 14 1-half feet in height; and the Hall is about 16 feet in height from the floor to the roof.

The Hall runs from North to South;
the West side fronting the Inn yard.

On the right hand, at the bottom of the stairs leading to this Hall, through a narrow brick arched passage, is an entrance into the burying vault under Bread-street church.

There are two pair of stairs from Basing-lane that lead into that part of the Hall belonging to Mr. Harvey, glover, in Cornhill, one pair of 13, and the other of 16 steps, measuring about 7 inches deep each step of the latter pair; and a pair of winding stairs, of 19 steps, that lead into the Inn yard, to which there is a door of entrance, now nailed up. There are 8 pillars in this part, 2 of which are central ones.

The length of this part of the Hall is 16 feet, to the foot of the stairs leading into Basing-lane.

One part of the Inn is built over this Hall, and a house in Basing-lane is built over that part of it belonging to Mr. Harvey.

The whole length of both parts of the Hall is 34 feet.

A LONDON ANTIQUARY.

P. S. I have been favoured lately with the sight of an impression in in-glass of the seal of St. Anthony's Hospital in London*, about the size of a half-crown, representing St. Anthony supporting the cross, and preaching the Gospel to a numerous congregation—under St. Anthony a pig—legend,

✠ *Sigill' Mag'ri & Frat'nitatis D'ni
Sc'i Antoni London.*

The seal itself is supposed to be in some gentleman's hands in Nottinghamshire.

* A drawing would be acceptable. EDIT.
MR.

MR. URBAN, Malton, Aug. 7.

I NCLOSE you an exact drawing of a ring [see fig. 2. of our miscellaneous plate] found a few years ago in this neighbourhood. It has the appearance of great antiquity, and in the opinion of some people is Druidical. It will give me pleasure to see it inserted in your useful Magazine, in hopes of its receiving an explanation from some of your ingenious correspondents.

Yours, &c. A. BEAMONT.

MR. URBAN, Lincoln, Aug. 6.

THE inclosed is an exact representation of a ring lately found in making a grave in the church-yard at Wragby, in Lincolnshire. It is of solid silver, weighing six pennyweights and one grain, and is exactly an inch in diameter. It is ornamented with a quatrefoil, and an inscription or motto beginning with the word JESUS. [See the plate, fig. 3]. The middle part, as appears in the drawing, is nearly obliterated, but possibly, by the assistance of the remaining letters, which are accurately delineated, some of your ingenious correspondents may be able to make out the whole of the inscription, the time in which it was made, and the use to which it was applied. X. Y. Z.

MR. URBAN, Blackbeath, Sept. 9.

THE inclosed ring [see fig. 4.] was found near Bouchier-hall, in the parish of Halsted, co. Essex, which was formerly the residence of the Bouchiers Earls of Essex. The coin which accompanies it (a jetton, I presume) was dug up at Braintree in the same county. Yours, &c. A GOFFER.

MR. URBAN, Cobham, Sept. 12.

IN trenching up a spot of land, the site of a farm house (in this parish) taken down in the year 1686, and which land had not been cultivated till the month of March last; a coin, computed to be about two thirds gold, and weighing 29 grains, was thrown up. [See fig. 6.] I should be obliged to any of your correspondents who can inform me of what nature it is. B. H.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 24.

I SEND you an impression of a seal-ring dug up a few years ago in Berkshire, and when first found was hung on an iron ring along with a key, but the two latter articles mouldered immediately to dust on being exposed to the air. The seal-ring, being made of brass, has been more durable, and is in almost perfect preservation. It is very heavy and clumsy, large enough to go on a thick man's thumb, and very little worn. Perhaps some one of your numerous correspondents may be able to explain the marks. VALERIC.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 22.

THE inclosed drawing [fig. 8.] represents a coffin dug up a few years ago in the church-yard of Swinford in Leicestershire. No lid or covering was found with it; but a few bones in it. It lay on the south side, the head towards the steeple, and the narrow end a considerable way under the foundation of the church porch. The ancient lords of Swinford were the Malorys; whence by females it came jointly to the *Vincent*s and the Caves.

The part of the Caves descended to Sir Thomas Andrews, of Cherwelton, co. Northampton. Of the Vincent family was Augustine, the Rouge croix poursuivant, whose son John is in Burton called "son and heire," against which is written, in a copy now before me, "of nihil." The estate seems to have gone by a female to the Mulsbos.

I wish some of your Leicestershire correspondents would send you a drawing, or at least a description, of a curious tomb placed within these two or three years in the church-yard of Burton Lazars, in memory of a weaver, who left the greater part of the fortune he acquired to the erecting of a monument for himself. It would be kind also if Mr. Bickerstaffe, or any other friend at Leicester, would explain why on a flat stone in the church of St. Martin in that town, a particular person (whose name I do not recollect) is called "prebendarius hujus ecclesie." Was St. Martin's ever a collegiate church?

I have been informed, that, in the town-library at Henley, there are some unpublished MSS. of Bishop Atterbury, and should be glad to have it ascertained what they are.

A CONSTANT READER.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 22.

AS your valuable and useful miscellany seems to be the proper channel for giving and obtaining information upon all questions of antiquity, and the like; permit me to recommend a subject of enquiry to your numerous readers, which some of them will undoubtedly be well qualified to consider and satisfy. You

7311

Gent. Mag. Oct. 1764.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

Fig. 8.

Fig. 6.

Fig. 7.

You well know, that in the month of February, every year, a list is published in the Gazette of "Sheriffs appointed by his Majesty in Council;" this list contains the names of thirty-five sheriffs for thirty-six counties, one person serving the office for the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon, as was the custom in respect to the counties of Essex and Hertford till 9 Eliz. and probably in respect to other counties also. This then being the case, there are four counties in England whose sheriffs are appointed in a different manner, viz. Middlesex, and the three northern counties of Durham, Westmorland, and Lancaster*.

With respect to the sheriffalty of Middlesex, it is well known that King Henry I. granted it to the citizens of London, in consideration of their paying into the Exchequer a fee-farm rent of 300l yearly, which grant was confirmed and enlarged by his great-grandson King John, of sagacious memory: and what a liberal and proper use those worthy citizens made of their grant we frequently see in their nominating the lame, the blind, and the dying, to serve the office, with the very laudable design of picking their pockets; and, once within these twenty years, I think I remember hearing that they had nominated a man who at the time of nomination was actually dead.

The sheriff of the county of Durham is appointed by the Lord Bishop, as Count Palatine, for the time being: and that office is now held by Sir Hedworth Williamson, of Monk Wermouth, Bart. who has been continued in it by the Bishops Butler, Trevor, and Egerton, ever since his first appointment by Bishop Chandler upon the death of his father, the late Sir William Williamson, May 5, 1747, who had held it from about the year 1723, when he was appointed by Bishop Talbot.

The sheriffalty of Westmorland appears to have been hereditary in the family of John de Vipont, a Baron of great note, who died 25 Henry III. leaving issue Robert, who was killed at the battle of Evesham, August 4, 1265, whose eldest daughter and coheir, Idonca, carried the office into the family of Clifford, by marrying the Hon.

Roger de Clifford, son and heir of Roger fourth Lord Clifford, in whose family it continued for many generations, till it at length descended, with the baronies, to Lady Anne, sole daughter and heiress of George seventeenth Lord Clifford and third Earl of Cumberland, who was married to Richard third Earl of Dorset, by whom she had issue Lady Margaret, who at length became sole heiress, and was married to John second Earl of Thanet, in consequence of which that family had undisputed possession of the baronies and the office, till the death of Thomas the sixth Earl, on July 30, 1729, without male issue: since that time the baronies have been severed from the earldom of Thanet; and, on Feb. 26, 1775, were confirmed on Edward Southwell, Esq. grandson and heir of Lady Katharine Tufton, eldest daughter of the said Earl Thomas, who married Edward Lord Viscount Sondes, by whom she had one daughter, of her own name, married to Edward Southwell, of King's Weston, in co. Glouc. Esq.; but the office of sheriff of Westmorland still continues to be exercised by the Earl of Thanet, who is grandson to a younger brother of the aforesaid sixth Earl, though, as the baronies and the office descended from the same family, and were, I presume, held by the same tenure, I do not understand how they can legally be severed from each other.

And now, Mr. Urban, having endeavoured to give you a satisfactory account of the sheriffs of Middlesex, Durham, and Westmorland, permit me to confess my ignorance in respect to the sheriff of Lancashire, and to request, of some of your correspondents, information who he is, and in what manner appointed.

Your publication of my paper upon the absurdities of some peerages, in p. 576 & seq. of August Magazine, is in general correct: but in p. 577, col. 1, l. 16, I wrote 'a wise government,' and in col. 2, l. 7, I wrote 'on the other side.' As to Lord Kensington, I know full well that Kensington is not in Ireland; but I believe his Lordship has some property in that kingdom—therefore I did not insert his name. In answer to your question, stating a doubt whether some of my new creations have not been only advancements to higher titles, I say most incontrovertibly, no: there either immediately is, or ultimately will be, an addition of twelve new peerages, viz.

1. Lord

* The sheriff of Cornwall should also be added, as he is appointed by the Prince of Wales, when of age, in right of his duchy. EDITOR.

1. Lord Camelford; 2. Lord Lovaine, for Lord Algernon Percy; 3. Lord Carteret; 4. Lord Eliot; 5. Earl of Lonsdale; 6. Lord Bulkeley; 7. Lord Grey of Wilton; 8. Lord Sommers; 9. Lord Borindon; 10. Lord Berwick; 11. Lord Sherborne; and 12. Earl of Norwich.

Yours, &c.

E.

Some Account of STOCKTON, in the County of Durham.

STOCKTON is pleasantly situated upon the banks of the Tees, about four leagues (following the course of the river) from its mouth. A little to the S. E. of the town, a fine stone bridge, consisting of five elliptical arches, crosses the river; and from hence a spacious winding road leads, by a very easy ascent, to the town. At the end of this road the principal street (running nearly north and south, in the middle of which stands the town-hall, a handsome stone column, excellent inclosed shambles for butcher's meat, &c.) affords a prospect which can scarcely be excelled in beauty by any town view. An elegant engraving of this view will shortly be presented to the public by that eminent artist Mr. Pollard. The whole town is well paved, and kept extremely clean; and, though there is little doubt of its being a very ancient place, it is so full of elegant modern houses that scarce a building in it bears the stamp of antiquity except an old house in the market-place (the property of Rowland Burdon, Esq. of Newcastle). The upper part of this building projects considerably further into the street than the lower part, and rests upon two pillars of variegated marble, which tradition and some old manuscripts report to have supported a gallery in a castle which formerly stood near this town, belonging to the Bishop of Durham, where King John signed the charter of Newcastle upon Tyne; some small remains of this castle may be seen in a field at the south end of the town, by the side of the bridge road, which still retains the name of The Castle Field, as the adjacent grounds are called the Park, &c. These are now part of the demesne lands of the Bishop of Durham.

The church, a large and neat brick building, adorned with rustic quoins of free-stone, was finished in 1712; before that time a chapel stood here, which (though then too small) had at former periods been large enough for the inhabitants. Dr. Smith, prebendary of Durham, preached a sermon at the consecration of the new church (Aug. 21, 1712), from Matthew, chap. xxi. ver. 9 "Hosanna to the son of David." This sermon was printed, and dedicated to "the right worshipful the Mayor, Recorder, and Aldermen, with the rest of the inhabitants of the ancient corporation of Stockton." Towards the conclusion of his dedication the Dr. prays, that "their corporation may go on to flourish and increase till their church be again too little for them;" and it seems as if his prayer had been heard, for a chapel of ease would now be a useful appendage to their very capacious church. Though the majority of the inhabitants are of the established church, there is a great number of dissenters of various kinds amongst them; but so great are the politeness and liberality of sentiment which generally prevail here, that a person is seldom despised or ridiculed on account of his religious tenets, so that people of all professions mingle together with the utmost cordiality.

Here are two markets in the week, on Wednesday and Saturday (but Wednesday is the chief market-day), well supplied with provisions of every kind, which are generally sold at more moderate prices than in any other market-town in the neighbourhood. Abundance of fine large salmon are caught here: one taken this season measured four feet two inches in length, two feet four inches in breadth, and weighed three stone five pounds and a half. After the town is supplied, those which remain are carried by the fish machines to York, Leeds, &c. The ale brewed here is highly esteemed by the lovers of that liquor. Much sail-cloth is manufactured; and many ships, greatly admired for their beauty and strength, are built here; a company of gentlemen are likewise engaged in the business of sugar refining. Several ships are constantly employed by the merchants of this place in the London trade; they also carry on a traffic with Holland, Norway, &c.; their exports, consisting chiefly of lead, corn, butter, pork, &c. are very considerable. A charity-school, for the educating and cloathing twenty boys and fifteen girls, is supported by the donations and subscriptions of the inhabitants. This town is about 240 miles north of London, and 21 south of Durham. Sept. 14, 1784.

BIOGRAPHICAL ANECDOTES OF THE LATE LEARNED ABBE WINKELMAN.

(Concluded from p. 671.)

1763. "I Have obtained the place of president of the Antiquities at Rome, void by the death of the abbé Venuti; and they have given me a place in the Vatican worth 50 crowns a year, under pretence of arranging the German MSS. but with a view to fix me here in order to give me the first writer's place that offers. I have now an income of 320 crowns per annum. They have begun to form in the Vatican a museum of profane curiosities, which will be ready this summer, and the direction of it is promised me.

"A Mosaic has been found at Pompeii with the artist's name; and near Albano a magnificent vase; a fine head of Hadrian; and several other fragments. And the prince Altieri, to whom they belong, sends me word a statue is just found.

"More is dug up here in a month than at Naples in a year. I have now one foot in the Vatican, and expect the first vacant place there. I am to have by the pope's brief that of one of the writers, who is 74, and cannot hold out long. I am to make a catalogue of the Greek MSS. which is wanting; and then a general catalogue of the MSS. in that language in the Vatican.

"When we suspect an Imperial medal to be counterfeit, we send for a man, to whom we have given the name of Cacia-ruolo, because his original profession was to sell cheese, and he knows every thing. As to the Greek medals, where beauty is the principal object, it is very difficult, and on this head I consider myself qualified to judge. It is only with Imperial medals that we are deceived, and not with Greek ones. A perfect knowledge of medals cannot be acquired out of Rome.

"I have received the melancholy news that my best and most intimate friend at Rome, the abbé Ruggieri, keeper of the imperial library, and superintendant of the printing-office de la Propaganda, has put an end to his life in the English fashion, with a pistol.

1765. "On occasion of the letter of lady [Wortley] Montagu, which M. Fufesli has given me, he mentions this lady's son, because I was particularly acquainted with him. He confounds him, however, with lord Baltimore, whom I likewise knew. It was the latter, and not the former, who came to Rome, where he went but seldom out of his chamber, but gave himself up entirely to chemistry, and filled one case after another with wretched drugs. Montagu, as we all know, was disinherited by his father and mother, who left all their fortune to his sister lady Bute, whose son [Lord Mountstuart] is now at Rome with Mr. Mallet, a Genevese, author of a History of Denmark. But both had good reason for what they did, as his conduct seems to prove. At Alexandria he got acquainted with the Danish consul, who had a very handsome wife. Under various pretences, he engaged the husband to go to Holland; some time after he shewed a feigned letter mentioning the consul's death, and married his wife, whom he now carries with him into Syria. Not long after, the Danish resident at Constantinople received from the Texel advice of the supposed dead consul, so that Montagu is not safe in any of the Grand Signor's dominions. He had written to me from Alexandria.

1767. "I had determined to go into Sicily, to get drawings of painted vases; but I must put off this voyage, because the emperor, the grand duke of Tuscany, and the queen of Spain, are to come to Rome in September, for a fortnight. They will lodge in the cardinal's villa, because the queen will not enter Rome, and will continue her journey after a day's rest. The emperor's marshal de logis is arrived. They have engaged 450 horses, and 400 beds; and all the villas of the Porta Salerna are appropriated to the suite of these illustrious travellers.

"I have discovered the villa of Vedrus Pollio, where the slave was condemned to be eaten by lampreys, and this ancient pond serves as a proof of my discoveries. This villa is at the extreme point of Pausilipo, accessible only by water. I have there found a beautiful bas relief, which, for the singularity of its subject, I keep for the 3d volume of my monuments.

"The first* volume of Mr. Stuart's Antiquities of Greece [Athens] is arrived, but is as little liked at Rome as in England; for the whole of this great volume contains only little things, as the tower of the winds; all the figures of which are spread on great leaves, so that it is easy to see the aim was to make a great book—Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.

"The university of Oxford has sent the cardinal a present of a new edition of the Marmora Oxoniensia, a magnificent work of little use. Little is added to what is already in the second edition of the Marmora Arundelia, except a fine statue. The inscriptions, however, are in the new edition; but without the learned explanations of Selden, Prideaux, and Maittaire. I have engaged the cardinal to employ your friend Clerisseau, with the design and decoration of his magnificent hall."

* When is the second to appear?

1765. "The Marquis Galliani has published at Naples a scandalous tract against my 'Letter on the Discovery of Herculaneum;' so wretchedly written, that the Marquis Tannucci, secretary of state, obliged him to suppress it. I hope to have my revenge in the preface to my 'Monuments,' which work, I flatter myself, will humble the pride of the Antiquary of the Portici Museum. The pope has bought for the capitol, for 13,000 crowns, the Mosaic of the Centaurs, with the pigeons formerly in Cardinal Funtana's museum, and thought to be mentioned in Pliny, N. H. XXXVI. 60. Jenkins's Venus has been sent to the king of England. On a close examination, it appears that a leg and 2 arms are modern; the head is of another Venus, and of superior workmanship to the body. An antique has been found at Roma Vecchia, a beautiful landscape, 6 palms long, exceeding in beauty every thing of the kind in the museum of Herculaneum; the cardinal, my master, has secured it, and it will probably appear in my Monuments, because a building in it will suggest to me some observations.

"If Mengs can stay three years in Spain, and the king lives, he has the promise of being allowed to return to Rome with his family, to paint there in oil for his majesty.

"The celebrated Wilkes, with whom I was particularly intimate, has lost all his papers, letters, and 'History of England from the Revolution,' by a pretty Bolognese dancer*, whom he carried with him from Paris, and who set off in an English felucca, with design, doubtless, to deliver up her stolen goods to the court of London. 'Tis said that the famous Montagu has been impaled in Turkey for a horrible act, of which all the circumstances are known to me.

1767. "Baron Reidesel, in a letter from Messina, gives me so particular and exact a description of the ruins of the temple of Jupiter at Girgenti, that I see all former travellers who visited the spot were blind. By this description it is easy to explain the whole passage in Diodorus Siculus, which has hitherto appeared obscure and unintelligible. He speaks highly in praise of the hospitality of the Sicilians; so much does the reception one meets with depend on the temper of the traveller. The English, who are just the contrary of baron Reidesel's Sicilians, enter houses like so many fish [comme des perches], their heads and eyes blinded with spleen, like people unacquainted with the pleasures of life, and strangers to joy. How can a host take any delight with these cold silent souls! I was lately in company with some Englishmen, among whom was lord [Robert] Spencer, brother to the duke of Marlborough. Not one of these gentlemen smiled during the three hours we were together.

"I am preparing for my third volume, to be printed at my return from Germany and Switzerland. I keep a regular correspondence with Mr. Hamilton, the English minister at Naples, to which city I am going after Easter.

"Among the different things that have appeared here, is a small copper medal, very curious. On one side the name Virgilius Maro is very legible; the letters are round the head of that poet, of which there is but a faint trace [que l'indice.]. On the reverse are the letters E. P. O. This medal, which has been sent to my cardinal, is the only one in the world; and, had the head been well preserved, we should have had a portrait of Virgil. I have received the first proofs of Mr. Hamilton's great work of vases, which is to appear in two months. When I go to Naples, I shall consider of new instructions about the new discoveries at Pompeii, of which I have received good drawings by M. d'Hancarville.

"The Marquis Tannucci, to whom I have sent a fine copy of my work well bound, has answered me with much kindness, and assured me that he takes no part in the discontents that have arisen about my letter on the antiquities of Herculaneum [see p. 669], so that peace is re-established there.

"In Mr. Hamilton's great work of vases, that minister has directed M. d'Hancarville to insert the following passage. 'On this article consult abbé Winkelman's Preliminary Discourse to his excellent work just published, intitled, Monumenti Inediti. To this author we shall frequently refer, because we are persuaded that unless we copy him we cannot express ourselves so well, and we consider his book, which contains the most solid and best reasoning on the art of the ancients, as equally satisfactory to scholars and men of taste, as well as best qualified to perfect that of the moderns.' This work, all the plates of which are engraved, will make four volumes folio. The first is now in hand, and Mr. Hamilton sends me the plates as fast as they are worked off*.

* This particular had been mentioned in a former letter. See p. 573. Ed. 8.

"I am preparing for a tour to Sicily, with a draughtsman, to take the finest of the 700 earthen vases at Catanea, where I shall leave him while I go on to Syracuse. The evil spirit torments me already with the idea of reaching Greece; and M. Reidesel, more powerful than the devil himself, leaves me no rest. I flatter myself, nobody can make this voyage with more experience and knowledge than myself.

1768. "Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton are coming to Rome: I hope baron Reidesel will accompany them, if he does not go to Constantinople.

"There is shortly to appear in Holland a 4to volume, intituled, 'De l'Usage des Statues †; the author is coun Gualco, canon of Tournay in Flanders. This good man never heard of me, or my book; and that, after he had read elsewhere, that nobody knew what he was going to say. Now he has read my proposal, he is quite dispirited, for the greatest part of his work is printed.

1766. "Cavaceppi has bought three caryatides, 11 palms high, well preserved, found some time ago in an hill of vineyards beyond Cupo di Bove. Jenkins has bought the two beautiful candlesticks of the Barberini palace; but the duty of my office requires that I should oppose this sale made to a stranger by my superiors. My portrait cannot be prefixed to my work, for this would be justly considered as a foolish vanity in me, seeing I am myself the editor.

* M. d'Hancarville, the editor, took an opportunity soon after the death of M. Winkelman, in the second volume of the work, to pay a public tribute to the memory of this learned man in the ancient style. On a separate leaf added to the title he engraved a columbarium, in the middle of which was a sarcophagus, inscribed

D. M.
Joan. Winkelman,
Vir opt. amic. cariss.
Pet. d'Hancarville
Dilecti fecit
Orco Peregrino.

† It was printed at Brussels, 1768, in quarto, with this title, "De l'usage des Statues chez les Anciens. Essai Historique" 502 pp.

1767. "Madame Mengs, five of her daughters, and a son, are hourly expected here from Spain. The reason I know not, for our correspondence has been suspended these two years.

"There has been discovered, in a villa behind Monte Testaccio, a room 15 palms long, with a pavement of beautiful Mosaic, which unfortunately had been repaired with pieces of white marble most irregularly put together, and evidently a work of the later ages. To get at this chamber, it was necessary to dig through a thickness of 10 palms of the broken tiles and pots, of which the hill is composed. All these particulars are of consequence, not only as they serve to support the opinion of those who, from a medallion of Adrian found last century in digging a cellar under this hill, suppose it to have been formed in the time of the emperors of the third century, but also as they may serve to authorise an opinion that this hill is of a still later date, since it covers noble habitations, and habitations repaired so coarsely, that it carries the marks of the times of the later emperors.

"In demolishing last autumn the circuit wall of a villa out of the Latin gate, it appeared to be formed of a considerable collection of very beautiful reliefs in terra cotta, among which I distinguished three similar impressions, representing Argus building the ship Argo, and Minerva sitting and unfurling the sails, and fastening them to the yards, assisted by Typhys the pilot. I have engraved this valuable piece, which was purchased by cardinal Albani, in the frontispiece of my first volume.

1766. "An Englishman named *Vil-lebrain, has made the tour of Sicily, accompanied by an able Scotch architect, Mr. Byres. These two travellers made antiquities their object, and have carefully examined those at Corneto, in the country of the ancient Tarquinenses. They penetrated into the heart of the island, to search for the remains of the ancient Enna, but found only a square tower built by the Saracens.

"The more I reflect on the use you have made of Norden, to prove that the passage of Strabo refers only to ancient monuments and tombs, and not to quarries of basaltas, as Agricola falsely thought, the more I think you have made a happy discovery in antiquity. Read Pococke. He tells you nothing on

PART I.

Coronation Anthem: "Zadock the Priest."

Overture of Esther.

Dettingen Te Deum.

PART II.

Overture and Dead March in Saul.

"When the ear heard him."

"He delivered the poor that cried."

"His body is buried in peace."

From the Funeral Anthem.

"Glory be to the Father;" from the Jubilate.

PART III.

"O sing unto the Lord all the whole Earth."

"The Lord shall reign for ever and ever," from Israel in Egypt.

The music for the third day's performance was "Messiah."

The music for the fourth day, viz. Thursday, the 3d of June, was as follows.

PART I.

Overture to Esther.

Dettingen Te Deum.

PART II.

Overture in Tamerlane,—Dead March in Saul.

"When the ear," &c.

"He delivered the poor," &c.

"His body is buried," &c.

From the Funeral Anthem.

"Gloria Patri," from the Jubilate.

PART III.

First grand concerto.

Chorus, "Gird on thy sword,"—Saul.

Fourth hautboy concerto.

Anthem, "The Lord shall reign for ever and ever,"—Israel in Egypt.

Coronation Anthem, "Zadock the Priest."

The price of a ticket for a single day's performance was one guinea:—except for the rehearsals, which was only half a guinea.

Ib. p. 490. It is said that Abbé Winkelman made a catalogue of Count Bunau's library, in 4 vols. Is this meant of the "Catalogus Bibliothecæ Bunavianæ?" I have seen a copy of that catalogue, in 3 tomes, 4to. bound in 6 volumes. But to each tome is prefixed a preface, by John Michael Franckius. This catalogue, however, is not complete; the modern-historical part being still wanting. Quære, therefore, did the abbé continue this catalogue? or was he the compiler, and Franckius only the editor, of the 3 tomes above mentioned?

Is Bailey's derivation of the word "Tassel," a pendant handle hanging down from a cushion, &c. the right one? Is it not rather the same with "Tassel," or "Teazel," i. e. a Thistle; as it is usually made in the form of a Thistle? See Ainsworth, v. Tassel; and Bailey, v. Teafil.*

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 18,

THE extract from the Exeter newspapers, relative to the executioner of Charles the First, given in your Mag. for June, p. 409, is taken from one of two little 12mo vols, intitled, "The Tell-Tale, or Anecdotes;" in which are preserved some things worthy of remembrance. In order to corroborate the account there given, I have searched the register of burials at Whitechapel, to see whether a man of the name of Richard Brandon was really buried there at the time mentioned—and I now send you a faithful extract:

"Parish of St. Mary, Matfellow, otherwise Whitechapel.

"Burials in June, Anno Domini 1649,

"21st. Richard Brandon, a man out of Rosemary Lane."

By this it should seem that Brandon was buried on the day after he died.—A person of the name of Hulet was tried and condemned on Oct. 15, 1660, for having been one of those who appeared on the scaffold as executioners. Vide State Trials, vol. II. p. 381.

Can any of your correspondents inform me where I may see a print of the pulpit at Paul's Cross? and likewise of the pulpit-cross which formerly stood in the church yard of St. Michael's, Cornhill, built, according to Stow, by Sir John Rudstone, lord-mayor of London, 1528? Stow, 4to edit. 1603, p. 199.—I have been told, that at Hereford there is yet standing a pulpit-cross; possibly there may be more elsewhere; and some of Mr. Urban's correspondents may procure drawings of them, which he would not think unworthy of engraving*.

I should be glad to be informed too, where may be seen the Ichneography of Westminster Hall, and the buildings adjoining? I was much pleased on a view of them lately, and with to know the history of the tapestry which hangs in a large room leading into the House of Lords. An inscription runs round the whole suit at the top; and there are many mottoes.—Although it is very old, and much defaced, more by dirt than wear, it seems by no means to be of contemptible execution; I think much superior to the House of Lords.

* Bailey's is rather a definition, than a derivation. Johnson's derivation is still more unhappy, from the French tasse. "Or ornamental bunch of silk of glittering substances." EDIT.

† Mr. Pennant has engraved one at Shrewsbury in the first volume of his Wales. We should willingly engrave others. EDIT.

Yours, &c.

D. N.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 24.

IN the church at Arundel in Sussex is a monument with two human figures, the one jolly, the other emaciated; and the story there is not that he starved himself to death, but that the jolly figure shews what the person was in his health; but, that being wounded by a poisoned arrow, he, before his death became so emaciated as the other figure represents. Perhaps others of the emaciated figures might arise from some like cause; for I can hardly suppose any man could be so foolish as to imagine he could fast forty days without supernatural assistance, which was the case with those who did so fast. Yours, &c.

T. B.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 20.

I Transcribed in the church of Stifford, in Essex, the other day, the following epitaph, from an elegant scroll of white marble, and I wished it had been in a more public part of the church.

“In the Vault of Arthur Shish, Esq;
“was buried Elizabeth, Wife of Her“bert Croft, Esq; She died in child-“bed, of her 13th child, on the 27th of “April, 1763, in the 36th year of her “age.

“Her eldest surviving child inscribed “this stone on his 30th birth-day, to “the memory of the worthy woman
“who gave him birth.

“HERBERT CROFT, 12 November, 1781.”

I think this should be preserved in your useful repository. I conjecture the author of it to be the celebrated biographer of Young among Johnson's Lives, who has lately taken orders, as appears by a postscript to the last edition of Young's Life, which pays a compliment to Johnson, not less original than elegant. Yours, &c.

AN INHABITANT OF BRENTWOOD.

MR. URBAN,

July 30.

HEARING a friend of mine tell what I thought an extraordinary story concerning the hydrophobia, I applied to him for a copy of it, which is much at your service. Yours, B. W. B.

SIR,

“YOU tell me you are desirous of having the particulars of the story I was mentioning concerning the hydrophobia, which happened in my own family, and under my own observation. Here it is at your service; and, should you and the editor of the magazine think it worth inserting, you are very welcome to put it to that use. In the year 1762, when I was in the East Indies, a greyhound of mine ran mad (I was not then at home), and bit two women. Some time after, I returned from camp much indisposed; and was disturbed the whole night, as I thought, by the yelping of a dog. When my servant came to me in the morning, I reprehended him for not removing the dogs to a greater distance. He assured me of my mistake; that there were no dogs near me; and that the noise was made by a poor woman, who in my absence had been bitten by one of my dogs. I immediately went to see the poor creature, and found her sitting in the lap of her husband, with a great deal of saliva drivelling from her mouth, in violent agonies, yet perfectly sensible. I asked her many questions relative to the pains she suffered, which, she told me, were chiefly about the neck and throat, and a stricture about the heart. She could bear the sight of water perfectly well; but said, that to attempt to swallow a drop (which she could not possibly do) threw her into the greatest agonies. She died in about two hours after I left her.—The other woman, not feeling then any symptoms of the malady, said she was under no apprehensions, for she had eat some of the dog's liver. However, in a few days afterwards, she was seized; and notwithstanding all the faculty could then do for her, she died, but was very sensible to the last moment. Yours, &c.”

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 3.

DIVORCE was allowed in Ancient Rome; and yet it was 523 years before any one made use of it. The first who did so (if we can believe history) was Spurius Carbilus Ruga, a man passionately fond of his wife, and who said he only parted from her on account of his oath, because she was incapable of bearing children.—This Rome was Pagan.

England never allowed divorces, except in cases of adultery. And yet within five years, from 1776 to 1781,

the

the numbers of them were very considerable: not because the women could not breed, for, alas! they were too prolific: nor because they had in general any reason to complain of want of attention in their husbands. This England was nominally Christian. Hæu Pietas, hæu Præfca Fides! B. W. B.

MR. URBAN,

June 8.

YOUR late correspondent is mistaken in supposing that there is any mention made of Dr. William Oldys, in the Reports of Sir Francis Moore; for, although an edition of that reporter was published in 1688, the cases mentioned in that book come no lower than the year 1612: but the case to which your correspondent alludes, as between Dr. Oldys and Russell the celebrated undertaker, may be found in a book of Reports, called 4th Modern, fol. 128, although not mentioned as being between Oldys and Russell, but simply intitled, "Russell's Case."—Another case indeed, somewhat similar to Russell's, is mentioned in Shower's Cases in Parliament, fol. 58, as between Dr. William Oldys, plaintiff, and Charles Donmilke, defendant; wherein the doctor was defeated in an attempt to enforce the power of the court of chivalry. Yours, &c. TOBIAS DANDIPRAT.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 10.

THE following remarks were found in the table-book of a gentleman fond of all subjects which occurred in the pursuit of Natural History, who died lately in his passage from the West Indies.—They seem to be collected from immediate remarks; and therefore I request the favour of you to convey them to the public through your excellent miscellany.

"At Barbadoes, some days previous to the hurricane in 1780, the trees and shrubs were entirely covered with butterflies of the most beautiful colours, so as to screen from the sight the branches, and even the trunks, of the trees. In the afternoon, before the gale came on, and when it was quite still, they all suddenly disappeared. The gale came on soon after."

To those who are curious in their researches into Natural History, it may be an matter of amusement to acquaint your correspondents and readers, whether they trace any similar cause for these flies, and those webs which produced innumerable smaller insects and flies, and so covered all the hedges in England about the same period, and before the influenza; and whether they conceive that the difference of climate between England and Barbadoes would cause insects in one place, and very beautiful flies in the other.—But I proceed to the next article.

"In the unfortunate expedition from Jamaica to the Spanish Main, to which thousands went, and only tens returned!—the troops, being short of provisions, had recourse to shooting in the woods. Among other things remarkable, was a wild hog, with the navel on the back: when killed, if this navel part was not instantly cut away, putrefaction took place, and it was not eatable; otherwise it was deemed very good food. Monkeys also were commonly eaten in this expedition, and were said to be exquisite."

I should be glad if any of your correspondents who are acquainted with the above hog, would inform you what they conceive to be the cause of putrefaction, as I believe the fact is not to be controverted.

"In Jamaica is a bird called the nightingale; it is in colour and song like that of Europe, but appears to be at least as big again; and sings by day, as well as by night. There are many birds there of beautiful plumage; but it is very remarkable, that few of them sing."

For this last there may be anatomical reasons; but as I confess myself a plain man, whose researches have been only amongst those sequestered walks of philosophy which lead to philanthropy and ethics, I am to request your indulgence towards the favours I have enquired above; and am, &c. A. H.

MR. URBAN,

Leicester, Sept. 15.

NOT a year ago, in digging a grave under the steeple, in the space between the nave and the chancel of St. Martin's church, Leicester, several scuttles full of cattle-bones, horns, and jaw-bones of the herd, came to light, the teeth in many instances entire, five feet deep from the surface, and a foot deep in bones, with an appearance of a lateral continuation.

Some months before, a few yards distant south of the above discovery, near the steeple or belfry-door, were met with, in making a grave, within a foot of the surface, continuing on all sides, as well as through the cut, and not terminating with it, a vast quantity of very large pebbles, wedged or heaped together, without interstices of earth or mortar.

Foundations, well set in mortar, have likewise sometimes occurred to the present sexton, within the precincts of the said church.

The yard in Humberston-gate, where the ancient coffin, bones, and horns were found, as described in p. 920 of your last November magazine, is not half a mile on the east of St. Martin's church.

About a quarter, on the west of the said church, is a place called "Holy Bones," a few yards from St. Nicholas's church easterly; where many like relicks of victims have, at times, been discovered.

And on the west side, within four or five yards of this latter church, are the remains of an ancient work, called "Jury Wall," composed of rude unequal forest-stones, with a kind of bricks two inches in thickness, in mortar of the same dimensions.

In this wall, over narrow diameters of seemingly imperfect furnaces, are wide and high arches, strongly blackened like the under parts, and edged abruptly, as a ruin; probably a place for sacrifice, corresponding with the "Holy Bones."

It was not unusual, in earlier times, to convert heathen temples into Christian churches; or to raise, on their site, places for the worship of the true God:

Yours,

WILLIAM BICKERSTAFFE.

P. S. N. J. [see p. 568 of your Aug. Magazine] is wrong in his conjecture [no disparagement to his judgement], that Mrs. Bankart, in your Obituary, p. 895, might be a descendant of "Eluner Bankar," in nubibus:

She was indeed a Leicester woman, daughter of a Mr. Staples, plumber and glazier, in our High Street; and captivated the affections of a Mr. Bankart, a Swiss, belonging to a regiment quartered here, who married her, quitted the army, and practised surgery: his chief, if not sole diet, for many years, milk. This man of longevity, 104, left no numerous issue; his eldest son is a great wool-stapler in Leicester. I never heard of any other family of the same name in this place; but cannot answer for preceding centuries.

GENT. MAG. October, 1784.

I intreat N. J. not to despair, but examine the second line once more: it makes two on the glass. Hints from a novice may have their value. I take the seemingly capital "I" to be only a sign of the cross, and announce a profession of Christianity: And I read after it, in No 2d, "ÿse Bynso," with a caret above; haply the man who can supply it: if you use an "n" final, it is only supposing caret effaced.

The first caret in No 2d, second word, has a reflex, instead of pointed extremity, to the left: my duplicate copy, now before me, is well pointed, the size of the original, more than twice that of the engraving: as the stem of the under "y" should be more than even with the commencement of the left branch of the "y;" whereas it is right under its chasm.

In No 2d, second line, written copy, I read "Luy Bliskyn;" not "Fys," nor "Pyts." I allow "u" for the caret, after "P" in the first word.

N. B. I have certain misgivings, that N. J.'s "Eluner Bankar, will prove an Olluer, or Oliver; but believe his "Animabus" and "Bankar" will stand the test: for his efforts I thank him, and wish he may further find a double caret in my "Bynso," as he has in "Animabus, or more.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 23.

THE following specimen of my Collections towards the History of Hertfordshire may afford some amusement to your readers, and shew, that if a generous public will support me, the whole work shall be published. Other specimens shall be occasionally communicated by

Yours, & PAUL WRIGHT.

HINXWORTH PLACE.

Arms in the parlour window. Argent, on a bend Vert between two cottises dancette Gules, a crescent for a difference Or.

Second shield. The same coat, impaling quarterly, first and fourth Sable, three dexter hands coupé Argent. Hanchett second Gules, three chevrons Or. Montfitchet. An ancient baron. Third Gules, three lozenges in bend Argent, a martlet Or for a difference. Underneath Grey and it was formerly Hanchett Third shield. Quarterly, first and fourth, Or, a lion rampant queue fourchée Gules within a border of the same. Second and third Azure, a bend Argent between between seven billets, &c. Underneath Malory and 570.

In the chamber window. First shield. Quarterly first and fifth. Quarterly, per fesse indented Gules and Or. Bromley. Second Argent, on a chevron within a border ingiled Gules, five Bezants. Third Argent, on a Fesse Sable, three cross crolets Or, between six fleurs de lis. Imaling, Quarterly, first and fourth Azure a bend ingrailed Argent, cottised Or. Fortescue. Second and third, Argent ftee Azure, on a chief of the second, the roses of the first, barbed and seeded go. These were the arms of Sir Thomas Bromley, knight, who was solicitor genal in 1569; and in 1579 was made lord chancellor. Dugdale's Chronica Serii, pp. 93 and 94. He married Elizabeth daughter of Sir Adrian Fortescue. His shield, by the blunder of some glazier repairing the window, has been tured outwards; so that, as it now stands, the second quartering in the Fortescue arms is the first coat.

Second shield in the chamber window. Quarterly, first Argent, a lion passant in fesse Gules, between two bars Sable, charged with three bezants, in chief, three stags heads caboshed of the third. Parker Lord Morley an Mont eagle. Second Argent, a lion rampant Sable, crowned Gules. Sir Robert Morley temp. Edward the First. Third Quarterly. First and Fourth Barry Nebulee of six Or and Gules. Villiam Lovell, who, by his marriage with Eleanor, daughter and heiress of Robert Lord Morley, had the title of Lord Morley. Second and third Azure, a lion rampant Argent.

Fourth coat. Gules, a bend fusilee Or. Crest. Out of a lucal coronet Or, a bear's head Sable, tided gold.

Alice, sister to Henry, only son of the said William, was married to Sir Henry Parker, knight, whose son Henry was, 21 Hen. VIII. summoned to parliament by the title of Lord Morley.

Third shield in the chamber window. Twelve coats formerly quartered. First Argent, three bars Azure, in chief three torteauxes. Grey. Second Argent, a chief indented Azure. Glanville. Third Or, a maunch Gule. Hastings Earl of Pembroke. Fourth Argent, a double tressure floree couerfloree, in the honorary point an escutcheon Gules. Scott Earl of Huntingdon. Fifth is almost demolished; out part of the field, and the top of a grb appearing, shews that it was Azure, three garbs. On Blundeville Earl of Chester. Sixth Gules three leopards heads jessant fleurs de lis, Or. Cantelupe. Seventh Azure, a lion rampant. Or. Eighth, Barry of ten Argent and Azure, nine martlets, Gules. Audomare de Valentia Earl of Pembroke. Ninth, Newburgh, or Berkeley, demolished. Tenth, demolished, except part of the field Or; and it was probably, Or, three inescutcheons Barry of six Vaire and Gules; being the arms of Joan Montcheny, mother of Audomare de Valentia Earl of Pembroke. Eleventh, almost demolished, but part of the field Argent, and the chief Azure, charged with three crosses pattee fitchee of the field. Strongbow. Twelfth, Sable, three garbs Argent. Mackmurrough. Dermot Mac Murrough knight, of Leicester, married Eva, the only daughter and heir to Richard Strongbow Earl of Pembroke. The second, third, eighth, tenth, and eleventh coats are in Dugdale's Origines Juridiciales, p. 300, quartered by the Lord Grey of Wilton; and many of them are likewise quartered by the present Earl of Stamford.

There is no account of these several shields in Sir Henry Chauncy. And Salmon's description of them is very short and imperfect.

From Dr. Plot's Analeceta in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, Oct. 5, 64, inter MSS. Browne Willis, Armig.

Near St. Albans, not many years since, quicksilver sprang out of the earth.

Hertford. The Danes made a strong intrenchment on the River Lea, where Hertford now is. Life of King Alfred, p. 72.

Verulam. Ophiomorphites found there. Mr. Ray, p. 115.

Between Puckeridge and Ware, on the banks of an hollow lane, the great whitish ash-coloured shell-snail*, eaten much in Italy, found there by Mr. Martin Lister, p. 404.

* I myself saw, a few years since, near Braughing, some of the snails mentioned by Mr. Martin Lister, p. 404. He was afterwards M. D. P. WRIGHT.

 ANTI-SCOT is our next.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 6.
THOUGH I firmly believe there is one only sure guide to be blest and happy, or to remove the evils of life, yet I would humbly propose a query or two for discussion, through the channel of

of your World of Delight and Information.

I. Whether the state and individuals would not be more flourishing, rich, happy, and industrious, if imprisonment for debt was totally abolished by the Legislature?

II. Whether credit and confidence would not be as extensive, if some dreadful stigma attended a crime of vast magnitude (though lightly esteemed as a fashionable folly, or sign of an enterprising spirit) fraught with injustice of nearly as black a die as the dark assassin?

III. Whether private friendships and love would not more abound, if they had no further hold than justice and gratitude, except the wise bankrupt laws in a commercial state? VANITY.

ACCOUNT OF THE RESEARCHES MADE AT LONDON RELATIVE TO THE HISTORY OF FRANCE. BY
M. DE BREQUIGNY.

Read at the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, 1766. From their Memoirs, Vol. LXIX. p. 1—25. 12mo.

IT had long been known that England was in possession of a variety of deeds relating to France. Thomas Carte had printed, 24 years ago, a catalogue of the pieces contained in Gascon, Norman, and French, rolls in the Tower of London: he at the same time gave us to understand, that this was but a small part of the records interesting to France that were to be found in England. He added, that it was in the Exchequer they were to be looked for, and that probably the [chartrier] chartulary of Philip Augustus, lost at the battle of Belle Fosse, near 600 years ago, might be found there. There was, indeed, less reason to hope to recover this valuable record, because no English writer mentions a trophy so glorious for his nation. It was undoubtedly lost in the disorder of a tumultuary retreat, and never fell into the enemy's hands. But one might hope to find the original of other acts, besides those pointed out by Carte, "supplications, representations, letters of nobility, of cities, communities, inquisitions, tenures;" and in short, "acts drawn by seneschals, magistrates, commissaries, sent into the provinces of France formerly subject to England."

The design of searching for them had been frequently taken up, but a variety of reasons had delayed the execution. Peace offering a favourable opportunity, the Duke de Praslin, then minister for foreign affairs, seized this moment to resume the design, and fixed on me to execute it. The honour of being chosen, and the advantage of the measure, did not permit me to hesitate. I set out, and arrived in London in May, 1764.

My plan was drawn up before I left Paris. Carte had pointed out the Exchequer as the principal place wherein to find the pieces relating to France. At this office I was to begin; and the Count de Guerchy, the French ambassador at London, had procured me admission into it.

The archives of the Exchequer are distributed into several offices, or presses, appropriated to keep the records of its several courts, and the accounts of receipts and disbursements of the public money. There also were kept the treaties with foreign nations; but these had been a few years before removed to an office appropriated to affairs of a political nature. The pieces preserved in the Exchequer are of two kinds: those in daily use are ranged in excellent order, in a number of presses, and well known to those who have the care of them. Those which are looked on as useless, are piled up in a garret 60 feet long, and four feet high; others heaped up in confusion in a dark closet, covered with a thick coat of moist stinking dirt: a proof how long it is since they have been looked at, and sufficient to check every wish to disturb them.

I laboured three months in tumbling over this chaos, without fear of increasing it. The persons appointed to attend me, seeing my close application to this laborious and disgusting work, bestowed on me a smile of pity, persuaded in their own minds to how little purpose I laboured. In fact, in this farrago of old parchments, I found nothing relating to France, but old statements of the receipts and expences of some of our provinces formerly held by the English. Yet, as the proofs accompanied them, I thought many of them likely to throw light on the ancient administration of our provinces, the pedigrees of our nobility, part of whom, especially those of Guienne, were for a long time in the service of England. I also made extracts from different accounts of the revenues of various parts of France in the 14th century, as mere objects of curiosity: for for example, in turning over a great register of the Custom-house of Bourdeaux, 1350, I found, that in the course of one year, there went out of this port 141 ships laden with 13,429 tons of wine, which had produced a revenue of 5400 livres 16 sous Bourdeaux money.

These were not the principal pieces I sought after. Carte had said, that one might find them in the boxes where he supposed they had been shut up for many centuries. I was indulged with the opening of all in the Exchequer, except two or three, which I was assured contained only criminal processes, which ought not to see the light. What I found of most consequence, was a great number of old MSS. among which was the register, so well known by the name of the Red Book, famous for its antiquity, and cited as authentic in the judicial proceedings of the 14th century.

I drew up accounts of almost all these registers. There were scarce any from which I did not extract some piece relative to our history. Among these are two acts of the beginning of the 12th century, the oldest records we have of the sovereignty of France over the Earls of Flanders. They are indeed in Rymer, but disfigured by hiatuses, which rendered them partly unintelligible: the state of the fiefs of Normandy in the time of the Conqueror was published by Du Chesne, but in a very imperfect manner: some laws of the Conqueror, which preserve the first traces of our Neustrian [Norman] law, have been printed more than once, but always incorrectly, because the editors confess they could not obtain an exact collation of this Red Book, from whence I transcribed them with the most scrupulous fidelity.

Thus ended my researches in the Exchequer. My collections however, though filled with useful matter, fell far below the hopes given me by Carte. But though the Exchequer was my first, it was not my only, object. I had sprung a new mine, which amply compensated for the scanty produce of the other, I mean the British Museum. Of this I had some knowledge by the printed catalogue; but this knowledge was very imperfect. Messrs. Morton and Maty, the keepers of it, with whom I had made an acquaintance, gave me a very different idea of the riches which it contained. They invited me to go over it, and procured me the necessary permission from the committee to open to me its most secret treasures.

This library contains many united: those of different kings of England; Sir Hans Sloane's, with his magnificent collection of natural history; a cabinet of ancient and modern medals; the Harleian MSS. and those of Sir Robert Cotton, in which are a great number of original pieces, besides a collection of above 15,000 charters.

The charters and original records principally engaged my attention, and afforded so rich an harvest, that six transcribers could hardly collect it in a year's time. The limits of this paper do not admit of particulars. The bare titles of the pieces which I extracted, form a volume.

Among the principal is a letter from Charlemagne to the Emperor of the East, and above 60 letters of Alcuin, never printed*. They are to be found in a MS. of the ninth century noted in the margin by the hand of the learned Usher, who probably intended to publish them.

I might cite also many original charters of William the Conqueror, which his name alone renders interesting; and a quantity of original letters of almost all our kings, from Lewis VII. particularly of Lewis XII. Francis I. Henry IV. I collected, with a religious respect, even the least lines written by the hand, or dictated by the mouth, of those princes, whose memory is so dear to us. All that came from them seems to have a right to some share of that veneration we preserve for their memories.

Twenty-two great volumes of original records, concerning the History of France in the 14th and 15th centuries, collected at great expence by Sir Robert Cotton, formed once one of the richest ornaments of this library. A fire, which had like to have consumed the whole about 40 years ago, almost entirely destroyed this collection. There remain only some bundles of leaves in confusion half burnt, or shrivelled by the fire, and which cannot long survive total destruction. I have extracted about 500 pieces, which were all that I could save from these ruins. Happily Rymer has preserved some part of it in the supplements which he had prepared to his famous collection. These MS. Supplements, forming 59 volumes folio, are in the British Museum. I have taken out all that bears any relation to our history; and have compared Rymer's copies with the originals as far as I could; and this comparison has frequently answered very well.

* I have since carried them to Dom Probenius, abbot-prince of St. Emeran at Ratisbon, has inserted them in the beautiful edition of Alcuin's Works, which is shortly to be published.

It is commonly believed in France, that all Chancellor Seguier's MSS. passed into the abbey of St. Germain des Prez; but I have met with several in the Harleian library. They have furnished me with a number of letters of persons employed in that chancellor's administration, and different original pieces which he thought worth preserving.

The moneys current in France in the different ages of our monarchy, especially those which particular lords, cities, and churches, had formerly a right to coin, are a very proper object of our curiosity. I have had a great number drawn; with an account of their weight, legends, and value, from some MSS. in the Harleian and Cottonian libraries.

A deed, which may perhaps be deemed foreign to France, but which its importance would not suffer me to neglect, is the famous decree of union, the most famous of Pope Eugenius IV's bulls; which should serve as an eternal monument of the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches. The industrious author of the Treatise Diplomatic cites seven authentic copies of this decree, without knowing of this particular one. The learned have observed, that of the copies of this diploma, known to exist, there are not two alike. It was necessary, therefore, to transcribe this in the Cottonian library, till now unknown. M. Simon pretends that the signatures of the bishops, in the copy which he saw, were in the same hand as the instrument itself. I take upon me to affirm, that in the London copy they are all different hands, and consequently originals. The sight of my copy of this celebrated bull, in which they are traced with the utmost exactness, will shew the truth of this.

In the intervals of my labours at the British Museum, I visited the learned, solicited their assistance, consulted their collections, and particularly their superior judgement. I found them all eager to serve me in the most obliging manner. I must not forget to observe a circumstance, too honourable to literature to be concealed, that the King himself was pleased several times to express the interest he took in my researches.

I wish the bounds here prescribed gave me time to enumerate the names of all the learned in England, to whose kindness I am indebted. I shall always retain the most lively remembrance of it. Allow me, at least, by this public testimony, to immortalise, if possible, my gratitude.

I hasten to pass to the most celebrated and least accessible record-office in London, the only one which remained for me to visit; I mean the Tower.

Mr. Carte assures us, that there are lodged in those archives other pieces relating to our history, as well as those in the "Rolles Gascons, Normans, et Francois:" and I intended to content myself with transcribing the titles of the most essential of them. But what were my surprise and pleasure, at hearing that there were 12 great bundles of deeds concerning France, of which no catalogue had been made, and which I was to consider as, till now, unknown! I doubted not but these were the bundles which Carte concluded were in the Exchequer, and I lost no time to satisfy myself. They appeared at first view to contain at least 5 or 600 great pieces each; but they were in the greatest disorder and a most deplorable condition; treated as waste; bundled up without care; rumpled into a thousand folds; a prey to worms' dust, and the fermentation produced by the natural moisture of parchment; part of them considerably damaged; and the writing so changed, that, without the continual washings which I was allowed to use, the sight of all these treasures would have served only to make me regret their loss. I can here give only a general idea of them. I perceived immediately 40 original letters of St. Lewis to Queen Blanche his mother, and Queen Margaret his wife; and from princes of the blood: 55 of our kings Philip le Hardi, Philip the Fair, Lewis le Hutin, Philip le Long, Charles le Bel: minutes of the answers of Henry III. of England, his wife, Eleanor of Provence, and the three first Edwards. I found many curious letters written from Syria in the 13th century, on the situation of the affairs of the Christians in the East, in which our ancestors bore so large a part; a list of grand masters of the Templars, of whom we have not an exact series, and which which was drawn up in 1347, soon after the suppression of the order*.

I found many ordinances of Philip le Hardi, le Bel, and de Valois. There is reason to think they are wanting among our records, as they have never yet been found on the most diligent search, made by order of ministry, to complete the collection of the ordinances of our kings.

I found such a number of memorials concerning the differences between the kings of France and England during three centuries, that one might compose from them a particular history of the fatal quarrels which so long exhausted England, and desolated France.

I found a prodigious quantity of original petitions or supplications of cities and towns, of provinces of France, which fell under the English government. Their ancient privileges, or the new ones which they desired to obtain, are commonly set forth, and the prince's answer is at the bottom of the petition. Thus these acts ascertain two important matters at once: the antiquity of the privileges which the new master confirms, and the original of those he grants.

Lastly, I found many pieces relating to the royal demesnes, and the estates of individuals; terriers and deeds, wherein are stated the titles of great estates, proceedings, inquisitions, and sometimes decisions that determine them; deeds which give the regular succession of different possessors, and reflect valuable light on their pedigrees.

It is easy to see among these pieces those which Carte thought buried in the Exchequer; these petitions of communities, these inquisitions, these acts drawn by the seneschals and commissaries deputed: and after above two years hard work, I enjoyed the pleasure of being possessed of the fruit of so many laborious researches. It only remained for me to transcribe the most important of the Rolles Gascons, Normans, et François, already known by Carte's catalogue.

These rolls, which take their name from their shape, are long slips of parchment, composed sometimes of above 50 leaves sewed together at the ends, and rolled. The letters of the kings of England were filed there as they were dispatched. These records have been, and are, frequently consulted. The French nobility usually seek there the early evidences of their advancement; and sometimes the decision of disputes touching the rights of their ancient patrimonies; but these researches have been hitherto difficult, expensive, and often fruitless. It was therefore necessary to enable us to consult these rolls without difficulty and expence; and for this purpose, I thought it sufficient to transcribe the principal pieces pointed out in Carte's catalogue; but I soon perceived that a great number were not pointed out at all, and that frequently the most interesting were omitted: I determined therefore to review the rolls from one end to the other, notwithstanding the number was alarming; I distinguished the pieces necessary to be copied from those to be extracted, or from which only minutes were to be taken. The records copied at length amount to some thousands! Their different contents cannot be specified here; it is sufficient to say, that they furnish general history with an innumerable multiplicity of acts relating to the differences between France and England, from St. Lewis to Henry IV.; to ecclesiastical history, deeds of concession or confirmation; of privileges granted to the church and monasteries of France, which formerly acknowledged the kings of England for their sovereigns; to the private history of the provinces; a numerous collection of pieces concerning Normandy, Bretagne, part of Flanders and Picardy, especially Guienne, which comprehended then almost all that part of France from the Loire to the Pyrenees; the foundation, increase, municipal laws, revolutions; sometimes the destruction of their cities, castles, towns, villages; even exact successions of the different orders of their magistrates; the pedigrees of private families; a number of memoirs concerning their descents, alliances, advancements, and services.

* "I communicated this catalogue to Dom. Clement, who has made use of it in his new edition of the "Art of verifying Dates,"

I close this enumeration, which might be thought exaggerated, if it were not already justified by Carte's catalogues, imperfect as it is. But I cannot conclude this paper without resting on some proofs the judgement I have formed of his work: they will serve at the same time to shew the advantage which our history may derive from my own enquiries. I shall select an object on which the public attention has been some time excited, the memorable siege of Calais, and the most celebrated of her her heroes which it has rendered famous, Eustace de St. Pierre. Without repeating known facts, I shall confine myself to certain singular particulars hitherto unknown, mostly taken from the Tower rolls, and which T. Carte has neglected to point out in his catalogue, where the name of Eustace de St. Pierre is not once mentioned.

It is well known, that Edward III. after his victory at Cressy, came before Calais, Sept. 3, 1346, and formed the siege, which lasted eleven months. I have copied the original statement of the land and sea forces which he employed on that occasion. The land army was formed, according to the custom of that age, of the contingents furnished by the lords, in consequence of their fiefs, or by particular agreement with the king; and of foreign hired troops. The fleet was also formed of contingents furnished by the different ports of England, and auxiliary ships, and amounted in the whole to 737 vessels, carrying in all 15,515 men. I omit particulars. Lediard has published them from a Cottonian MS. little different from the statement which I have copied. I shall only observe, that these vessels were, properly speaking, mere boats; some carried only six men; and the largest of them all but 51. The inhabitants of Calais, blockaded by land and sea, were in the month of June reduced to the greatest extremity. Their letters to Philip, dated the 26th of that month, set forth, That if they were not speedily relieved, they had no resource left but to sally out and die sword in hand; "for," say they, "we had rather fall honourably in the field than eat one another." Shortly after Philip marched to their relief; he was within three leagues of Calais on the 23d of July, and in sight of it on the 27th, according to various letters of Edward. They negotiated several days to obtain at least a truce: but Philip demanded, as a preliminary, that a capitulation should be granted to the town; while Edward insisted that it should surrender at discretion. Philip, unable to obtain his point, decamped before day break, August 2: and the besieged, despairing of success, determined to surrender next day. Edward, who had refused them a capitulation when Philip demanded it at the head of a formidable army, as a preliminary of a truce desired by both princes, and actually signed the following month, was far from granting it to the wretched inhabitants, exhausted with fatigue, dying of hunger, and without resources. He required, that they should surrender their properties and lives to the discretion of the conqueror. The few contemporary writs, English and French, differ in almost all the circumstances of the surrender of Calais, but all seem to agree in this; that the inhabitants, more or fewer, came out with halters about their necks, imploring mercy of Edward, who spared their lives. Froissart says, that Edward contented himself with requiring that six of the principal burghers, with their heads and feet bare, and halters round their necks, should come and bring him the keys, reserving to himself the liberty to dispose of them as he pleased, and promising to receive the rest on mercy. The historian adds, that the richest burgher, Eustace de St. Pierre, offered himself first, and was followed by three of his relations, John d'Aire, James and Peter Wisant. He pretends, that Edward was going to order these generous citizens to execution, but pardoned them on the entreaties and tears of his queen. Being master of their lives by right of war, he might have disposed of them with the rigour of those yet barbarous times. He treated the people of Calais as rebels, conformably to the title which he assumed of king of France by right of succession. It was his interest to strike terror into those who should presume to attempt to imitate their noble defence. Had Edward been cruel, his cruelty would not have wanted pretences; but he was generous, and contented himself with threats.

I shall not examine the different circumstances of Froissart's account, which rests on his single testimony. Perhaps it will be thought difficult to reconcile it with some facts hitherto unknown, but of incontestable authority. I shall content myself with mentioning one. The queen, who is supposed to have been so touched with the hard fate of the six burghers whose lives she had saved, obtained, notwithstanding, a few days after, the confiscation of the houses which one of them, John d'Aire, possessed in Calais. Most of the other houses were given to the English whom Edward invited thither by his letters, dated Aug. 12. Calais had cost him too much; he knew too well the importance of such a place to neglect any measure that could secure to him the possession of it. The houses which he granted to his subjects were given, with an express condition, that they should sell them only to the English. We are not, however, to imagine, as is too common, on the faith of historians, that every ancient possessor was turned out, and every Frenchman excluded. On the contrary, I have seen a number of French names among those to whom Edward granted houses in his new conquest. But I little expected to find among those who had accepted the new sovereign's favour the man who seems most calculated to reject them, the famous Eustace de St. Pierre. By letters, dated Oct. 8, 147, two months after the surrender of Calais, Edward gives Eustace a considerable pension, till he could provide for him more amply. The motives for this favour are the services he was to do by maintaining good order in the town, or watching over the security of the place. Other letters, dated the same day, founded on the same motives, grant to him and his heirs most of the houses and tenements which he held in this city, with the addition of others. How could Eustace de St. Pierre, this man who is described as sacrificing himself with so much generosity to the duties of a subject and citizen, consent to acknowledge for his sovereign the enemy of his country, engage solemnly to keep for him this place which he had so long defended against him, and bind himself to him by the strongest tie on an noble mind, the acceptance of a favor! All this but ill agrees with the high idea hitherto given of his patriotic heroism. His conduct may particularly be ascribed to disgust; and it may be alledged, that Froissart says Philip did nothing to reward the courage and fidelity of the brave Calaisians. But Froissart was misinformed. We have many ordinances of Philip, printed in the collection of Ordinances of the Kings of France, by which he provides for the indemnity of the unhappy inhabitants of Calais: we have some which prove that this indemnity took place; and the kings, his successors, John I. and Charles V. interested themselves in it. The glory of Eustace de St. Pierre must therefore suffer diminution and since the facts here stated seem to lessen it, I will venture to draw from them some obvious conjectures.

were

We have seen by the letters of the inhabitants of Calais, that their last resolution was to fly out sword in hand, and seek through the English army liberty or death. It appears certain, that Eustace opposed this desperate resolution. In the last council held at Calais, he rose first, and advised, according to Froissart, to surrender on the terms offered by Edward. Thereby he saved the besieged, and at the same time the blood of the besiegers, for which Edward might think himself obliged to him, and prove his gratitude by his favours. He had reason to endeavour to attach to his interest a person of so great weight in his city; and he was fortunate enough to compell Eustace to be grateful. This, I think, results naturally from the above recited facts. If they at all detract from the high idea which the eulogiums of four centuries seem to have annexed for ever to the memory of Eustace, let us no longer hesitate to restore to his family all the glory of which they shewed themselves worthy. His heirs did not imitate his conduct. They sacrificed the advantage which he derived from it to the duty of faithful subjects. Eustace died in 1351. Letters, dated July the same year, shew us, that his property in Calais was confiscated, because his heirs remained attached to the lawful prince. Edward, by depriving them of his gifts, did more for them than if he had loaded them with favours; he restored to their name all the lustre which the same gifts accepted by Eustace had tarnished.

I confine myself to this instance. It is easy to judge by this memoir what assistance may be derived to our history from the pieces which I have collected, and what materials for the labours of the Academy, to whom the monuments of our history are such interesting objects.

MR. URBAN,

BY an early insertion of the following corrections, you will oblige your correspondent,

T. H. W.

P. 650. "Lister informed Ray, that he had seen Spiders dart out of a web." Dele of.

Q. Who is Molly Leapor, whom you mention in your note? I know no such person.

P. 657. "The assertion, in Gibson's edition of Camden, that this shire is always spelt Buckingham, with an u, in most of our ancient records, is certainly erroneous, for the title to the chapter of this county runs constantly Boching-hascire, or Bochinghscire, in Domesday-Book. Instead of in most of our ancient records, it should be in our most ancient records; and add in Domesday-Book.

MR.

ACCOUNT of an unknown Youth, who speaks an unknown Language, lately found in Normandy; published with a View of discovering his Relations.—Translated from the Fifth Papers of Sept. 8, 1784.

IN the beginning of March last, a young man, of about 17 years of age, who spoke an idiom that has not yet been known or understood by any who have seen him, was found, not far from Caen. The Count de Faudoas, high sheriff of Caen, having met with him when he was brought to that city, was so affected with his situation, that he ordered him to be received into the Hôtel-Dieu, till some interference could be had of his family, his country, and the circumstances that brought him to France.

M. Feydeau de Brou, intendant of Caen, on seeing this young foreigner, was also much interested in his behalf. He thought that, as Paris contained persons of all nations, and many who are well acquainted with foreign languages, some one who could understand the idiom, spoken by this young incognito, might probably be found there.—He therefore wrote to M. le Noir, lieutenant-general of the police, and on receiving a favourable answer from that magistrate, he sent the stranger to Paris on the 21st of the same month.

On his arrival there, having the good fortune to lodge in the house of Mad. Billard, who keeps a lace-shop in St. Honoré street, at the corner of Roule-street, she interested herself strongly in his favour; she not only received him into her house, where he still remains, but she took as much care of him as of her own children. The Sieur la Rive, of the French theatre, being acquainted with this young man, mentioned him to his company. They embraced the opportunity of exercising an act of benevolence, and settled on him, by an unanimous resolve, a pension of 63 livres per month. This event, and some other circumstances, have given this youth some consequence.

He has been presented to the Count de Vergennes, minister for foreign affairs, who saw him with compassion, and wished Mad. Billard to continue her good offices. M. le Noir has assured her, that he would be accountable for every thing the young stranger might want.—He has also been presented to M. de Calonne, comptroller-general, and to the Baron de Breteuil, minister for the department of Paris.—The Dutches of Bourbon has desired that he might be introduced to her, and has shewn him that tender attention which is the sweetest consolation of the distressed; she was desirous of adding to it a present in money; and many other persons of distinction, who have seen him at Mad. Billard's, have made him the like offers; but that gentlewoman, being unacquainted with the rank of the young incognito, did not think it proper to accept for him any transient supplies.

GENT. MAG. October, 1784.

He has been seen by a great number of foreigners, who have heard him speak without understanding him, and have spoken to him without being understood. With as little success, almost all the languages, of which we have grammars and vocabularies, have been tried in his hearing. In his person, however, he resembles the Europeans, and in particular some people of the North of Europe. The great regularity of his behaviour, and his exemplary moral conduct, indicate an education superior to what is common; but the little instruction he has had proves that it has been much neglected. The only knowledge, which he seems to have acquired, is that of the objects which he has seen in different countries. He seems not to know how to write: the rude characters, which he traces, resemble those of a child who is beginning to learn the first elements of writing; and their direction, which is almost perpendicular, gives them some similitude to the running hand used throughout all the North of Europe. He has written several times; but, though he seems to distinguish, from time to time, the characters which he has formed, by divisions, it seems only to be in imitation of those that he has seen made. He has never read a single word of what he has written; he has been frequently desired to read it, but always in vain. Since he has been at Paris, our characters have been shewn him; those are what he traces at present, when he is asked to write.

He shews a particular attachment to the military, an inclination, a strong propensity to arms. He is of a gentle and chearful disposition, has a proper assurance, seems firm, courageous, sober, disinterested, reposes a confidence, is frank and sincere. He is fond of liberty and and independence; shews a contempt for slaves; regards our servants as such; and is disposed to grant every thing to persuasion and affection, but nothing to compulsion. Of what belongs to him he is careful, and remarkably neat.—

With the plainness of his dress he seems not displeased; and it appears as if it would be more agreeable to his eyes if it were more elegant.

He has sketched, in a very intelligent drawing, a ship that has Dutch *semelles, and he has distinguished them on some Dutch buildings, of which a print was shewn him. He has made it understood, by signs, that he is acquainted with the savages of America, their arms, and their utensils. When a map of the world was laid before him, the place where he now is being pointed out to him, and being asked, by signs, from whence he came, he shewed the South West. He particularly distinguished, in the king's cabinet, the arms and utensils of the savages of South America, some fruits of that country, and two insects, which the savage women hang, by way of ornament, in their ears; in short, he seemed to intimate that he was born in an island. These united testimonies seem to point out the Antilles: and his knowledge of the Dutch buildings, discovered by himself, seem more especially to lead our conjectures to a Dutch island.

However, on the contrary, he has known some leaves on which some Malabar characters were engraved. He has given us to understand, that they were hung round the necks of slaves, and that those characters were engraved with a bodkin. He has also drawn an uniform, resembling that of the Cipayes, and distinguished by the lining of the vest.

But when he was shewn, in the map of the world, the places where these things were found, and asked if he came from thence, he replied by negative signs. If he is of the Antilles, or of Surinam, and Dutch, he might have had some knowledge of them without having been in the East Indies.

When some snow-shoes were offered him, of which the inhabitants of the North make use to go on the ice, he immediately put his feet into them, and shewed that something was wanting to fasten them. He made it also appear, that he was acquainted with the manner in which the savages of North America wrap themselves up in their cloaths; but this last custom is common to many savage nations; and one circumstance, which induces a belief, either that he is acquainted with those customs by hearsay, or that he may have seen them in some dwellings in the coldest region of Chili, is, that he shews a great dislike to cold climates, and seems constantly to desire and to ask that those whom he esteems would conduct and accompany him to the South West. He expresses that, in order to arrive at his country, they must first go by sea, afterwards take horse, and make some days journeys by land. He seems, in his recitals, to speak of sea-fights and a shipwreck, of a counting-house, of money, of rich relations, of papers, letters, and a portfolio, of which he has been robbed. He often repeats the word peou, or pelou. It cannot yet be ascertained whether he means Peru, or whether it be a word which, in his idiom, has some other signification. He intimates that, when he was a child, he wore a sailor's dress, made of cotton, with a fringe of muslin; that, when he embarked, he wore a blue coat with gold embroidered buttons, faced and lined with red; that he had a musket, a large greyhound, and some horses of his own (in fact, he knows how to manage a horse.) He adds, that his father is about fifty-five years of age, and that he wears the ribbons of two orders; that his mother dresses in the European manner; that she has a hat adorned with feathers; an aigrette of jewels, some pearls on her neck and in her ears; that there are in their house some marble pavements, and a pavilion decorated with glass, the floor of which is covered with a red stuff. However, as he applies the name of Father, which he pronounces Poupa, to his patrons in France, it is possible that what he endeavours to express on that subject does not really mean his father, but the commandant of some European settlement, by whom he may have been succoured and protected. He makes it also understood, that there are some mines in his country, which produce gold and silver, of which money is coined; that the use of coaches is not known there, but only a kind of calash. Lastly, he appears to have some knowledge of the late American war.

All the intelligence that can be drawn from him is comprised in this advertisement. But no stress is laid on the various various conjectures to which it may have given rise; as, not knowing our language, in the multitude of particulars which he wishes to communicate, those which really relate to his country or his family cannot be distinguished from those which he may have learned in his travels.

* Qu. what?

The idiom which he speaks is a medley of words corrupted from different languages, and of a great number of French words mutilated and distorted; the greatest part of which he may have learned since he has been in France; some of them he learns every day.—When first he came to Paris, he did not articulate the letters h, l, r, ch, j. He now pronounces them, and even our liquid l. His prosody is drawling; it is composed of long sounds, blended with sounds still longer. This slowness renders it soft, though he chiefly employs the strong articulations p, t, g, f, and b.

We must not be surprised at not having discovered what is his idiom, when we consider that there are in the world at least thirty general languages, and some thousand jargons, or gibberish, each of which is only spoken and understood in a small district; possibly, being born of an European in the Antilles, or on the continent of South America, he may, as children often are in that country, have been exposed, if we may so express it, among the Negro, Caribbee, Brazilian, and other slaves, and only speak the jargon used by those slaves. On the whole, we shall only repeat, that what has been just said, and all that we are yet able to say, of this young man and his country, are vague conjectures, which can be confirmed or destroyed by two methods only; the one is, the knowledge which he will acquire of our language; and in this he makes a progress very perceivable to those who see him constantly: the other is, his being claimed by his family. In order to open and extend this view, it has been determined to make this advertisement as public as possible. We wish most ardently that it may reach his relations; and we share, by anticipation, some part of the joy which they will feel on hearing that this young man is at Paris, in the hands of persons of credit, in perfect health, in want of nothing, under the protection of the government, in the bosom of a nation which cherishes all strangers, and especially those who are in distress. He gives us to understand that, after disembarking in Normandy, he was robbed by several men on horseback; that they took from him a blue coat, faced and lined with red, with gold buttons, his breeches, his cotton stockings, and diamond buckles, a sword, and a watch; that he was wounded on the head and the mouth by a blow with a stone, and was left on the ground in his shirt.—We will add, which may contribute to make him known, that he is in height about five feet; his hair is tight chestnut; his eye-brows fair; his eyes light grey, small, and rather hollow; his forehead small; his nose short and thick; his mouth of a moderate size, the upper lip a little thick; his face oval, and without a beard, marked with the small pox; his neck short; his shoulders broad, and rather high; his hands small and well made, and his legs thick.

MR. URBAN,

AS Ireland is at this period the object of universal curiosity, I should presume that whatever tends to mark the progress of its inhabitants towards civilization cannot fail of being acceptable to your readers. As long as the feudal system prevailed, they who lived in a state of vassalage were not more remarkable for their attachment to their lord, than for the persevering spirit with which they prosecuted his disputes, and assisted in the gratification of his revenge. Perhaps this system was never more extensive in its operations than in Ireland. No barons ever possessed, within their own jurisdiction, more unlimited authority than the Irish nobility; nor were any vassals more remarkable for their zeal, fidelity, and attachment. The spirit is not yet evaporated; it breaks forth continually, in striking incidents, and appears wonderfully strong in the incident I am about to relate, the authenticity of which is unquestionable.

A Mr. A——, of the county of Kilkenny, possessed very extensive landed property; his steward, a man of some abilities, enjoyed the entire confidence of his master, and his only child was a youth of very promising expectations.—At the death of his father, young Mr. A. continued his affairs under the direction of the same steward, not only from respect to his father's memory, but from the favourable inclination we all feel towards those with whom we have lived in habits of familiarity.

Mr.

Mr. M. indeed, the steward, had acquired some property, and so much consequence in the family, that, in process of time, he married the widow, declaring, on all occasions, that he intended his fortune should ultimately revert to those by whose favour it was obtained. Young Mr. A. continued to live in the most perfect harmony with his mother and her husband till the time of her death, which happened not long after her second marriage. There was, in the same town, a young woman of some accomplishments, but of very inferior rank and connections. She appeared in so pleasing a light to the steward, now a widower, that, in spite of the difference of age, his former declarations, and his immediate connection with Mr. A, he determined to marry her. Mr. A, somewhat inflamed by disappointment and resentment, immediately demanded the management of his own affairs, and fixed a period for the final balance of all accounts with his steward. Altercations ensued, which terminated in a law-suit; and this was prosecuted by both parties with equal obstinacy and acrimony. At the time of trial in the County Court, the old man was so far tempted by passion as to forget himself, and struck the son of his former master. The very following night his cattle were houghed, his fences thrown down, his ricks burned, his house levelled with the ground, and himself very narrowly escaped with life. One of his servants being indiscreetly enough heard to exclaim, "I know you," was instantly seized by the perpetrators of the above, hurried into the mountains with which that county abounds, shot, and afterwards burned. He was assured, while yet alive, that his death was not in consequence of any dislike to him individually, but inflicted merely for their own security. He was treated in his last moments with attention and some degree of tenderness, and the choice of the manner of his death submitted to himself.

Suspicion was immediately directed to five of Mr. A.'s tenants, who really were the propagators of the incidents above related, and who, without much reserve, related the particulars of the place and manner of the servant's death, who was never heard of afterwards. They were accordingly apprehended, tried, and acquitted for want of evidence. The neighbourhood are perfectly satisfied of their guilt; but they themselves, though not ignorant of the imputations under which they labour, are not only careless of all consequences, but seem proud of the lengths they have gone to prove their zeal and personal attachment to their master. I must add, that the popular odium against Mr. A, from the supposition that he connived at their violence, or at least took no pains to prevent it, is at present so strong that he has been compelled to retire to the Continent, where he now resides.—Upon the above I make no comment, for its length has exceeded my expectation. You may be assured that every circumstance related is individually true. Yours, &c. A. B.

ANECDOTES of Dr. HOOKE, from Two original Letters of Sir GODFREY COPLEY to THOMAS KIRKE, Esq.

1. "YOUR old Philosopher is gone at last to try experiments with his ancestors. He is dead, they say, without a will; had only a poor girl with him, who, seeing him ill, went to call somebody, and he was quite gone before they came. Thus departed the great Doctor Hooke." March 4, 1702-3.

2. "I HAVE little to write of our friends, whom I contrive, if possible, to see once a week, if it be but two hours. The Society have warning to remove: the poor Corporation of London stand in need to make some profit of the ground of Gresham College. I wonder old Dr. Hooke did not chuse rather to leave his 12,000*l.* to continue what he had promoted and studied all the days of his life (I mean mathematical experiments), than to have it go to those whom he never saw or cared for. It is rare that Virtuosos die rich; and it is pity they should, if they were like him.—I know you are employed in your wood, which now you have brought to perfection: but pray let me know how Mr. Airlington employs his time. He is as good a correspondent to me from the country as he was to you from London; and I am as bad as he.—We drink your health at Pontack's.—Dr. Sloane and Mr. Hallye bade me remember their service to you. Your affectionate friend, G. COPLEY." Apr. 29.

RUSTICUS wishes for some account of John Hartcliffe, B. D. fellow of King's Coll. Cambridge, and author of a book On the Moral and Intellectual Virtues, printed at London, in 1691, for C. Harper, at the Flower-de-luce, over-against St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet-street.

ARISTIDES requests a biographical account of the late Dr. Bolton, Dean of Carlisle.

99. Captain Cook's last Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, &c. &c. (Continued from p. 686.)

THE following is an abstract of the account given of the reception of Omai among his countrymen, after his return from England.

"On the 12th of August, 1777, we reached Otaheite. When we first drew near the island, several canoes came off to the ship, each conducted by two or three men. But, as they were common fellows, Omai took no particular notice of them, nor they of him. They did not even seem to perceive that he was one of their countrymen, although they conversed with him for some time. At length a Chief, whom I had known before, named Ootee, and Omai's brother-in-law, who chanced to be now at this corner of the island *, and 3 or 4 more persons, all of whom knew Omai before he embarked with Capt. Furneaux, came on board. Yet there was nothing either tender or striking in their meeting. On the contrary, there seemed to be a perfect indifference on both sides, till Omai, having taken his brother down into the cabin, opened the drawer where he kept his red feathers, and gave him a few. This being presently known among the rest of the natives upon deck, the face of affairs was entirely turned, and Ootee, who would hardly speak to Omai before, now begged that they might be sayos †, and exchange names. Omai accepted of the honour, and confirmed it with a present of red feathers; and Ootee, by way of return, sent ashore for a hog. But it was evident to every one of us, that it was not the man, but his property, they were in love with. Had he not shewn to them his treasure of red feathers, which is the commodity in greatest estimation in the island, I question much whether they would have bestowed even a cocoa-nut upon him. Such was Omai's first reception among his countrymen. I own, I never expected it would be otherwise; but still I was in hopes that the valuable cargo of presents, with which the liberality of his friends in England had loaded him, would be the means of raising him into consequence, and of making him respected, and even courted, by the first persons throughout the Society Islands. This could not but have happened, had he conducted himself with any degree of prudence. But, instead of it, I am sorry to say, that he paid too little regard to the repeated advice of those who wished him well, and suffered himself to be duped by every designing knave."

"The important news of red feathers being on board our ships, brought a multitude of canoes early the next morning. Soon after we had anchored in Oheitepeha bay, Omai's sister came on board to see him. To their mutual honour, their meeting was marked with expressions of the tenderest affection, easier to be conceived than to be described.

"Omai and I then went on shore, where he presented some feathers to the god of Bolabola, an elderly infirm man, who was carried about on a hand-barrow. But, after a short conversation with this Bolabola man, his attention was drawn to an old woman, the sister of his mother. She was already at his feet, and had bedewed them plentifully with tears of joy."

The Captain now discovered, that since his last visit some Spaniards from Lima had been at Otaheite. An house and wooden cross, as well as the conversation of the natives, proclaimed this intelligence.

Omai then began to harangue his countrymen in large parties, and was with difficulty carried on board again. When he paid a visit soon after, he dressed himself, not like the native of any particular place, but in a strange medley of all that he possessed.

The celebrated Oberca * was dead; but the Captain found his other friends living, and particularly the king, Otoo, to whom he paid a visit of state on the 24th, with Omai, who behaved very properly.

"Soon after (to use Capt. Cook's words) the king's mother, who had not been present at the first interview, came on board, bringing with her a quantity of provisions and cloth, which she divided between me and Omai. For although he was but little noticed, at first, by his countrymen, they no sooner gained the knowledge of his riches, than they began to court his friendship. I encouraged this as much as I could; for it was my wish to fix him with Otoo. As I intended to leave all my European animals at this island, I thought he would be able to give some instruction about the management of them, and about their use. Besides, I knew and saw that the farther he was from his native island, he would be the better respected. But, unfortunately, poor Omai rejected my advice, and conducted himself in so imprudent a manner, that he soon lost the friendship of Otoo, and of every other person of note in Otaheite. He associated with none but vagabonds and strangers, whose sole views were to plunder him. And, if I had not interfered, they would not have left him a single article worth carrying from the island. This necessarily drew upon him the ill-will of the principal Chiefs; who found that they could not procure, from any one in the ships, such valuable presents as Omai be-

* Miss Seward, though an excellent poetess, is, it seems, no prophetess, as, in her fine Elegy, she has introduced this lady pathetically lamenting Capt. Cook's death.

flowed

* The S. E. part.

† Friends.

flowed on the lowest of the people, his companions." . . .

On Sept. 4, Omai gave them a dinner on shore, consisting of excellent fare, fish, fowls, pork, and puddings. He accompanied Capt. Cook in all his parties, and was very useful, as an interpreter, on many occasions.

"Omai was seldom rewarded for his presents. Once, however, he got a fine double-sailing canoe, completely equipped, and fit for sea. Some time before, I had made up for him a suit of English colours; but he thought these too valuable to be used at this time; and patched up a parcel of colours, such as flags and pendants, to the number of ten or a dozen, which he spread on different parts of his vessel, all at the same time, and drew together as many people to look at her as a man of war would, dressed, in an European port. These streamers of Omai were a mixture of English, French, Spanish, and Dutch, which were all the European colours he had seen. When I was last at this island I gave to Oroo an English jack and pendant, and to Towha a pendant, which I now found they had preserved with the greatest care.

"Omai had also provided himself with a good stock of cloth and cocoa-nut oil, which are not only in great plenty, but much better, at Otaheite, than at any of the Society Islands; insomuch that they are articles of trade. Omai would not have behaved so inconsistently, and so much unlike himself, as he did, in many instances, but for his sister and brother-in-law, who, together with a few more of their acquaintance, engrossed him entirely to themselves, with no other view than to strip him of every thing he had got. And they would, undoubtedly, have succeeded in their scheme, if I had not put a stop to it in time, by taking the most useful articles of his property into my possession. But even this would not have saved Omai from ruin, if I had suffered these relations of his to have gone with, or to have followed us to, his intended place of settlement, Huaheine. This they had intended; but I disappointed their farther views of plunder by forbidding them to shew themselves in that island, while I remained in the neighbourhood; and they knew me too well not to comply." . . .

They left Otaheite on September 29, as Omai refused to fix himself there. This Capt. Cook lamented, for there was no probability of their being provided with refreshments better or cheaper at any other place.

They found there, and were visited by, one of the two natives whom the Spaniards had carried to Lima. The visit, however, was never repeated.

"At this," the Captain observes, "I rather wondered, as I had received him with uncommon civility. I believe, however, that Omai had kept him at a distance from me, by some rough usage, jealous that there should be another traveller upon the island who might vie with himself. Our touching at Teneriffe was a fortunate circumstance for Omai; as he prided himself in having visited a place belonging to Spain, as well as this man. I did not meet with the other who had returned from Lima; but Capt. Clerke, who had seen him, spoke of him as a low fellow, and as a little out of his senses. His own countrymen, I found, agreed in the same account with him. In short, these two adventurers seemed to be held in no esteem. They had not, indeed, been so fortunate as to return home with such valuable acquisitions of property as we had bestowed upon Omai; and with the advantages he reaped from his voyage to England, it must be his own fault if he should sink into the same state of insignificance."

Omai then accompanied the Captain to Eimeo, from which place they sailed to Huaheine, where it was determined that Omai should settle. The business was thus negotiated, Oct. 13:

"After the hurry of the morning was over, we got ready to pay a formal visit to Tairetareca [the Chief], meaning then to introduce this business. Omai dressed himself very properly on this occasion, and prepared a handsome present for the Chief himself, and another for his Eatooa. Indeed, after he had got clear of the gang that surrounded him at Otaheite, he behaved with such prudence as to gain respect. Our landing drew most of our visitors from the ships; and they, as well as those that were on shore, assembled in a large house. The concourse of people on this occasion was very great; and amongst them there appeared to be a greater proportion of personable men and women than we had ever seen in one assembly at any of these new islands. Not only the bulk of the people seemed in general much stouter and fairer than those of Otaheite, but there was also a much greater number of men who appeared to be of consequence, in proportion to the extent of the island; most of whom had exactly the corpulent appearance of the Chiefs of Watoo.—We waited some time for Tairetareca, as I would do nothing till the Earterabic came; but when he appeared, I found that his presence might have been dispensed with, as he was not above 8 or 10 years of age. Omai, who stood at a little distance from this circle of great men, began with making his offering to the gods, consisting of red feathers, cloth, &c. Then followed another offering, which was to be given to the gods by the Chief; and, after that, several other small pieces and tufts of red feathers were presented. Each article was laid before one of the company, company, who, I understood, was a priest, and was delivered with a set speech or prayer, spoken by one of Omai's friends, who sat by him, but mostly dictated by himself. In these prayers he did not forget his friends in England, nor those who had brought him safe back. The Barcarabie no Pretane, Lord Sandwich, *Toote, Tates, were mentioned in every one of them. When Omai's offerings and prayers were finished, the priest took each article, in the same order in which it had been laid before him, and after repeating a prayer, sent it to the morai; which, as Omai told us, was at a great distance, otherwise the offerings would have been made there.

"These religious ceremonies having been performed, Omai sat down by me, and we entered upon business, by giving the young Chief my present, and receiving his in return; and, all things considered, they were liberal enough on both sides. Some arrangements were next agreed upon, as to the manner of carrying on the intercourse betwixt us; and I pointed out the mischievous consequences that would attend their robbing us, as they had done during my former visits. Omai's establishment was then proposed to the assembled Chiefs.

"He acquainted them, "That he had been carried by us into our country, where he was well received by the great King and his Barues, and treated with every mark of regard and affection while he stayed amongst us; that he had been brought back again, enriched, by our liberality, with a variety of articles, which would prove very useful to his countrymen; and that, besides the two horses, which were to remain with him, several other new and valuable animals had been left at Otaheite, which would soon multiply, and furnish a sufficient number for the use of all the islands in the neighbourhood. He then signified to them, that it was my earnest request, in return for all my friendly offices, that they would give him a piece of land to build a house upon, and to raise provisions for himself and servants; adding that, if this could not be obtained for him in Huaheine, either by gift or purchase, I was determined to carry him to Ulictea, and fix him there."

Captain Cook, however, undeceived them instantly, and declared against all hostilities; observing, that if Omai went to Ulictea, it must be as a friend, and not be forced on the Bolabola men as their conqueror.

The Chiefs then declared that Omai should have as much land in Huaheine as Capt. Cook chose; and at length the ground fixed on was about two hundred yards along the shore of the harbour, and somewhat more in depth. Part of the hill was included in the grant.

* Cook and Clerke.

"This business being settled to the satisfaction of all parties, I set up a tent ashore, established a post, and erected the observatories. The carpenters of both ships were also set to work to build a small house for Omai, in which he might secure the European commodities that were his property. At the same time some hands were employed in making a garden for his use, planting shaddocks, vines, pine-apples, melons, and the seeds of several other vegetable articles; all of which I had the satisfaction of observing to be in a flourishing state before I left the island.

"Omai now began seriously to attend to his own affairs, and repented heartily of his ill-judged prodigality while at Otaheite. He found at Huaheine a brother, a sister, and a brother-in-law, the sister being married. But these did not plunder him, as he had lately been by his other relations. I was sorry, however, to discover that, though they were too honest to do him any injury, they were of too little consequence in the island to do him any positive good. They had neither authority nor influence to protect his person or his property, and in that helpless situation I had reason to apprehend that he ran great risk of being stripped of every thing he had got from us, as soon as he should cease to have us within his reach, to enforce the good behaviour of his countrymen, by an immediate appeal to our irresistible power.

"A man who is richer than his neighbours is sure to be envied by numbers who wish to see him brought down to their own level. But in countries where civilization, law, and religion impose their restraints, the rich have a reasonable ground of security. And, besides, there being, in all such communities, a diffusion of property, no single individual need fear that the efforts of all the poorer sort can ever be united to injure him, exclusively of others who are equally the objects of envy. It was very different with Omai. He was to live amongst those who are strangers, in a great measure, to any other principle of action besides the immediate impulse of their natural feelings. But, what was his principal danger, he was to be placed in the very singular situation of being the only rich man in the community to which he was to belong. And having, by a fortunate conjunction with us, got into his possession an accumulated quantity of a species of treasure which none of his countrymen could create by any art or industry of their own, while all coveted a share of this envied wealth, it was natural to apprehend that all would be ready to join in attempting to strip its sole proprietor.

"To prevent this, if possible, I advised him to make a proper distribution of some of his moveables to two or three of the principal Chiefs, who, being thus gratified themselves, might be induced to take him under their patronage, and protect him from the injuries injuries of others. He promised to follow my advice; and I heard with satisfaction, before I sailed, that this very prudent step had been taken. Not trusting, however, entirely to the operations of gratitude, I had recourse to the more forcible motive of intimidation. With this view, I took every opportunity of notifying to the inhabitants, that it was my intention to return to their island again, after being absent the usual time; and that if I did not find Omai in the same state of security in which I was now about to leave him, all those whom I should then discover to have been his enemies might expect to feel the weight of my resentment. This threatening declaration will, probably, have no inconsiderable effect. For our successive visits of late years have taught these people to believe that our ships are to return at certain periods; and while they continue to be impressed with such a notion, which I thought it a fair stratagem to confirm, Omai has some prospect of being permitted to thrive upon his new plantation....

"Omai's house being nearly finished, many of his moveables were carried ashore. Amongst a variety of other useless articles was a box of toys, which, when exposed to public view, seemed greatly to please the gazing multitude. But, as to his pots, kettles, dishes, plates, drinking-mugs, glasses, and the whole train of our domestic accommodations, hardly any one of his countrymen would so much as look at them. Omai himself now began to think that they were of no manner of use to him; that a baked hog was more savory food than a boiled one; that a plantain-leaf made as good a dish or plate as pewter; and that a cocoa-nut shell was as convenient a goblet as a black-jack. And, therefore, he very wisely disposed of as many of these articles of English furniture for the kitchen and pantry as he could find purchasers for amongst the people of the ships; receiving from them, in return, hatchets, and other iron tools, which had a more intrinsic value in this part of the world, and added more to his distinguishing superiority over those with whom he was to pass the remainder of his days.

"In the long list of the presents bestowed upon him in England, fire-works had not been forgot. Some of these we exhibited, in the evening of the 28th, before a great concourse of people, who beheld them with a mixture of pleasure and fear. What remained, after the evening's entertainment, were put in order, and left with Omai, agreeably to their original destination. Perhaps we need not lament it as a serious misfortune that the far greater share of this part of his cargo had been already expended in exhibitions at other islands, or rendered useless by being kept so long....

"As soon as Omai was settled in his new habitation, I began to think of leaving the island, and got every thing off from the shore this evening, except the horse and mare, and a goat big with kid, which were left in the possession of our friend, with whom we were now finally to part. I also gave him a ~~boar~~ and two sows, of the English breed; and he had got a sow or two of his own. The horse covered the mare while we were at Otaheite; so that I consider the introduction of a breed of horses into these islands as likely to have succeeded by this valuable present.

"The history of Omai will, perhaps, interest a very numerous class of readers more than any other occurrence of a voyage, the objects of which do not, in general, promise much entertainment. Every circumstance, therefore, which may serve to convey a satisfactory account of the exact situation in which he was left will be thought worth preserving; and the following particulars are added, to complete the view of his domestic establishment. He had picked up at Otaheite four or five *Toutous; the two New Zealand youths remained with him; and his brother, and some others, joined him at Hoaheine; so that his family consisted already of eight or ten persons; if that can be called a family, to which not a single female as yet belonged, nor, I doubt, was likely to belong, unless its master became less volatile. At present, Omai did not seem at all disposed to take unto himself a wife.

"The house which we erected for him was twenty-four feet by eighteen, and ten feet high. It was composed of boards, the spoils of our military operations at Eimeo; and in building it, as few nails as possible were used, that there might be no inducement, from the love of iron, to pull it down. It was settled, that immediately after our departure he should begin to build a large house, after the fashion of his country; one end of which was to be brought over that which we had erected, so as to inclose it entirely, for greater security. In this work some of the Chiefs promised to assist him; and, if the intended building should cover the ground which he marked out, it will be as large as most upon the island.

"His European weapons consisted of a musket, bayonet, and cartouch-box; a fowling-piece, two pair of pistols, and two or three swords or cutlasses. The possession of these made him quite happy; which was my only view in giving him such presents: for I was always of opinion, that he would be happier without fire-arms, and other European weapons, than with them; as such implements of war, in the hands of one whose prudent use of them I had some grounds for mistrusting, would rather increase his danger than establish his superiority. After he had got on shore every thing that belonged to him, and was settled in his house, he had most of the officers of both ships two or three times to dinner, and his table was always supplied with the very best provisions that the island produced.

* The lowest class of the people.

"Before I sailed, I had the following inscription cut upon the outside of his house:

Georgius Tertius, Rex, 2 Novembris, 1777.
Navis { Resolution, Jac. Cook, Pr.
{ Discovery, Car. Clarke, Pr.

"On the 2d of November, at four in the afternoon, I took the advantage of a breeze, which then sprung up at East, and sailed out of the harbour. Most of our friends remained on board till the ships were under sail; when, to gratify their curiosity, I ordered five guns to be fired. They then all took their leave, except Omai, who remained till we were at sea. We had come to sail by a hawser fastened to the shore. In casting the ship, it parted, being cut by the rocks, and the outer end was left behind; as those who cast it off did not perceive that it was broken, so that it became necessary to send a boat to bring it on board. In this boat Omai went ashore, after taking a very affectionate farewell of all the officers. He sustained himself with a manly resolution till he came to me: then his utmost efforts to conceal his tears failed; and Mr. King, who went in the boat, told me he wept all the time in going ashore.

"It was satisfactory to reflect that we had brought him safe to the same spot from whence he was taken. And yet probably his situation was less desirable than before his connection with us; not so much from the loss of the civilised life he had tasted, as from his hazardous situation in respect to personal safety. Omai, much caressed in England, lost sight of his original condition, and never thought of applying his knowledge or riches to any proper purpose of greatness or felicity. Revenge, rather than advancement, occupied his mind. Through the whole voyage, he talked of nothing else than dispossessing the conquerors of Ulitea, and recovering the property held there by his father. As we advanced, this error lest him, and he grew so diffident of his reception at home, that he would fain have staid at Tongataboo. There, and at the other islands, he squandered his treasure very unprofitably; and at Otahete formed such improper connections, that Otoo, at first disposed to countenance him, afterwards expressed his dislike to him. At Otahete, where he had lived several years, he might have risen to great advantage, and possibly some little rank, the foundation of all distinction and power on these islands, might have been obtained for him. As a stranger, and therefore naturally claiming respect, he would have attained it at Otahete more advantageously than in his native island of Huahine. But all this gave way to his ideas of revenge on the Bolabola men; nay, even when the ambassador or priest of

GENT. MAG. October, 1784.

Tiaraboo offered to reinstate him in his father's property, he peremptorily refused, and to the last was determined on an early opportunity of satisfying himself in battle.

"Whatever faults belonged to Omai's character, they were more than over-balanced by his great good-nature and docile disposition: I was very seldom seriously displeased with his general conduct. His heart was always grateful. He had a tolerable understanding, but wanted application and perseverance to exert it. He was not a man of much observation. There were many useful arts, as well as elegant amusements, at the Friendly Islands, which he might have carried home; but he was indifferent to the introduction of any of them. . . .

"The fruits and vegetables we left with him, we are confident, he will cultivate. But the greatest benefit these islands are likely to receive from Omai's travels will be in the animals that have been left on them, which probably they never would have got, had he never come to England. When these multiply, of which there is little doubt, Otahete and the Society Islands will equal, if not exceed, any place in the known world, for provisions."

(To be continued.)

100. A compendious History of Capt. Cook's Voyage. 12mo.

THE Iliad in a nut-shell! Of three large quartos a duodecimo volume must be a "compendium" indeed. Nothing more need be said of the merit of this catchpenny (which at first had a more imposing title), than that it contains some extracts, verbatim, from that excellent voyage, which cannot be abridged without being maimed.

101. Instructor Clericalis B. R. and C. B.
By Mr. John Impey, of the Inner Temple.
2 Vols. 8vo.

WE deferred offering to our readers any observations on the former of these volumes, which appeared last Michaelmas Term, because we then understood that it was the author's intention to pursue the same regular method of instruction to practitioners in the Court of Common Pleas. The work attracted peculiar notice from the author's affixing his name, and being universally known for accuracy and acuteness in his profession; and it is with great pleasure we are able to say, that he has surpassed all the writers of this branch of the law in practical utility; and the plainness of his manner, and the regular course which he observes, to carry the student from the first to the last proceeding proceeding in every cause, are deserving of much more praise than preceding writers have deserved; and we are credibly informed, that both the volumes have received the approbation of some of the leading men in both Courts.—The Office of Sheriffs is subjoined to the first volume.

102. A Sermon occasioned by the Death of the Rev. Andrew Gifford, D. D. By John Rippon. With an Address delivered at his Interment, by John Ryland, M. A. 8vo.

OF this Sermon we shall only say, that the text is taken from Isai xxxviii. 17, and that the subject is “the pains and pleasures attending religion” and “the love of God in pardoning sin;” as the account of the Doctor’s life and labours has been abridged from it by a correspondent in p. 595.

103. Commentaries and Essays. Published by the Society for promoting the Knowledge of the Scriptures. No I. To be continued occasionally. 8vo.

THIS new-erected Society (of whose plan a sketch is prefixed) must not be confounded with one of a very similar title, established in 1699, viz. the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge. The Institutors and promoters of this Society are anonymous; though, if we may judge of the whole from a part, they seem to be disciples of Dr. Priestley.—Their professed design is, 1. to comment on detached portions of Scripture; 2. to give notes critical, philological, and explanatory of rites and customs, historical facts, &c.; and, 3. conclusions, doctrinal and moral. In this the laity and clergy are equally invited to assist and co-operate. Some tracts and papers on these subjects are also proposed to be occasionally republished; the expence of printing is to be defrayed by the Society; and no stated mode or time of publication is professed to be observed. “The right of free enquiry, and of private judgment,” seems to be their leading principle.—The subjects of the present number are, I. “An Attempt to illustrate John xiv. 1, 2, 3.” Signed Sospater.—II. “A new Translation of Isaiah lii. 13, liii. 12, with “Notes.” Signed M. D. Of Bishop Lowth’s translation, &c. this author premises, “Though much may be done by this very learned and ingenious writer, yet I am confident that great improvements may be made, as well in translating, as in explaining the writings of this evangelical prophet. The Bishop is particularly defective in one point, which appears to me to be of singular importance. I mean in respect to the passages cited in the New Testament from the prophet. Several of these passages, as they stand in his version, are essentially different from the citations. St. Paul, in Romans xv. 21, intended to cite the two last lines of chap. lii of Isaiah; but, if the Bishop’s version be just, the original conveys a very different meaning from the citation. In like manner, three lines of Isaiah liii. 8, are understood to be cited in Acts viii. 33; but two of these lines, in the Bishop’s version, are totally different from the citation. In neither of these instances doth he attempt to reconcile the difference, or to account for it. It appears to me highly probable, that in both instances there was a perfect agreement between the original and the citation; and that the difference was occasioned by the corruption of the original, either by accident or design. I may add, that if the two first lines of Isaiah liii. 4, which are cited in Matt. viii. 7, as being fulfilled in the cures performed by our Saviour on certain diseased persons, be rightly translated by the Bishop, they are strangely misapplied by the Evangelist. But the mistake is certainly in the translation, and not in the application. It may perhaps be found, that in other respects the learned author fails materially in his explication of the passage of Isaiah here considered*.”

III. “The Illustration of Christ’s “last Discourse with his Disciples, continued, John xiv. 4, &c. to the End “of the Chapter.” Signed also Sospater. Part of this is endeavoured to be reconciled with the Unitarian System (as it is called), it being contended that “praying in the name of Christ, “here enjoined, related only to the “Apostles and the times,” and that “almost every word concerning the “Deity, uttered by Christ, declared or “implied that the Father, the God, “and Father of himself and of all, was “the only true God †.”

* In another place this writer accuses the Bishop of having been, “on many occasions, “misled by early prejudices, and an undue “attachment to established systems.”

† It is scarce worth while to notice here a grammatical inaccuracy. John xvii. 1, 3: “O Father, this is life eternal, to know “thee, the only true God.” Here he says, ver. 28, My Father is greater than I. “From “which,” says this writer, “it has been “well inferred, that Christ therefore is not “the only true God; for none is, or can be, “greater than him.”

104. Libanii Sophistæ Orationes et Declamationes ad fidem Codicum M. S. P. T. recensuit, et perpetuâ adnotatione illustravit, Jo. Jacobus Reiske. Vol. I. Altenburgi. 4to.

LIBANIUS, the Sophist, who was born at Antioch, on the Orontes, A. D. 314, and lived to the reign of Arcadius, that is, beyond the seventieth year of his age, is well known by his friendship with the Emperor Julian, and by his voluminous writings, of which two volumes in folio were published by Frederick Morell, in Greek and Latin, 1606 and 1627; and another volume, in folio, of Epistles, by Wolfius, in 1738.—“Though so many of the writings of this Sophist are preserved,” says Fabricius, “there is no doubt that many, both of his Epistles and Orations, have been lost.” Of this we have a proof before us, the learned Editor, in the present edition (which is posthumous), having recovered five Orations. He had the use of six MSS.; and has annexed several explanatory notes, but no translation. The Orations here published are XIX, viz. his own Life, (written, he says, when he was sixty); this Mr. Gibbon styles “a vain, prolix, but curious narrative;” against those who called him vain-glorious (first published by Fabricius); to the young men; against lying; encomium of Diana; on covetousness; on ill-acquired wealth; on the calends; on the Plethrum (a building at Antioch); on Julian’s consulship; in behalf of Aristophanes; to intreat Julian to visit Antioch, rather than Tarsus; to the Antiochians; on appeasing the Emperor’s resentment (first published also, but imperfectly, by Fabricius); monody on Julian; funeral oration on Julian; to Theodosius, on the tumult at Antioch; on the reconciliation; and to Cæsarius Magister, for his assistance in quelling the riot.

105. Curialia: or, An Historical Account of some Branches of the Royal Household, &c. &c. Part II. Containing a Memoir, addressed to the President of the Society of Antiquaries, London, regarding the King’s Honourable Band of Gentlemen Pensioners,*

* The President (not named) is repeatedly addressed, by our author, as a commoner, though his letter is dated “Whitehall, June 4, 1784,” when it is certain that the Captain of the Band, the present Earl of Leicester, was President of the Society of from its Establishment to the present Time. By Samuel Pegge, Esq. 4to.

HAVING, in his two former Dissertations, (see vol. LII. p. 340,) discussed two branches of the Royal Establishment, viz. the Esquires of the Body, and the Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber, of which “the first is entirely vanished, and the second is little less so, except in name,” he now proceeds to “this demi-military corps,” which, with its “pendant or companion,” the Yeomen of the Guard, (an account of which is to follow,) both of French extraction, are, “at present, the only interior body-guards of the person of the sovereign.”

The Band of Gentlemen Pensioners (as it is now styled) “originally composed of cadets of noble families, and of the higher order of gentry, who were afterwards transplanted, for the most part, into the army,” was established, we are told, not by King Henry VII, or Queen Elizabeth, as has been commonly supposed, but by King Henry VIII, in 1509, the first year of his reign, “at the instance,” says Lloyd, in his Worthies, “of Sir Wm. Compton.”—Several writers say, that “the corps was soon after disbanded, on account of the expence, and not revived till 1539.” But this Mr. Pegge shews to be “absolutely fallacious.”—We are next presented with its original Statutes, or Ordinances, and the Oath to be taken by each individual, a curious MS. in the Cottonian Library. It was to consist of “certaine Speres,” or Spear-men, “of noble blood,” the number not ascertained, each of whom was to appear in “harness,” or armour, and to have “two double horses,” great or managed horses, “at the least, for himself and his page; also his coustrell,” or “rather coustill, from coustillier, the servant of a man of arms,” properly “armed and horsed,” and two archers, also armed and horsed. To support this retinue, each spear was to have a daily pay of 3s. 4d. or 6ol. 16s. 8d. per annum. And the whole to be commanded by a Captain and Lieutenant, not named, though the printed accounts say, that “the Earl of Essex was Captain, and Sir Jn. Peachy Lieutenant.” About 1526, to raise the stipends of Antiquaries, having been elected (when Lord De Ferrars) on the preceding St. George’s day, April 23. See p. 314.

some additional officers, viz. a Standard-bearer, a Clerk of the Cheque, and a Harbinger, the pay of each pensioner was reduced to 50l.; and about this period, or soon after*, the battle-axe, then in use, was probably introduced, adopted, perhaps, from the becs de corbin, borne by the most ancient household troops in France; an institution which ours is shewn very much to resemble. — From 1526, tracing the Band through the remainder of that reign, our author finds them attending on Blackheath and at Greenwich, at the ceremonial of receiving the Princess Anne of Cleves, in 1539; escorting his Majesty at his grand entrance into Boulogne, in 1544; marching at the coronation of Edward the Sixth; mustered in Saint James's Field†, in 1551, much to the satisfaction of that young monarch (as expressed in his Journal), and performing mock-fights and sieges; receiving at Hampton Court, and escorting to London, the Queen Dowager of Scotland, in 1550, and attending the King in a progress in 1551; of real use, as a military body, in Queen Mary's reign, by defending Whitehall Palace in Wyatt's insurrection, 1553; mustered before her Majesty in Greenwich and Hyde Parks, 1556 and 7; and, in short, from "its meridian, which it seems to have passed with the demise of Q. Elizabeth," he pursues its history thro' the three succeeding reigns to 1670 (so corrected in the Appendix), when from fifty it was reduced to forty, at which number it has ever since continued, and the salaries advanced to the present standard; and from thence to the present

* Yet, from some of these gentlemen appearing with their battle-axes in the picture of the Champ de Drap d'Or, in 1520, "one is led to imagine," says our author, p. 20, "that the battle-axe had obtained about that period."

† "What was then St. James's Field is now Pall Mall, the adjacent streets, &c. [See a View of St. James's Palace and Westminster Abbey, from the Village of Charing, engraved from a drawing of Hollar, in the Antiquarian Repertory, vol. I. facing p. 197.] It is worth remarking, that there was so little connection between the City of London and this Village, in the reign of King Henry VII. that an Act of Parliament was made, 1533, to mend the road between the Strand-Cross (where the New-Church now stands) and Charing Cross, it having become almost impassable. This Act is printed in Rastall's Statutes."

times; observing, that "the Band actually received an order from the Lieutenant, in the absence of the Captain, to prepare themselves to attend King George II, who had resolved to set up his standard on Finchley Common," in 1745, and that "they have a prescriptive right to carry up the royal dinner on coronations, and also at Saint George's Feast."

In the Appendix No I. is "A List of the Captains of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners, from its Establishment, A. D. 1509." In this List it is observable, that the second Earl of Suffolk is styled Lord Walden, though his name was Howard; yet the noble Lord who has lately claimed, and been allowed the same barony, was summoned, if we mistake not, as Lord Howard, though his name is Griffin. And it is observed, that the present Captain, the Earl of Leicester, as Baron Bouchier and Louvaine, is the lineal heir and representative of Henry Bouchier, Earl of Essex, the first Captain of the Band."—No II. "Orders of K. James II. A. D. 1684," which differ widely from those of K. Charles I. or K. Charles II.—And No III. "Additions and Corrections."

106. An Apology for the Metastrophics which were published in 1782 &c. With a second Collection of Metastrophics. By George Isaac Huntingford, M. A. Fellow of New College, Oxford. 8vo.

"SOME elaborate and learned strictures," as our author justly and candidly styles them, on his former work, which appeared in the Monthly Review for June and August 1783, have occasioned this Apology, in which he defends the metrical propriety of most of the expressions arraigned, with great acuteness, and on very respectable authority: 1. considering that of Homer as a full justification of any liberty, either in matter or style; 2. claiming also the liberties taken by every other writer of reputation; and 3. insisting on the allowance of intermixing occasionally, and with caution, various dialects, as the four are found in Homer, and three at least in Sophocles. On these principles, which have always, he says, directed him in writing Greek, Mr. Huntingford defends the controverted passages; but "verbal criticism," as he allows,

* See vol. LII. pp. 537, 589.

allows, being "a species of erudition among all others the least entertaining," we shall waive particulars, and refer those who are fond of such disquisitions to the work itself, which displays great knowledge of the subject, much good taste, and a thorough acquaintance with the Greek poets. At the same time he acknowledges many other passages as exceptionable, and of several he proposes emendations. In the course of his criticisms he digresses, however, to other subjects, which are generally instructive and entertaining. Thus, after contending that the Odes ascribed to Anacreon cannot be of the period or age pretended, because they discover no similarity of style or diction to that of the "spirited and noble scion on the death of Hipparchus," by Callistratus, a contemporary writer; and that, for a similar reason, the poems ascribed to Rowley, could not have been the production of the fifteenth century; he proceeds, in the same manner, to shew that the Hymn to Ceres, "which has been too hastily adopted as a genuine production of the immortal writer of the Iliad and Odyssey," was "not written by that Homer at least," this Hymn, as he shews, not being "written in conformity with Homer's practice, either with regard to quantity or signification of words, or application of epithets, or manner of treating the subject." It might, perhaps, he says, have been by "the second Homer, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus." For a similar reason "Clarke has condemned the Hymn to Venus," and Damnius the Hymn to Mercury.—In another pertinent digression several passages of Pindar are cited, to shew "how closely and happily" Gray, "our chief Lyric poet, in his Progress of Poetry, has followed Pindar's manner of connecting the simile and subject together."—And in a third discussion, of some length, which is thus summed up, the antiquity of the Iliad and Odyssey is very ably supported, both by external and internal evidence:

"Eustathius proves the Iliad and Odyssey to have existed nearly as we now have them, in the XIIth century after the Christian æra; Macrobius, at the end of the IVth; Longinus, in the IIIrd; Quintilian, in the Ist; Dionysius and Virgil, in the Augustan age. Aristotle proves their existence 340 years before the Christian æra; Plato, from the poet's silence about precious stones, 429 years; Sophocles and Herodotus, 480 years. The poet's silence about equitable laws (νόμοι), anchors (ἀγκυραί), and rings for the fingers, affords a very strong presumptive argument that the Iliad and Odyssey did exist before the time of Solon, and were written more than 530 years before the Christian æra. And so, without the aid of authors, to whom without end we might have appealed for testimony, that there was very early such a poet as Homer we may be convinced by evidence relative and internal, that the two poems now ascribed to that divine bard were actually in being more than 2300 years ago: an antiquity this to which no other human composition can pretend, and which can be exceeded only by the Holy Scriptures.

"Thus then my discussion ends; for as to what may be added, it is not to be considered in any other light than as imaginary evidence, which may or may not be right. It has then occurred to me, that though every other proof of the antiquity of the Iliad and Odyssey should fail, yet there are two circumstances which, to an attentive reader, would be convincing arguments that they were very ancient. One is, that there is a wonderful similarity of manners, as described in Homer's writings and the Scriptures. The other, that there is a simplicity and a vigour which bespeak an original and early genius, exerting itself before the powers of the mind had been too much shackled by art, or vitiated by luxury. Simplicity and vigour usually characterise the poetry of remote ages; 'quippe solo natura subest.' And, methinks, if we consider how copious, how various, how rich, how pathetic, how sublime, how bold, how animated, how unwearied the genius of Homer is, he will appear, in his luxuriance and energy, to be like America, that continent which owes little to the hand of civilization, impregnated as it was by nature, when it emerged from the ocean, with the seeds of every herb or tree, which man can either wish for or admire, enriched with mines that are inexhaustible and inestimable, productive of objects that at once excite astonishment, and evince a creative power working spontaneously, and without controul."

This, though in prose, is the language of a poet, who has formed himself on Homer and the best models.

— — exemplaria Græca
Nocturnâ versans — manu, versansque diurnâ.

Though we have avoided entering into a discussion of our author's verbal criticisms, we must add, that we think his use of the hiatus, in particular, "on which the Reviewer so continually animadverts," fully justified, not only
b

by authorities both ancient and modern, but by true taste. We must also applaud the respect and liberality, so becoming "a scholar and a gentleman," with which he treats his critic, though he wishes to have known him, "and to have seen his name avowed," applying, on this occasion, the speech of Ajax, Ζευ πάτερ, κ. τ. λ. Il. xvii. 645.

"Give me to see, and Ajax asks no more," &c.

In a note, p. 207, is an elegant Greek elegiac epigram, a "μῦθος φιλοφροσύνης," a testimony of respect for the memory of THOMAS LOWTH, late fellow of New College, Oxford; whose accomplishments and amiable temper endeared him to all who knew him when alive, and whose untimely death will ever be lamented by his friends and acquaintance. The literary world was deprived of a shining ornament by the loss of him, as he was well versed in every branch of polite learning, and particularly well skilled in the Greek language:—"clarus patriâ pariter virtute suaque."

Having enlarged on the prose part of this pamphlet, we shall give little more than the subjects (in English) of the Monstrophics, though they seem to be written with an elegance worthy of antiquity. "On the Muse. To a Lamb." This shall be faintly attempted in English. The sense only must be expected.

"Proud in the budding beauty of your horns,
Lamb, 'midst yon tender grass still frisk and play;
Thrice blest in ignorance! the murder's knife
You see not whetting that will pierce your throat.
Nor bleating cries, nor tongue that licks his hand,
Can melt obdurate and carnivorous man.
Oh! had I been some gentle Indian sage,
Or thy disciple, mild Pythagoras."

An English reader will immediately recollect the beautiful lines in Pope's Essay on Man.—"Thebes." With the subject the author has here imbibed the spirit of a Greek tragedian.—"On a Pigeon, that was shot as it was carrying a Letter.—On the Fragments of Sophocles.—Fate.—Orpheus." This also, as it is short, and the idea is taken from Shakspeare, shall be translated:

"Orpheus to pity could stern Pluto move,
His wife reviv'd, the ~~lute~~ so sweetly sung.

Nor strange; of poets' nerves, subdued by love, [strung *."

His lute, if right I ween, was surely

"To a Bee that appeared before Spring.—On the Vicissitude of all Things.—On a Thrush singing in Winter.—The Thrush's Answer.—Death.—On a Beechen Wood.—A mournful Reflection, during Blindness.—On the Russian War, 1783."

"—ten thousand times I've sworn,
Never to write an epigram again."

Pallada, Ep. i. 5.

"On reading the judgment pronounced on my late Monstrophics by an unknown but learned and acute critic, the above was immediately written."

107. The Case of the Rev. Dr. Harwood. 8vo.

DR. H, recovered to life and penitence, here recounts the mode of that recovery, and the misconduct and other circumstances that reduced him to the calamitous situation from which electricity, in the hands of Mr. Birch having failed, in the hands of Mr. Ford has now recovered him; and we wish his present alleviation may answer his most sanguine expectations. The author of this whimsical little tract makes so many apologies for his garrulity, that we must forgive the woe-begone pedant, and rejoice at his being able to relieve the most calamitous malady by reading Athenaus, and warm his cold feet by loading them with closet-doors.

Thus far we had actually printed, when we received a request from Dr. H. to convey to his distant friends the following intelligence:

"That the wonderful benefit which I have received in an obstinate palsy, of about two years' duration, still continues.

"That my dimness of sight, which was, at the same time, removed by electricity, of which particulars are mentioned in my Case, lately published, hath not returned; and that I am now able to read the smallest Greek type.

"That the dismal apprehensions I had, from an alarming vertigo, for many months together, of falling, every day, a sacrifice to a second paralytic stroke, are now vanished, owing, I am persuaded, principally to an issue that my judicious friend Mr. Ford, the surgeon, cut behind my neck.

"That my worthy niece, the celebrated Miss Harwood, who was cured of a long and alarming deafness by electricity, as related in my Case, continues to enjoy her hearing perfectly.

* "For Orpheus' lute was strung with poets' sinews." Two Gentlemen of Verona.

"That

"That my health and spirits, after a long and deplorable illness, are so much re-established, that I shall continue to read, as I have done 30 years, the Greek and Roman writers with any gentleman who wishes to improve himself in classical learning.

EDWARD HARWOOD."

108. A Letter to the Honourable and Right Reverend Shute Lord Bishop of Sarum; containing some gentle Strictures on his Lordship's Charge delivered to the Clergy of that Diocese, in the Year 1783: From a Lay-Member of the Church of England. 8vo.

THESE "Strictures," or Animadversions, are confined to some reproofs in the Bishop's Charge which were levelled against those clergymen in his diocese who vent extravagant notions in religion, or, in other words, are tinctured with Methodism. That part of the Charge having been quoted at length in our review of it, may be seen in vol. LIII. p. 1035; and of the manner in which it is here treated the reader may form some idea from the following short specimen:

"Of the charges exhibited against them, the first is, 'that they are persons who profess the most rigid piety.' This brings to my mind a trial in one of our courts of justice, soon after Admiral Byng's unhappy fate; in which a gentleman of the sword was called as an evidence to prove that a certain elaboratory in his neighbourhood was a great nuisance to him, because it smelled of gunpowder; when one of the counsellors immediately remarked, with much shrewdness, 'it was no wonder that our fleets and armies were so unsuccessful against the common foe, when our officers had such an antipathy to the smell of gunpowder.'—For my country's sake, I hope your Lordship has not the same dislike to piety: for, should that spirit of impiety, which hath already seized almost all orders of men among us, creep up into the bench of bishops, we must be an abandoned people indeed; the measure of our iniquities must be nearly full; we must be arrived at the last stage of profligacy; and, without the spirit of prophecy, I can easily foretell, that the judgements of God will soon overtake us, which must devour us as his adversaries. O England! thy desolation is approaching. I write Ichabod on all thy glory; thy boasted privileges are departing; and, like Israel's idols, they shall be cast to the moles and to the bats."

In like manner this animadverter combats the other charges, insisting (as usual) on the scriptural doctrines and irreproachable lives of these methodistical teachers, and the loose morals, supineness, &c. of the parochial clergy.—

In short, all that has been usually said in defence of the Methodists is here drawn to a focus, with great appearance of respect and candour, and in a correct and animated style. But—Non nostrum tantas componere lites. The Bishop of Sarum and the parochial clergy want no defenders.

109. BIBLIOTHECA TOPOGRAPHICA BRITANNICA. N^o XXIV. Containing the Roman Roads, Ikenild Street, and Bath Way, discovered and investigated through the Country of the Coritani, or the County of Derby. To which is added, A Dissertation on the Coritani. By Samuel Pegge, M. A. 4to.

THE first part of this work was printed, but not published, in 1768, and is now reprinted, with Mr. Pegge's consent, and some improvements. The other Dissertation, "originally annexed to the Essay on the Coins of Cunobelin," is also a republication.

"The greater Roman Road," here investigated, "extended, in a manner, the whole length of the county of Derby, from S. W. to N. E"—It was "called Ikenild *, or Rikenild," says Harrison, "because it passed thro' the kingdom of the Icenæ." And this is confirmed by the map of Richard of Cirencester. From its entrance into Derbyshire, over the easternmost branch or arm of the Dove, Mr. Pegge traces it to Little Chester, or Derwentio, and from thence, much more minutely than we can follow him, to Higham and Stretton (which, no doubt, takes its name from it), and the middle of Sir Henry Hunloke's avenue, from whence he can carry it no farther, there being "no marks of it to be found between that place and Chesterfield, to which it points, and which was probably the next station." For its being deserted, two reasons are here assigned, 1. that when Derby became a place of note, "it was more natural and direct to cross the Derwent there than at Little Chester;" and, 2. "after Duffield bridge was erected, the river would then be more safely crossed there than before."

"The lesser Roman Road, or the Bath-Way, as Mr. Camden styles it,

* "The former is the truer orthography; for the R, I am of opinion, fastened itself to the other name from the British particle yr, signifying the."

“ is now commonly styled, by the natives of the county, Bathom-Gate; “ Gate, in these midland parts, usually “ signifying a street, way, or road, and “ Buxton being intended by the Bath, “ κατ’ ἔξοχον.”—“ Brough, (manifest- “ ly the Latin Burgus, or Burgum), “ whence the Bath-Way begins, was “ unquestionably a Roman station. It “ is a small hamlet in the parish of, and “ very near, Hope, where remains of “ antiquity have been frequently and “ copiously found.”—In the same manner as before our author traces this road, by Smaldale and Fairfield, to Buxton, “where it finally ends.” Seven miles Camden calls the length of it, but Mr. Pegge presumes “ it cannot be less “ than ten Italian miles.” He dissents, on this subject, from Edw. King, Esq.* who “ states that at Peak Castle was the “ dwelling of some ancient chief and “ his train, for whose use such a road “ [the Bathom-Gate] was made long “ before the Conquest;” our author being of opinion, that “ the building “ there was very unfit for any such residence (see Mr. Bray’s Tour, p. “ 195); and the road not pointing to “ that place, which was far more modern than it.”

As to the “Dissertation on the Coritani,” without discussing other etymologies, we shall only say, that, with Richard of Westminster, who died in 1400 or 1401, and whose Geographical Commentary was published in 1757, Mr. Pegge chooses to call these people Coitanni, a word very naturally deducible from the British Coit, “a wood;” this clan being in all probability so denominated from that immense forest called Sylva Caledonia, so visible in Richard’s map.—Our author then treats of this “Caledonian wood, or forest,” which he supposes to have been in the middle of Britain, (not in Scotland, as Camden imagines,) and which is mentioned both by Florus and Pliny†.—“This,” it is said, “seems to have “ been a general word amongst the “ Celtae, witness Calydna, Calydon, &c. “ for which see the geographers.”—Mr. Baxter derives it from “woods “ which the Caledonians inhabited, called by the Britons Kelydon, or Co-lydon, and their woods, Coit Kelydon.”—The British bears, called by

*Martial Urbi Caledonii, came also probably from this forest, which included the whole of the county of Derby.—Our author then defines their limits in respect of the Brigantes and Carnabii; and herein treats of the name and extraction of the Iceni, of whom the Coritani were a part, and shews them to have been the same with the Cenomanni, and, in opposition to Dr. Plot, that they were not seated either in Staffordshire or Worcestershire.

110. A Letter to a Patriot Senator, including the Heads of a Bill for Constitutional Representation of the People. 1773. 8vo.

“ ON the principle of admitting “ every man, in the united kingdoms, “ who may, if he pleases, be independent, “ to a share in the legislature,” a principle which he endeavours to prove “to “ be fundamental in our genuine Constitution,” this writer† proposes, by his bill, to establish annual parliaments, consisting of 560 members, to be chosen “ in the counties, (making 80 divisions, “ seven to be chosen in each,) but for “ the whole nation,” at the hundred courts, or in the wardmotes in London; at which elections every man should have a vote who has a certain income of 25 or 50l. a year (which is not ascertained), “either arising from his own “ property, or acquired by his own industry, for which he is in no way “ dependent upon any person or persons;” the electors to be sworn to this, and much more, by the minister in their respective places of worship; the sheriffs and constables to be also sworn in their courts, and the elected in parliament, &c. &c. The hint of this plan the author professes to have “borrowed “ from a passage in The History of the “ Common Law, by Sir Matthew Hale.” To the “clamour that will be heard “ against admitting Scotland to so large “ a share in the legislature of Britain,” he answers, “Why should not the “ Scots be as free and happy as ourselves?” However, as a palliative, he allows, “that eight or nine members, instead of seven, may be chosen “ for a time in each of the divisions of “ England and Wales, and one or two “ more be elected in the liberty of “ Westminster.”—Other objections he foresees and answers.

* “Archæol. vol. VI. p. 428.”

† “Romanis armis non ultra vicinitatem Sylva Caledoniae propagantibus. Plin. N. H. IV. c. 16.”

* “Nuda Caledonia sic peiora præbuit urbs. Mart. de Spect. Ep. VII.”

† Sir William Jones, as we are credibly informed.

211. An exact and authentic Narrative of M. Blanchard's Third Aërial Voyage from Rouen in Normandy, on the 18th of July, 1784, accompanied by M. Boby; in which they traversed a Space of Forty-five Miles in Two Hours and a Quarter, inclusive of the Time employed in raising and depressing the Machine in the Air. To which are added, Four Certificates, testifying the Truth of the Relation, and signed by several respectable Characters. Translated from the French of M. Blanchard. 4to.

M. BLANCHARD, we learn from the translator's preface, like another Dædalus, had long ago constructed wings, or rather oars, and had been six years meditating, but in vain, an aërial flight, till M. Montgolfier's important discovery enabled him to carry it into execution on March 2, 1784, in the Champ de Mars, in the presence of an innumerable concourse of spectators. He then ascended, alone, "to a height" "which no mortal had yet attained," nearly a mile and three quarters, according to the observations of the Count Cassini and M. Messier; and the globe, being permeable to the gas, descended gently, in an hour and a quarter, in the plain of Billancourt, near Seve. His third departure, here related, (his second, which was from Rouen May 23, is not mentioned,) was from the old barracks of Rouen, with M. Boby, Greffier in the Parliament of Normandy, on July 18, 1784, at a quarter past five in the evening. Their ballast was 210lb. weight. The balloon, made of taffeta, covered with a net, was 26 feet in diameter. The car, as usual, was suspended by longitudinal cords from a hoop, that, like an equator, surrounded the balloon. The wings were easily moved, by means of ratchet-work. A large parachute, or umbrella, hung over them, to break the force of descent, if the balloon should burst, and a tube communicated with the inside of it, to accelerate the descent. All this is well explained by a print. But on the particulars of this flight we shall not enlarge, as they have appeared verbatim in all the papers. Suffice it briefly to add, that, after hovering half an hour over Rouen, passing over the town of Saint Saen, descending and hovering near Neufchatel, saluting the inhabitants, and then turning to the NNW, seeing the Channel, and even a vessel on it, at two leagues distance, and deliberating whether they should pass over to England, they descended in the plain of Puiffanval, at 30 minutes past 7, fifteen leagues from the place of their departure. They brought down with them great part of their ballast. The 1st certificate is relates to filling the balloon, by M. Villet; the 2d attests the time, &c. of their departure, signed by 48 names; the 3d, of their descent, signed by two rectors, two syndics, &c.; and the 4th of what passed after leaving the rectorial house at Puiffanval, till their arrival at the castle of Folny, where they passed the night. Here twelve ladies, who have signed the certificate, were raised successively (2 at a time) to the height of 80 feet, the machine being held, with difficulty, by three cords; thus verifying Pope's rant to Belinda,

GEN T. MAG. October, 1784.

"Think what an equipage thou hast in air,
And view with scorn twopages and a chair."

Afterwards, in order to empty it, though M. Blanchard cut away the whole of the inferior pole, and though the valve was also open, and the balloon laid on its side, yet it was more than an hour before it was completely exhausted; "from whence," he adds, "this conclusion may be drawn, that if a rent of three feet should be made in the globe, the loss of inflammable air would not be sufficient to occasion a dangerous fall." What Horace said of the sea is now at least as applicable to the air: Nil mortalibus arduum!—Had the learned Dr. Jortin lived a few years longer, among things "impossible," which "several have employed their time and pains to find out, and to perform," he would not have reckoned "the art of flying, of travelling in the air (Serm. X.);" nor would he have put those arts on a level with "a perpetual motion, the transmutation of metals, and the making of gold," all as yet undiscovered, notwithstanding the pretensions of Doctors Kenrick and Price. One circumstance in these ascents seems remarkable. Nothing is said of that difficulty of respiration which, in so rare an atmosphere, we have been taught to expect, and which has been usually experienced on high mountains, the Alps, the Andes, &c. We only hear of extreme cold; and even of that, in this narrative, M. Blanchard does not complain. This aërial traveller, whose excursion to Rumsey (see p. 792) will long make him hominum volitare per ora in this metropolis and island also, is now meditating, we hear, a flight to his own country from the South Foreland by a passage that birds only have made before; we may add add, with as much reason surely as sea-navigators, wind and weather permitting.

112. An Account of the first Aerial Voyage in England, in a Series of Letters to his Guardian Chevalier Gherardo Compagni, written under the Impressions of the various Events that affected the Undertaking, by Vincent Lunardi, Esq. Secretary to the Neapolitan Ambassador. 8vo.

MR. LUNARDI beheld, with astonishment, the apparent indifference with which the philosophers of England attended to the aerial voyages which had excited so much curiosity in France, and resolved himself to be the first to visit our atmosphere. Some feeble attempts had indeed been made to anticipate his design. He remarked their defects, and profited by their miscarriage. And having proceeded so far in constructing a balloon as to have finished the globe, and to have the gallery, oars, and wings in forwardness, he was advised to apply to Sir George Howard, governor of Chelsea College, for leave to commence his exhibition from the inclosures of that College. Accordingly he addressed to Sir George the following request:

"Mr. Lunardi has the honour to acquaint Sir George Howard, that he intends to construct an Air Balloon, in which he will ascend, for the purpose of making some interesting experiments. But, previous to his engaging in so expensive an undertaking, he wishes to be assured of a place for launching it, to which none but subscribers can be admitted. If Sir George Howard will indulge him with his permission to launch it from Chelsea Gardens, Mr. Lunardi proposes to devote whatever may exceed the expence of the undertaking to be divided among the invalids of the Hospital. Mr. Lunardi requests the favour of an answer from Sir George Howard."

To this request the Governor, with his Majesty's approbation, returned a favourable answer. In the prosecution, however, of his design, Mr. Lunardi finding the expence to increase beyond his powers, he took the liberty of addressing the publick at large to honour him with their support, and referred those who should interest themselves in his experiments to certain houses of credit, where they might leave their donations, and to the Lyceum in the Strand, where they might see the balloon while it was constructing.

Subscriptions, Mr. Lunardi says, came in slowly; but the concourse of the people to the Lyceum were numerous and splendid. This was not all. Mr. Lunardi reckons among the happiest incidents of his life the acquaintance he has gained, by this public notice, with Mr. Biggins, a young gentleman of birth, education, and fortune, and with Dr. Fordyce, lecturer in chemistry, and perhaps the first chemist in Britain.

Thus far Mr. Lunardi may be said to have proceeded successfully; but it happened a little unfavourably for him, that, impelled either by ambition or industry, a Frenchman, of the name of Moret, commenced a competition, who, resolving to be first, was deservedly punished for his precipitancy. Having fixed on a day previous to that on which Mr. Lunardi was to make his excursion, two or three hundred people assembled in a garden near that belonging to Chelsea Hospital; and some thousands, who surrounded the spot, waited the filling of his balloon with patience till four in the afternoon, when, instead of rising, it was seen to sink into the fire used in expanding it. It was then that the multitude rushed in, tore it in a thousand pieces, robbed many of the company, and levelled with the ground the fences that surrounded the garden whence it was intended to have been launched.

The terror which this desolation spread through the neighbourhood alarmed the Governor of Chelsea Hospital, who absolutely forbade the exhibition of any balloon in any place belonging to that hospital.—This was a poignant mortification to Mr. Lunardi, who, having gone so far, and having advertised the time and place of exhibition, was reduced to the most complicated circumstances of distress.

In this hour of desponding anxiety he found himself buoyed up by the flattering solicitations of many amiable ladies who visited the Lyceum, some of whom, supposing him in readiness to set out, expressed their wishes to accompany him in his journey.

Thus animated, he determined to ascend, "if he rose from the street."—But it was soon suggested to him, that though he had been deprived of the advantages he might have expected from the situation of Chelsea College, there was yet another place, which, though not quite so secure, was still more spacious, and not less commodious. This was the Artillery Ground. He embraced the thought, and instantly applied to Sir Watkin Lewes, the colonel of the Artillery Company, who, by the offer of a hundred pounds, to be appropriated to the relief of Sir Barnard Turner's

Turner's family, and the powerful intercession of other friends, obtained the permission Mr. Lunardi requested. He was now relieved from his anxiety for the present, only to be again reduced to accumulated distress. He had made no doubt but that the proprietor of the Lyceum, who had received the money for the admission of more than 20,000 people, would immediately have enabled him to fulfill the agreement which Sir Watkin had made for him with the Artillery Company. But in this he was mistaken. What he was now to do he could not tell. Fatigue, agitation of mind; and that kind of shame which attends a breach of promise, though ever so involuntary, induced him to send an apology to the Committee of the Artillery Company, instead of waiting on them himself. Conceiving this an attempt to deceive them, they rescinded the resolution they had formerly taken to guard the avenues with men in arms, and ordered the materials for fixing and preparing the balloon to be removed, unless the hundred guineas were paid next morning, and security given to indemnify the Company in the sum of 500*l.* for any injury that might be done their premises. But this was not the worst. The man at the Lyceum, apprized of the resolution of the Artillery Company, locked up his balloon, with all its apparatus, and declared they should never be removed till he consigned to him a moiety of all the possible advantages that should now and in future be produced by it. The injustice of this proceeding defeated its own enormity. The case was known, and the generous and humane interested themselves in his relief. He was soon enabled to send the money. Sir Watkin Lewes and the Rev. Mr. Kirwan became his securities to the Company. The magistrates of the police warranted him to force his balloon out of the Lyceum; and they extended to him the protection of their officers to convey it to the Artillery Ground.

Nothing now remained but to fix and fill it; and Dr. Fordyce, with a readiness that does honour to his character and ingenuity, generously undertook the task. What followed, till he was safely mounted on his flight, we have already related in our last (see p. 711). The history of his voyage we shall give nearly in his own words:

"Sept. 15. About five minutes after two, the last gun was fired, the cords divided, and the balloon rose, the company returning my signals of adieu with the most unfeigned acclamations and applauses. The effect was that of a miracle on the multitudes that surrounded the place; and they passed from incredulity and menace into the most extravagant expressions of approbation and joy.

"At the height of twenty yards the balloon was a little depressed by the wind, which had a fine effect. It held me over the ground for a few seconds, and seemed to pause majestically before its departure.

"On discharging a part of the ballast, it ascended to the height of two hundred yards. As a multitude lay before me of a hundred and fifty thousand people, who had not seen my ascent from the ground, I had recourse to every stratagem to let them know I was in the gallery, and they literally rent the air with their acclamations and applause. In these stratagems I devoted my flag, and worked with my oars, one of which was immediately broken, and fell from me. A pigeon too escaped, which, with a dog and cat, were the only companions of my excursion.

"When the thermometer had fallen from 68° to 61°, I perceived a great difference in the temperature of the air. I became very cold, and found it necessary to take a few glasses of wine. I likewise eat the leg of a chicken; but my bread and other provisions had been rendered useless, by being mixed with the sand which I carried as ballast.

"When the thermometer was at 50°, the effect of the atmosphere, and the combination of circumstances around, produced a calm delight, which is inexpressible, and which no situation on earth could give. The stillness, extent, and magnificence of the scene, rendered it highly awful. My horizon seemed a perfect circle; the terminating line several hundred miles in circumference. This I conjectured from the view of London, the extreme points of which formed an angle of only a few degrees. It was so reduced on the great scale before me, that I can find no simile to convey an idea of it. I could distinguish St. Paul's, and other churches, from the houses. I saw the streets as lines, all animated with beings, whom I knew to be men and women, but which I should otherwise have had a difficulty in describing. It was an enormous bee-hive, but the industry of it was suspended. Indeed, the whole scene before me filled my mind with a sublime pleasure of which I never had a conception. I had soared from the apprehensions and anxieties of the Artillery Ground, and felt as if I had left behind me all the cares and passions that molest mankind.

"I had not the slightest sense of motion from the machine. I knew not whether it went swiftly or slowly; whether it ascended or descended; whether it was agitated or tranquil, but by the appearance or disappearance of objects on the earth. I moved to different parts of the gallery. I adjusted the furniture furniture and apparatus. I uncorked my bottle, eat, drank, and wrote, just as in my study. The height had not the effect which a much less degree of it has near the earth, that of producing giddiness. The gradual diminution of objects, and the masses of light and shade, are intelligible in oblique and common prospects. But here every thing wore a new appearance, and had a new effect. The face of the country had a mild and permanent verdure, to which Italy is a stranger. The sea glistening with the rays of the sun, the immense district beneath me spotted with cities, towns, villages, and houses, pouring out their inhabitants; you will allow me some merit at not having been exceedingly intoxicated with my situation. To prolong the enjoyment of it, and to try the effect of my only oar, I kept myself in the same parallel respecting the earth for nearly half an hour. But the exercise having fatigued, and the experiment having satisfied me, I laid aside my oar, and again had recourse to my bottle. This I emptied to the health of my friends and benefactors in the lower world. All my affections were alive, in a manner not easily to be conceived; and you may be assured that the sentiment, which seemed to me most congenial to that happy situation, was gratitude and friendship. I sat down and wrote four pages of desultory observations, and pinning them to a napkin, committed them to the mild winds of the region, to be conveyed to my honoured friend and patron, Prince Caramanico.

"During this business I had ascended rapidly; for, on hearing the report of a gun, fired in the Artillery Ground, I was induced to examine the thermometer, and found it had fallen to 32°. The balloon was so much inflated as to assume the form of an oblong spheroid, the shortest diameter of which was in a line with me, though I had ascended with it in the shape of an inverted cone, and wanting nearly one third of its full complement of air. Having no valve, I could only open the neck of the balloon, thinking it barely possible that the strong rarefaction might force out some of the inflammable air. The condensed vapour around its neck was frozen, though I found no inconvenience from the cold. The earth, at this point, appeared like a boundless plain, whose surface had variegated shades, but on which no object could be accurately distinguished.

"I then had recourse to the utmost use of my single oar; by hard and persevering labour I brought myself within three hundred yards of the earth, and, moving horizontally, spoke through my trumpet to some country people, from whom I heard a confused noise in reply.

"At half after three o'clock I descended in a corn field on the common of South Mimms, where I landed the cat. The poor animal had been sensibly affected by the cold, during the greatest part of the voyage.

Here I might have terminated my excursion with satisfaction and honour to myself; and the people about me were very ready to assist at my disembarkation. But my affections were afloat, and in unison with the whole country, whose transport and admiration seemed boundless. I had them therefore keep clear, and I would gratify them by ascending directly in their view.

"My general course to this place was something more than one point to the westward of the north. A gentleman on horseback approached me; but I could not speak to him, being intent on my re-ascension, which I effected after moving horizontally about forty yards. As I ascended, one of the ballustrades of the gallery gave way; but the circumstance excited no apprehension of danger. I threw out the remainder of my ballast and provisions, and again resumed my pen. My ascension was so rapid, that before I had written half a page, the thermometer had fallen to 29°. The drops of water that adhered to the neck of the balloon were become like chrystals. At this point of elevation, which was the highest I attained, I finished my letter, and fastening it with a cork-screw to my handkerchief, threw it down. I likewise threw down the plates, knives, and forks, the little sand that remained, and an empty bottle, which took some time in disappearing. I now wrote the last of my dispatches from the clouds, which I fixed to a leathern belt, and sent towards the earth. It was visible to me on its passage for several minutes; but I was myself insensible of motion from the machine itself during the whole voyage. The earth appeared as before, like an extensive plain, with the same variegated surface, but the objects rather less distinguishable. The clouds to the eastward rolled beneath me, in masses immensely larger than the waves of the ocean. I therefore did not mistake them for the sea. Contrasted with the effects of the sun on the earth and water beneath, they gave a grandeur to the whole scene which no fancy can describe. I again betook myself to my oar, in order to descend; and by the hard labour of fifteen or twenty minutes, I accomplished my design, when my strength was nearly exhausted. My principal care was, to avoid a violent concussion at landing, and in this my good fortune was my friend.

"At twenty minutes past four I descended in a spacious meadow in the parish of Standon, near Ware, in Hertfordshire. Some labourers were at work in it. I requested their assistance. They exclaimed, they would have nothing to do with one who came in the Devil's house; and no intreaties could prevail on them to approach me. I at last owed my deliverance to the spirit and generosity of a female. A young woman took hold of a cord which I had thrown out, and calling to the men, they yielded that assistance to her.

her request which they had refused to mine. A crowd of people from the neighbourhood soon assembled, who very obligingly assisted me to disembark. Gen. Smith was the first gentleman who overtook me. I am much indebted to his politeness. He kindly assisted in securing the balloon, having followed me on horseback from London; as did several other gentlemen, amongst whom were Mr. Crane, Capt. Connor, and Mr. Wright. The inflammable air was let out by an incision, and produced a most offensive stench, which is said to have affected the atmosphere of the neighbourhood. The apparatus was committed to the care of Mr. Hollingsworth, who obligingly offered his service. I then proceeded, with Gen. Smith, and several other gentlemen, to the Bull Inn at Ware. On my arrival, I had the honour to be introduced to William Baker, Esq. member for Hertford in the last parliament. This gentleman conducted me to his seat at Bayford Bury, and entertained me with a kind of hospitality and politeness which I shall ever remember with gratitude, and which has impressed on my mind a proper idea of that frank liberality and sincere beneficence which are the characteristics of English gentlemen.

"The general course of the second part of my voyage, by which I was led into Hertfordshire, was three points to the eastward of the north from the Artillery Ground, and about four points to the eastward of the north from the place where I first descended.

"This is the general account of my excursion.
VINCENT LUNARDI."

113. Hints of important Uses to be derived from Aerostatic Globes, with a Print of an Aerostatic Globe, and its Appendages. Originally designed in 1783. By Thomas Martin. 4to.

AMONG the uses which Mr. Martin enumerates, Night Signals are the chief. He thinks they may be used to advantage by making them stationary, to carry lights, as beacons were formerly, to indicate the approach of an enemy. But, in that case, the invaders would perhaps be more benefited than the invaded. By observing to what side the strength of a country would naturally be collected, the enemy would of course steer to the opposite side, where they might hope to meet with the least resistance.

Another important use to which, Mr. Martin says, they may be applied, is, to convey intelligence to the inhabitants of a besieged town, when every avenue is rendered impracticable to spies or deserters. But previous regulations must first be established between the parties, before such signals could be of use.— Indeed, if a method should ever be rendered certain of lowering and raising balloons at pleasure, and directing their course to a certain point, so as to land whenever the steersman pleases, then, indeed, a regular communication between the garrison and country might be established, which might be of advantage. But, like every other destructive discovery, this would avail but little, for friends and foes would have the secret in common, and balloons would be sent to oppose balloons, and we should then have Milton's war in the clouds realised.

Mr. Martin suggests another use for balloons, in directing the operations of an army; but this likewise is liable to the objections already stated.

With regard to the use of balloons in regulating the manœuvres of fleets at sea, by means of signals from balloons, made stationary for that purpose, Mr. Martin is very explicit. Such signals, communicated by lights highly elevated, might be seen at a much greater distance than signals from the mast-head, and an enemy descried long before their approach. This might be used to forward an attack, or facilitate an escape, as occasion required. Our author thinks that the varieties of colours, and conformations of different fireworks, attached to balloons, their combinations and other artificial diversities, might furnish a book of signals as numerous, and more intelligible by night, than those communicated by flags in the day. But what he particularly insists on is, the advantage that would accrue to fleets, or even single ships, by the elevation of men in the gallery of a balloon, secured by cords to the side of the ship. Fleets have not the resources of armies and garrisons.

The uses above are merely speculative, and perhaps never can be reduced into practice; but the use that follows has probability in its favour:

"Aerostatic machines, with retaining cords, may likewise be used to throw many new and important lights on the nature, power, and effects of the atmosphere, in its different states; on clouds and meteors, thunder and lightning, snow, hail, rain, and mists: to ascertain the just medium where animals may still retain life, but, advancing a little further, immediately lose it; and to enquire how far this point of vitality may vary with the variations of the seasons and the weather in the lower regions. In short, the natural history of the air, in all its parts, may be thus completely explored and elucidated."

JUVENAL, SAT. I. IMITATED BY DR. KING.

*(Concluded from our last, p. 696.)LOl gliding Thames his silver current leads,And murmurs gently thro' the flow'ry meads;
Behold how villas throng on every side,
Lift the gay head, and grace his chrystal tide.
These greatness, cas'd of all unwieldy care,
Seeks the calm comfort of a purer air.But mark what throngs of sycophants attend;
They crowd the table, and expel the friend:
On pies of Perigord an eunuch dines,
A foreign dancer quaffs the richest wines;
Buffoon and pimp the various plunder share,
And sulsome Riot builds her temple there;
While the poor farmer, scantied of his meat,
Receives the leavings of the splendid treat;
Struck, shoulder'd, curs'd, he hides his drooping head,And wets with tears his scarce-accorded bread.
Not so our fires; the jolly nut-brown bowl
Chear'd every heart, and open'd every soul;
The tenants, uninvited, fill'd the board,
Nor fear'd a tyrant where they found a lord;
With wholesome viands was the table crown'd,
And social mirth flew innocently round;
An honest plainness glow'd on every face,
And guilt fled trembling from the hallow'd place.

Thrice happy times!—Now Wealth usurps the throne

Where Virtue sat, and rules the world alone.
A thief or pilf'rer, with the bloody track
Of the smart lash fresh streaming from his back,

If Riches chear him with their powerful gleam,

The giddy crowd shall honour and esteem.
What tho' a cheat, the ruder hand of Law
In vain to reach him stretch'd her threat'ning claw,The gaudy splendor stopp'd the fatal word,
And Justice dropp'd her long-uplifted sword;
He mounts, exulting, on proud Plutus' wings,
And, 'scaping dungeons, shares the ears of kings.Then down with all that's awful or divine,
Raise the new idol on the richest shrine.
The glittering pageant on her seat behold,
With gems irradiate, and adorn'd with gold,
To her shall courtiers bend the supple knee,
And willing crowds confess the deity.Her sable trumpet, lo! Corruption sounds,
And the earth trembles to her utmost bounds;
Aghast each virtue flies the hated shore,
Faith, Honour, Glory, Freedom, are no more.Unblest'd dependents on a griping peer,
Who counts what annual sum his place may clear,Hope not to rise, unless by strength of purse.
Art thou not poor, the greatest deadliest curse?
For, lo! a man of power will recommend
A fawning slave, and call the wretch a friend;
To please his Grace your patron must comply,
When Greatness sues 'tis madness to deny!In vain you plead your service as your right;
Can Merit rise when Interest is in fight?Yon ragged race of meagre poets mark,
From balliffs safe, and sauntering in the park.
Next to those urns which royal albes keep,
Where Spenser, Jonson, Newton, Dryden sleep;Among the wise and great, O fate unjust!
Lewd-Oldfield mingles her profaner dust:
There rove the bards, until the dining hour
Strikes on their stomachs with prevailing power;Away they run, the genial feast to join,
And their parch'd palates quaff imagin'd wine;
When, cruel thought! such the decree of fate,Forbid to enter thro' the wish'd-for gate;
The frowning porter, in a surly tone,
Cries, "Varlets, hence! my Lord will dine alone."Pensive they go, nor offer once the bribe;
How good, how pious, is the rhyming tribe!
See the proud glutton, gloating with his eye
On the hot fragrance of a partridge-pie;
The land and sea their various gifts afford,
To fill his kitchen, and to deck his board;
Persist to spend estates at every meal,
Nor dread too soon what you at last must feel;
O'ercharg'd with wine, and with all dainties stow'd,The flagg'ring feet refuse their wonted load,
The blunted brain's with rising fumes oppress,
The unpropt head sinks on the quivering breast;Then suffocations stop the lab'ring breath,
And the loose surfeit brings intestine death.
Thy poor relations quickly hear thy doom,
And cast the carcase in a common tomb,
(More tender usage meets a favourite slave,)
And mutter curses o'er the wretch's grave.
Was ever age so void of all that's good?
So lost, so sunk in the polluted flood?
Our sons shall try to equal us in vain;
No future times shall show a deeper stain.
Rise, Satire, rise! and with thy pointed dart
Aim the just blow, and search the tainted heart.Object, ye Critics, to my tuneless strain;
Accuse me, that too boldly I arraign;
Wild, uninspir'd by the poetic beam,
My groveling numbers wrong my brighter theme,Yet, greatly daring in the glorious task,
Let Virtue smile, and I have all I ask.
Whom have I anger'd in this wicked town?
If worth resent not, let the villain frown."But soft; too sanguine, friend, in Honour's "cause!" [laws?"Know you not, Lords are makers of the "Attempt not then the noble name to spot;"Is Whatehead's* fate so suddenly forgot?
"Thy sharpen'd sting let Fleetwood, Buck-

"worth, fear," [peer.

"But learn respect whene'er you name a

* Paul, taken into custody by the Black Rod for his Mansions,

* And

To him such strains of eloquence belong,
 "That truths divine come mended from his tongue:"

How calm he reasons with Religion's foes!
 How soon the host of Infidels o'erthrows!
 Ev'n Hume o'erthrows *, whose daring impious hand

Hath scatter'd poison, and defil'd the land.
 'Tis thine, bright guardian, to convince the wrong

By mild persuasion and by reason strong;
 'Tis thine to shew, 'tis thine to point, the road,

And lead the way to happiness and God.

Did fate permit, oft would my Muse repeat
 Her grateful visit to this lov'd retreat,
 Oft seek at morn and silent eve the shade,
 Where Meditation dwells, a pensive maid;
 Here cull the flowers of many a distant age,
 Or trace the beauties of the hallow'd page;
 Here pass in science each returning day,
 Here tune the comic or the serious lay.

T. W.

A N E L E G Y

ON THE DEATH OF MISS SARAH STARKY, OF EVERLY, WILTS, WHO DIED
 MARCH 17, 1784, AGED
 NINETEEN YEARS.

IF aught be due to modesty and truth;
 To virtue, blooming in ingenuous youth;
 To soft complacency, grace, beauty, sense,
 And genuine humour, frank without offence;

To thy sad bier this tribute will I bring,
 Thy praise demands my first essays to sing.
 Who would not sorrow for so sweet a maid,
 To see such charms in earth for ever laid?
 Ere pale consumption, with her lingering train,

Thy form corroding, wasted it with pain,
 None shone so fair, so affable, so kind,
 Form'd to improve and captivate the mind.
 Ah! what avails the fond, maternal sigh,
 The fervent prayer, or the uplifted eye?
 O'er thy wan image, struck with pious care,
 Desponding parents shed a tender tear;
 As quiver'd on thy lip the parting breath,
 They view'd th' approaching agonies of
 death;

They felt that heighten'd love thy worth in-spir'd;

Thy pains dejected, but thy patience fir'd.
 Depriv'd of thee, what pleasure can they know?

What, but one constant sympathy of woe?
 Thy lively sentiments, and open heart,
 Could each domestic happiness impart;
 Thy spirits cheer'd, thy mirthful accents
 pleas'd,

And all their transitory cares appeas'd.
 In thee, sweet maid, each excellence combin'd,

By virtue cherish'd, and by sense refin'd:

* Letters on Infidelity. See p. 607.

But death's chill grasp benumbs that well-taught soul, [troyl.

Which all the stubborn passions could con-
 April no more its genial influence sheds,
 Nor calls the flow'rets from their frozen beds;

Earth smiles no more, with verdant herbage
 crown'd,

By rugged winter's icy fetters bound.
 What virgin innocent, like thee, should greet
 Th' exhaling fragrance of each opening sweet?

For thee sick nature a drear aspect wears,
 And spring no more luxuriant appears.

Bid the gay throng, that in their noon-tide hour, [power,

Life's high career, feel fortune's milder
 With glowing pity bid their breasts dilate,
 In fix'd attention, as they learn thy fate.

Ah! bid them meditate thy awful doom,
 And hang in mournful silence o'er thy tomb.
 Say, their ideal joys will fade away,
 And wanton youth and beauty soon decay.

Though now you seek the blissful seats above,

Accept, dear maid, this token of my love!

My Muse, unequal to my daring zeal,
 In vain attempts to paint the griefs I feel!

Still on my soul thy virtues stand impress'd,
 Thy image ever present to my breast;
 While mem'ry holds a seat in this frail frame,

No years shall e'er efface thy honour'd name.
Winton Coll.

*We are indebted to PHILIP THICKWESSE,
 Esq. for the two following POETICAL
 FABLES, written by the elegant Mrs.
 CKES.*

I. THE LOOKING-GLASS AND ORANGE-TREE.

IN an apartment where expence
 Appear'd in full magnificence,
 A Looking-Glass, of neatest taste,
 Within the middle pannel plac'd,
 Gather'd from Phœbus' noon-day blaze
 Th' assemblage of his scatter'd rays,
 And shot (in borrow'd splendor bright)
 Across the room a flood of light.

High on a stand of sattin wood,
 An Orange-Tree obliquely stood,
 Whom thus, of fancy'd power possess'd,
 The self-conceited glass address'd:

"By my kind influence behold,
 How fair thy tender buds unfold,

"Which, but for my all-fostering ray,
 Their beauties never would display.

"Should not such gay expanded bloom,
 Such pleasing verdure, high perfume,

"Thy mind with grateful rapture raise,
 To render some return of praise,

"Such as may speak both love and awe, Lest I my influence withdraw?"

"Nought can your judgement more mis-
 guide,

"Than pride," the Orange-Tree reply'd;

"But

" But for that passion you would know,
 " I nothing to your influence owe;
 " All the perfections which you name,
 " From yonder glorious orb I claim,
 " The same whose partial beams I view
 " Shine with such energy on you;
 " And but for whose imparting light,
 " You had remain'd as dark as night:
 " Then scorn not the advice I give,
 " With gratitude those beams receive;
 " But think not any merit thine,
 " Who by reflection only shine.
 " If to thy happy lot 'tis given
 " To be the instrument of Heaven,
 " Reflect that thou can'st ne'er dispense
 " But that which thou receiv'd'st from " thence."

II. THE OAK AND THE RIVER.

A RIVER, which, from side to side,
 Rush'd forward an impetuous tide,
 Which scarce its verdant banks contain'd,
 Amidst hoarse murmurs thus complain'd:
 " Me, wretched! whose hard fates decree
 " Such an unhappy destiny;
 " For ever, as I flow, to find
 " Nature through all her works unkind;
 " My banks no verdant tints adorn,
 " But, 'midst discolour'd grass and corn,
 " Mishapen trees their aspects rear,
 " And falling battlements appear;
 " While yonder brook, those flowers among,
 " Thro' smiling valleys winds along,
 " With lofty elms the borders crown'd,
 " And verdure flourishes around."

An Oak, which many a year had stood,
 With branches pendent o'er the flood,
 Concern'd, its leafy honours shook,
 And thus th' impetuous stream bespoke:
 " While you regard, with envious eyes,
 " Those beauties, and your own despise,
 " And thus ungratefully disgrace
 " Us, stately trees, of ancient race;
 " The blame which you have falsely thrown,
 " With justice rests on you alone,
 " Whose turbid motion makes appear,
 " Things the reverse of what they are!
 " Behold these domes majestic rise,
 " Whose turrets seem to reach the skies,
 " Where not th' exactest eye can see
 " Any mis-shapen imagery.
 " For verdant grass, and flow'rets fair,
 " Few banks can with your own compare;
 " That envy'd brook, which, as it flows,
 " Each object's just proportion shows;
 " Those flow'ry vales, and smiling skies,
 " All from internal calmness rise;
 " In you such charms can ne'er be seen,
 " Till you become, like that, serene.
 " If happiness you wish to find,
 " Let gentleness possess your mind."

MR. URBAN,

Sept. 20.

ON Wednesday morning last, Robert Kingscote, Esq. of Kingscote, co. Glouc. gave an elegant déjeuner to the ladies and gen-

GENT. MAG. October, 1784.

tlemen of the neighbourhood, during which a large balloon was launched, which gave occasion to the following lines:

" STRANGER, whoe'er thou art, whose gazing eye
 Is fix'd with wonder on this novel scene,
 Ignoble on the ground behold me lie,
 And kifs, indignant kifs, the level green!
 " From Chloe's hand launch'd forth in fields of air,
 Swift as the bolt of heaven I took my
 flight;
 Child of the wind, I flutter'd here and there,
 Till clouds obscur'd me from the gazer's sight.

" Long while I held my daring rapid course,
 I travers'd skies, where eagles never flew,
 With strengthen'd wing, and undiminish'd force,
 Far from the keenest ken of mortal view.

" But fate, alas! to check my tow'ring pride,
 At length has laid me at thy feet thus low;
 Let not thy pity be to me deny'd,
 But on my fate one tender sigh bestow.

" Art thou to mad ambition now a slave?
 Or dost thou hope in higher walks to shine?

Tutor'd by me, thy dear contentment save,
 Or prophesy thy future fate by mine.

" If yet a youth, the moral lesson hear,
 For, oh! believe thou canst not know too
 soon

A truth (which added years will make more clear),

" That vain ambition is—an Air-Balloon.

" Hurt not my form, 'twere sacrilege to wound

That form by Chloe's hand so sacred made;
 Let not that cruel wretch on earth be found,
 That dares, that impious dares, my sides invade.

" My flight I took from Kingscote's happy
 plain,

A daring wand'rer thro' th' etherial sky—
 Then, gentle friend, pray take me back again,
 Perhaps, once more, another course to try."

ON THE ADDITION OF A LIBRARY TO THE EPISCOPAL HOUSE AT H—Y, W—R—SHIRE.

THUS Phœbus to Minerva said:
 " By H—d in all things we're obey'd.
 Not Socrates, however fervent,
 Was more than H—d your humble servant.
 Genius and taste from me he drew,
 But moral dignity from you:
 Now, with propriety refin'd,
 He manifests a grateful mind.

Behold the hoary Gothic seat,
 Which rises in that green retreat!
 To us a votive temple there
 Is finish'd by his filial care.
 Whate'er in literature is best;—
 The various treasures of the East;

The eloquence of Greece and Rome;
 Shall dignify the spacious dome.
 Whate'er, in learning's commonweal,
 Of modern date hath had our seal,
 Shall to this venerable fane,
 Thro' H—d, a free admission gain:
 Hence (whom we deem our special care,)
 Each British genius shall be there.
 There Locke and Newton claim your smile,
 And Bacon, glory of this isle:
 There, chiefs of the poetic band,
 My Shakspeare, and my Milton, stand:
 And Clarendon, with Sterner pride,
 Shall o'er th' historic ranks preside.
 Thus fill'd with all that's good and great,
 The votive fane shall stand complete."

The maid reply'd: "If in our shrine
 His modest merit should assign
 To his own works a station due,
 Your observation would be true."

Worcester, Oct. 12.

FIDUS.

ON READING SOME MALEVOLENT STRIC-TURES ON MISS SEWARD'S LOUISA,
 IN TWO RECENT PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS.

AS up the arduous heights that lead to Fame,

With timid step, the beauteous Seward hied,
 Pursuing Glory to the fair-one came,

Seiz'd her white hand, and thus exulting
 "O let us hasten on, illustrious maid! [cried]

And I will be companion of thy way;
 Soon, in yon fane of adamant display'd,

Shall blaze, with quenchless beams, the wonders of thy lay." [den'd haste,

She said—and springing light, with glad-
 Up the steep paths her lovely votary drew;

Yet often paus'd, to gather, as they pass'd,
 The blooming laurels, where aloft they grew:

Then 'midst their sprays the richest myrtles led
 That scent with tender sweets poetic gales,

And, as she bound them round her Seward's head, [the vales.

Britannia's loud acclaim resounded from Them thus employ'd with trembling haste drew near

Pale Envy, sick'ning at the garland gay,
 And thus, with scathful tone, and ghastly stare,

I too will be companion of thy way.
 No longer can my ears endure the sound

That echoes round the scilles Louisa's name;
 But know, fond wretch! my scorpion rod can wound [dying fame.

The breast that swells with hope of never-
 This said, her livid fingers seiz'd one hand,

While Glory grasp'd the other, then display'd, [wand,

With hissing serpents wreath'd her baleful
 And, grinning, shook it at the shudd'ring maid.

Shield me, ye powers! (the injur'd fair-one
 If I return, Envy will quit her prey; [cried]

But Glory, might not she too leave my side?
 Britannia, do thou point thy daughter's happiest way.

 Ascend (replies the power, in accents mild);
 Thine is the shield by sun-clad Genius given;

Nor thro' its bright invulnerable form
 Can haggard Envy's scorpion stings be driven;
 Speed to the summit with them both, for there Shall Glory place the amaranthine crown
 On thy fair brows; and Envy, in despair,
 Stinging herself to death, shall seal thy name
 KNOWN. J—W—

THE REV. MR. F—, TO MR. C—

YOU were so obliging to send us a pig;
 Like Miss Betty Pringle's, 'twas not very big;
 Some think it the sweeter and better for that;
 But then, to be sure, it was not very fat.
 When I call it not fat, I certainly mean,
 That your pretty piggy was rather too lean;
 But then, as I now shall improve in my metre,
The nearer the bone, the flesh was the sweeter.
 From what's above said, I will prove very clear,
 The flesh was all sweet, for I'm sure it was near.
 However perhaps you intended to York us,
 It was not Epicuri de grege porcum:
 But coming so far as from Bengal to China,
 The pretty poor piggy was hurt in the spina.
 As it just had left school, I hop'd it would squeak
 A distich or two in most elegant Greek;
 So I look'd in his mouth, and I thought to find that in,

But, lo! in the room were some verses of Latin,
 In which you create, with your usual slyness,
 My dear little Nanny Her Most Serene Highness;
 When you know very well tho' her looks are so placid, [acid.

She is cloudy sometimes, and with sweets mingles
 What shall I return for your Hertfordshire present?

A partridge, a woodcock, a hare, or a pheasant?
 If I durst my adventurous fancy let loose,
 I would certainly send you a fat Kentish goose:
 But you'd pluck the best quills, and then very soon
 I should find myself cut in some biting lampoon.

Nov. 2, 1771.

P. S. My rib sends her complim. to your's, but a line

Of her writing she knows very well to decline.

ANSWER.

"BUT you'd pluck the best quills, and then very soon

"I should find myself cut in a biting lampoon."
 Thus you gallop along, and ne'er mind where you tread;

Leaving me to take care, as I can, of my head.
 Could I pluck the best quill, I should then very soon

Disarm of its venom each dirty lampoon.
 By this quill which I handle, meantime be it known,

That I have some faults to amend of my own;
 And whenever my Muse may be taken in labour,
 She shall not lie in at the charge of my neighbour.
 The significant sneer, the malevolent jest,

If I wish to be wise, I must learn to detect.
 But you wanted a rhyme; and rhyme without reason,

You see, like my betters, I readily seize on P. S. My rib's com. to your's, whom you need not to teach,

All her life to deliver all the eight parts of speech.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

(CONTINUED FROM P. 706.)

Monday, July 12.

Mr. Grenville, in committee, moved for leave to bring in a bill to empower the treasurer of the navy to pay the officers and men of his Majesty's ship the Santa Margareta the rate of head-money allowed to vessels taking or destroying an enemy's ship; as Capt. Salter, after taking the Amazone, a French frigate, was either obliged to abandon or destroy her, on the appearance of the enemies' fleet. The former alternative he chose, rather than consign to destruction 70 wounded men who could not be removed. The motion was carried without any debate.

The order of the day being read, for going into a committee on the new tax-bill on candles;

Mr. Sloper stated, that, as the bill then stood, it would more materially affect the poor than the rich. He thought a distinction might be made, and that candles of a certain distinction might be exempted.

Sir J. Johnston wished to know, if mould-candles were to pay no more than candles of 16 to the pound.

Mr. Rose informed the house, that the commissioners of excise had been consulted on that head, and had declared that, if any exemption was made, that exemption would open a door to every kind of evasion and fraud.

Mr. Eden thought that the commissioners ought to be called before the house, to state their reasons for such advice; for his part, he could see no reason why large candles should not be taxed, and small ones exempt.

Mr. Pulteney ridiculed the calculation of 70lb. being the average of a poor man's annual consumption. Many poor were obliged to consume more than their betters; and it was hard that the industrious man, who worked for his bread and that of his family by night, should be taxed high for the light that enabled him to provide for his family.

Capt. J. Luttrell defended the tax as it stood; for, if any exemption was made as to small candles, the rich would burn small candles; and the working poor, who could not do without a good light, would bear the whole burden of the tax.

Mr. Pulteney remarked it as a curious mode of reasoning, that the poor man would not feel it, and that, notwithstanding, the rich man would think it worth while to evade it. Some better argument must be produced before he could give his assent to the bill.

Mr. Jelliffe followed Mr. Eden, in wishing for evidence, that no distinction could be made without introducing fraud. It could only retard the passing of the bill for a single day, which, on a bill so materially affecting the poor, was no object.

Mr. Sloper laughed at the idea of the rich burning farthing candles to evade the duty. If they did, their servants would waste more than masters would save.

The question on this clause was put, and carried without a division, notwithstanding all that had been urged against it.

The clause which empowers excise officers to enter any house, at any hour of the night, without any information or peace-officer, &c. was next proposed; when

Mr. Hussy rose, to caution the committee, to consider the power they were giving to excise-officers to enter private houses in the night, and what abuses might be practised under that power.

Mr. Steel defended the clause, without which the bill would be nugatory. Persons might make candles in a garret; and the fair trader be injured and undersold without any possible remedy.

Mr. Sawbridge insisted, that no excise-officer should be suffered to enter a private house without previous information, nor without a peace-officer to attend him.

Mr. Sheridan would rather consent, that the fraudulent making of candles should be made felony, than that excisemen should be authorised to enter private houses at any hour of the night, without any previous information being laid.

Mr. Dundas insisted on the clause as absolutely necessary; it was idle to talk of informations, for people would make candles in garrets and in vaults, and before application could be made in the ordinary course of legal proceeding, their business would be done, and their property removed.

Mr. Sawbridge remarked, that information might always be had by runners who had any nose, for nobody could pass by a place where tallow was melting, but must smell it.

Mr. McDonald replied, that the time when fraudulent practices were carried on was at the time when few noses were passing by.— This clause was likewise agreed to, as were all the rest, without debate.

The order of the day was then read, for the house to go into committee, on the bill to prevent smuggling.

Mr. Eden observed, that, as many alterations had been made on the bill since the second reading, it would be necessary to have it printed before it could be properly debated.

Mr. Pitt was of the same opinion. He did not wish to hurry the bill through the house, but to have it seriously considered; and therefore the chairman might report progress, and desire leave to sit again. The principal alterations he meant to make were, first, the Four Seas, which were thought too indefinite; next, the size of the vessels, and the distance of the hovering act, which he intended to propose to be four leagues from shore instead of two, within which distance, vessels of a certain description should be liable to confiscation.

Mr. Wilberforce stated objections to several clauses in the bill, but dwelt particularly on that that by which ships were made liable to confiscation, for having small quantities of contraband goods on board. He thought it the extreme of injustice, that the owner should be made to suffer for the illegal act of perhaps the most villainous fellow on board his ship, who, from covetousness or resentment might find means to smuggle a few gallons of spirits on board the ship, and to secrete the same. He thought it both just and necessary, that a certain quantity of spirits should be allotted to each man on board of all ships, proportioned to the length of their voyage; and that, if a greater proportion was found in any man's custody, or concealed, the person offending should be liable to pay treble the value. No man can think that the owner of a ship would run the risk of losing his ship, for the profit he could make of forty or fifty gallons of spirits.

Mr. McDonald defended the clause, on the ground of opening a door for abuse. If forty or fifty gallons were allowed, that quantity would soon be made to cover four or five hundred. In cases like these stated, a jury in the Exchequer, upon complaint, was ready at all times to do justice to the injured owner.

Mr. R. Atkinson said, it was a very odd kind of justice; when, by the knavery of one of the crew, a merchant has had his ship seized, his voyage retarded, and himself put to a hundred pounds expence, the jury, in their great mercy and love of justice, shall let him have his ship again, with all her expences on her head. Should this clause pass, he knew of his own knowledge several eminent merchants that were determined to relinquish all shares in shipping, rather than lie at the mercy of common seamen, who, all men well know, will smuggle a few gallons at whatever risk for their friends and families. He instanced a ship of his own, that was seized, because the men had concealed under some hemp 20 gallons of Holland's gin in bottles. After much trouble he got his ship again, but not without paying 100l. to the officers who seized her, besides all other expences.

Mr. McDonald contended, that the clause in question was no new clause; it had existed ever since the reign of Edw. III. and, if it were to be abolished, the owner would never be guilty of any illicit practice; it would be always the profligate crew that would be in fault. He believed it was well-known, that the common seamen were not the only persons that would smuggle for their family and friends on board a ship. The contagion he believed to be catching.

Mr. Brooke Watson instanced two ships in somewhat similar circumstances with the former; the one, an American ship, for having a quantity of a drug called gen-lang, which, when the clerk came to enter, he could not find in the book of rates, and the ship was accordingly seized, and, though recovered, was loaded with an expence equal to the profits of the voyage.

Mr. Baring instanced a ship's being seized for taking out ten casks of Woolwich sand, under pretence of its being Fuller's-earth.

Mr. Arden defended the clause, and the whole bill; in which there had been no material alteration made, except in the hovering clause.

Mr. W. Stanhope strenuously opposed the clause. Let the precedent be of ever so long standing, it could not, he said, affect the immutable nature of moral justice. No just law could ever subject an innocent man to punishment for the crimes committed by another without his consent. It should surely be proved, that the owner or master who had the conduct of the vessel was consenting, or at least there should be some presumptive evidence of his conniving at the fraud, before the owner's property should be confiscated, and his family ruined. The law of no country could be more severe or arbitrary.

Mr. Beaufoy remarked, that if this law obtained, by parity of reasoning, the learned gentleman himself might have his horses confiscated, for his coachman or helper hiding a cag of gin in his stables.

Sir Henry Fletcher stated, that to his knowledge three ships had been detained; one, for having two gallons of spirits on board more than was allowed, and it cost 70l. to have her returned; the other two were proved to be illegally detained, and the only redress was against the officer, a man of 50l. a year salary.

Capt. McBride was of opinion, that the bill, as it was now framed, would rather increase than diminish smuggling. He had reason to think that the masters of the King's cutters, and the masters of the smuggling cutters perfectly understood one another. It was no uncommon thing for the crew to go one voyage with the smuggler, and the in with the King's ship.

Tuesday 13.

The order of the day, for the second reading of the E. India Bill, being read;

Mr Francis rose, to state his objections. Some passages, he said, were imperfect, some wanted explanation, and others were wholly inadmissible. It did not appear to him that any commander in chief of the forces was appointed; and yet the bill stated, that the commander in chief should have place and vote in the council. By another clause, persons who had served the Company in India and had returned, except for the benefit of their health, are prohibited from returning to India again in any civil or military capacity, than which nothing can be more unjust or impolitic. He did not say this, because the clause affected himself; but because it would deprive the Company of their best and ablest servants. He saw, he said, a gentleman on the other side of the house [Maj. Scott], whom it would equally affect with himself. That gentleman did not come hither on account of his health, but was employed in a very honourable service at home, which he had conducted with credit to to himself, and much to the advantage and the satisfaction of his employer; but, should the clause alluded to pass into a law, not only the Company, but the government in India would be deprived of a member in every respect qualified to be useful to it. A third clause to which Mr. Francis objected, as wanting explanation, was that by which the new board were empowered to send out dispatches originating with them, without communicating the contents to the court of directors: should such a power be vested in the new commission, it might happen that secret orders might be sent to the commander in chief of the army, with which the civil power might be totally unacquainted, the consequences of which were too obvious to need illustration.

Mr. Pitt urged, in general, the impropriety of discussing the clauses till the bill had got into the committee; thus much, however, he would say, that it was certainly not the intention of Government to leave the East India army without a commander in chief; with respect to the restraint to be laid on the company's servants returning to India, it was meant to be indiscriminate and general; if, therefore, in that shape, it should appear objectionable, the Hon. Gent. would have an opportunity to combat it in the committee; and as to the power to be vested in the new board of commissioners to send out dispatches without passing through the medium of the court of directors, the motive was secrecy; and as the court of directors had their committee of secrecy, he should have no objection to the clause being so worded as to include that committee.

Mr. Eden rose, just to make one remark, and ask one question. He could not help, he said, considering the future government of India, and the establishment of judicature for the punishment of delinquents there, as two distinct objects of the greatest magnitude, and was therefore at a loss to account for the Rt. Hon. Gentleman's views in blending two such objects in one bill, to be discussed at the end of a session; and the rather, as so considerable an alteration was to be made in the fundamental law of the land as the abolition of trial by jury, when all the twelve judges must necessarily be absent on their respective circuits. This he thought an alarming circumstance. As to the question he had to ask, it was this. The Rt. Hon. Gentleman had professed, that one part of his plan was to grant relief to the East India Company, and that a bill was to be brought in for that purpose. He thought, that, before any other bill relative to India should be concluded on, the House had a right to be made acquainted with the extent of that relief; and he was not a little surprised, he said, that such information should be withheld. He therefore desired to know when that bill was to be brought in?

Mr. Pitt little expected, after the declaration of a Rt. Hon. Gent. [Mr. Fox] whom he did not now see in his place, that he would vote no relief to the East India Company, till he should see the bill for the future government in India, that any gentleman should be displeased that the territorial bill should be first presented; however, to satisfy the House on that head, he meant to bring in the relief bill before the other went to a committee, probably to-morrow. The bill was read the second time, and an order made to be referred to a committee on Friday next.

Mr. Gilbert brought up the report from the committee of ways and means of the candle bill, in which the House made one amendment, by extending the exemption to candles made of Sperma Ceti.

Sir J. Johnson opposed this amendment, unless it was to subject such candles to a higher tax.

Mr. Rose satisfied the Hon. Baronet's scruples on this head.

Mr. Ald. Newnham proposed to transfer the tax from the candles to the tallow, as less liable to fraud, and more productive.

Mr. Pitt objected to it, as too complex to be attempted at the close of a session. The bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Ld. Beauchamp moved for leave to bring in a bill for repealing the acts of 10th and 15th of the present reign, relative to the issuing of writs for the election of members, and for comprising the same with additional provisions in a new bill, which he begged leave to bring in. Granted.

Wednesday, 14.

The above bill was presented, read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

Thursday, 15.

The house resolved itself into a committee on the Smuggling-bill, on which the clauses were all re-debated.

Capt. Macbride was for extending the hovering act, from four to six leagues, not however exceeding half channel.

Ld. Mulgrave observed, that in framing laws for regulating our coasting trade, care should be had, in executing a local law, not to infringe the general law of nations. His Lordship therefore thought our revenue cutters ought to be restrained from taking cognizance of any other vessels, except those belonging to our own subjects.

Mr. Pitt insisted, that by the law of nations every state had a right to regulate trade on its own coasts. Encroachments are not to be made by foreign vessels contrary to the known and established systems of commercial laws.

Capt. Macbride observed, that if his Lordship's principle were to be admitted, it would at once establish what the present bill was intended to suppress; and we should soon have swarms of smugglers from all nations to infest our coasts.

Mr. Dundas was for admitting no indulgences.

Mr. Dempster was of the same opinion. Great part of the smuggling trade on the coast of Scotland was carried on in Dutch bottoms. He was for extending the hovering clause, which, however, was at length fixed at four leagues from shore.

In the course of discussing the several clauses of the bill, Mr. Bosc observed, that great numbers of useful subjects would necessarily be thrown out of employment, and forced to seek their bread in foreign service, if a clause of indemnity was not introduced into the bill in their favour: he would therefore, he said, move such a clause, if Administration would best their assistance in giving it effect.

Mr. Pitt thanked the Rt. Hon. Gent. for the hint, which he thought not only good policy, but humanity required.

The several clauses of the bill were many of them so technical and complicated as not to be clearly understood, and others so severe as to be strenuously opposed by the mercantile part of the house, which protracted the debate to an unusual length. It was therefore moved to adjourn, to report progress, and to move for leave to sit again.

Friday, 16.

Mr. Pitt brought forward his bill for granting relief to the East India Company; which was read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

The bill for laying an additional duty on paper was reported from the committee, and is to take place from the 17th of August.

The bill for laying a duty on horses was read the first time.

Mr. Martin reported to the house the privilege he had by his perseverance acquired for the members of that house to have admittance into the House of Peers, and to be stationed behind the throne. He apologized for the trouble he had often given, but, as an accommodation was now brought about, he hoped it would be the means of establishing a good understanding between the two houses, and a return of good humour and politeness to each other.

The order of the day being then read, for the house to go into a committee on the India Bill; and the question being put, that the Speaker do leave the chair;

Mr. Francis rose, and objected not only to the principle, but to every part of the bill: he thought the preamble very improper, as it neither stated the particulars of the abuse it was meant to remedy, nor the grounds for making such a bill necessary. That the bill was wrong in principle, was obvious, for it went to transfer the power of the court of Directors to the Crown; and by that transfer to increase the power of those servants abroad, who had been the means of all the misfortunes that had befallen the Company at home. The manner of filling up the vacancies was, he said, calculated for the same purpose. The system of dividing the civil and military government he disapproved; he insisted, that the bill, as it was now framed, went to deprive the Proprietors of all their chartered rights; whereas the utmost that was urged against Mr. Fox's bill was, that it invaded their charter. To the clause for settling the debts of the princes in India, he objected as nugatory. He was certain it would have no effect. And as to the clause relative to promotions by seniority, it was stifled in the birth, by adding unless cause shall be seen to do otherwise. By the clause for restraining persons who had been in India from returning, and rendering persons above a certain age ineligible, it should seem, he said, that the Rt. Hon. Gentlemen meant, that both age and experience should be excluded. The clause for preventing the servants of the Company from enriching themselves by presents, he treated contemptuously. He had never accepted of any himself, but his colleague [Mr. Barwell], a member of that House, had made no secret of receiving 20,000*l*. As to Mr. Hastings, his hands were clean. After stating objections to almost every clause, Mr. Francis entered into a justification of the conduct of Gen. Clive and Col. Monson from the aspersions of a learned lord in another house, who, speaking of their conduct and his (Mr. Francis's); made this humane remark, That it would have been a happy thing for this country, if they had all three been drowned in their passage to India. The learned lord had made use of this expression in perfect security from his elevated situation; but shew me, said Mr. F. another man, that dared to utter such language, or cast a blot on those two brave but injured men! If such expressions could come from the seat of judgment, what justice could be expected, in the case of innocence, from a mind in which rancour and malice appear so deeply rooted! He concluded his objections to the bill, by remarking, with respect to the clause for establishing a distinct jurisdiction for the trial of offenders in India, that it was not indeed new: it was only a revival of that odious star-chamber jurisdiction, which was so justly held in detestation. He wished, that additional power might be given to the court of King's Bench, if it did not at present possess sufficient, to try such delinquents: but totally to abolish trial by jury was a stretch of despotism, which even Henry the VIIIth, the most arbitrary of our monarchs, never dared attempt.

Before he sat down, he adverted to what lord Delaval had said when he quitted the coalition, "That now Mr. Pitt and the present minister had come in upon the shoulders of the people at the front door, and were beloved and the people's choice, &c." and wished to know what mighty things the darlings had done for the people! They had, he said, endeavoured to establish a democracy in Westminster, which he supposed they would next extend to London; from London to Middlesex, till representatives should no longer be necessary throughout the kingdom. The example they had seen succeed in a Northern nation; and it seemed but too plain, that some such despotic principles were secretly hatching in this. For which reasons, he was against the Speaker's leaving the chair.

Mr.

Mr. Lambrose rose, in justification of Lord Delaval, who, he said, was an independent country gentleman, who had no man's turn to serve, nor any other interest in view but that of his country.

Mr. Pitt saw no reason, he said, for reciting in the preamble of the bill the whole history of India; and thought, if the house had before shown any aversion to go into a committee, the Hon. gentlemen's arguments were sufficient to induce them to it. He was happy to find, that the clauses he seemed most to dislike were copied almost literally from the bill of his friend Mr. Fox; and, as for his personalities, they were such as retorted reproach on himself: the refutation of his arguments against the bill was such as required no great abilities to effect; he should therefore, he said, leave that easy task to the proper place.

Mr. Fox began a speech of more than two hours length by apologising for attacking the bill in its present stage, which he would certainly not have done, had he not, upon reading it, found the principle different from that which the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, upon opening it, had professed. He found, he said, the chartered rights of the Company wholly revoked, and a door opened for the annihilation of all chartered rights, on the shallow pretence of state-necessity. He could discover, in framing the bill, the hand of the delinquent servant of the Company, against whose abuses it was the duty of ministers to direct their vengeance. If ever there was a plan in contemplation to form a weak and debilitated government, it was here to be found, when the measures were to be directed by one party, and the execution of them to be invested in the hands of the opposite party. It was a maxim in politics never to be departed from, that he who gave the instructions should likewise appoint the persons who were to execute the trust. But the bill was fraught with absurdity from one end to the other. The directors are to transmit their dispatches to the new board of commissioners, who have power to alter them and send them back. If the directors think themselves aggrieved, they may appeal to his Majesty in council, of whom the commissioners form the efficient part. It is true that by his bill he intended to have taken the commercial part out of the hands of the present company. But in whose hands did he invest it? Not in the multitude, but in select directors, many of integrity well qualified by experience in the company's service, to conduct their affairs. Wholly to separate the commercial from the territorial acquisitions was a dangerous measure, which could not now be safely attempted; commerce was the means of bringing home revenue; and revenue was the means of enlarging and bringing home commerce. He followed Mr. Francis in criminalising the conduct of Gov. Hastings, who, to use the words of a Rt. Hon. gentleman [Mr. Dundas] two years ago, never went from Calcutta, but blood and rapine followed him; and in enforcing and elucidating the arguments against the exceptionable parts of the bill which Mr. Francis had pointed out, he dwelt long on the merits of his own bill. The propositions contained in it were such as looked villainy in the face. He detested temporising expedients: he well knew that if the same servants were to be continued, the same abuses would be continued. But he boldly struck at the root. Had he done otherwise, he might have been in a very different situation to that in which he now stood. The defence of his bill was masterly and pointed; he was severe on those who had deserted their principles, and who, having knowledge of the enormities committed, had menly stooped to abandon their friends, and become advocates for villainy. He cautioned the house to consider deliberately, and not to suffer their zeal to get the better of their judgment; but to think seriously, by passing the bill, what a stab they would give to the constitution.

Mr. Dundas replied to Mr. Fox in a most spirited speech. With respect to those excellent documents of truth, justice, and honour, those liberal professions of equity, candour, and humanity, so ably set forth by the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, he acknowledged; they were admirable in theory, and could not be too much venerated in practice. He wished, for the honour of human nature, and for the benefit of the empire, that the Rt. Hon. Gent. and every Gent. in that house, could lay his hand upon his heart, and say, "I do not advance aught but what flows from the genuine sentiments of my heart." After a full display of his oratorical powers, he proceeded to answer the principal objections that had been stated. As to the new mode of trial for India delinquents, so much reprobated, he wished to know when a jury of their Peers was to be impannelled. Whether they were to be summoned from the preferences abroad, or from the courts of proprietors at home. Few of the electors of Westminster, he believed, and fewer still of the assy-principled gentry of Spitalfields, would be thought competent to judge of crimes committed at Oude, or depredations made at Benares. Gentlemen, he said, had talked of a fourth estate, that had lately started up in our constitution; is it to be wondered, then, that this new state should have some new regulations; or that they should adopt old regulations, and adapt them to their own particular mode of government? Trials by jury are unknown to delinquents in India, and they cannot be deprived of what they never were possessed. The great aggregate bodies of military and marine in this country are not tried by jury in the vicinage of their own corps; yet no one ever complained of a breach made in the great fundamental law of the land, by judgment of death being pronounced by courts martial. As to chartered rights in India, who could claim them? Was ever a charter heard of in India? There never was. The great which, however, was at length fixed at four leagues from shore.

In the course of discussing the several clauses of the bill, Mr. Eden observed, that great numbers of useful subjects would necessarily be thrown out of employment, and forced to seek their bread in foreign service, if a clause of indemnity was not introduced into the bill in their favour: he would therefore, he said, move such a clause, if Administration would send their assistance in giving it effect.

Mr. Pitt thanked the Rt. Hon. Gent. for the hint, which he thought not only good policy, but humanity required.

The several clauses of the bill were many of them so technical and complicated as not to be clearly understood, and others so severe as to be strenuously opposed by the mercantile part of the house, which protracted the debate to an unusual length. It was therefore moved to adjourn, to report progress, and to move for leave to sit again.

Friday, 16.

Mr. Pitt brought forward his bill for granting relief to the East India Company; which was read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

The bill for laying an additional duty on paper was reported from the committee, and is to take place from the 17th of August.

The bill for laying a duty on horses was read the first time.

Mr. Martin reported to the house the privilege he had by his perseverance acquired for the members of that house to have admittance into the House of Peers, and to be stationed behind the throne. He apologized for the trouble he had often given, but, as an accommodation was now brought about, he hoped it would be the means of establishing a good understanding between the two houses, and a return of good humour and politeness to each other.

The order of the day being then read, for the house to go into a committee on the India Bill; and the question being put, that the Speaker do leave the chair;

Mr. Francis rose, and objected not only to the principle, but to every part of the bill: he thought the preamble very improper, as it neither stated the particulars of the abuse it was meant to remedy, nor the grounds for making such a bill necessary. That the bill was wrong in principle, was obvious, for it went to transfer the power of the court of Directors to the Crown; and by that transfer to increase the power of those servants abroad, who had been the means of all the misfortunes that had befallen the Company at home. The manner of filling up the vacancies was, he said, calculated for the same purpose. The system of dividing the civil and military government he disapproved; he insisted, that the bill, as it was now framed, went to deprive the Proprietors of all their chartered rights; whereas the utmost that was urged at Mr. Fox's bill was, that it invaded their charter. To the clause for settling the debts of the princes in India, he objected as nugatory. He was certain it would have no effect. And as to the clause relative to promotions by seniority, it was stifled in the birth, by adding unless cause shall be seen to do otherwise. By the clause for restraining persons who had been in India from returning, and rendering persons above a certain age ineligible, it should seem, he said, that the Rt. Hon. Gentlemen meant, that both age and experience should be excluded. The clause for preventing the servants of the Company from enriching themselves by presents, he treated contemptuously. He had never accepted of any himself, but his colleague [Mr. Barwell], a member of that House, had made no secret of receiving 20,000*l*. As to Mr. Hastings, his hands were clean. After stating objections to almost every clause, Mr. Francis entered into a justification of the conduct of Gen. Clive and Col. Monson from the aspersions of a learned lord in another house, who, speaking of their conduct and his (Mr. Francis's); made this humane remark, That it would have been a happy thing for this country, if they had all three been drowned in their passage to India. The learned lord had made use of this expression in perfect security from his elevated situation; but shew me, said Mr. F. another man, that dared to utter such language, or cast a blot on those two brave but injured men! If such expressions could come from the seat of judgment, what justice could be expected, in the case of innocence, from a mind in which rancour and malice appear so deeply rooted! He concluded his objections to the bill, by remarking, with respect to the clause for establishing a distinct jurisdiction for the trial of offenders in India, that it was not indeed new: it was only a revival of that odious star-chamber jurisdiction, which was so justly held in detestation. He wished, that additional power might be given to the court of King's Bench, if it did not at present possess sufficient, to try such delinquents: but totally to abolish trial by jury was a stretch of despotism, which even Henry the VIIIth, the most arbitrary of our monarchs, never dared attempt.

Before he sat down, he adverted to what lord Delaval had said when he quitted the coalition, "That now Mr. Pitt and the present minister had come in upon the shoulders of the people at the front door, and were beloved and the people's choice, &c." and wished to know what mighty things the darlings had done for the people! They had, he said, endeavoured to establish a democracy in Westminster, which he supposed they would next extend to London; from London to Middlesex, till representatives should no longer be necessary throughout the kingdom. The example they had seen succeed in a Northern nation; and it seemed but too plain, that some such despotic principles were secretly hatching in this. For which reasons, he was against the Speaker's leaving the chair.

Mr.

Mr. Campbell rose, in justification of Lord Dalhousie, who, he said, was an independent country gentleman, who had no man's turn to serve, nor any other interest in view but that of his country.

Mr. Pitt saw no reason, he said, for reciting in the preamble of the bill the whole history of India; and thought, if the house had before shown any aversion to go into a committee, the Hon. gentlemen's arguments were sufficient to induce them to it. He was happy to find, that the clauses he seemed most to dislike were copied almost literally from the bill of his friend Mr. Fox; and, as for his personalities, they were such as retorted rancour on himself: the refutation of his arguments against the bill was such as required no great abilities to effect; he should therefore, he said, leave that easy task to the proper place.

Mr. Fox began a speech of more than two hours length by apologising for attacking the bill in its present stage, which he would certainly not have done, had he not, upon reading it, found the principle different from that which the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, upon opening it, had professed. He found, he said, the chartered rights of the Company wholly revoked, and a door opened for the annihilation of all chartered rights, on the shallow pretence of state-necessity. He could discover, in framing the bill, the hand of the delinquent servant of the Company, against whose abuses it was the duty of ministers to direct their vengeance. If ever there was a plan in contemplation to form a weak and debilitated government, it was here to be found, when the measures were to be directed by one party, and the execution of them to be invested in the hands of the opposite party. It was a maxim in politics never to be departed from, that he who gave the instructions should likewise appoint the persons who were to execute the trust. But the bill was fraught with absurdity from one end to the other. The directors are to transmit their dispatches to the new board of commissioners, who have power to alter them and send them back. If the directors think themselves aggrieved, they may appeal to his Majesty in council, of whom the commissioners form the efficient part. It is true that by his bill he intended to have taken the commercial part out of the hands of the present company. But in whose hands did he invest it! Not in the multitude, but in select directors, many of integrity well qualified by experience in the company's service, to conduct their affairs. Wholly to separate the commercial from the territorial acquisitions was a dangerous measure, which could not now be safely attempted; commerce was the means of bringing home revenue; and revenue was the means of enlarging and bringing home commerce. He followed Mr. Francis in criminalising the conduct of Gov. Hastings, who, to use the words of a Rt. Hon. gentleman [Mr. Dundas] two years ago, never went from Calcutta; but blood and rapine followed him; and in enforcing and elucidating the arguments against the exceptionable parts of the bill which Mr. Francis had pointed out, he dwelt long on the merits of his own bill. The propositions contained in it were such as looked villainy in the face. He detested temporising expedients: he well knew that if the same servants were to be continued, the same abuses would be continued. But he boldly struck at the root. Had he done otherwise, he might have been in a very different situation to that in which he now stood. The defence of his bill was masterly and pointed; he was severe on those who had deserted their principles, and who, having knowledge of the enormities committed, had meanly stooped to abandon their friends, and become advocates for villainy. He cautioned the house to consider deliberately, and not to suffer their zeal to get the better of their judgement; but to think seriously, by passing the bill, what a stab they would give to the constitution.

Mr. Dundas replied to Mr. Fox in a most spirited speech. With respect to those excellent documents of truth, justice, and honour, those liberal professions of equity, candour, and humanity, so aptly set forth by the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, he acknowledged; they were admirable in theory, and could not be too much venerated in practice. He wished, for the honour of human nature, and for the benefit of the empire, that the Rt. Hon. Gent. and every Gent. in that house, could lay his hand upon his heart, and say, "I do not advance aught but what flows from the genuine sentiments of my heart." After a full display of his oratorical powers, he proceeded to answer the principal objections that had been stated. As to the new mode of trial for India delinquents, so much reprobated, he wished to know when a jury of their Peers was to be impannelled. Whether they were to be summoned from the precincts abroad, or from the courts of proprietors at home. Few of the electors of Westminster, he believed, and fewer still of the easy-principled gentry of Spitalfields, would be thought competent to judge of crimes committed at Oude, or depredations made at Benares. Gentlemen, he said, had talked of a fourth estate, that had lately started up in our constitution; is it to be wondered, then, that this new state should have some new regulations; or that they should adopt old regulations, and adapt them to their own particular mode of government? Trials by jury are unknown to delinquents in India, and they cannot be deprived of what they never were possessed. The great aggregate bodies of military and marine in this country are not tried by jury in the vicinage of their own corps; yet no one ever complained of a breach made in the great fundamental law of the land, by judgment of death being pronounced by courts martial. As to chartered rights in India, who could claim them? Was ever a charter heard of in India? There: never was. The great mass mass of evidence which Parliament had been able to extort, what had it produced against delinquents? and could it be supposed that a jury of housekeepers could be more efficacious? The truth was, there was a defect in the law, which this bill was intended to supply: several exceptions, he owned, might be made to the clauses, and those the committee were to correct; but against the leading principles of the bill, he insisted, there were no exceptions. He therefore was for committing the bill.

Ld. Delaval replied to Mr. Francis with some warmth. He was, he said, no upstart member, who came into the House to support this or that man's interest. He had been twenty-five years a member of Parliament, and the voice of his constituents and the voice of the people had ever been his voice. He knew no interest that a senator had to support, but the interest of his country. He had never deserted his principles, but had uniformly endeavoured to distinguish himself by his attachment to Parliament and the rights of the People.

Ld. North rose, to congratulate the house and the people on such a steady friend to the constitution of his country, and liberties of mankind; but begged his lordship to recollect, that whenever any gentleman was thought to desert his principles, it might not perhaps be the gentleman, but the times, that had changed complexion; He wished to bring to the recollection of the old members of the house what had passed when the noble and learned lord, now in the highest seat of promotion, was Attorney-General, respecting the opinion he then entertained of Mr. Hastings; and the share he had at that time in the appointment of Gen. Clavering, Col. Monson, and Mr. Francis; and they must think the wishes of the noble Lord somewhat extraordinary; and that they must have been words spoken in heat, which his Lordship in cooler moments would not pretend to justify. The resolutions of that house, the instructions of the proprietors, and even the commands of his Majesty, had all been sported with by Mr. Hastings, as being just as much to the purpose as "a chapter in Robinson Crusoe." Surely the noble Ld. [Turlow], whatever his friendship might now be for Mr. Hastings, would not defend his insolent disregard to the orders from this country; his contemptuous disrespect to his sovereign, which has marked his conduct as lord paramount to all controul. He was against the Speaker's leaving the chair.

Mr. Francis observed, that he held his seat in Parliament on principles equally liberal and independent; and that, in supporting the general interest of Great Britain, as connected with the general interest of the Empire, he would give place to no man, let his continuance in Parliament be of ever so long standing. Of the local interest of his constituents the noble lord [Delaval] might possibly have gained experience, by his long service in parliament; but with respect to the relative interests of distant acquisitions, his lordship, he was happy to remark, had generally chosen to be directed.

Mr. Pepper Arden followed Mr. Dundas in defending the clause for setting aside juries in the trials of India delinquents; as at present these delinquents are out of the reach of the British laws, he insisted they were not entitled to their privileges. He spoke to other points of law with great spirit and animation.

Maj. Scott defended the principle of the bill on the ground of former precedents.

Mr. Dampster observed, that the bill, worded as it was at present, would do the East India company more harm than good.

Aldm. Newnham had heard that both the court of Proprietors and the court of Directors were against the bill; and as the bill was said to be grounded on their acquiescence, he thought it a proper question to ask the minister, whether the report was founded in truth?

Mr. Atkinson in reply said, that the East India Company had adjourned their final determination, under a notion that the bill was to be postponed.

Mr. Huffey was for giving the bill another discussion before it went to a committee.

Mr. Tornton said, he was present at the India House the day before; and it was the general opinion, that the farther consideration of the bill was to be adjourned.

Mr. Eden was of opinion, that the bill should be postponed till the company, the rock on which the bill was founded, were agreed among themselves.

Mr. Pitt urged the necessity of proceeding with the bill, the circumstances being such as would admit of no delay.

Mr. Martin thought the debate had been protracted to an unusual length, and wished the same to be adjourned.

Several members became impatient, and the question being loudly called for, the house divided. For the Speaker's leaving the chair, Ayes 271, Noes 92. Majority 179.

The house then resolved itself into a committee, Lord Mahon in the chair.

Mr. Percy rose instantly, to assign his reasons for voting with the minister on the present occasion, because he thought it of importance to his country that the bill should go into a committee, where its merits and demerits might be candidly considered; but when he and the gentlemen who acted with him did this, they imagined that report would have been made of progress, and leave asked to sit again. Instead of which, he now found the minister's intention was, to get through the most obnoxious clauses, at least as many of them as he could, before the house rose, which he by no means approved.

Mr. Pitt pleaded the urgency of the measure. He said, the affairs abroad were at that moment in so critical a situation, that a day's delay might endanger the loss of all our possessions in the East. The princes in that country waited with impatience the decrees of Parli-ment

ment in their favour; and if Parliament should rise, and the regulations and redress they had been given to expect, were protracted, the confusion that could ensue might easily be conceived, but would not possibly be averted. The very existence of our territorial acquisitions depended on dispatch.

Lord Mahon hastened to read the clauses as they stood; and had gone through the bill, as far as the clause by which commissioners are appointed, without a division, when

Mr. Fox rose, and insisted, that the new board of commissioners should be made responsible for the orders they should transmit to India. It were otherwise a mere board of inquisition, where the judges act without controul, and where, let their acts be ever so atrocious, there is no law to punish them. He saw, he said, the troops were mustered, and had now got the watch-word; but, let their numbers be ever so great. he would take the sense of parliament, whether the minister, the crown, or the commissioners, were to be answerable to the public? or whether any body or nobody was to be punishable for acts done contrary to law, and in violation of the constitution of this country?

Mr. Pitt opposed any alteration, or any further explanation on the subject, than what was contained in the clause itself.

Mr. Sheridan remarked, that the more arbitrary and unconstitutional any clause was, the more tenaciously it was adhered to by the Right Hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Fox then moved an amendment to the effect he had expressed above; and the question being put, there appeared for the question ayes 7, noes 92; majority 85.

The other clauses were then read, as far as the home business; when

Mr. Pitt moved, that Ld Mahon do leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Which was agreed to, and the House adjourned at three in the morning.

Monday 19.

The E. India regulating bill was read.

Mr. Sheridan rose, and apologised for keeping the Speaker in the chair; but wished the clauses in the bill relative to the court of judicature for trying delinquents might be considered in a separate bill.

Mr. Pitt observed, that it was not often that the Hon. Gentleman and himself were of one mind; but on the present occasion he saw no objection, if the sole object was to accommodate the house, and that no delay was intended.

Mr. Sheridan disavowed any intention of procrastinating the bill; but the tribunal which was to be erected was so perfectly new, as to require particular attention. He would therefore move that the same might be distinctly considered.

Mr. Jolliffe thought the preceding provisions of the bill would produce great good to the Company and the public. What the subsequent clauses might produce, he was not so clearly satisfied.

GENT. MAG. October, 1784.

Mr. Eden was for having the bill printed immediately after passing the committee, for it had there been so cut and mangled, that what remained of it could not be well understood; and it was of such magnitude and importance, that gentlemen should have every sight to decide upon its merits, before it should pass into a law.

Mr. Pitt hoped the house would not expect that his complaisance to the gentlemen on the other side of it should divert his attention from the opinion of those who sat on his side. A reason against the Hon. Gentleman's proposition, that had since forcibly struck him, was, that as the whole was intended as a system for the reformation of Indian policy, there appeared an absurdity in sending one part of the plan to the H. of Lords, while the other was yet under discussion.

Mr. Sheridan hoped, that no man's opinion would prevail on the Rt. Hon. Chancellor to retract his consent to the separation of the clauses for establishing the tribunal in question, from the former part of the bill; and he hoped likewise that those who had joined the minister in voting for the former part of the bill, would now join him [Mr. Sheridan] in opposing the bill for erecting the new tribunal.

Mr. Dempster owned himself averse to the whole bill, but more particularly to that for establishing a new Court of Judicature. Before the boasted birth-rights of Englishmen were wrested from them, he wished counsel to be heard at the bar in their favour.

Mr. Francis felt the very idea of such a deprivation, as repugnant to all his sentiments of liberty as a Briton. As a representative of Englishmen, he would give it his unequivocal dissent. He hoped the house would look upon it in the same odious light, and concur with him in voting for the present motion.

Mr. Pitt rose, to congratulate the house and the country, on the accession which the national representation had received in the person of the hon. member. He had declared but a few days ago that he had come into the house, not as a representative of the people of Great Britain, but to vindicate the cause of injured Indians, whose distresses he had marked in melancholy colours. To-day he had assumed a new character, which he doubted not would meet the approbation of the house.

The motion for separation was then put, and negatived without a division.

The order of the day was then read, and the house resolved itself into a committee. Lord Mahon in the chair as before.

Capt. Carbarrat wished to introduce a clause in the bill, for supplying defects in the present military system in India. He stated to the committee that Sir John Burgoyne was that moment under arrest, and that the whole army in India was in confusion. He trusted there would be a remedy provided against such an evil.

Gen. Burgoyne entered into the particulars relative to the arrest of his relation, who, he said, had preserved the military system, and perhaps the country, by his masterly conduct. See India Affairs, p. 223.

Sir James Erskine wished to know if commanders in chief were to have seats in the council. As he understood the troops were henceforth to act under one commander, he thought they ought to act likewise under one and the same commission.

Mr. Dundas, in reply, said, that commanders in chief were to have seats at the several presidencies of Bengal, and Bombay; but submitted to the committee the impropriety of admitting the second in command to the same privilege, as in that case orders would issue from inferiors, which superiors were to obey.

Col. Fitzpatrick could not conceive, as the Company were to possess the military command, how the King's troops could act there under the Company, while commissioned by the King.

Mr. Pitt did not see any difficulty in the case, as the only object in view was to extinguish animosities by placing all in the same service on the same footing.

Maj. Scott avowed his coming to the house, to assign the cause of the late confusion which has prevailed in the government of the territorial possessions in India, which, he roundly asserted, had originated in the act of the year 1773, which increased, without either reason or justice, the number of the supreme council. Generals Clavering and Monson came prejudiced against Mr. Hastings. This principle poisoned all their subsequent conduct. He appealed, for the truth of what he asserted, to a gentleman he had in his eye [Mr. Francis], whom he challenged to contradict him. The number five plunged the country into ruin and disorder. Every thing was orderly and tranquil prior to that event. Mr. Hastings had discharged the debts of the Company, the troops were paid, and the commerce supplied with investments. The whole history of that period went to establish the facts as he had stated them to the house.

Mr. Francis in reply said, the Hon. Gent. had asserted many things boldly, which he thought it would be difficult for him to prove. He had taken it for granted, that he and the other gentlemen were sent out purposely to oppose Mr. Hastings, and that they had done it partially, and from no motives of public utility. All this was easily said, and as easily contradicted. But he would tell the Hon. Gent. and the house, that, when they came to India, they found it impossible to reconcile the orders of the Directors to the plan of the Governor-General. The orders of the former were for peace; but the policy of the latter was, secretly to foment a war. He should decline, he said, entering into the particulars of the Rohilla war at present. He trusted, that war was now pretty well understood. He was not fond, he said, of following every vague assertion; it was enough for him that the part he acted would bear the test of the strictest investigation. This altercation took up some time. The committee went through some few more of the clauses, and at length Resolved, the chairman to report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Tuesday 20.

The order of the day, for proceeding on the India Regulating Bill, being read;

Mr. Adam wished to know, whether the bill was to be reported pro forma and printed, that the house might see it complete.

Mr. Pitt said, he had not the least objection to its being printed. The house went then into committee upon the remaining clauses.

Mr. Dundas proposed an amendment to the clause for empowering agents to arrange and settle the reciprocal claims of the Company with their territorial allies, which he thought too particular as the clause now stood. He wished to allow them greater latitude; and only to express the wish of the legislature to the Company's servants on that head, to expedite the conclusion of such settlement on the most equitable terms that could possibly be obtained. This amendment was moved for, and carried.

The committee proceeded, and went thro' all the other clauses, till they came to that for appointing the new tribunal, among which was that for limiting the age of all those going out to India as cadets and writers, from 16 to 22, except such gentlemen as had already served one year in some of his Majesty's regiments, who were allowed till 25 to accept an appointment. This settled, the chairman was ordered to report progress, and ask leave to sit again. (To be continued.)

Curious Experiment in Natural Philosophy.

Some German noblemen have lately revived the old exploded experiments of Transfusion. At the hotel of Baron de Dietrichstein they took a sheep and a calf, and having tied their legs they were laid upon a table; they then opened a jugular vein of the sheep, and let him bleed till the physicians and other spectators owned there were no signs of life left; they then opened the same vein of the calf, which was placed near the sheep, and by means of a quill let the blood out of the calf into the sheep, and in a short time, to the great astonishment of the spectators, the sheep began to move, and shew signs of life; and when the sheep was thought to have received blood enough, the vein was tied up, and the sheep trotted; he immediately began to run and eat grass, and joined the flock which were in a neighbouring field.

F. Q.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Petersburg, Aug. 31. The Empress our Sovereign, who has long been ill, and who went to Czarsko Zelo on the 12th inst. for the air, has had a return of the disorder with which she was so formidably attacked here. Five physicians attend her Imperial Majesty, one of whom, Dr. Ball, an Englishman, has made himself famous by his skill and address.

Petersburg, Sept. 21. Her Imperial Majesty arrived unexpectedly in this capital, from Czarko-Zelo, in the evening of the 16th: no person having notice of her return, the apartments of the palace were not ready, and her Majesty was obliged to lodge for some days at the Hermitage. On the 19th her Majesty had a drawing-room, and appeared in public.

Berlin, Sept. 23. The Count de Hoya, with his two aids de camp, arrived here the 20th from Prague; he has been introduced to the King and all the Royal Family; and the court are preparing two or three Galas in different styles for his entertainment.

Vienna, Sept. 15. According to letters from Prague of the 9th of this month, the Emperor arrived the 6th at night at the camp of Hlupieten. There was a prodigious concourse of people of every rank and description to see that monarch. Several persons who had suffered by the inundations last spring experienced his munificence. Soon after his Majesty, the Prince Bishop of Osnabrug arrived, and alighted at the castle of Lichen, where every thing had been prepared for his reception. The grand manoeuvres are fixed for the 10th and 13th of this month. The masked ball, which the Emperor intended to have given here the 20th to the Prince Bishop of Osnabrug, will take place on Monday next.

Copenhagen, Sept. 25. On the 14th and 15th of August several shocks of an earthquake were felt in Iceland, whereby 30 parcels of land and several houses were destroyed. The subterraneous fire which had raged for some months in the eastern part of the island appeared to be extinguished, and the isle of Reikenas, which the sea moved towards Iceland last year, had disappeared.

Vienna, Sept. 29. There never was a more brilliant entertainment in Bohemia than the masked ball given by the Emperor for the amusement of the Prince Bishop of Osnabrug, and his Majesty was so well satisfied with the managers, that he made them a handsome present above their expences.

Hanover, Oct. 5. His R. H. the Prince Bishop of Osnabrug has shortened his journey thro' Germany, and arrived here this morning.

Naples, Sept. 7. On the 16th of last month Messina experienced a most violent earthquake; the inhabitants are alarmed for their new edifices, which they have covered with a kind of stuff which may prevent the effects of the fire.

Amsterdam, Oct. 8. As to this country, its situation becomes critical. Pressed on the one side by the Emperor to open the navigation of the Scheldt; and, as it is said, on the other hand, by the King of Prussia, not to admit it; no pleasing alternative is left to us, and it is reported that the decision cannot be much longer protracted.

Hague, Oct. 10. The last dispatches from Vienna mentioned that his Imperial Majesty was unalterably determined upon the opening of the Scheldt. (see p. 706.) Another Courier arrived on Monday from Brussels, at the Imperial Ambassador's, with dispatches upon the above important subject; immediately after the perusal of these dispatches, that minister gave notice to the president of the States General, that about the 7th or 8th of this month a vessel would sail from Antwerp, down the Scheldt, into the sea, and that his Imperial Majesty should look upon any obstacle to the free passage of the said vessel as a declaration of war.

In consequence of this notice, the brig Louisa, Capt. Van Iseghem, sailed on the 6th from Antwerp, destined to Dunkirk. Two commissaries who had waited for this vessel at St. Philip were there taken on board. When furnished with an Imperial order for that purpose, he attempted to sail down the Scheldt. M. de Volbergen, who commands the ships of war stationed in the river, gave notice to the Austrian Captain in the most friendly manner that he should be obliged to stop his sailing down that river; to which he answered, that "the Emperor had declared the Scheldt open, and had ordered him to pass down it." The Dutch commander, after renewing his friendly instances to no purpose, fired a gun a-head without shot, but the Austrian Captain still pursued his way; a ball was then fired from the Dutch ship, but without effect, when, upon the repeated refusal of the Austrian Captain to stop, the Dutch ship fired her whole broadside, when the Austrian immediately struck. This transaction took place two hours before the new instructions from their High Mightinesses to Admiral Reynst arrived. We are assured that the captain of the Austrian vessel had the offer made him of returning to Antwerp, but he refused it without orders from his court.

Upon these important tidings arriving at the Hague, the High Council of the nation immediately assembled at eleven at night, and their deliberations lasted till three o'clock in the morning; the Prince Stadtholder attended till half past two, and we are assured proposed to augment the troops 14,000 men.

The substance of the resolutions of the States-General, at their assembly held on Saturday the 9th of October, at eleven o'clock at night, relative to the stopping of the Austrian brig from sailing up the Scheldt was, 'That, having deliberated upon the letter on that subject sent by Capt. Volbergen, dated on board the Pollux frigate, the 8th of October, at half past one at noon, it was determined to send orders to that officer to release the vessel in question (notwithstanding her having passed Fort Lillo without the necessary passport) on condition that the captain returns to Antwerp, and engages in writing not to continue his voyage.

Hague, Oct. 14. It is said that M. de Barro de Keilbach has communicated to their High Mightinesses that a verbal process, concerning the affair which happened on the Scheldt, had been sent to Brussels to his Imperial Majesty; and that he expected the final order of the Emperor before the end of the month.

Utrecht, Oct. 14. An immediate war with the Emperor seems inevitable; and indeed this issue might have been predicted in the earliest stage of his controversy with the republick respecting the navigation of the Scheldt, since the event that is now on the point of taking place was so plainly indicated by the inflexibility with which the King of the Romans persisted in his demands, and the firmness with which they were opposed by the Batavian Senate.

The Austrian account of this transaction does not materially differ from the above. It here follows: The Emperor having declared by his Ultimatum, sent to the Dutch Plenipotentiaries in this city, that after the repeated infractions which the States-General had made in all the stipulations of the Treaty of Munster, of the 30th of January, 1648, which were advantageous to our Provinces, he considered them as disengaged from the odious and unnatural yoke which the 14th article of that Treaty had imposed on them by the unfortunate circumstances of the times, in shutting the entrance of the Scheldt against them. Accordingly his Imperial Majesty ordered his Gov. Gen. of the Low Countries to execute what he had declared relative to this object to the republick; in consequence of which, the Imperial Brigantine le Louis, Capt. Lieven Van Issegheem, which had been some time at anchor in the Port of Antwerp, and bound to Dunkirk or Ostend, having appeared on the 8th of this month under the Imperial flag at the western passage of the Scheldt called le Hout, and by an unexampled inhumanity, the Dutch on her approach had removed all the sea-marks, which pointed out the sand-banks and rocks, that she might run aground; the Dutch cutter the Dolphin of 14 Guns, belonging to Vice Admiral Reynst's Squadron, stationed before Flushing, stoppt the said merchant ship, which was on full sail unprovided for defence, firing successively on her, and with precipitation discharged a whole broadside with case shot, which the captain and crew of the ship, and Mr. de Launoy, the engineer captain in the service of his Majesty, who was on board by order of the government, sustained with a bravery which did them much honour, without any other accident than a slight wound which the captain of the ship received in the face by a splinter of wood which flew from the mast which was damaged by the cannonade.

This violence, carried, as we see, to atrocity, and which the States General thought they might commit, notwithstanding the wise and salutary counsel given them by the court of Versailles, not to do any thing which might wound the dignity and respect due to his Majesty the Emperor, cannot but engage the attention of all Europe to the consequences which must necessarily result from it.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Extract of a Letter from the Rev. Donald M'Kinnon, D. D. (Vicar of Cleybrook in Leicestershire) to his friend at Aberdeen, Feb. 1784.

I am now, on a tour through the upper parts of Indostan, at Etawa, on the banks of the Sumna, in my way to Agra and Delhi; I learn the history and antiquities of the country, and see its present state much better from this peregrination, than I could do from reading. My professed design is, to make a catalogue of all the manuscripts in Indostan, Shanscritt, Arabic, and Persian, and to get, as far as I am capable, a view of the state and progress of the sciences here: Unfortunately, the state of the countries beyond the Company's influence is not favourable to my undertaking. I hear of nothing before me but robberies and assassinations; our Ambassador at Delhi absolutely dissuades me from proceeding, but I am not willing to recede so soon. Whatever becomes of me, there is no knowledge in Asia, which Europe will not see very soon. Judge Jones has founded a society, which I had begun to establish before his arrival, viz. an Oriental society, for the cultivation and investigation of Oriental learning. Col. Maritine, now at Lucknow, has, at an immense pains and expence, got a Shanscritt dictionary and grammar arranged in the European manner, with Persian and vulgar Moors translations; you will soon be able to judge whether the Brahmins, like the modern Arabs and Persians, have drawn their knowledge of science from the Greeks, or whether their systems are more ancient and original than that of Greece.

The General Goddard, —, is arrived in the Downs; she sailed from Bombay the 27th of April, and left St. Helena the 22d of August, where she left no ship.

Notwithstanding the many reports that have been circulated that all the crew of the Resolution East Indiamen, condemned in the East Indies, were dead, we are happy to inform our readers, and the public in general, that several of the — are come over in the General Goddard.

The

The Nauffa arrived at Tellicherry the 15th of April, in her way from Bengal to Bombay: the True Briton, arrived at ditto the 3d of May, from Batavia for Bombay, to dock; the Sullivan, from Bombay for China, touched at Tellicherry the 29d of April; the Alfred at Bombay, preparing to proceed to China; the Latham, in dock, nearly ready for sea, to proceed to China; the Resolution, in dock, and nearly completed from thence, with a cargo for Europe; the Hawke, at Bombay, to be dispatched for China.

WEST INDIA ADVICES.

Kingston in Jamaica, July 31. A dreadful hurricane last night was fatal beyond imagination. Every vessel in the harbour, except three or four, among which is numbered his Majesty's packet boat Thynne, are either sunk, dismasted, or driven on shore, and great numbers of lives are lost. The Barracks on Park Camp are levelled with the ground, the inner Barracks on the parade are in ruins, the workhouse is also destroyed. In the upper parts of the town, and to the eastward, the scene is fearful beyond example, and the whole town in general has suffered immense damage. The storm began about half past eight o'clock at night, with a deluge of rain, and continued with increasing violence till past eleven, when it moderated. To add to the horror of this dreadful night, two severe shocks of an earthquake were felt between nine and ten o'clock, which, no doubt, completed the destruction of several houses. Dr. Coakley stands foremost in the list of sufferers by the calamity; a small vessel belonging to that gentleman, which arrived yesterday at Port-Royal, with a valuable cargo, and 1200l. cash on board, was totally lost, and three of his Negroes perished.

Kingston, Aug. 4. The barracks at Fort-Augusta are a mass of ruins, and fell to the earth so suddenly that four soldiers were immediately killed, and 30 wounded; many of the wounded are so miserably hurt, that their lives are despaired of. The barracks in Spanish-Town were blown down, crushed one soldier to death, and wounded three others dangerously. Most of the estates and plantations in the parishes of St. George and St. David have suffered enormous mischief; but the storm seems to have fallen with tenfold fury on the parish of St. Thomas in the east, which was one entire scene of desolation. The two wings of the barracks at New Charles-Town were blown down, and the main body of the building moved from the pillars on which it stood, to the distance of 15 feet at least. Great numbers of dead persons, of all colours, have been found upon the beach in Hunt's Bay, and other parts of the harbour, who were sent to their last accounts by the horrible tempest, with all their imperfections on their heads, and many now lie bleaching upon the shore, without the assistance of one friendly hand to perform the last sad rites, which are due to decency and humanity. The damage done to the towns of Kingston and Port-Royal, and to the shipping in these harbours, by the late most tremendous visitation, is computed, upon a moderate estimation, to amount to the enormous sum of 800,000l. Sterling, without taking into the account the number of lives lost.

Kingston Aug. 15. The Lieut. Gov. by listening to the prayers of a suffering people, and granting during pleasure a free trade with the United States of America for provisions and lumber only, has gained a large portion of well-earned popularity; and it is to be hoped that this act of his honour's power, so distinguished for its humanity, will meet with the approbation of our most gracious Sovereign and the Parliament.

We hear from the Musquito-Shore, that the Spanish and English commissioners, who were appointed to run the limits of the territory on the coast of the Bay of Honduras granted to the English by the Definitive Treaty of peace between Spain and Great-Britain, for the purpose of cutting logwood and mahogany, have accomplished that desirable business to the satisfaction of all parties. The affability and sincerity of the Spanish commissioners, through every stage of this important transaction, are spoken of in terms which do those gentlemen the highest honour. The boundary lines are marked in so liberal a manner, that our commissioners obtained a considerable quantity of land which they had no well-founded right to expect.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

On the 20th of September last, a most numerous and respectable meeting of the City of Dublin was held at the Tholsel; in order to appoint five delegates to represent them in national Congress, on the 25th of October next, when the High Sheriffs came forward, and produced the following letter from the King's Attorney General:

"GENTLEMEN, I have read with very great surprize a final summons signed by you, as High Sheriffs of the city of Dublin, calling upon the Freeholders and Freemen of your Bailwick to meet on Monday next, for the purpose of electing five persons to represent the City of Dublin in National Congress.

"I must inform you, that in summoning the Freeholders and Freemen of your Bailwick to meet for such a purpose, you have been guilty of a most outrageous breach of your duty; that, if you proceed to hold any such election, you are responsible for it, to the laws of your country; and I shall hold myself bound, as the King's Attorney General, to prosecute you in the Court of King's Bench.

Bench, for your conduct, which I consider to be so highly criminal that I cannot overlook it. I am, Gentlemen, your very humble servant,
JOHN FITZGERALD.

Ely Place, Sept. 16, 1784.

On the perusal of this letter the business was of course laid aside.

On the 7th of October the Sheriffs of Dublin declared their dissent to the requisition delivered to them for calling a meeting of delegates.

Letters from Dublin, by the last Mail, mention, that the enormities committed by the mob every day become more desperate. A reputable draper was, last week, upon a charge of importing English articles, taken out of his house, and dragged by a prodigious number of people to a place called the Tenter-grounds, near the Earl of Meath's Liberty, where he was tied to a post, and lashed by those rioters till he fainted; they then tarred and feathered him, and led him through the principal streets of the city. He now lies so dangerously ill that his life is despaired of.

His Majesty has been pleased to incorporate the Surgeons of Dublin into a College, to be called henceforward "The Royal College of Surgeons of Ireland," with authority to examine and grant letters testimonial to all such persons as shall be deemed qualified to practise surgery in that kingdom. Mr. Sam. Croker King is elected president, and is to be assisted by five censors, a secretary, &c.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, Oct. 13. On Sunday the 12th ult. between eight and nine in the morning, the water at the East end of Loch Tay ebbed about 300 feet, and left the channel or bed of the loch quite dry, at that part where the water is usually three feet in depth; and being gathered together in the form of a wave, rolled on about 300 feet farther to the Westward, until it met a similar wave rolling in a contrary direction. When these clashed together, they rose to the perpendicular height of about five feet, emitting a white foam on the top of the water. Then this wave, so formed, took a lateral direction Southward towards the shore, gained upon the land four feet beyond the high-water mark of the loch at that time. Then it returned, and continued to ebb and flow every seven minutes for two hours, the wave gradually diminishing in size every time it reached the shore, until it wholly disappeared. It is to be observed, that, during this phenomenon, there was a perfect calm. During the whole of that week, at a later hour in the morning, there was the same appearance, but not in any respect to the same degree.

The Duke of Athol has been elected Praeses of the late meeting of the noblemen and gentlemen of Perthshire and Athol Highlands, who assembled together at Perth, and after mature deliberation have published their resolves in opposition to the distillery acts of the last session of Parliament.

The following prosecution for the penalty on the Receipt Tax (the first in this country) happened within these few days. A man convicted of being concerned in a riot was fined 4*l.* he demanded a receipt for the money, which was inadvertently given him on unstamped paper; he immediately laid an information, and was paid half the penalty of 50*l.* allowed to informers.

PORT NEWS.

Pool, Oct. 8. Last week was brought to his Majesty's warehouse at this Port, a large quantity of wool, which was seized in the Isle of Purbeck, by Mess. Croombs and Florence, officers of the Customs, for being lodged near the sea coast without entry. It has been some time past the practice of many of the farmers in that part of the country to sell their wool to smugglers, and of some of them even to export it clandestinely on their own account; but it is hoped that the timely exertions of these gentlemen will not only check it for the present, but prevent in future this shameful traffick, which materially injures the manufactories of our own manufacturers, at the same time that it affords the greatest encouragement to those of a neighbouring nation.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Cambridge, Sept. 29. Being just two hundred years since the foundation of Emanuel College, that Society, according to ancient custom, concluded the century with a grand jubilee. After a sermon and Te Deum, and a Latin oration in commemoration of their benefactors, and an Anthem conducted by Dr. Randal and Dr. Ayrton, the Company met in the College Hall, where about 150 gentlemen were entertained in a sumptuous manner.

Cambridge, Oct. 6. This day Mr. Seaton's prize for the year 1784 was assigned to Mr. Samuel Hey, M. A. fellow of Magdalen College, for his Poem on the Creation.

Same day the Rev. Mr. Turner, M. A. and fellow of Pembroke Hall, was elected Master of that Society, in the room of Dr. Brown, deceased.

Cambridge, Oct. 10. This day the following gentlemen were elected officers of the University for the ensuing year:

Professors.—William Johnson, M. A. King's College; John Heslop, M. A. Sidney College.

Taxers.—Thomas Johnson, M. A. Cath. Hall; Thomas Cautley, M. A. Trinity College.

Scrutators.—Robert Morris, B. D. Queen's College; Sam. Hey, M. A. Magd. College.

Moderators.—Isaac Milner, M. A. Queen's College; Henry William Coulthurst, M. A. Sidney College.

On Thursday the 7th inst. a dreadful fire happened at Abbotsbury in Dorsetshire, which in three hours consumed twenty-two dwelling houses, besides barns, stables, and many fine ricks of wheat, hay, hemp, &c. This melancholy accident happened through the burning of straw in a chimney, which communicating with the thatch set the house on fire.

Cambridge, Oct. 22. Last night a most dreadful fire broke out at Hardwick, six miles from this town, at a farm belonging to Mr. Cotton, who chiefly lives in London. It is thought this fire was occasioned by some evil-designed person or persons, which are yet undiscovered. It burnt for nine hours with great rapidity, nor is it out yet. The dwelling-house is saved; the barns, stacks of hay, corn, and all the out-houses are burnt; the damage amounts to upwards of 1300l.

At Leeds, Yorksh. one Booth, a farmer, was defrauded of 50 pounds, and 5 shillings, by an old stale trick, by two men; one of them offered to lay him five guineas he could not produce fifty pounds in an hour, which was readily accepted by the farmer, who instantly went out, and soon returned with the money. A squabble arose respecting some of the guineas being under weight, when the accomplice went out to have them weighed. He was not in haste to return, and the other went out on a pretence to learn what was become of him, when both decamped with the cash.

A letter from Asbbourn, in the Peak of Derbyshire, mentions, that as some men were digging at a place called Burton-Wood, about four miles from that place, they found an urn, containing about seventy Roman coins and medals, chiefly those of Adrian, Severus, and the younger Constantine; they were found within the boundaries of a specious Roman camp, which the country people pretend has once been a large town.

In the dusk of evening of Oct. 2, an insurrection happened in the high gaol, Exeter, which was with difficulty suppressed. When the prisoners were going to be locked up, they rose on a sudden, and forced their way into the dwelling house, where they secured the keepers; they then knocked down the turnkey, and locked the gate on the inside. In the mean time some of the villains attempted to cut the rope of the alarm-bell, which made it ring, and alarmed the soldiers on guard, who instantly ran to the goal, and with difficulty burst open the gate. Upon entering they found the turnkey on the ground, some kneeling on him, while others were for cutting his throat. After some slight resistance, however, they were overpowered, and the ringleaders properly secured. During the disturbance, a captain and serjeant of marines, under sentence of imprisonment for defrauding government, made their escape through the garden to a public house, from whence they sent to the jailor and surrendered themselves after the disturbance was over.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

Wednesday, Sept. 29.

A court was held at Guildhall, when the Aldermen Hart, and Pugh resigned their gowns.

The court then proceeded to the election of a Lord-Mayor for the year ensuing, when Alderman Clarke was declared duly elected; who, being invested with the chain, thanked the livery for the honour they had conferred upon him.

The Aldermen Hopkins and Bates were then sworn into the office of Sheriffs; as was Philip Wyat Crowther, Esq; into the office of Under Sheriff for the county of Middlesex.

Monday, October 4.

At two o'clock in the afternoon, a paper balloon was launched from Mr. Wilson's garden at Chelsea, for the amusement of his friends. It was 12 feet in diameter, and took up a large Pomeranian dog, which it carried to a field near Epping, 18 miles from the place where it was let off, in less than two hours. It was found by a labourer, and brought back for a guinea.

Wednesday 6.

Several armed men boarded a Dutch ship in the river in the night, and stole to the number, it is said, of 5000 dollars.

Thursday 7.

Being a holyday among the Jews, a number of them assembled in Duke's Place, and in a riotous manner insulted the person, and assaulted the house of one Joseph Ridout, who kept a liquor shop in that neighbourhood; upon which, finding his house in danger of being set on fire, and himself murdered, he discharged a blunderbuss among them, by which one boy was killed, and several wounded. He was soon apprehended, and committed to prison.

Saturday 9.

About three in the morning, a desperate set of housebreakers found means to get into Mr. Delaval's house, which fronts the river, by forcing open the garden gate, and taking out two pannels of a window shutter. On the ground floor, they found only an old woman and a girl in bed, over whom they threw the bed-cloaths, and threatened them with death if they stirred. They then rifled the house of what cash and plate they could find, and made off by water undiscovered, leaving some of their implements behind them, particularly an iron crow which they dropt in the mud. Mr. Delaval was at Margate.

Monday 11.

Mr. Sherwin, surgeon and apothecary of Enfield, returning, with his wife, from visiting a patient at Winchmore Hill, was stopp

In a lane just by the Green Dragon alehouse, near the Boarded River at Bush Hill, at ten in the morning, by two highwaymen, who breakfasted at the said house, and robbed them of a gold French metal watch, and their money, in sight of houses, the inhabitants of which could not suspect so daring an attempt.

Tuesday 12.

About eight in the evening, the postboy was robbed of the mail by two footpads, at a place called Lord Stafford's Lane, between Northampton and Harborough. They have been since taken.

A court of aldermen was held at Guild-hall, at which were present the Lord-Mayor and 16 aldermen.

Paul Le Mesurier and Richard Atkinson, esqrs. lately elected aldermen of Dowgate and Tower wards, took the oaths of office and the oaths to government.

Thursday 14.

The computing-house of Mr. Mills, dyer, near the Bank-side, was broke open, and robbed of notes and money to the amount of 200l. by the fresh-water pirates that infest the river. These villains, if not suppressed, will absolutely render the communication by water impracticable, and the houses by the water-side unsafe to live in.

Friday 15.

At Weyhill fair, which ended this day, unfortunately, there were about 8000 pockets of hops, above 2000 of which were Farnham: Their fine hops from the best ground sold from 7l. 7s. to 7l. 15s. per cwt. Some few pockets higher. Their best seconds from 5l. 12s. to 6l. Some few at 6l. 6s. Their fine hops from light grounds sold from 6l. 10s. to 7l. Their seconds from 4l. 10s. to 5l. 5s. Crondall and country fine hops from 5l. 12s. to 6l. 6s. Best seconds 4l. 10s. to 5l. Low ordinary hops 3l. 10s. Many left unfold. This fair concluded with an event no less dreadful than unexpected; for about half past nine a large fire having been made with refuse hurdles, in the chimney of the White-Hart booth, the flames caught the roof, and in a few minutes the whole building and its contents were on fire, spreading to the east and west, nine booths up the fair; 540 feet of standing were burnt, and more than 300 bags of Farnham, hops with various goods and furniture, the property of the people who kept the fair. Such was the intensity of the fire, that for some time it could not be approached within twenty yards, and flakes thereof fell as far distant as Fildesfield. It was at length stopt by cutting off the communication. The Crondall hop-row escaped unhurt.

Saturday 16.

There was assembled, by twelve o'clock, a considerable concourse of people at the Military Academy near Chelsea, to see Mr. Blanchard ascend by the assistance of his balloon into the air. The multitude was not so great as that which attended Lunardi in Moorfields, the difficulty in going up being, in a great measure, lessened in the public opinion.

The fields for a considerable way round Little Chelsea were crowded with horse and foot; in consequence of which, a general devastation took place in the gardens, the produce being either trampled down or torn up. The turnip-grounds were totally despoiled by the multitude. All the windows and houses round the academy were filled with persons of the first fashion. Every roof within view was covered, and each tree filled with spectators.

At twelve o'clock, Mr. Blanchard, and Mr. Sheldon, surgeon, stepped into the basket pendent from the balloon; and the cords being loosened, it took a diagonal direction across the garden, its altitude being about two feet from the ground, and then rose above the wall, but not high enough for the boat to clear it. The machine in which the gentlemen sat must undoubtedly have been broken to pieces, had not Mr. Bourne and another gentleman caught hold, and kept it from the wall until it rose safe above this impediment. The slowness with which it ascended soon convinced Mr. Blanchard that he carried too much ballast. He therefore threw out two bags. But, before he could accomplish this, the balloon struck some trees, and descended to the ground.

Being lightened of ballast, it ascended with an inclination to the south-west, and then seemed to move horizontally for about a quarter of a mile, when it made rather a rapid direction about west and south-west towards Sunbury, where the travellers alighted, and Mr. Sheldon reluctantly quitted the car. Mr. Blanchard pursued his aerial voyage to Rumsey in Hampshire, where he descended exactly at half past four in the afternoon, in the meadow called Goosey; and still standing in his boat, his balloon was conveyed through Lord Palmerston's park into the middle of the market-place, amidst the acclamations of a vast concourse of people who assembled from all parts, having seen as they thought an extraordinary kite flying in the air. It was first seen over Abbot's wood common, and appeared about the size of a small hoghead. As soon as he alighted, Mr. Penton spoke to him in French, and took him to his house, where he dined, and was jovially entertained.

The day being rather dark above, and the atmosphere low, the balloon was out of sight in about thirty minutes. It was not so large as that by which Lunardi ascended.

Owing to the confusion naturally attending these wild schemes, many of the articles intended for the voyage were omitted. Some were taken up, viz. two speaking-trumpets, a ramborine, an instrument of copper shaped like a horn, to try the effect of sound; several pair of live pigeons, and a case of small dissecting instruments to try the effect of air upon their lungs; a barometer and thermometer, two flags, and several telescopes.

Sunday

Sunday 17.

Early this morning the house of Mr. Pellet, iron-monger in St. John's street, was broke open and robbed of cash, notes, and other property to a great amount. The villains broke through the wall, poisoned a large house dog, and escaped undisturbed.

Thursday 21.

At the sessions at the Old Bailey, which began yesterday, William Murrow was indicted for stealing a bag, containing 1000l. and sundry other sums of money, the property of Messrs Drummond and Co. bankers. He was convicted on his own confession and other corroborating circumstances, for it did come out by what means he got at the bag, which it appeared was kept in an iron-chest in the strong room, at the keys of which every clerk in the office had free access in the way of business; but a bag being missing about the beginning of April last, the suspicion fell upon the prisoner, from his purchasing stock in the funds, without any body's knowing how he came by the money. His salary with the perquisites did not exceed 90l. a year, and of this he had only been in possession since 1782; previous to that period he had had only 60l. a year; yet Mr. Pygot, the stock-broker, had purchased for him 50l. stock in August 1783, in the 3 per cent. consols; on the 3d of October 1783 purchased 50l.; on the 27th of April 1784 purchased 250l.; on the 23d of July purchased 70l. Mr. Wright had purchased for him 525l. 41 er cents. on the 3d of June 1784; 264l. 10s. 4 per cents. on the 3d of July 1784; 262l. 10s. on the 7th of September 1784. When the prisoner brought the first 400l. he said he had received 200l. from a friend in the country, the other 200l. he had saved from his salary. When he brought the next 200l. he said he had part from a lady at Lancaster, the other part he had raised by selling part out of the 3 per cents. The third sum, he said, from the sale of all his 3 per cent. stock. — His counsel did not deny the fact; but endeavoured to prove him at times insane; but Lord Loughborough, before whom he was tried, observed, that if a man was deprived of his reason, he was certainly an object of compassion, not of punishment; but here was a regular plan, a habit with too much method to be compatible with the plea set up. Singularity of conduct gives no protection. The jury found him guilty, but recommended him to mercy.

Friday, 22.

At the sessions at the Old Baily, Joseph Ridout was tried for the murder of Moses Lazarus, a boy of 13 years of age, whom he killed on the 7th instant in Duke's Place, by firing a carbine among the people who surrounded his house. A number of witnesses, some Jews, some Christians, were brought to prove, what was not denied by the prisoner, that he was the person who fired the carbine by which the boy was killed. Of all the witnesses for the Crown, two only proved any thing that could affect the prisoner's life. One of them swore that, speaking of the approaching festival, when the Jews were to celebrate the anniversary of the promulgation of their law, he had threatened that, if they proceeded as they usually had done, on the like occasion, to assemble riotously to throw serpents and crackers; to the great annoyance of their neighbours, instead of applying to the civil magistrate, he had fire arms in his house, and would give the Jews the contents of them. The other witness swore to the same effect; but both being of suspicious characters, little credit was given to their evidence.

GENT. MAG. October, 1784.

The prisoner, in his defence, proved, that having observed the Jews to assemble as usual on the 7th instant, and that men, not boys, began to throw serpents, squibs, and crackers, he applied to the civil magistrate; that he had assisted the constable of the parish in the execution of his duty; that he had been thrown in the kennel; that several men got about him, while others were dragging him along the kennel by the legs; that it was with difficulty he escaped from them with life; and that they followed him with groans and hisses to his house, which they forcibly endeavoured to enter, threatening at the same time to put him to death; that he was grievously hurt and wounded; and that he called to them in vain to disperse. These facts being all fully proved, Lord Loughborough, who tried the prisoner, observed, that if a person assaulted finds himself in a situation in which a man of firmness would have reasonable cause to apprehend the destruction of his property, or the loss of his life, and under that apprehension slays the aggressor, the law will not say that in killing him he had committed either murder or manslaughter, but that he killed him in his own defence.

Having thus explained the law, his lordship left the case to the decision of the jury, who, without a minute's hesitation, acquitted the prisoner, and he was instantly set at liberty.

The same day Alexander Dixon, the accomplice with Morgan (see p. 712) was tried for the murder of Mr. Linton; but not being able to fix the guilt on him, he was of course acquitted. A detainer, was however, lodged against him for a robbery at Dover, and he was sent to Maidstone, there to wait the assizes.

Sunday 24.

A funeral sermon was preached at St. John's Church Horsley down, Southwark, by the Rev. William Jarvis Aody, curate of the parish, on the death of the late Richard Russell, Esq; who was interred there on Tuesday last with (see p. 797.) uncommon funeral riot. Very little was said of the deceased; so that it was a funeral oration that might have served any body, or rather a discourse upon death, death that may be applied to every man living. Neither the basket-virgins, pall-bearers, mourners, nor any of the relations or friends of Mr. Ruffel were present. The hangings of the pulpit and desk, which had been pulled down on the day of the funeral, were restored.

Between twelve and one o'clock, one of the watchmen on Blackfriars-bridge was inhumanly beat with his own staff, by some men coming through the turnpike in a hackney coach (the coachman riding behind), because he stopped them for not paying the toll. He was carried to his house at Newington, where he died that night.

Remarkable Effects of the Lightning which fell on the Ship WHEEL OF FORTUNE, Capt. Belfour, in the Thunder Storm of the Evening of the 27th of July, off the West Rocks a breast of Harwich.

BEING under way at seven o'clock in the evening there came on a very heavy squall, accompanied with much rain, and excessive thunder and lightning: one clap in particular was astonishingly loud; while the flash, which immediately preceded, struck our main-top gallant mast, and split it down from the trunk, shivered the main-top-mast nearly to pieces, and rent the main mast in so many places as to render it totally unsafe to proceed with on our voyage. The lightning spent itself from the masts on the larboard gangway, tore up several planks from the deck, and drove three out of the ship's side just above the wale. Providentially nobody happened to be at this instant a mid-ships, except a lad, who, being sick from a first voyage, was lying under the long-boat's side over the main hatches. The boy was struck motionless, and observing his hat to be rent in pieces, we all concluded he was killed; but in about an hour however. The long-boat's stern was shattered, and the large oak chock on which she stood shivered and blown to-pieces from under her. Such a sulphureous smoke and smell at the same time issued from the hold and between decks, that for some minutes we thought the ship was on fire; but happily our fears were groundless.

Capt. Belfour possessed great presence of mind and composure, and in all probability saved the ship from foundering, by having, on the appearance of the storm, ordered the pump spears to be taken out, and the pump spears to be taken out, and the pumps covered over with large open mats; for had the pump spears been left in, they would doubtless have acted as conductors to the lightning. Every one on board felt the shock, which forced the vessel considerably down in the water: to me it seemed like the explosion of a large mortar close to my ear; it drove me back a yard into the round-house, at the door of which I was standing by the captain and my son, noticing an uncommon cloud: we could neither see nor

A well-approved Recipe for the Stone and Gravel.

Take a quantity of blackberries in their unripe state (from a quart to as many gallons as you may chuse). September is the time to gather them. Put them into a jar well covered, and set the jar in a kettle of water over the fire; let it continue there five or six hours to digest; then pass the pulp or juice through a sieve, and to every pint of it add two pound of white lump-sugar powdered; then boil and scum it as you do other jams and jellies. Take a tea-spoonful of this every night going to bed, when in pain, and the like quantity in the morning.

hear for more than a minute. The mate was dazzled and rendered giddy for some time afterwards: the second mate and carpenter were thrown from the top of the round house flat upon the quarter deck; the boatswain jammed up between the wheel and mizen-mast, and two seamen struck down with great violence. The boys were terrified to the last degree, and the whole crew in short stood aghast with astonishment. For my own part, what with the continuance of the storm, the vapour issuing from hold, the idea of the long boat being stove, and the sight of the boy to all appearance dead, I confess that I fully expected inevitable death. But by God's providence we were all saved, and blown with a fair wind into Leigh Roads the evening following, where we came to an anchor in a heavy gale, out of all danger from the damage the ship had received, which Capt. Belfour thought it best to get repaired at London for the greater satisfaction of his underwriters.

ANECDOTE of Mr. Justice NORMAN, examined into by the Editors, and may be relied on.

IN the year 1724 Mr. Justice Norman, of Norwich, by his will directed, that the sum of 4000l. should be given, to build a charity-school sixty years after his decease; the school to contain 120 boys; and he directed that every boy should on Sunday have a pound of roast beef to his dinner, and 10 ounces of plum-pudding to his supper. On Monday a pound of boiled beef for dinner, and 10 ounces of suet-pudding to supper. Every Tuesday morning beef-broth for breakfast; and at dinner a pound of mutton or veal. Every Wednesday pork and pease. Every Thursday mutton or veal. Every Friday beans or pease. And every Saturday 6th. well buttered, &c. There were a number of curious items, and he appointed the Bishop, the Chancellor, the Dean, the two members for the city, the two members for the county, and eight worthy churchmen besides, to be his perpetual trustees. The term of the donation expired in May last; and the original legacy, with simple and compound interest, amounts now to 74,000l.

Dr,

Dr. Mortimer (see p. 716) was universally respected for his learning and integrity, and beloved for his singular humanity and affability. His acquaintance have lost an agreeable companion; the poor a liberal, though not an ostentatious, benefactor; and the society over which he presided, a father and a friend.

George Alexander Stevens (see p. 717), was a person so extraordinary in his way, that a further account of him will not be disagreeable to our readers. For the singularity if not extent of his genius, he has perhaps left no one with whom he may be compared. His origin is not accurately known; but we have been informed he was born in London, about Holborn. He was the son of a tradesman, and brought up with a view to some mechanical employment. The obscurity of his birth has cast a veil over the early part of his life. Whether dissipation, prodigality, want, idleness, profligacy, or inclination, led him to employ his talents in public, we are unable to determine; but the first notice we meet with concerning him is as a strolling player in one of the provincial companies, whose chief headquarters were at Lincoln, where he performed some time (Sing. Dramat.) His own account of himself, extracted from a poem, called, "Religion; or, the Libertine Repentant," 8vo. 1751, affords us every reason to suppose that the tenor of his life had not been much influenced by the rules of piety or virtue. Thus he describes himself:

"By chance condemn'd to wander from my birth

An erring exile o'er the face of earth;
Wild thro' the world of vice,—licentious race!
I've started folly, and enjoy'd the chase;
Pleas'd with each passion, I pursu'd their aim,
Cheer'd the gay pack, and grasp'd the guilty game;

Ravel'd regardless, leap'd reflection o'er,
Till youth, till health, fame, fortune, are no more.

Too late I feel the thought-corroding pain
Of sharp remembrance and severe disdain:
Each painted pleasure its avenger breeds,
Sorrow's sad train to riot's troop succeeds;
Slow-wasting sickness steals on swift debauch;
Contempt on pride, pale want on waste, approach."

This poem was written during a fit of illness, and probably made no longer impression than until health returned. The next year, 1752, he performed in Dublin; and while there published a burlesque tragedy, called, "Distress upon Distress," which does not appear to have been acted. The year following he came to London, and obtained an engagement at Covent-Garden theatre, where he performed without any applause, to which, indeed, his performances on the stage were in no respect entitled. In 1754 he published a poem, called, "The Birth-day of Folly," in imitation of the Dunciad, but proceeded in his design no further than the first book. In Jan. 1755, the theatre in the Haymarket was opened with an entertainment ridiculing Macklin's "British Inquisition," and called, "The Female Inquisition. By a Lady." It was supposed to be written by our author, who delivered a proemium and peroration; but, though aided by the assistance of Miss Isabella Wilkinson's performances on the wire, it ended without any advantage to the adventurers, after being four times repeated. At this period Mr. Stevens was celebrated at the several convivial societies then in being, of which there was a great number, as, the Choice Spirits, High Borlase, Comus's Court, &c. &c. and wrote many of the songs he has since been very much applauded for. As a companion, he was cheerful, humorous, and entertaining; particularly after the manner of his predecessor Tom D'Urfey; by his singing, with much drollery and spirit, a variety of songs of his own writing, many of which are not only possessed of great humour, but true wit, a happy manner of expression, and an originality of fancy, not often exceeded by authors in that walk of poetry. He was, indeed, sometimes condemned, and then not entirely without cause, for having run into too great a degree of libertinism in his little sallies of this kind. His finances were generally at a very low ebb, and his person in durance. He experienced the extremes of mirth and jollity, as well as want and dependence; and led a life, if unstained by crime, yet despicable for its meanness and irregularity. He usually wrote pieces of humour for Shuter to deliver at his benefit; and, we believe, was the author of a droll, acted at Bartholomew Fair by that comedian in 1759, called, "The French flagged; or, The British Sailors in America." In 1760, he published a novel, in 2 vols. called, "The History of Tom Fool;" and in 1761 began a periodical publication, entitled, "The Beauties of the Magazines." In 1763, he gave the public some entertainment at the expence of his friend Shuter and Nancy Dawson, in "The Dramatic History of Master Edward, Mrs. Ann, Mrs. Llwnddwhydd, and others, the extraordinaries of these times," 12mo. For Shuter he composed the first sketch of his "Lecture on Heads," but, whether the humour of the piece was not congenial with that of Shuter, or whether he was inadequate to the task, it is certain it was at first scarcely noticed. Luckily for the author, he was prompted to enlarge his plan, and, having furnished himself with a complete apparatus, he went into the country, and repeated his Lecture with so much success, at various places, that he was soon enabled to amass and remit home several large sums of money, by which he secured himself an affluence during the rest of his life. In April, 1764, he commenced his Lectures at the Haymarket, greatly to the advantage of his fortune and reputation. He afterwards travelled over every part of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and even made a trip to North America, and at every place met with the most flattering and gene-room reception. After the "Lecture on Heads", had apparently been repeated often enough to lose some of its effect, he composed another entertainment of the like kind, called, "The Supplement, being a New Lecture upon Heads, Portraits, and Whole Lengths." It began in Feb. 1766; but, notwithstanding the lecturer's acknowledged reputation, it was coldly received, and ended with six nights performance. It was tried again the next year, but with little more success, being repeated only seven nights.—The money he had acquired by means of his Lecture having made the drudgery of literature unnecessary to him, we do not find that he produced any performance until Jan. 1770, when "The Court of Alexander," a burletta, set by Dr. Finner, was acted at Covent Garden, with, at least, as much applause as either the author or composer deserved. In 1772, owing to a pirated edition of his songs being published at Whitehaven, he printed a genuine collection of them at Oxford, in 8vo. In 1773, appeared the "Trip to Portsmouth," a comic sketch, acted at the Haymarket, consisting of a few detached scenes, begun and finished in five days. He performed in this piece for the last time himself, and afterwards repeated his "Lecture on Heads" both in London and several other places; when at length, finding his faculties impaired, he sold the property in his work to Mr. Lee Lewes, a comedian of some eminence, who endeavoured, but without success, to catch the spirit of the original author. The "Lecture on Heads" will probably never again meet with the favour it formerly obtained. It was his misfortune that his mind and body did not keep pace with each other in their decay. He sunk by degrees into a state of all others the most distressing to those who have any connection, either of friendship or consanguinity, with a person so unhappily circumstanced. He retained his bodily faculties, after his mind had lost its powers, and exhibited a miserable spectacle of idiotism and fatuity. At length, after several years remaining in this condition, he died, as we have already mentioned, at Biggleswade, Sept. 6, 1784.

BIRTHS.

LADY of Sir John Papillon Twisden, bart. a son and heir.

The wife of Mr. Sotheby, bookseller, in Covent-Garden, a daughter.

Lady of Lord G. Cavendish, a son.

Oct. 16. Viscountess Deerhurst, a son and heir.

MARRIAGES.

LATELY, Philip Saltmarsh, esq; nephew to the Earl of Fingal, to Mrs. Brockholes, esq; widow of the late Joseph B. esq. of Cloughton, Lanc.

Anth. Hugginson, of Ronaldkirk, to Miss Brown.

J. Turnbull, esq; of Gibraltar, to Miss Maria Maravlay.

Mr. J. Crouch, assistant clerk of the minutes of the Custom house, to Mrs. Tyson, widow of the late Mr. T. rector of Lambourn, Essex.

Sept. 23. W. Adair, esq; capt. in the 25th reg. of foot, to Miss Shafro, dau and heir. of the late Jenison S. esq; of Renwell, near York.

28. Pr^l Charles of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, (2d brother to her majesty,) to Princess Charlotte of Hesse-Cassel.

30. Rev. — Jefferson, fellow of St. Peter's college, Cambridge, to Miss Richardson, of Titchfield-street.

John Bamford, esq; of 3d reg. of guards, to Miss Jane Simpson, of Bond-st.

2. Mr. Rich. Thomesay, of Austin-Friars, merchant, to Miss Catherine Wakefield, of Croydon.

At Enfield, Mr. Webb, of Little Queen's-st. Holborn, to Miss Eliz. Sapsford, only dau. Mr. S. carpenter at Enfield.

3. At St. Mary, Whitechapel, the rev. Tho. Bryant, of that place, to Mrs. Anne Robinson, Mr. Jas. Brown, of Milford-lane, to Miss Anne Field.

4. At the Savoy chapel, in the Strand, Tho. Painter, aged 76, to Keziah Jelps, above 90.

At Sutton Coldfield, co. Warwick, Mr. Bedford, attorney, of Birmingham, to Miss Riland, dau. of the rev. Mr. B. rector of Sutton Coldfield.

Hon. Capt. Douglas, of the 1st reg. of foot guards, to Miss Lascelles.

5. W. Miller, esq; upper marshal of the city of London, to Miss Eliz. Stanley.

At Weston Favell, co. Northamp. the rev. — Hill, son of the late Benj. H. esq; receiver-general of the land-tax for that county, to Miss Knight, dau. of the rev. Mr. K. rector of Weston Favell.

At Oxford, Jos. Jones, esq; of Stapleton, near Bristol, to Miss Humphreys. Mr. J. died of an apoplexy before twelve o'clock the same evening.

6. Mr. Henry Yates, of Bengal, to Miss Nelly Little, of Bermondsey.

Joseph Gurney, esq; banker, in Norwich, to Miss Jane Chapman, dau. of the late Abel C. esq; of Whitby.

7. Rev. — Haverfield, of Kew, to Miss Eliz. Roberts, dau. of Mr. R. of Brentford.

9. Rev. Mr. Hallelwell, of Boroughbridge, to Miss Preston.

10. Mr. W. Milton, of Doctors-Commons, attorney-at-law, to Miss Anna Maria Penrose Finch, of Isleworth.

11. In the English church at Rotterdam, Charles Gore, esq; of Tring-house, Herts, to Miss Rochford.

12. At Birlingham, co. Worc. rev. Tho. Broadstock, M. A. rector of that parish, to Miss Elizabeth Colley.

14. Alexander Cottiny, esq; of Chevrell's-Green, Herts, to Mrs. Nove Barwick, of Charter-house-sq.

18. Mr. Swinscow, brandy-merchant, to Miss Champion.

22. Mr. S. Andrews of Edmonton, to Mrs. Mary Wrench.

24. Charles Forb's, esq; to Miss Pettigrew. Jacob Eccardt, esq; to Miss Sarah Murray.

Mr. W. Shuffrey, of Fleet-str. upholsterer, to Miss Bowman, of Alder-gate-str.

25. At Old Swinford, the rev. Dr. Foley, rector of that place, to Miss Harris, of Stour-bridge.

26. At St. Clement Danes, Mr. Sandys, attorney at Canterbury, to Miss Cluck, only dau. of Capt. C. of Stratford.

27. Thomas Hopkins, esq; of Bentinck-str. to Miss Amelia Hopkins, youngest dau. of Mr. Alderman H.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at Wilton, Mr. James Penling, farmer, aged 111 years. He married about twelve years since, and had four sons.

At Flushing, Mr. Scarfdale, proprietor of several iron and steel works in Staffordshire.

At Baldock, Herts. Charles Colleton, esq.

At Southwell, the rev. John Holmes, M.A. senior vicar choral of that collegiate church, rector of Beilby, co. Linc. and vic. of Farnsfield and Kerkington, co. Nott.

At Jamaica, the hon. Samuel Alpele, late a member of his majesty's council in that island.

Near Barnley, in Lancashire, Susannah Evison, a farmer's wife, aged 108 years.

Rev. Mr. Kirk, rector of Horknaw, Brock-leby, and Bonby, co. Linc.

Rev. C. Harland, rector and patron of Lud-desdown, Kent.

At Newcastle, Mrs. Elizabeth Alcock, a pure old virgin, much regretted by the sister-hood. Six unspotted virgins attended her funeral, all dressed in black gowns and white petticoats. At her particular request, in one hand was put a quarter of a pound of good bohea tea, in the other a box filled with superfine snuff; and her coffin was painted white, as an emblem of her virgin purity.

July 18. In Jamaica, James Tierney, esq; of Kingston, in that island.

Sept. 7. In the Isle of Mann, aged 17, Mr. Josh. Lewis, an ensign in the 58th reg. of foot, and eldest son of Lieut. Cpl. Lewis, who commanded the artillery at the siege of Gibraltar. His death was occasioned by wet cloaths, which brought on a violent fever, that carried him off in nine days.

17. In an advanced age, at Naples, where he had resided many years, John Earl Tylney of the kingdom of Ireland. He was the grandson of Sir John Child, and son of Richard Earl Tylney, who, April 17, 1718, was created Viscount Castlemaine, and, Jan. 11, 1735, Earl Tylney. Dying without issue, his title is extinct. He has left his fine seat at Wanstead, in Essex; and his estates, to his nephew Sir James Tylney Long, bart. who was lately M. P. for the Deviser.

23. In Bermondsey-street, Surrey, aged 61,

Rich. Russell, esq; in the commission of the peace for that county. He died a bachelor; and left, among other legacies, 5000*l.* to the Magdalen Hospital, 3000*l.* to the Small-Pox Hospital, 3000*l.* to the Lying in Hospital near Westminster-bridge, 500*l.* to the Surrey Dispensary, 2000*l.* for a monument to be erected in St. John's church, Southwark; 50*l.* each to six young women to attend as pall-bearers on the night of his interment; 20*l.* each to four other young women, who were to precede the corpse, and strew flowers, whilst the dead march in Saul was to be played by the organist of St. John's; and 100*l.* to the rev. Mr. Grose, to write his epitaph. This sum had been left to Dr. Samuel Johnson, but altered by a codicil in favour of the rev. Mr. Grose. All the rest of his property, after the sale of his estates, to the Asylum for young girls in Lambeth parish, which, it is supposed, will amount to 15 or 16,000*l.* after all the legacies and funeral charges are defrayed; and directed his picture to be placed in the committee-room of the Asylum, and his will to be read there once in every year, for which the secretary is to receive an annual gratuity. Eight of the acting magistrates in Surrey, by his desire, attended his funeral; and his executors are Sir Joseph Mawbey, bart. Samuel Gillan, Thomas Bell, and William Lewis, esqrs. He also left 200*l.* which was given away, on the morning of his interment, in bread and meat, to the poor of St. John's parish in Southwark; 100*l.* to the charity-school of St. John's, and the like sum to the charity-school of Bermondsey. He has left 200*l.* each to three or four friends, but had not mentioned the name of any one of his relations; one of whom, Miss Russell, an amiable young girl, in poor circumstances in Southwark, was appointed a pall-bearer by his executors. His other relations are said to live in Staffordshire, and at Birmingham. The six young women who attended his funeral as pall-bearers, and the four others to strew flowers before his corpse, were (as desired) spinners, and of good character and reputation. Five hundred pounds were ordered to be spent on the funeral, exclusive of the sums left to the young maidens, which he expressly desired might not be considered as part of the charges of his funeral.—He directed his body to be moved to a more convenient place than his own house, previous to the procession; in consequence of which, it was intended that the body should lay in state in the great-room at Union-hall, in Union street, Southwark. The hall, however, could not be obtained for the purpose; and he was therefore carried from his own house to St. John's church, Oct. 19, amidst the most riotous concourse that ever attended at a funeral. It was with the utmost difficulty that the corpse and the pall-bearers (the pall was torn away) could gain admittance into the church; and only Sir Joseph Mawbey and one other of the executors could crowd in (the others remained in their coach

EACH DAY'S PRICE OF STOCKS IN OCTOBER, 1784.

Bank Stock.	3 per Cent. reduc.	3 per Cent. consol.	1 per Cent. Consol.	New 1777	Long Ann.	Short 1777.	Ditto 1778.	India Stock.	India Ann.	India Bonds.	S. Sea Stock.	Old Ann.	New Ann.	3 per Cent. 1751	New Navy.	5 per Cent. Navy.	3 per Cent. Scrip.	4 per Cent. Scrip.	Exchqd Bills.	Lottery Tickets.
18		54 7/8 a 1/8			16 1/2		12 1/8								15 1/2 dif.	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 12 0
19		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12			4 s. dif.			53 1/2		16	87 1/2	55			15 13 0
20		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12			3					16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
21		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12			3					16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
22		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12			4					16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
23		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12			3					16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
24		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
25		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
26		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
27		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
28		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
29		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
30		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
31		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
32		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
33		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
34		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
35		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
36		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
37		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
38		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
39		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
40		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
41		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
42		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
43		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
44		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
45		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
46		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
47		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
48		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
49		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
50		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
51		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
52		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
53		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
54		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
55		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
56		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
57		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
58		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
59		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
60		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
61		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
62		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
63		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
64		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
65		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
66		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
67		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
68		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
69		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
70		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
71		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
72		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
73		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
74		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
75		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
76		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
77		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
78		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
79		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
80		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
81		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
82		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
83		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
84		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
85		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
86		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
87		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
88		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
89		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
90		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
91		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
92		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
93		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
94		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
95		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
96		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
97		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
98		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
99		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0
100		54 1/2 a 1/8			16 1/2		12								16 1/2	87 1/2	55 1/8			15 13 0

A. B. In the 3 per Cent. Consols. the highest and lowest Price of each Day is given; in the other Stock the highest Price only.

The Gentleman's Magazine;

ST. JOHN'S Gate.

Edinburgh 5
Dublin 3
Newcastle 3
York 2
Leeds 2
Norwich 2
Nottingham 2
Exeter 2
Liverpool 2
Gloucester 2
Bury St. Edmund's
Lewes
Sheffield
Shrewsbury
Winchester
Ipswich
Salisbury
Leicester
Worcester
Stamford
Chelmsford
Southampton
Northampton
Reading
Whitehaven
Dumfries
Aberdeen
Glasgow

London Gazette
Daily Advertiser
Public Advertiser
Gazetteer
Morning Chron.
Morning Herald
Morning Post
Public Ledger
Daily Courant
Gener. Advertiser
St. James's Chron.
General Evening
Whitehall Even.
London Evening
London Chron.
Lloyd's Evening
English Chron.
Oxford
Cambridge
Bristol 3 papers
Bath 2
Birmingham 2
Derby
Coventry 2
Hereford 2
Chester 2
Manchester 2
Canterbury 2

For NOVEMBER, 1784.

CONTAINING

More in Quantity and greater Variety than any Book of the Kind and Price.

Meteorological Diary for November, 1783.	801	Statue at Oxford.— Labrum .—Ed Ross, &c.	829
Average Prices of Corn and Grain	802	Options, their Origin.—Clerical Abuses	828
The Boarded River at Ilkington described	803	Medals, Memorials of notable Events	831
Sir Hugh Mordaunt's Family.—Aithmole	805	Further Anecdotes of President Bradshaw	831
Lancashire Sheriff.—Courtess Conway, &c.	806	Singular Story.—Fonmatt, or Fillematt	836
Pope's Unfortunate Lady, who?—Weavils	807	REVIEW OF NEW PUBLICATIONS, viz Ger-
Rev. Mr. Suter's Letter how verified	808	man Literature.—Phil. Trans. vol. LXXIV.—
Remarks in a Voyage to Jersey	809	Jago's Poems.—Dean Shipley's Trial.—Knox's
History of Paul's Cross illustrated	810	View, &c.—Andrews's Letters.—Suppl. to Chas-
Improvement of Parochial Registers	811	terton.—Bruce's Poems.—Irwin's Ode.—Jones's
Critique on Pinkerton's Scottish Ballads	812	Sermon, &c.	817—852
Ring of Jet.—Memoirs of a Humourist	814	SELECT POETRY, viz Verses on E. Mansfield
Origin of the Art of Plaster-writing	815	at Tunbridge Wells.—On Sir Joshua Reynolds
Algebra in Phil. Trans.—Lord's Prayer, &c.	816	and Painters' Com. and—Rosaline's Complaint
Mexican Medal of K. of Spain described	817	—Elegies, Epitaphs, Epigrams, &c.	853—856
Critique on Select Collection of Songs	818	Proceedings in Parliament continued	857—863
Lady Conway.—Dean Reeves.—Fasting Bishops	819	Fact relative to Cols. Gordon and Thomas	863
Little Ease.—Plays by Parish Clerks	820	Foreign Affairs.—East and West India, Irish,
Authentic Anecdotes of the late Mr. Russell	821	Scotch, Port, Country, and Domestic News—
Annual Balance of his Accumulations	822	Aerostation.—Theatrical Register	865—872
Specimen of valuable Historic MSS	823	Lists of Births, Marriages, Deaths, Promotions,
Structures on the Conduct of the Clergy	825	&c. &c.	872—879
Remarks on Dr. Jortin's Posthumous Sermons	826	Prices of Stocks	880

Illustrated with an accurate Representation of a CROMLECH in the Island of JERSEY; a View of the PULPIT at PAUL'S CROSS; a MEDAL of the King of SPAIN; another of Dr. SOLANDER; two curious FAENCH MEDALS; a JET RING; and the ARMS of the S. J. EXETER by SYLVANUS URBAN.

London, Printed by J. NICHOLS, for D. HARRIS, late of St. John's Gate.

802 Meteorological Diary for November, 1783.—Average Prices of Corn.

Novem. Days.	Thermom.	Barometer. Inch. 20ths	Wind.	Rain. 100ths of inch.	Weather.
1	52	29 17	SW		fair and funny.
2	50	29 18	SW		thick fog, funny ¹ .
3	50	29 16	E		fog, fun.
4	46	29 16	E		fog, fun ² .
5	46	29 18	E		cloudy, fun ³ .
6	50	30	E		cloudy, fun ⁴ .
7	46	29 16	E		bright, brisk wind.
8	39	30	E		bright and brisk wind.
9	40	30	E		cloudy and cold.
10	44	29 18	SE		cloudy, milder air, rain.
11	42	29 10	W		cloudy, rain.
12	40	29 4	W		cloudy, frost.
13	37	29 6	W	.28	cloudy, rain.
14	41	29	W	.20	wind and sun, rain.
15	47	29 1	W		stormy.
16	46	29 10	W	.26	clouds, sun and wind, rain ⁵ .
17	56	29 9	W	.32	stormy, rain.
18	55	29 9	W	.20	clouds, rain.
19	57	29 10	W	.32	clouds and wind, rain.
20	48	29 14	W		cloudy.
21	42	29 16	W	.5	cloudy; rain.
22	39	29 16	W		fair.
23	34	29 18	W		overcast ⁶ .
24	36	30 2	W		white frost, fair.
25	38	30 4	N		mist.
26	42	30 4	E		mist.
27	37	30 6	E		overcast.
28	34	30 4	E		white frost, bright and still.
29	46	30 2	S		overcast, fair, mild and pleasant.
30	46	30 4	E		fair.

OBSERVATIONS. ¹ Gossamer floats.—² Cattle seek shade at noon from the heat.—³ Green leaves of the crocus appear.—⁴ Ruyton crows.—⁵ Thermometer, 56 abroad, and 56 within, at 8 A. M.—⁶ Frost. Ice.

AVERAGE PRICES of CORN, from Nov. 15, to Nov. 20, 1784.

Wheat Rye Barley Oats Beans										COUNTIES upon the COAST.
s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
London	5	6	3	4	3	6	2	6	3	4	Essex	5	2	0	0	3	5	2	2	3	7
COUNTIES INLAND.
Middlesex	5	8	0	0	3	4	2	2	4	0	Suffolk	5	6	3	0	3	3	2	4	3	4
Surry	5	8	3	0	3	5	2	4	4	5	Norfolk	6	0	3	2	3	2	2	5	0	0
Hertford	5	6	0	0	3	6	2	6	4	4	Lincoln	5	4	3	2	0	2	2	0	3	6
Bedford	5	5	3	4	3	4	2	4	3	10	York	5	9	3	10	3	4	2	0	4	0
Cambridge	5	7	3	2	3	2	2	3	3	4	Durham	5	7	4	0	3	6	2	0	3	8
Huntingdon	4	10	0	0	3	2	2	1	3	5	Northumberland	5	7	3	9	2	10	2	0	4	2
Northampton	5	3	3	3	3	2	2	2	3	2	Cumberland	6	0	4	6	3	5	2	2	5	2
Rutland	5	7	0	0	3	7	2	3	3	7	Westmorland	6	3	4	3	3	2	1	11	4	0
Leicester	5	10	3	11	3	5	2	2	3	11	Lancashire	6	2	0	0	3	8	2	4	4	2
Nottingham	5	4	3	6	3	2	2	3	3	6	Cheshire	6	0	4	6	3	2	2	2	0	0
Derby	6	3	0	0	3	4	2	5	4	2	Monmouth	5	10	0	0	0	9	1	7	3	2
Stafford	5	11	0	0	3	0	2	0	4	4	Somerset	5	5	3	0	2	8	2	1	3	2
Salop	5	10	0	0	3	0	2	0	4	6	Devon	5	9	0	0	2	9	1	7	0	0
Hereford	5	5	4	0	2	8	1	9	3	2	Cornwall	5	11	0	0	2	5	1	7	0	0
Worcester	6	4	0	0	3	0	2	4	3	9	Dorset	5	10	0	0	2	11	2	3	3	10
Warwick	5	4	0	0	3	2	1	9	3	1	Hampshire	5	5	0	0	3	1	2	4	3	5
Gloucester	5	10	0	0	2	10	2	1	3	6	Suffex	5	2	0	0	2	11	2	1	3	4
Wilts	5	6	0	0	2	11	2	5	4	3	Kent	6	1	0	0	3	3	2	4	3	5
Berks	5	9	0	0	3	1	2	6	3	8	WALES, Nov. 8, to Nov. 13, 1784.
Oxford	5	10	0	0	3	1	2	4	3	9	North Wales	6	2	4	8	3	3	1	9	4	1
Bucks	5	11	0	0	3	1	2	2	3	7	South Wales	6	1	4	10	3	1	1	6	4	9

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For NOVEMBER, 1784.

BEING THE FIFTH NUMBER OF VOL. LIV. PART II.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 22.

THE curious account of The Frame at Bush Hill, &c. with which your correspondent D. H. has obliged the publick in the two last numbers of your valuable Miscellany, and the beautiful plates with which that account has been embellished, have engaged my attention to a similar aqueduct, which not long since existed in my neighbourhood. I mean The Boarded River, as it used generally to be called, about half-way between Highbury, in the parish of Islington, and Hornsey Wood House, in the parish of Hornsey. It was about 178 yards long, and was so exactly upon the same principles as that at Bush Hill appears by your plate to be, that a view of it would be quite needless, if I had one to offer you. It was carried over an ancient bridle-way; and as I used frequently to pass under it in the summer time, I observed it to be almost continually dropping. This being, literally, such a constant drain upon the Company, first, I suppose, suggested the idea of destroying it. Accordingly, about Midsummer 1776, preparations were made for that purpose. The earth was raised, by the addition of a great bed of clay, to a proper level, and a channel was made for the river nearly along the old track. Great pains were taken to strengthen the bank, and make it water-tight, as far as possible, by sowing grass down its sides, and covering the top on one side with gravel, so that a fine terrace is carried along the brink of the river. But for a long time the water continued oozing through, and perhaps does so still.—Just by the road, under the trough, was a small house for one of the Company's servants, which, so far as my memory serves, exactly resembled that which is exhibited in your first plate; and when the trough was destroyed, that house was also pulled down, and another erected upon the river, for the residence of the same person, about a quarter of a mile farther North.—This trough also, like that at Bush Hill, passed over a small, but ancient, water-course, which runs under the road, beneath a brick arch of considerable length, which is not straight, but has a bend in it. The arch is about three feet and a half wide, and high enough for a man to stand in. It is very neatly built, but probably not so much so as that you have represented; nor has it any inscriptions of any kind, and I suppose is not near so high; but, on account of the water that was running under it, I could not form a judgment thereof. This stream consists here principally, I believe, of water that runs down from Highgate Hill; but after it has passed under the river, is much increased by receiving the waste water from thence, and runs, at times a considerable stream, through the parish of Stoke Newington, cross the great Hertford Road at the Northern extremity of the village, and thence to Hackney, where, having acquired the name of Hackney Brook, it crosses two streets, and at length falls into the River Lea, in Hackney Marsh, near Oldford, a hamlet belonging to the parish of Stratford le Bow.

The bridle-way I first mentioned being a public horse road (though scarcely passable in winter), leading from the principal Green Lane, the ancient Ermen Street, where it separates the parishes of Islington

Islington and Hornsey, the Company did not presume to stop it up, but built a bridge cross the river, nearly over the aforesaid arch; and at the West end of this bridge is the boundary of Hornsey parish. And here I am led to take notice of a blunder which pervades all the books upon the subject that I ever saw, and that is as to the situation of the manor of Brown's Wood. It is the corps of a prebend of the church of St. Paul, the prebendary of which has the 16th stall on the right side of the choir, and is generally described as part and parcel of the parish of Wilsden, in this county; whereas it is co-extensive with the East side of the parish of Hornsey (at least in this Southern part of it), of which it forms a very considerable part, I apprehend more than half. This abundantly appears from a number of stones that I have frequently seen, standing close to the Hornsey parish-mark, with M upon them. The place where the Manor Court is held is Hornsey Wood House, a tea-house, formerly very much frequented. But to return to the New River. From this bridge a road leads North Westward to Stroud Green, whereon stands an old farm-house, but dignified with the name of Stapleton Hall, as having been the property and residence of the family of Sir Thomas Stapleton, of Grey's Court, in the county of Oxford, Bart. and thence to Hornsey. From this Green are outlets Eastward to Hornsey Wood House, and thence to the principal Green Lane, and Westward to Duval's (vulgarly called Devil's) Lane, in which is Duval's or Devil's House, said to have been so called as having been the residence of one Duval, a famous highwayman in days of yore, and thence to Holloway and Highgate. From the bridge before-mentioned, South Westward, there is no public way, a gate having been erected just by that spot by James Colebrooke, of Arnolds at Southgate, Esq. (father of Sir James and Sir George Colebrooke, Barts.), when he was lord of the neighbouring manor of Highbury, which produced a suit at law, attended with some curious circumstances. There was one Jennings, a Quaker, who was originally, by profession, an ass-driver, afterwards became proprietor of some asses in fee simple, then a farmer at Crouch End, a little hamlet in the parish of Hornsey, and at length lessee of the manor of Brown's Wood. This man became acquainted with Richard Holland, a leather-seller in Newgate Street, London, who had a villa at Hornsey, and was at great pains to obtain the suppression of some tolls demanded in Smithfield Market (see Noorthouck's History of London). These two worthy gentlemen determined to oblige Mr. Colebrooke to open the road. Accordingly, one day they sent several teams down the road. When they came to the Boarded River, not finding any body to open the gate, they, without farther ceremony, cut it down, drove across the field to the next gate, and did the same there. They then passed by a farmhouse*, which belongs to the Crown, and thence, by the side of what is now Mr. Dawes's park, (who bought the manor of Highbury of Sir George Colebrooke, and about the year 1781 built a house on the spot which used to be called Jack Straw's Castle, from whence there is a delightful prospect of the neighbouring country,) to Highbury Barn. Here they found a third gate; upon which they dispatched a messenger to Mr. John Wallbank, a very reputable farmer, who was Mr. Colebrooke's tenant, requesting him to open the gate; which he refusing to do, they pulled it up with their horses, and drove it in triumph down the road to Canonbury Lane, and thence to Islington, where they proclaimed aloud, "that they had come along this old road, which was a thoroughfare," &c. Upon this, Wallbank commenced a suit; and in order effectually to stop the passage, by Mr. Colebrooke's desire took off the crown of the arch at the Boarded River, and laid it open, railing the opening to prevent mischief. At length the suit was brought to an issue, and the plaintiff examined one Richard Glascock †, who had long dwelt at the Boarded River House, as a servant to the Company (and who may be ranked with your correspondent's Abraham Criesley), and swore that there had always been a bar there. The defendant did not appear, and was nonsuited. In consequence of which, this has ever since continued a via clausa. Mr. Colebrooke died before the trial came on.

* Commonly called Cream Hall. On the hill near this house is a remarkably distinct echo. EDIT.

† A droll character; the terror of all the little boys who attempted to fish in the Boarded River. We well remember him by the name of Old Dick Glascock; and perfectly recollect most of the circumstances related by our friendly correspondent. EDIT.

The present governor of this Company is Peter Holford, Esq. master in chancery, who succeeded his father Robert Holford, Esq. in both those offices.—James Colebrooke, Esq. was deputy governor, and William Berners, Esq. (who died about 14 months ago) was treasurer. Who are the present possessors of those offices I know not.

I am happy to have it in my power to ease the mind of your respectable correspondent, as well as of the gentleman from whom he quotes, respecting Lady Myddelton. The mother of the late Sir Hugh Myddelton, Bart. (of whom see a note in your Magazine, vol. LII. p. 74, col. 2.) did actually receive a pension of 20l. per annum from the Goldsmiths Company, which, after her death, was, at the solicitation of Mr. Harvey, of Chigwell in Essex, continued to her son Sir Hugh, but was not his whole support, he being possessed of other property. He afforded a melancholy proof of a fact, the truth of which we have too frequent evidence of, namely, that a man may convey his blood, but not his brains, to his posterity. All his employment, and all his amusement, consisted in drinking ale in any company he could pick up. Mr. Harvey took care of him, and put him to board in the house of a sober farmer at or near Chigwell, on whom he could depend; and there he lived and died, a striking and unhappy contrast to his great ancestor.—He was the last heir male of this branch of the family, and with him the title expired. It is necessary to observe, in justice to the Goldsmiths Company, and to their Clerk, 1st, that the Company receive no benefit from the bequest of Sir Hugh Myddelton, being merely the channel through which it is conveyed to his pensioners, and that the annuity they paid to Lady Myddelton and her son was merely ex gratia, and out of their own purse (whether the New River Company did any thing, in imitation of their example herein, I am not informed); and 2dly, that if D. H. applied to Mr. Reynolds, the present clerk of the Company, it is not to be wondered at, that he could give no information upon the subject, as Sir Hugh Myddelton was dead, and consequently the pension ceased, before Mr. Reynolds was in possession of that office.

The late William Clarke, Esq. of Bush Hill, was a Turkey merchant. He was the son, I believe, of Sir William Clarke, Knt. an eminent Turkey merchant, of the last age. Mr. Clarke married a Miss Hamilton, sister to the lady of the late Sir Anthony Thomas Abdy, Bart. who died before him, leaving issue two daughters, one married to ——— Forbes, Esq. the other unmarried. The house and gardens were sold by auction in July last, and bought by John Blackburn, Esq. merchant, in Scots Yard, Bush Lane, London, for £. 2700. E.

MR. URBAN,

THE following original letter, affixed to the books to which it relates, in the choir of the cathedral at Lichfield, will perhaps be worth preserving.

Yours, &c. N. J.

“MR. SUBCHANTOR,

“I have now sent downe by Mr. Rixam your Lichfield carrier, the set of Church Services and Anthems, for the use of your Quire; with two Bookes of ruled Paper, wherein to prick the Organ parts for both: in all 12 Bookes, and well bound, having the Episcopall Armes of your See imprest on the foreside, and my owne upon the other. This is my first Free-will Offering, which with a cherefull and willing minde I dedicate to the service of your Temple; and may as pious a use be made of them, in sounding forth the Praises of the Almighty, as the Donation hath sincerity of heart from

“Your reall friend

“most humble servant,

“E. ASHMOLE.

“Middle Temple, May 3, 1662.

“For my honoured friend
“Mr. Zachary Turnepenny, “Subehantor of the Cathedral Church of Lichfield,
“at his house in the Close
“of Lichfield.”

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 22.

YOUR correspondent E. (p. 735) is desirous to know by whom the sheriffs of Lancashire are appointed; and therefore I shall take the liberty to inform him of what I thought no person who could write to learnedly of the other counties he mentions could be ignorant, viz. that Lancashire was erected into a county palatine anno 50 Edward III. and granted to his son, John of Gaunt, for life, that he should therein have Jura Regalia, &c. But these royalties are abridged by statute, particularly directing that all writs and process should be in the king's name. However, the chancellor of the county palatine still appoints the sheriffs of that county, and therefore their names do not appear amongst those nominated minated at Westminster, and afterwards appointed by the king in council.

It may also be observed, that the sheriff of the county of Cornwall is omitted amongst those nominated the other day; the reason whereof is, that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales being fully invested with the dukedom of Cornwall, the right of appointing that sheriff devolves upon him in the same manner as it was exercised by the late Prince Frederick, his highness's grandfather, who was the first Prince of Wales that had so done since the reign of King James the First, when Charles, his son, was Prince of Wales. B. R.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 18.

THE inclosed transcript from the "New and General Biographical Dictionary," Art. MORE (Dr. Henry), will give your Berlin correspondent F. S. (see p. 728) some information respecting the learned Countess Conway, and likewise shew that you was right in your first conjecture of her being a daughter of Sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London.

"In 1639, he (Dr. More) had taken his Master of Arts degree; and being chosen fellow of his college, he became tutor to several persons of great quality. One of these was Sir John Finch, whose sister, Lady Conway, may be called another of the Doctor's pupils at a distance, or out of college. This lady, whose genius and temper was nearly related to his own, had the misfortune to fall into Quakerism, from which he laboured many years to reclaim her, but without success. He had a great esteem of, and friendship with, her. He drew up some of his treatises at her request; and she, in return, left him a legacy of £. 400. He composed others of his works at Ragley, the seat of her lord, in Warwickshire, where, at intervals, he spent a considerable part of his time. He met here with two extraordinary persons, the famous Van Helmont, and the noble's famous Valentine Greatrakes; for, it seems, Lady Conway was frequently afflicted with violent pains in her head, and these two persons were called in at different times to try their powers upon her; and at last Van Helmont lived in the family. There was once a design of printing some remains of this lady after her death, and the preface was actually wrote by our author, under the person of Van Helmont; in which disguise he draws her character with so much address, that the most Quaker would see every thing

"he could wish for in it, and yet the soberest Christian be entirely satisfied with it. It is printed at large in his Life."

In the margin to this extract reference is made, by the compilers of the Dictionary, to Mr. Ward's Life of Dr. Henry More, p. 203, &c.; and I have reason to believe, that at pp. 192, 195, this extraordinary woman is mentioned*. She, according to Collins's Peerage, vol. III. p. 375, must have had a second husband; for, in the detail of the family of Conway Lord Conway, it is set forth, "that Francis (Seymour) Lord Conway, after the death of his brother Popham, took the surname and bore the arms of Conway, being heir by adoption to the estate of Edward Earl of Conway, which, on the decease of the Countess of Mulgrave, widow of the said Earl, he accordingly enjoyed." W. & D.

MR. URBAN,

THE elegant Epitaph on Gen. Wolfe in Westerham church (p. 731) had before been inserted in your Magazine, vol. XXX. p. 201 †, with the omission, however, of the material words, CONQUEROR OF QUEBEC. It was written, and the tablet erected, by the Rev. Geo. Lewis, M. A. then vicar of that parish, who was admired, in his younger days, at Westminster, for his masterly performance of Ignoramus, and in his old age was panegyriced at Tunbridge, in Latin and English, in verse and prose, by the late facetious Knight and Doctor, Sir William Browne.

Molly Leapor (p. 752) was a most extraordinary, uncultivated genius, who "warbled her native wood-notes wild." The first volume of her poems was published by subscription (the proposals for which were drawn up by Mr. Garrick) under the patronage of several persons of rank and taste, in 1748; as was also the second volume, of which the late Mr. Hawkins Browne was the editor, in 1750, both of them after her death, which happened prematurely by the measles, at the age of 24. She has been celebrated by Mr. Duncombe in the Feminead. CRITO.

MR. URBAN,

MOLLY LEAPOR, p. 752, according to the account of her prefixed to some pieces of hers, inserted in the

* See more of her in p. 210.

† See the epitaph in Westminster Abbey, vol. XXXIII. p. 616; and several others proposed for him in volumes XXXII. and XXXIII.

Collection of Poems by eminent Ladies, in two volumes 12mo, 1755, was born at Marston St. Laurence, Northamptonshire, in 1722, and died of the measles at 24 years old, which must have been in the year 1746. Her poems have been collected and published by subscription, in two volumes 8vo. Her father was a gardener, and she was some time cook-maid in a gentleman's family in the neighbourhood. Her fondness for writing verses there displayed itself by her sometimes taking up her pen while the jack was standing still, and the meat scorching. The editor of the Poems by Eminent Ladies cautions the reader against forming an idea of her person from the poem called "Mira's Picture;" and says, though she has made free with herself, it was by no means disagreeable. But the description, I remember the gentleman, in whose house she lived as servant, once gave me of it, was still harsher. He represented her as having been extremely swarthy, and quite emaciated, with a long crane-neck, and a short body, much resembling, in shape, a bass-viol. However, the talents of her mind amply compensated for the defects of her person; and if, with so few advantages, she was capable of writing with so much credit to herself, there can be no doubt but, if her career had been prolonged, she would have greatly distinguished herself in the annals of female literature. W.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 16.

IT is somewhat surprising that, amongst the various Histories of Mr. Pope's Life, and observations on his writings, no person has been able to mention who the unfortunate lady was, to whose memory some pathetic verses are inscribed. One would imagine Mr. Ruffhead might have known from the Bishop of Gloucester; but little is to be obtained from that dull, unsatisfactory performance of his. [See our vol. LI. p. 314.]

I venture to send you the following relation, in hopes it may induce some persons, better informed, to confirm it with further particulars, or provoke them to contradict it, and discover the truth.—I cannot pretend to vouch for the authenticity of my account, but you shall have it as I received it, long ago, from a very worthy, but obscure, country parson, one very unlikely indeed to be furnished with secret anecdotes. He told me, that in the earlier part of his life he had been an enthusiastic admirer of Pope, and immoderately inquisitive about every circumstance relative to his works. It often happens that zeal and diligence will effect its purpose where all the best means and favourable opportunities are wanting.—His account was as follows: That the lady's name was Scudamore; that she and her family were Roman Catholics; that, having fixed her affections on a person not suitable to her, the match was steadily opposed by her uncle and guardian. This created such uneasiness between them, that it was agreed they should separate, and the lady go abroad to a convent. It was to Antwerp, as well as I can recollect, that she was sent; not with a view of taking the veil, but to stay as a boarder, her friends hoping that, by the time she was of age, she might come to better judgement; that she was soon after seized with a fever, which ended in a state of melancholy; and that she somehow or other procured a sword, and put an end to her life. Such are all the particulars that were communicated to me, and such the authority.

That great genius and excellent man, Dr. Johnson, is the first, as far as I can remember, that has very properly censured the sentiment in these verses.—There is not, in all Pope's Works, a more reprehensible passage, or more contrary to the principles of society. Uncommon bitterness is expressed against the lady's uncle, merely for acting as a man of honour and a conscientious guardian should do. Nothing could warrant such lines, but the supposition that the uncle had opposed an equal match from interested motives, and with a view of inheriting his niece's fortune. But we are too much in the dark to judge fairly on this occasion. P. ARVUS.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 6.

A Remedy for destroying the weevils in ships, and preserving dry provision for sea service, being a very great object of naval utility, has engaged the attention of a medical gentleman to exert his abilities in researches after so useful a discovery. Experiments have been made with success, not only for this desirable purpose, but also for making biscuit, which will keep longer and sweeter than those made in the usual manner, and prevent the internal breeding of that insect, and resist the efforts of the external weevil from damaging the bread, either in its purity, flavour, or quality, though that species of vermin should even gain a lodgment therein.

Yours, &c. BENEVOLOUS.

MR.

MR. URBAN, Fleet-street, 198, Nov 5.

HAVING again read the letter published in your Magazine of last month, signed by the Rev. William Backhouse, Archdeacon of Canterbury, and referred to in your Contents by the words "Recent Medical Imposition detected," calculated to invalidate one published at my desire some time since the public newspapers, which I had received by post as from a Reverend Daniel Storer, curate of Sittingbourn, in Kent, and in which the writer authorises me to make that public use of it, as a corroborative testimony to the well-known virtues of a medicine of which I am the sole proprietor; now, Sir, as I would wish to evince, by the whole tenor of my conduct, as much contempt for imposition and regard for veracity as the Reverend Archdeacon himself, I trust you will allow me an opportunity of defending myself against illiberal and aspersive conclusions, however sacred their source, in which the common precautions with respect to truth, usually observed by men of sense, seem wholly disregarded.

The medicine of which I am the proprietor does not derive its reputation from forged testimonies or suborned perjuries; of its established efficacy I am empowered to adduce vouchers not less respectable, in every point of view, than even the Reverend Archdeacon of Canterbury. The letter in question is one of a number received from different quarters, by post, on the same subject, of which, I trust, the subjoined solemn asseveration* will be held a sufficient proof; and, as it appeared to me a fair and gentlemanly acknowledgement of facts, I made use of the author's permission to publish it.

The Archdeacon has thought proper to justify his interference by saying, "he thought it his duty, as a public man in office, to detect such impositions." I will not pretend to say what may be the particular duties of an Archdeacon of Canterbury; but I believe his duty as a Christian and a Citizen required him to reflect a little farther on the subject, before he ventured to attack the property and character of an unoffending individual, by pointing him out as an impostor, who was at least as innocent of the fault, if it was one, as your Reverend correspondent, or his friend Mr. Evans.

Yours, &c. B. CORNWELL.

* * * The above letter being abridged by us from a longer one, it may be necessary to observe, that the Archdeacon has replied, Mr. Cornwell rejoined, and that Mr. Storer has not been brought into Court. And here, without a comment, we shall close the subject; referring the reader who may desire to know more of it to the Kentish Gazette of October and November.

* "In the High Court of Chancery. Bryan Cornwell, of Fleet-street, in the city of London, patentee of a certain medicinal cordial, called Oriental Vegetable Cordial, maketh oath, and saith, that he this deponent did, on or about the 14th day of August last past, receive the original letter hereunto annexed, from or by the General Post or person who usually delivers letters to this deponent from the Post Office, with the usual Post marks thereon, which appears on the said letter. And this deponent saith, that although he did not then know the name or person of the Rev. Daniel Storer, annexed or subscribed thereto; this deponent, at the time he read the contents of the said letter, verily believed that the same was written and sent to this deponent by the said Daniel Storer, as the curate of Sittingbourn in the said county of Kent, from whence the same is dated, and that the said letter was written and sent to this deponent for the benevolent purpose expressed and contained in the said letter; and that this deponent, in full confidence and belief that the said letter was written by, and in the real character of, the said Rev. Daniel Storer, thought it an act of justice due to the public and to himself to have the same printed and published in the newspapers; and with that view, and under full persuasion of the authenticity of the said letter, this deponent ordered an extract thereof to be published in Lloyd's Evening Post, as stated in the Kentish Gazette of the 9th of October instant. And this deponent saith, that from the time of publishing the said extract of the said letter until he read the said Kentish Gazette, he never heard, or had the least reason to suppose or believe, that the said letter was not written or sent by the said Daniel Storer as curate of Sittingbourn as aforesaid; nor has this deponent at this time any reason to believe that the said Daniel Storer is not curate of Sittingbourn aforesaid, otherwise than from what is intimated to the contrary by a note, printed in the said Kentish Gazette, signed W. Backhouse, Archdeacon of Canterbury. And this deponent saith, that if the said Daniel Storer is not, or was not, curate of Sittingbourn aforesaid, at the time of writing the said letter, the publication of the said extract thereof was not meant or intended as any imposition by this deponent, as he received the said letter by the General Post, and paid the postage marked thereon as aforesaid.

BRYAN CORNWELL.

Sworn before me this fourteenth of October, 1784, at the Public Office in Symond's Inn, before

EDW. MONTAGU.

This paper writing [exactly the same which we have printed in p. 726] was produced and shewn to Bryan Cornwell, and is the same mentioned and referred to in his affidavit.

Sworn this fourteenth day of October, 1784, before me

EDW. MONTAGU."

R000

Fig. 4. p. 814.

Size of the Seal

Mr. Wood's log

Camden Street, Islington, Oct. 25.

MR URBAN,

YOUR ready insertion of my letter (p. 409) induces to my being a farther correspondent, as there promised, which I should have been sooner, but for the interruption of a voyage to Jersey, and from thence into France, in the months of June, July, and August last.

The fertile island of Jersey is one of the most beautiful moles on the face of the ocean; and the romantic scenes of stupendous rocks and bays, which skirt this island, are picturesque almost beyond description. Few remarkable antiquities are to be met with; the most noted is what is called Mount Orgueil, on which is what is distinguished by the name of The Old Castle, close to the sea, a venerable piece of antiquity, built on, and surrounded with, rocks of the most tremendous appearance. In old time it has stood the brunt of several sieges from the French, who at one time encamped before it with 10,000 men but failed in their attempt to take it. The æra of its erection is unknown, no historian being able to trace its origin; and, before the invention of artillery, it was thought impregnable. But it is so commanded by an adjacent hill, that, according to the present art of war, a smart cannonade would soon reduce it to a heap of rubbish. The ascent to the top of this castle is by near 200 steps, from whence is an extensive view of the sea and coast of France; and, by the help of a prospective glass, I plainly saw the two front towers of the cathedral church of Coutance, in Lower Normandy, said to be one of the finest churches in France, and that it was built by the English, when that country was in their possession. In my walk to the castle, a gentleman informed me, that in a field on the summit of the opposite hill was a cromlech, or altar, of the Druids; which as I earnestly desired to see, he kindly conducted me to the place. It stood in the corner of a field of corn, on an elevated spot or barrow, almost covered with fern. It is a large, rough, irregular-shaped stone, supposed to weigh 80 tons, supported by six smaller ones, its elevation not above two feet from the ground. The inclosed drawing [see plate I fig. 1.] is a representation of it. Some modern Bacchanalian rites had been celebrated on this altar, as there were the remains of several broken glasses and bottles on it. I was informed, that there are one or two more of these cromlechs on the island;

GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

an evident demonstration that it was known in the most remote ages. A gentleman shewed me the spot where a much larger one stood; which, he said, was within his own remembrance, and that it could not be less than 800 tons. It has been demolished; and the fragments used about the fortifications or pier; one of its supporters is still standing, and is near five feet in height. He also favoured me with the sight of some very ancient pieces of coarse silver coin, which were found in an earthen pot, in a field in the island. They were thick, and about the size of a sixpence; a head, of exceeding rude workmanship, on one side; and something like a horse, with abundance of dots, on the reverse, but no inscription. He apprehended them to have been of some Gaulish princes, in the time of the ancient Romans.

The churches in the island of Jersey are all very plain buildings, most of them with square steeples, several of which I saw, but they have nothing remarkable in them, only that the communion-table is not at the east end, as in our English churches, but placed just under the pulpit. The gallant Major Pierson, who was killed at the time the French invaded this island, in 1781, has a handsome monument erected to his memory in Saint Hillier's town church, in August last, while I was there. It was executed by Bacon, and has the following inscription:

“To the Memory of Major FRANCIS PIERSON, who,
when this Island was invaded by the French,
fell, bravely fighting,
at the Head of the British and Island Troops.
He died in the Flower of Youth,
and in the Moment of Victory,
on the Sixth Day of January,
1781, aged 24.
The States of the Island,
in grateful Testimony of their Deliverance, caused this Monument to be erected at the Public Expence.”

The French General was also mortally wounded, and carried into a gentleman's house facing the market-place, where he died the next morning. I was shewn his blue coat, laced with gold, very bloody, and two gold snuff-boxes which were found in his pockets, one of which had his lady's picture on the cover, and inside was the order, in his hand-writing, for the French troops to throw down their arms and surrender.

The coin fig. 7, in your Magazine for May, I think, has been hitherto unnoticed.

riced. I take it to have been struck at Hamburg; the inscription, "Civitas. Sancti. M. T. B. HA." meaning (as I apprehend) a city under the protection of the Virgin. Reverse, "Servorum Inpatoris;" which may allude to its being a city dependant on the empire.—This being but conjecture, I should be glad to see it rightly explained.

In P. Q.'s critical remarks on my letter, p. 496, he says, "The Bishop's figure is, on the tomb, in pontificals;" but there is no other on that tomb but the skeleton: all the tombs of bishops with figures on them, in the north aisle, are the following, and every of them in the opposite wall, viz. The first, on the entrance of that aisle, from the body of the church, is an honorary one for Valentine Carey, who was buried on the north side of Old St. Paul's, London, where he had a stately monument, with his effigies, erected to his memory. He died in 1626. The second is of Henry Marshall, 1203, on a tomb of grey marble, in his pontificalibus, mitred, and a pastoral staff, or crozier, in his hand, still in good preservation. The third, Walter Stapledon, who, in a great insurrection in the troublesome reign of Edward II, 1326, was murdered by the Londoners, and ignominiously buried in a heap of rubbish from a tower he was then building or repairing, near his own house in the Strand; and, about six months after, the body was taken up, and carried to the cathedral church of Exeter, where it was honourably interred on the north side of the high altar, under a sumptuous monument, with his largely-proportioned mitred figure, in pontifical vestments, thereon, a pastoral staff in one hand, and the other over his breast, with a book in it. On the flat roof, over the figure, is painted the image or picture of our Saviour, the hands elevated, as if to shew the wounds which appear in them and his feet. This monument is kept in complete repair, painted and gilded, by the munificence of the provost and fellows of Exeter College in Oxford, of which he was founder. A long inscription, in Latin, was placed over the tomb, at the last repair, intimating the untimely end of this good prelate, and the college's grateful obligations.

The arms engraved in the plate for June, fig. 2, p. 409, are not those of the see of Exeter, as asserted also in p. 426; but, I have reason to think, belong to the deanry of Winchester, that of the bishoprick of Exeter being as the inclosed drawing [see plate I. fig. 2], and are thus blazoned: Gules, two keys in saltire, and a sword in pale, Or, uniting the Saints Peter and Paul.

I may probably send you some further observations on Jersey. M. S.

MR. URBAN,

Oct. 3.

TO gratify your correspondent D. N. (p. 742) I send you a drawing of the pulpit at Paul's Cross [see plate I. fig. 3.] from a copy in the Pepysian Collection at Magdalen College, Cambridge; and shall transcribe, by way of illustration, the words of honest Stow:

"About the midst of this church-yard is a pulpit-crosse of timber, mounted upon steps of stone, and covered with lead, in which are Sermons preached by learned Divines, every Sunday in the fore-noone. The very antiquity of which crosse is to me unknown*.—I read, that in the yeere 1259 King Henry the Third commanded a generall assembly to be made at this crosse, where he in proper person commanded the Maior, that on the next day following he should cause to be sworne before the Aldermen, every stripling of 12 yeeres of age, or upward, to be true to the King and his heires, Kings of England.—Also, in the yeere 1262, the same King caused to be read, at Pauls Crosse, a Bull, obtained from Pope Urban the Fourth, as an absolution for him, and for all that were sworne to maintaine the Articles made in Parliament at Oxford. Also, in the yeere 1299, the Deane of Pauls accursed, at Pauls Crosse, all those which had searched in the church of S. Martin in the Field for an hoord of gold, &c. This

* "The original occasion of erecting a cross here, and so likewise in all other church-yards," says Dugdale, "was to put good people, passing through such cemeteries, in mind to pray for the souls of those whose bodies lay there interred. But, besides that use of the cross in this place, there hath been another made thereof, and perhaps very anciently, viz. of preaching there to the people." The "preacher at Pauls Cross" is mentioned in the will of Michael de Northburgh, Bishop of London, dated 10 kal. June, 1361; and by the letters hortatory of Robert de Braybroke, Bishop of London, 11 Rich. II, it appears, that "the high cross standing in the greater church yard of the cathedral, where the word of God had wont to be preached to the people, was then grown ruinous by reason of winds and tempests. Hur, after that time, Thomas Kempe, who sat Bishop here from 28 Henry VI. to 5 Henry VII, rebuilt it, as Godwin affirms, and as his arms, on sundry places of its leaded cover do manifest." History of St. Paul's, 2d edit. p. 130.

pulpit-crosse was, by tempest of thunder and lightning, defaced. Thomas Kempe, Bishop of London, new builded it, in forme as it now standeth."

The cross at St. Michael's (after which D. N. also enquires) is thus described by Stow:

"This parish church hath, on the south side thereof, a proper cloyster, and a faire church-yard, with a pulpit-crosse, not much unlike so that in Pauls Church-yard. Sir John Rudstone, Maior, caused the same pulpit-crosse, in his life time, to be builded, the church-yard to be enlarged, by ground purchased of the next parish, and also proper houses to be raised for lodging of Quire-men, such as at that time were assistants to divine service, then daily song by note in that church. The said John Rudstone deceased 1531, and was buried in a vault under the pulpit-crosse. He appointed sermons to bee preached there, not now performed. His tombe before the pulpit-crosse is taken thence, with the tombe of Richard Yaxley, doctor of physicke to King Henry the Eighth, and other."

In the Pepysian Library, I may add, is also a copy of Sir Philip Sidney's funeral procession to St. Paul's, 1587, drawn and invented by Tho. Lant, gent. servant to the said hon. knight, and graven on copper by Theod. de Brij, in the city of London, 1587, Latin and English, dated at the end 1588. A copy of this procession was sold, at Mr. West's sale, for 10 guineas. John Claxton, Esq. of Lincoln's Inn, has another copy, which he bought for 4 shillings (see British Topography, vol. 1. p. 683). So fluctuating is the value of curiosities!

A LONDON ANTIQUARY.

MR. URBAN,

THE respectable writer of the Preface to a "Proposed Form of Registers for Baptisms and Burials" was probably led to say, that he did not find any mention of the regulation respecting parish-registers during the reign of Elizabeth, from the circumstance of his having only consulted THE INJUNCTIONS given by her to the Clergy and Laity, A.D. 1559. If you refer to the Articles of Visitation, eodem Anno, you will meet with this item: "Whether they have one book or register kept, wherein they write the day of every wedding, christening, and burying?" See Sparrow's Collection of Articles, Injunctions, &c. printed in 1661, 4to.

In Ridley's Articles of Visitation,

* See vol. LI. p. 377.

A. D. 1550, no mention is made of registers.

Inter Capitula five Constitutiones Ecclesiasticas, 1597, occurs much, De Registris in Ecclesiis salve Custodie commitentis (p. 49). And these Injunctions (as well as the Canons of 1603) direct the registers of baptisms, marriages, and burials, to be transcribed from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign.

There are many registers which contain no entry whatsoever from 1652 to 1659.

With due submission, would not born be preferable to aged? I apprehend that a person who was born the 7th, and baptized the 11th, might be registered as being aged only 4 days, though in fact he would be 5 days old.

In my Register of Burials I always specify the deceased having been a lodger or traveller, as well as his occupation.

The form prescribed under the running-title of Where buried is not full enough. The corpse may have been deposited in the church; in North or South aisle; in a grave or vault; the minister's, the parish, or a family vault. And if in the church-yard, whether in a grave or vault ought to be particularised, as well as the quarter of the burying-ground.

To the hints with regard to church-yards should be added the destruction of the ivy, so injurious to the fabric. The bishops ought not to have been included in the censure. Parochial visitations belong now to the archdeacons, and their officials or surrogates.

The charge of little attention being paid to church-yards is not universally true. I can mention upwards of 500 parishes where the churches are visited annually, between Easter and Michaelmas, and where the defaults then found are to be certified as being amended at the ensuing court held at Michaelmas.

Why is the mark of admiration added after fields! p. 5? or, rather, why is the deficiency of mould to be supplied from the neighbouring fields? I know several serious (not superstitious) people, who would be shocked at such a procedure—sacra profanis!

I do not altogether like the word manure, in the preceding paragraph. That, as well as the neighbouring fields, is surely liable to some objection.

If I had not, Mr. Urban, approved highly of the plan in general, you would not have had these minute remarks on it from Yours, &c.

A COUNTRY RECTOR.

Tb

The Editor, from his knowledge of the gentleman to whom the following letter is addressed, is confident that he will excuse the insertion of so singular a literary curiosity, and complete specimen of modern criticism.

TO MR. PINKERTON.

THE distinguished honour which your native country has acquired by literary imposition upon her neighbours renders a junction with those illustrious worthies, William Lauder, Archibald Bower, and James Macpherson, no small compliment to the ingenious Mr. Pinkerton*, (as you, with equal happiness and familiarity, have been pleased to introduce yourself to the acquaintance of an astonished world.) Your endeavours are not, it must be confessed, of equal magnitude; but the difference cannot be owing to a want of inclination. Your success has, doubtless, fully gratified your expectations; and the dexterity of a pick-pocket may vie with the impudence of a highwayman. You, Mr. Pinkerton, will be already conscious of the nature of this address, for you will be conscious that you deserve it, how little forever you may have thought your merits liable to detection. But though my readers may have heard of your now justly-forgotten Rimes†, Tales, Dithyrambic Odes, and other equally sublime and incomprehensible rhapsodies, they may still require to be informed that you are the editor (author, I should say,) of two volumes of what you have been pleased to call Scottish Tragic Ballads, and Select Scottish Ballads, (I congratulate you on your improvement in orthography), volume II, a character in which alone I am about to consider you. You will do me the justice to recollect how and when I appear; and, while I leave you no room to complain of my prolixity, admit that as a sufficient apology for my conciseness.

To your two learned Wartonian Dissertations I have nothing at all to say, for this obvious reason: you have been frequently asked what they are to the purpose, and I never heard that you were able to tell. Let us therefore proceed to examine the poetical contents of your first volume.

Hardyknute, Part I. This ballad has been substantially proved an artful and impudent forgery: but whether Mrs. Wardlaw were the mother or the midwife, is of very little consequence; the ballad is certainly spurious. There is not, I readily acknowledge, any great degree of criminality in reprinting a fine and popular ballad; even though, from a defect in judgment, or a sturdy adherence to what Dr. Johnson might call Scotch morality, you did not believe, or thought proper to deny, its true origin. But what excuse can you have for the publication of a second part, or continuation of this poetical fraud? Not ignorance surely? No; the composition must be altogether your own. Neither the lady, nor the common people of Lanerkshire, from whom you pretend to have recovered most of the stanzas, will deprive you of the honour of its procreation. The poetry is too artificial, too contemptible; the forgery too evident.

The eight following pieces, being chiefly transcribed from Percy, though not a whit the less suspicious on that account, I shall not attend to. I want to prove your forgery, not his.

The Laird of Woodhouselee, Lord Livingston, Binnorie, and The Death of Menteith, which you give "from tradition," were, I am confident, never heard of before; and carry the strongest intrinsic marks of forgery. Of I wish I were where Helen lies, this single line alone is genuine. And yet have you the affectation or assurance to censure Ramsay, who not only was a much better poet, but, though a poor barber, had infinitely more taste and judgment in Scottish poetry than yourself, for exercising a much slighter degree of the same liberty. If you be accused unjustly, convince us of your innocence.

You are pleased to tell us, that the stanzas you have given of "Flodden Field" form a complete copy of that

* Why a man of independent fortune should be censured for assuming the title of Mr., which is allowed to the meanest mechanic, seems extraordinary. Had he given barely his name and surname, much stronger objections might be brought. In France, that superlative land of etiquette, the Monsieur is always used by a young writer, of whatever private station; the name and surname solely by a writer of established fame. We follow them, and say John Milton, Horace Walpole, and Thomas Warton; but never give name and surname to a writer of inferior, or of commencing, reputation. For the writer himself to give them, without addition, were therefore the height of vanity. EDIT.

† "A mistake. Dr. Beattie mentions them, in his last publication, with all the warmth of friendship, and all the extravagance of puffing. But this is Scotch policy. Clen me, and I'll slay thee." poem; that a variety of versifiers had been induced to mingle stanzas of their own composition; and thence compliment yourself on your painful but necessary duty in discriminating such dross, by the touchstone of truth, from the gold of antiquity. You must have been sadly fatigued, to be sure; as I dare you to mention a single copy, of any better authority than that of a modern ballad-stall, which contains a single stanza more than, or different from, your own*.

P. 88. Britons, you say, "was the common name which the Scots gave the English anciently, as may be observed in their old poets, and particularly Blind Harry, whose testimony," you add, "can only be relied on as to the common language and manners of the time; his Life of Wallace being a tissue of the most absurd fables ever mingled." One would be glad to hear of an author who writes for the vulgar, in their native dialect, and cannot be relied on as to the common language of his time. In this, therefore, Blind Harry has nothing peculiar; but I defy you to point out a single passage in his Life of Wallace more descriptive of the manners of the age in which, than that of which, he wrote. If you had read the book, you never could have pronounced such an unjust, and indeed ignorant, sentence upon it. - That his story is not all true, is freely admitted. But is it less so than that of Homer, of Virgil, of Lucan, of Tasso, of Milton? And dare you call their immortal labours a tissue of the most absurd fables ever mingled? And yet, I will venture to say, you might do it with equal truth. But I shall now inform you whence your censure arose. You never read Blind Harry: no, not a line or word of him; and, most probably, never beheld his book. You say that Britons is the common name he gives to the English. It is not true. I suspected your veracity, and read him over to be convinced. There is no such word as either Britons or Briton, from the beginning to the end of him. If there be, find it. He always calls the English Sutheron, or Saxons, or Englishmen, and nothing else†: another proof that Hardyknute is a forgery, and that he who is capable of imposition in poetry is not incapable of falsehood in prose.

P. 113. The stanzas of Lady Botwell's Lament, you tell us, "are injudiciously mingled in Ramsay's edition, and several stanzas of his own added." The charge is unjust; the assertion untrue. There is not a single line in Ramsay's copy which is not to be found in copies printed before he was able to write one. Deny this, and I will prove it.

P. 116. From a manuscript you say, in your own possession, you print two poems, "with a few corrections," written, as you tell us, "by Sir Robert Aytoun, secretary of state during part of the reigns of William and Mary and Queen Ann‡." Your knowledge of history is of a piece with your judgment in poetry; or you think truth and integrity of equal little consequence in each. Sir Robert Aytoun was dead before either William, Mary, or Ann was born. He was secretary of state, indeed, as you may have somewhere read, "to Ann and Mary, queens of Great Britain." But these two ladies, Mr. Pinkerton, (and what a pity it is that so great a scholar should not have thought of it himself,) were the mother and grandmother, and not the daughters, of K. James VII.

You will just give me leave to look a little into your Glossary, to see if you be as well versed in the language, as you are in the history, of your native country.

Bansters, I find, you explain blufferers. Here honest Ailan, to whom you are so much obliged, could give you no assistance. The passage runs thus (p. 53):

"In haist at the sheiring na yokers are
"jeiring;

"The bansters are lyart, runkled, and
"gray."

That is (not the blufferers but) the bandsters, or bindsters, those who bind the sheaves after the reapers, are all decrepit old men.

Loaning, "a common green near a village." Let its colour or situation be what it may, it is always a lane.

Swankies, "merry fellows." Young peasants (Swainkins).

Thud, "sudden noise." The sound occasioned by a fall or blow. The ex-

* If this writer will take the trouble to look into any edition prior to that of Mr. P. he will find near a dozen stanzas which are all rejected in his. EDIT.

† To mistake, in quoting an author from memory, is surely a venial offence. Britons, in Hardyknute, may signify Welshmen. EDIT.

‡ On examining our copies of both editions of the Tragic Ballads, it stands thus: "They were both written by Sir Robert Aytoun, who bore some office under government in the reign of James I, if I mistake not." EDIT.

plosion of a pistol is a "sudden noise," but not a thud.

I should not doubt of being able to add considerably to this little specimen of your vulgar knowledge, had you not, by omitting the necessary references, taken every possible precaution to prevent a discovery of your mistakes.

You will, with Mr. Urban's good leave, in a little time hear from me again. Yours, &c. ANTI-SCOT.

* * * Though we do not altogether approve of the manner of this writer (the Observer on Warton if we mistake not), we respect his abilities as an Antiquary, and shall be glad to see a continuance of his correspondence.

MR. URBAN, Burbach, Oct. 7.
THE ring of jet, of which you now receive a drawing [see plate I. fig. 4.], was dug up, a few years ago, in the garden of Caludonhouse, near Coventry, (formerly belonging to the Segraves, afterwards to the Mowbrays, and now to Lord Clifford; see Dugd. Warw. I. 128, edit. Thomas.) At the same time were found some ancient black bugles, and silver coins of Henry VI, Henry VII, and Queen Elizabeth. There was formerly a large chapel in this place. Part of the wall is yet standing, and is very thick. Several of the arched windows are still visible. It was heretofore fortified with a moat, and embattled wall, the traces of which are remaining to this day.

Yours, &c. OBSERVATOR,

MEMOIRS of Mr. CHARLES GOSLING, the British Timon.

MR. GOSLING, commonly called The British Timon, or woman-hater, was a Londoner, and lived in Wyche Street, next door to the New-Inn Coffee-house, when first known to the writer of these memoirs, in 1737.—He was then fourscore years of age, or more. He gained that appellation from his living there in two little rooms by himself. He lighted his own fire, cooked his own victuals, made his own bed, washed his own stockings and handkerchiefs. His needle-work, to be sure, could not be much, for I never knew him wear a shirt, or have any sheets on his bed; so that, as he lived an old bachelor, regardless of the female sex, he had less need of one as a laundress.

He was a middle-sized man, strait, and well proportioned, and had been handsome in his youth. He wore a flannel waistcoat next his body; good cloth, serge, and camblet garments, though of a very antique cut and fashion, with large open cuffs to the sleeves, and plenty of mohair buttons on them. His shoes were square-toed, with small silver buckles; his breeches tied with strings at the knees, and his hose rolled over them. When dressed, he wore a black stock (but in dishabille a silk handkerchief about his neck, and a peruke-maker's linen apron), a large fine beaver hat, and good grizzle wig, deep and full with small curls, which as he always kept in prime condition, I was inclined to think he had been of that business.—Being but a youth when I became conversant with him, he always kept up his consequence with me, and a reserve that forbade any prying enquiry. He walked with an amber-headed cane, sullied by old time and much handling.

He was peculiarly successful in the preservation of his cloaths, and bade defiance to moths. He used to strew over them ground-pepper, cedar saw-dust and shavings, in the old chest or coffer in which they were embalmed and lay entombed, for many of them seldom saw sun or moon. He used the same process with his bedding, for evident reasons, which kept him clear from those little animals which would discredit a gentleman.

He was very regular in his way of living, and constantly frequented the daily service at St. Clement's church. He was intimate with Mr. Cox, the parish-clerk, an old man, of a facetious merry humour. He said, Cox had once lent a man fifty shillings, or three pounds, to help him in an emergency, who kept him out of the same for two years. When he applied to him for it, he was never at home, yet always kept his church on Sunday, where he was sure to confront his old friend in the middle aisle. Cox, sadly mortified at his assurance, resolved to treat him with two staves, and gave out the first line, looking him full in the face, "The wicked borroweth and payeth not again." This had the desired effect; for the next day he went and paid him, and made an apology. Mr. Cox loved his pipe and his glass, and chearful company, and was happy when he could give his old rib (which was a very crooked one) the slip, she being a termagant and a scold. However, at length she died, and it was observed, that on the evening she was buried he set his psalm, "This is a joyful

“ful day indeed;” and he seemed to be in high spirits. He survived her but a few years. The clerkship being in the gift of the rector, he bestowed it on his curate, the Rev. Mr. Edwards, who got a deputy to do the duty for a fourth of the income, and he engaged a curate for clerical relief on nearly the same terms. Edwards now rarely appeared in the desk on week-days. Gosling remonstrated with him, and asked him the reason. He replied, “Don’t you think that a Gosling question from you who are old enough for a Gander; for who doth keep a dog and bark himself?” Gosling thanked him, and said he was very liberal both to his curate and himself.

Gosling had a good understanding, sound judgment, and an excellent memory. He had read much, and also had preserved many anecdotes, or pieces of private history, some of which have lately been published, and others are ready, if called for. I will mention one circumstance, because it is sneered at by Doddsley, in his Chronicles of the Kings of England. I mean the pamphlet that Col. Lindsey printed, giving an account of the Devil’s taking a walk into a wood with Cromwell on the morning of the day that he fought and conquered Charles the Second, near Worcester. My friend Gosling lent me this pamphlet, which had Lindsey’s name to it; wherein he proved that the usurper sold himself to the enemy of mankind after a term of years, in which he was to be successful; and that he actually did die that day seven years, September the 3d, in the most violent storm of thunder and lightning that perhaps England ever knew.

Gosling used to say, that Queen Mary was used to dispose of the places about court, and even in the church, in a lucrative way, and in the latter bordering upon simony. So it was that a dean jumped over the heads of all the bishops, and got into the see of Canterbury, viz. “Mr. Dean, I’ll bett you ten thousand pounds that the King appoints you to the vacant archbishoprick.” It was in vain to remonstrate on the envy, malice, and enemies it would procure him; and Gosling used to say, “That as sure as the Dean was promoted to the primacy, so sure the bett was discharged *.”

Gosling was very fond of Hudibras, and could quote him on any occasion.—

* The absurdity of this must be evident to all who recollect the reluctance with which Archbp. Tillotson (who must be here meant) accepted the primacy, his character, circumstances, &c. &c. EDIT.

He lived till 1747, or 48. I had been absent from him two or three weeks with illness. On my recovery, I had the mortification to find him dead and buried, and those apartments shut up of my old sage friend, where my “foot had so oft worn the step of his door.” T. O.

MR. URBAN,

THE history of the art of expressing the conceptions of the mind by visible, permanent signs, has been traced, by Bishop Warburton, with much erudition and ingenuity. He has detailed the progression of this art, from the first rude essays of picture-writing, through the successive shades of hieroglyphics, to the arbitrary characters of the Chinese. But there he ended, and left unfilled the extensive chasm between them, and alphabetic writing. Mons. Goguet, “De l’Origine des Loix, des Arts,” &c. advanced farther, and conjectured, that the next step in the series was made by the introduction of marks denoting syllables, or the more compound elements of words. This mode of writing still prevails among the Ethiopians and some Indian nations; and, according to Kæmpfer, in Japan. He then attempts to account for the use of characters for the more simple elementary sounds, by observing that this analysis was suggested by the introduction of abridged marks into the hieroglyphical writing, the combination and varied arrangement of which might express the movements of the mind and other modes, not having a visible form; and this opinion, he thinks, derives support from the similitude of form and name between certain hieroglyphics and the letters of the Armenian and other alphabets. From this resemblance it appears, that the forms of these letters had an hieroglyphical origin. But I cannot believe that any supplemental exposition of symbols, emblematic of things, could guide in the analysis of sounds. I shall attempt to insert one link in the chain by conjecturing, that to this syllabic alphabet one entirely composed of consonants succeeded. The notation of every distinct syllable, by an appropriated sign, being found burthensome, a simpler method would be sought for. We can hardly think that one effort could raise the deficient syllabic mode to the refined perfection of the present literary alphabet. It required a long succession of inventive powers to consummate an art, which Cicero urges as a proof of the celestial nature of the human soul: “nonis vocis qui infiniti videbantur, paucis litera-”

“rum

“rum notis terminare.” To the analysis of words into syllables a still more complete resolution in time succeeded, of syllables into their component elements. But the variety of syllabic sounds, chiefly arising from organic articulations, or consonants; and the number of vowels or simple breathings being necessarily few; men would be contented to give marks to the first, leaving the others to be supplied by the reader. This conjecture seems more probable, if, according to the opinion of Lord Monboddo, the syllables in the primæval languages contained only single consonants. It is also supported by, and at the same time accounts for, the nature of the Hebrew and some other oriental alphabets, which have no characters denoting vowels, the Masoretic punctuation being novel. In all the western alphabets both consonants and vowels have letters appropriated to them, because the art of writing was not imported from Asia into Europe until the want of vowel marks had been found inconvenient. I do not recollect to have met with any attempt to account for this difference between Asiatic and European alphabets. RAPOTENSIS.

MR. URBAN,

A Correspondent, who signs himself ACADEMICUS, asks, in p. 178 of this year's Magazine, if “several of the articles in some of the later volumes of the Philosophical Transactions do not appear foreign to the purpose of an experimental Society.” And he adds, “The depths of algebra, not to particularise any other subjects, appear inconsistent with the original plan of the royal philosophers.”

This correspondent should have been told that, except in the very infancy of the Society, it never was, neither was it ever intended to be, merely “an experimental society;” but a Society, as the title of it has always been, for the improvement of natural knowledge. Therefore, unless your correspondent will be hardy enough to deny that algebra is a branch of natural knowledge, it cannot be foreign to the purposes of the Society.

I must add, that your correspondent seems but little acquainted with the volumes of the Philosophical Transactions, where he hints that algebraic papers are more frequent in the latter volumes than they were formerly. For I will venture to affirm, that, excepting a very few of the first volumes, which were published before the Society had adopted any regular plan of proceedings, he will find them more frequent formerly than they are now. But perhaps he is one of those feeble amateurs, as Dr. Horsley very emphatically styled them, who have, in the late disputes of the Society, endeavoured to treat all mathematical science with contempt, and for no other reason, it may be presumed, but that they have not capacity to obtain it. P. Q.

MR. URBAN,

Aug. 20.

IT has frequently seemed to me as if there were somewhat of an indecency, if not a greater impropriety, in our being made, according to the present form of the Lord's Prayer, to supplicate our Creator, not to lead us into temptation; as if God were the Being introducing us into such danger. For although God may permit us to be tempted, in order to try our faith and obedience, I should rather apprehend that could not warrant our considering a Being, of such exalted benevolence, as our conductor into temptation. I have therefore ventured to attempt a new form for that most comprehensive, yet concise, address to the Divinity, and which runs thus: “Our Father, who livest in Heaven, hallowed be thy Name. May thy Kingdom come, and thy Will be done, on Earth as it is in Heaven. Grant us this Day our necessary Support; and forgive us our Offences, as we forgive those who trespass against us: and suffer us not to fall into Temptation, but deliver us from Evil; for thine is Dominion, Power, and Glory, for ever and ever. Amen.”

Yours, &c. A. T. M.

MR. URBAN,

PLEASE to inform Drs. Priestley and Horsley, the two champions of the Trinitarian controversy, that Bp Bull's Works are already in English, in several volumes octavo, the writer of this having the first and second in his possession. They were translated by Fr. Holland, M. A. rector of Sutton, Wilts, and chaplain to Lord Weymouth, with Notes and Observations by Dr. Grabe. The passage which occasions this address is in the 113th page of Dr. P.'s Letter to Dr. H, by which it is evident neither of the disputants have seen the work here instanced.

There exists in print a copy of Saint Matthew's Gospel in Hebrew, with a long preface, in that language, on the same side of the argument as the electrical Doctor stands, and which the notifier would recommend to his perusal, as it contains the opinions of the ancient Jews on that contested point. H. L.

MR.

MR. URBAN, Nov. 3.

THE medal, represented in the plate annexed [*Pl. II. fig. 1.] is of pure virgin silver, weight 4 oz. 2 dwts. 20 grs. It was struck in S. America, and was, with others, intended to be transmitted to Old Spain, as presents for the court and grandees, being, as I am informed, designed as a sample of the first-fruits of a newly-opened mine; but the Spanish packet El Postillon de Mexico, of which they were on board, being taken by the King George privateer of London, Francis Werry commander, was sold by the candle at New Lloyd's Coffee-house, Dec. 1, 1779, by Tho. Hubbert, together with 293 medals, 12 gold, 150 silver, 125 copper, and 6 brass. On the obverse is a profile of the King of Spain in armour, adorned with the collars of the orders of the Golden Fleece and of Charles III.; the face is indeed a most extraordinary one, hardly human, but very much resembles that which appears upon his coins, and in the engraving of him in the frontispiece to Baron Dillon's Travels through Spain; round the head is the following, Carlos III. Padre de la Patria, y Protector de las Ciencias (Charles III. Father of his Country, and Protector of the Sciences): just before the beginning of this legend are the letters, very small, G. A. Gil. probably the name, or an abbreviation of the name, of the engraver of the dye in which the medal was cast. The edge has no milling, nor ornament of any kind, but is quite smooth. Of what is meant by the history depicted on the reverse I confess myself ignorant; in the centre, under the table or altar, is a very small shield of the arms of Castille and Arragon quarterly, and at some distance below that, the letters G. A. Gil. again appear; this side has the following legend, Vence y triunfa el mas prudente (The most prudent conquers and triumphs); and in an exergue at the bottom, Real Academia de derecho Español y publico año de 1778 (Royal Academy of Spanish and public right in the year 1778). The whole is exceedingly well executed, and I do not doubt the engraving of it will be acceptable to those of your numerous readers, who may happen never to have seen the original; if it tends in any degree to their amusement or your advantage, it will give me pleasure that I put it into your hands. Yours, &c. E.

* Fig. 2. will be explained in our next.
GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

MR. URBAN, Nov. 17.

STROLLING a few days since into a bookseller's shop in the Strand, I took up A Select Collection of English Songs in Three Volumes, said to be compiled by a Mr. Ritson. I had only time and opportunity for a cursory inspection; but I soon found that the editor, in his Preface, and Dissertation on National Song prefixed, has very illiberally and unfairly indulged himself in an abuse of some of the first critics of the present age, and even those to whom he appears to have been considerably indebted. To say nothing of his peevish insolence to the very learned and respectable Bp. Percy, in deducing the progress of the English Ballad he treats Mr. Warton with much asperity of language; when, at the same time, he uses that writer's History of English Poetry as a clue to his deduction, and for the ground-work of his matter. Here is plagiarism blended with ingratitude. He has, without the least acknowledgement, adopted an hypothesis or two from Mr. Warton. One is, that the sublime Oriental colouring of the Scaldic Odes originated from Odin's migration, who peopled Scandinavia from the East. Another is, that the wild spirit of poetry soon decayed among the Saxons, in consequence of their very early conversion to Christianity; and that therefore they have left us no poems replete with barbarous magical imagery, like those of their Northern neighbours. In tracing the progress of song through Greece, the compiler mentions the SIRENS as Singers; but he does not choose to have much to do with them, as they "were supernatural, of "an inferior order, half women and "half birds." Just as seriously he adds, without properly separating history from fable, "All know how the "songs of Orpheus mollified the iron "heart of Pluto." He is probably better skilled in black-letter than in Greek; and he betrays his ignorance of ancient literature, in supposing the convivial and amatorial lyrics now extant under the name of Anacreon to be genuine. The real and original poetry of Anacreon, Siquid OLIM lusi Anacreon, scarce one fragment of which now remains, was in a much severer style. Yet he says, "the rhapsodies of Anacreon are well "known; they are pure Scolia. and "every thing we can imagine the most "perfect and elegant songs on those subjects should be." And afterwards he cites a flowery conceited song by Jonson.

son, "of which," he says, "Anacreon, had he written in English, need not have been ashamed." The compiler's merit seems to consist in detecting petty inaccuracies, in restoring readings, and adjusting particulars, of no consequence. He sees well a little way, and in little things: he has no wide or comprehensive view. He reminds us of a couplet in Pope,

Ah, what the use, were finer optics given,
T'inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?

After Bp. Percy's RELIQUES; this collection was easily made.

Yours, &c.

T. T.

MR. URBAN, Aston, Nov. 22.

FOR the satisfaction of your correspondent at Berlin, desiring some information of the learned Lady Anne Viscountess Conway [see p. 806], the following is given you from the Life of the celebrated Dr. Henry More of Cambridge, by Richard Ward, his successor in the rectory of Ingoldsbey, Lincolnshire. Printed 1710.

"The Doctor had one heroine pupil, the Lady Conway. She was sister to Sir John Finch, ambassador at the Ottoman Port, an early pupil of his also. I have heard him say, that he scarce ever met with any person, man or woman, of better natural parts than the Lady C. She was mistress of the highest theories, whether of philosophy or religion, but had the misfortune to be exercised, from her very youth, with great pains and disorders in her head. She turned quaker; but said, that she never was in love with the name of a quaker, nor with their rusticity; and only regarded their principles and practices so far as they were good. She could not endure any noise, and found quakers so still and quiet, that their company was very acceptable to her. Baron Van Helmont, her physician, who lived long in her family, was a frequenter of their meetings.

"This unexpected scene at Ragley, Warwickshire (where Lady C. lived and died), affected the Doctor so much, that he received the account of it with tears, and laboured to set her right. Her pains were so great, that nothing but the intolerableness could make her undergo such coarse remedies, and so incurable as to defeat all the attempts of all physicians whatsoever, galenists, chemists, empirics, as well French as English.

"Dr. M. being acquainted with the circumstances of her death from Ragley, returned this answer: 'I perceive, and bless GOD for it, that my Lady Conway was my Lady Conway to her last breath; the greatest example of patience and presence of mind in highest extremities of pain and affliction, that we shall easily meet with. Scarce any thing to be found like her, since the primitive times of the church.'

In one of the pleasant fields near Ragley is a well, called Lady Conway's Well. Not only the goodness of the water, but the situation, or the retired and sequestered scene, might be very suitable to this contemplative and afflicted Lady. EUTHELIUS.

MR. URBAN,

THE former part of your correspondent B. R's enquiries (vol. LIII. p. 1029) being ably and satisfactorily answered by Mr. Ayscough in your Magazine for January, permit me to throw in my mite of information in answer to the latter part of Mr. B. R's letter, and to inform your readers that in a copy of the Mercurius Rusticus, 12mo. printed 1646, in my possession, is a manuscript note, saying, that it was written by Dean Reaves.

With the Mercurius Rusticus, in 2 parts, are bound up the Querela Cantabrigiensis, and the Mercurius Belgicus, or memorable occurrences from the beginning of the civil war to 1646; probably all of them by the same author.

Q. Who was Dean Reaves?

O. G.

MR. URBAN,

IT is not in my power to point out, agreeably to the request of A. P. in what cathedral is the figure of a bishop, who really attempted to fast 40 days and 40 nights. I believe there never was any mortal, either priest or layman, who made so ridiculous an experiment. Nevertheless there may be seen in many cathedral churches an emaciated figure of a bishop, who, the vergers tell us, tried to imitate our Saviour's fast, and perished (as might reasonably have been expected) in the attempt. Such a figure is to be seen in the cathedrals of Wells and Exeter. The monument at Wells has two portraitures of the same bishop, one on the upper part, in a cumbent posture, represented in the bloom of life, and dressed in his pontificalibus; the other below, naked, and quite emaciated.

ciated. The last figure is, without doubt, intended to express the dismal change which death occasions. In Salisbury cathedral is the meagre skeleton of an ecclesiastic, who, according to the tale of the vergers, made a vow of fasting till he had finished a translation of the whole Bible, and died as he was about the last chapter of the Revelations. Whence did these stories derive their origin? An engraving of one of these monuments would be no improper ornament for the Gentleman's Magazine.

In whose hands are the papers collected by Mr. Peck the antiquary, for a third Volume of the Desiderata Curiosa, the Lives of the two Burtons, and for other works?

Were the Collections of John Nelson, LL.D. relating to the civil war in the reign of Charles I. ever printed entire? Are any memoirs of his life transmitted to posterity?

By whom were the papers selected, which are printed in the Harleian Miscellany? Was this work set to the press before or after Lord Oxford's death?

I should not trouble you, Mr. Urban, with so many queries, if I did not consider your Magazine as the vehicle for almost every information. B. R.

MR. URBAN,

IN your Magazine for last year, p. 920, your correspondent Wm. Bickerstaffe has enumerated divers places called "Little Ease." To the passages cited by your correspondent the following may be added from the Mercurius Rusticus, p. 116. Speaking of the sufferings of the loyal clergy, the author has these words: "They were put under hatches, where the decks were so low that they could not stand upright, and yet were denied stools to sit on, or so much as a bundle of straw to lie on. Into this 'Little Ease' in a small ship they crowded no less than fourscore persons of quality, &c."

CRITICAL and HISTORICAL REMARKS.

The Song of Solomon was not permitted to be read by the Jews till they came to the age of 30 years. See Prynne's Histriomastix, p. 914, where Origen and Hierom are cited. Mr. Warton, in his History of English Poetry, vol. III. p. 318, note x, mentions this circumstance, and refers to Origen and Hierom, but without making any acknowledgement to Prynne, as he certainly ought to have done, for Mr. Warton's order and manner of citation is exactly the same as Prynne's, which plainly shews from whence Mr. W. derived his authority.

Mr. Warton has made a blunder in the II^d volume of his History, which escaped the penetration of his Observer. His words are these: "To this ecclesiastical origin of the drama we must refer the plays acted by the parish clerks of London, for 8 days successively at Clerkenwell, which thence took its name, in the presence of most of the nobility and gentry of the kingdom, in the years 1390 and 1409." See pp. 395, 396. At Skinner's-well beside Smithfield, and not at Clerkenwell, a play was acted in 1391 by the parish-clerks of London, which continued three several days, the king, queen, and the court being present. See Howell's Londinopolis, p. 399. I know of no play acted by them in 1390. In 1409 another play was acted, which lasted 8 days. Howell does not mention the place where it was performed. Clerkenwell was much frequented by the youth of the city in the reign of Henry II. and was most probably at that time in a rural state. See Pegge's edition of Fitzstephens's Description of London. Yours, &c. B. R.

MR. URBAN, Bottleys, Nov. 12.

THE will and probate of the late RICHARD RUSSELL, Esq. being now printed, by order of his executors, for the use and information of the several charitable foundations to whom he left his fortune, I send you a copy of it, which I request you will reprint* in your useful repository.

I should ill deserve the good opinion that gentleman always entertained of me, if I could suffer to pass uncontradicted the various false and exaggerated accounts of his character and conduct, with which the public prints have been filled for some weeks past; and I therefore transmit to you the following character, originally drawn up by me for the St. James's Chronicle, in which I have inserted nothing but what I believe to be true; and that belief is founded either on my own personal knowledge, or authorities I am persuaded I can rely on.

You receive also, inclosed, an origi-

* The substance of this will shall be given in our next Magazine, accompanied with his pedigree, and a portrait from an original picture by Russell.

nal letter, written by Mr. Russell a few months before his death, to Sam. Gillingham, Esq. one of his executors. If you should think with me, that it tends very much to elucidate his true character, and particularly his want of erudition, his love of truth, his frugality, and general turn of mind, and manner of thinking, you will print that also*.

Yours, &c. JOSEPH MAWBEY.

"RICHARD RUSSELL, Esq. was born in the parish of Bermondsey in 1723, and was the only surviving offspring of Mr. John Russell, of the same place, fellmonger. His father, who died in 1770, is said to have been a native of Staffordshire; and he acquired by great industry in business about 10,000*l.* which he left principally to his wife, Rebecca Docker, who survived him, and lived with her son till 1780, when she died. She was a very worthy woman, and much esteemed by all her acquaintance. Some years before her death she conveyed all her estates by deed of gift to her son, of whom she was very fond; taking care, however, to provide by the same instrument for their return again into her possession in case he died before her. The motives which produced such transfer are not known. He always treated his mother with great affection and filial respect; with his father, who is described as a bad-tempered man, it is said, he lived generally upon ill terms. A handsome monument is erected to both their memories in Bermondsey church.

"Their son carried on the business of a woolstapler many years, and had not relinquished it altogether at the time of his death. He is allowed on all hands to have conducted himself in it with great credit and integrity.

In person he was below the common stature, was pitted with the small-pox, and, while in health, was somewhat inclined to corpulency. He was regular and punctual in his accounts and dealings, and, having been bred to an oeconomy which bordered on parsimony, he never had any relish for pursuits which were attended with considerable expence. If he was not generous, he was honest and incorrupt. As an inhabitant of a large parish, and as a commissioner of the pavements and sewers, he always opposed the improper expenditure of public money, and was ever ready to pay any sum on such occasions out of his own pocket, rather than put the parish, or commission, to the least charge. It was very much owing to him that the latter commissioners introduced their present practice of paying for their own dinners at all their public meetings. He was in the commission of the peace for the county of Surrey, but never took out his debenus. The world at large have supposed that he was the Justice Russell who had some concern in suppressing the riot in St. George's Fields at the time of Mr. Wilkes's imprisonment in the King's Bench prison, and whose house in consequence was nearly pulled down by the mob; but that magistrate, Edward Russell, Esq. is still living at Sydenham, in Kent. Others have mistaken him for John Russell, Esq. a magistrate at Greenwich.

"His education had been narrow and confined, even for a tradesman; but he possessed a considerable share of good sense, which he improved by reading. He was, in particular, an admirer of poetical compositions, and purchased a renter's share of Drury-Lane Playhouse, to gratify his love of theatrical exhibitions, which, in winter, he

* An extract from this letter, we believe, preserving the orthography, will answer the intention of our obliging correspondent. "On Thursday last I began my usual summer walk on the other side London, and walked from Islington to Sumner's Place, accompanied over the fields and some parts of the quiet streets by the Gentleman turned Apothecary. I compare Mr. Ellis's manner of poetry to Mrs. Siddons' manner of performing tragedy:

The repetition of them doth not tire,

The more I see the more I do admire.

Antiquary Society being done about 8 o'clock I went to see the two last acts of Venice Preserved, in which she took her leave for the season in Belvidera; found the house quite full, many had gone away for want of room, but I put my head close to the door of the stage box, where I very distinctly heard her; this I think is another proof of her great merit, and shews how very articulate she speaks, to be heard in such a situation, by such ears as mine; indeed the house was very still, all attentive to hear, only when she called forth the highest plaudits: however my situation thus lasted but a few minutes, for a gentleman came from the back seat in the box, and went away, and I took his place, and then saw as well as heard the compleatest performance and the best tragedian I think of my time, altho' I have not forgot Mrs. Cibber, who was a great favourite of mine. I brought home twelve prints, such as they are, from the Society, the Monument of Reharius, Views of St. Thomas's Chapel on London Bridge, &c.; should never have bought them, but as come for nothing thought them worth bringing home. Inclosed is King's most gracious speech. When I saw you last am sorry I gave you a wrong information in regard to the majority of Fox. I told you only 75, whereas I soon after found had been misinformed wrong by 100; it made me uneasy to think I gave you a false account."

 An attorney and money-scriver of the city, the author of several ingenious pieces of poetry. He is now upwards of 80 years of age.

almost

almost constantly attended. In summer he amused himself with walking all round the metropolis, but never lay out of his own bed. He had a kind of cynical turn, which led him frequently to oppose the sentiments of others; and that rendered him in a degree unpopular. Those who knew him best were not disgusted with his character, which, though odd, blunt, and singular, was sometimes thought entertaining, and always honest. If his manner sometimes assumed the appearance, he was not really ill-tempered. He possessed as much philanthropy as is generally found among men, with a particular fondness for domestic animals, usually keeping five small dogs in his house, for whom a regular allowance of meat was provided. After his mother's death, his family consisted only of one man, and two female servants, and himself. His housekeeper received two guineas weekly of him for the maintenance of a table, exclusive of wine, and other liquors; this was always sufficient, except when he entertained particular company, who sometimes, though not often, met at his house. He was a strict observer of his word on all occasions. Many years ago he declared in company to Mr. Donaldson, of Messrs. Child's shop, that he would leave him, at his death, his gold watch: he bequeathed it to him accordingly; and Mr. Donaldson has since received it from his executors, when he expressed his surprize at the completion of a promise which he had altogether forgotten.

"As a politician, he was public-spirited, and a great lover of freedom. He did not much like to go out of his usual track, and, therefore, scarce ever took journeys; but having conceived a great esteem for the public conduct of one of the gentlemen whom, altogether unknown to him, he had named as executor in all his wills for many years past, his love of ease did not prevent his going thirty miles to vote for him at three or four county elections.

"In 1782, he wrote a tract, called, "War with the Senses; or Free Thoughts on Snuff-taking; by a Friend to Female Beauty;" which, if not well written, was extremely well intended. The profits of this publication he declared his intention of giving away in charity. In this tract he has attempted a diffusive against the practice of taking snuff as unwholesome and slavishly and particularly as injurious to female beauty, of which he was always a great admirer.

"It is certain that the populace dropped some expressions of dislike against the memory of the deceased on the day of his funeral; but it is not true that he was hung in effigy, as was reported. The world at large had entertained a prejudice against him for having omitted all mention of his relations in his will, and this was greatly heightened in Bermondsey, by his having directed his body to be interred in St. John's church, the adjoining parish; but the funeral proceeded without the least obstruction or outrage, till it came to the church-yard, where, and in the church itself, a surprising multitude of both sexes, and all ages, was assembled. The singularity of ten virgins attending the funeral of an old bachelor, as pall-bearers, and strewers of flowers, and their dresses, excited the curiosity of the town in general: a prodigious crowd was assembled; and in it, it is believed, was every pick-pocket in London. These last placed themselves in the church and church-yard; they let the ladies follow the corpse without much interruption; but before the mourners and attendants could get out of their coaches they closed in, prevented these latter from following immediately after the ladies, and plundered almost every well-dressed person around them. The confusion in the church arose principally from the immense number of spectators; and it would certainly have existed if the corpse of the most popular character had been carried for interment in a manner equally pompous and novel.

"He had a natural son, who died young several years ago, to whom whilst living he at one time bequeathed all his fortune. From the time of his death he is said to have given all his property, real and personal, in every will he made, to public charities. He has left 3000l. to the Magdalen, 3000l. to the Small-Pox, 3000l. to the Lying-In Hospitals, and all the residue of his fortune, after a few legacies, to the Asylum for Female Children. These several charitable foundations were established, in a particular manner, for alleviating the distresses of the most amiable and helpless part of the creation; and, as he had been a man of some gallantry in the earlier part of life, may we not charitably suppose that he intended making retribution to the fair sex, by donations in their favour the most liberal and uncommon! He exerted himself much in his life-time in the establishment of a very useful charity, the Surrey Dispensary, of which, at the time of his death, he was one of the vice-presidents, and to which he has given 500l. by will.

"He was a member of the Antiquarian, and, it is said, was a candidate at the time of his death for admission, as a fellow, into the Royal Society. He was a great admirer of the fine arts, and has left behind him a collection of prints which are said to be very valuable. These, by his will, are to be sold to any gentleman that will give 200 guineas for them; and his library to any one who will give 100l.

"It was at first believed that he had directed all the estates of which he received the rents to be sold for the benefit of the charity above-mentioned; but, on a closer examination into his property, that bequest, it is said, extends only to such as were of his own purchasing; his father, by his will, devised all his real estates to his wife for life, with remainder-- mainder to his son Richard, and his heirs lawfully begotten; and, in default of such, directed they should be sold, and their produce divided among the children of his brother Thomas Russell, and his sisters Willett and Parkes. Their descendants consider themselves as now entitled to enter into possession of those estates, and have demanded them accordingly. The executors, it is said, will take the best advice in the law for their conduct, determined, as they are, to do strict justice to all parties. These estates, so left by the father, are of considerable value; and, it is thought, the knowledge Mr. Russell had of the certainty of his relations taking them after his death alone prevented his mentioning them in his will; for with some of them he lived on friendly terms, and corresponded*.

"He generally kept about 10,000*l.* running cash at his banker's, with which he was always ready to accommodate any of his neighbours of whom he had a good opinion (and they were not a few) by discounting their bills. In these transactions it is certain, so far from being guilty of usury and extortion, he never took a penny more than legal interest. At a time when the trading part of mankind were subjected to many inconveniences for want of regular remittances, such a conduct on the part of Mr. Russell was particularly useful: the want of such a friend, it is hoped, will not now be inconvenient to his trading connexions.

"He was a great admirer of Dr. Samuel Johnson, who, it is said, had formerly been his tenant; and he left him, originally, 100*l.* on condition that he should write his epitaph. So far from entertaining a wish that such epitaph should be salsome, he knew enough of Dr. Johnson, to be convinced that he was less likely than any other man to flatter the dead or the living. That he afterwards changed the bequest in favour of the Rev. Mr. Grose might, and probably did, arise from the infirm state of Dr. Johnson's health, and from a desire of paying a testimony of respect to the talents and ingenuity of a worthy young clergyman, who resided many years near him, and with whom he had lived on terms of great intimacy and friendship.

"From his first being seized with the jaundice, of which he died, he was firmly persuaded that he should not, and he frequently said he did not wish to recover. Possessed of his full senses almost to the last, he from day to day would talk of his approaching dissolution, and gave directions to his servants, and to Mr. Leavis, one of his executors; who was every day with him, with a calmness, composure, and fortitude of mind, which would do honour to the best of men. His regularity was such, that having been accustomed to pay his servants on the day next after every quarter-day, he paid, on the 30th of September, his housekeeper her wages, and made her a present for her care of him, an hour or two only before his death, at a time when he expected almost immediate dissolution.

"He was extremely fond of sculpture, which probably led him to direct a monument of 2000*l.* value to be erected in St. John's church, in Southwark. He passed over his own parish church on this occasion, not, as it has been said, from dislike to the inhabitants there (for whose charity-school he left 100*l.* by his will), but from the impossibility of obtaining room for its erection in a fabric so ancient. If this last act of human vanity will not bear the rigid animadversion of reason and philosophy, let us consider that none of us are perfect; that the best of men have their frailties, and that he is happiest who has the fewest imperfections!

"The author of this account knew him many years in public, and since his death he has had many opportunities of acquiring information respecting his private life. That Mr. Russell was not what the world would call an amiable man in his manners or deportment is certain; a defective education had prevented him from being such. But it is equally certain that he did not deserve the opprobrium with which his memory has been branded by the public prints. Impelled by truth alone, the author of this brief account, who can have no other motive, has thought it a duty in him to vindicate from misrepresentation the character of a man, whose failings have been exaggerated, and whose good qualities have been sunk in general abuse."

A. Z.

The following extract from a book, called, "Inventory of the Effects of Richard Russell, continued regularly from 1752," will shew the increase of his fortune from time to time:

	£.	s.	d.
1749 March,	624	0	0
1752 June, by self,	901	0	0
1753 June,	1133	0	0
1754 November,	1141	0	0
1755 June,	1514	0	0
Christmas,	1175	0	0
1756 July,	1580	0	0
1757 January,	1673	0	0
Christmas,	1916	0	0
1758 Ditto,	2430	0	0
1759 Ditto,	2849	0	0
1760 Ditto,	3185	0	0
1761 Ditto,	3560	0	0
1762 Midsummer (old house)	4012	19	0
1763 Ditto,	4775	0	0
1764 Ditto (1050 gained)	5824	15	0
1765 Ditto,	5748	0	0

* His father's will appears to have been inaccurately drawn; after the devise above-mentioned in favour of his relations, in a subsequent part of his will he gives all his freehold estates to his wife, and her heirs for ever.

1765 Christmas (Robert)	6071	13	0
1766 Midsummer,	6266	4	0
Christmas,	6458	1	0
1767 Michaelmas,	6840	0	0
March 10, took stock	7324	11	0
1768 July 1,	7564	10	0
1769 January 2,	7913	14	0
July 24,	8511	0	0
Christmas (1272 gained)	9185	1	0
1770 Midsummer,	9591	12	0
1771 July,	13,353	1	0
1772 August 1,	13,450	0	0
1773 June,	13,350	0	0
1774 January (1539)	14,889	0	0
July,	15,430	6	0
1775 January,	16,074	17	0
1776 January,	16,980	14	0
1778 July,	18,037	14	0
1779 November,	18,653	12	0
1781 January 27,	24,920	15	8
1783 March 1,	29,157	17	0

* There is reason to believe that Mr. Russell's valuation of his property is over-rated.

MR. URBAN, Princes-st. Bedford-row.

PERMIT me to recommend to your consideration, and if it meets with your approbation permit me to lay before your readers, an addition to the improved plan which you have adopted for the Gentleman's Magazine. Original papers, or well authenticated copies, are allowed to be the best materials from which historic facts are to be deduced. For the better security of such papers public libraries are established; they are also thought to be matters of so great consequence as to merit the protection of parliament; and the collection of public societies; or should it fall in the way of public spirited gentlemen to meet with such materials, they think their names will be remembered with additional honour by their having been the means of transmitting them to posterity. Collections of this kind in public libraries, while they remain undescribed, or buried under a general title of collections, &c. are consequently unknown: nor is it to be expected from a writer of history that he should wade through such immense volumes, when his prospect of success in meeting with materials worthy of notice must be very uncertain. In private collections their use must be more confined; perhaps, having been collected with a single object in view, the remainder of their contents remain unnoticed and unknown, whilst they might be of the greatest use to persons who may be endeavouring to clear up other historic doubts.

The plan which I would recommend is, to describe such MSS. on historical subjects preserved in public or private libraries, which are at present undescribed, or only described under the general title of Collections, of which there are many valuable volumes in the Cotton Collection of MSS. in the British Museum: and as this plan will be the means of extending the use of them, and of answering the purposes for which public libraries are established, I trust it will be well received. As a specimen I shall subjoin a description of Cotton MSS. Vespasian C. XIV. As it is certain that all gentlemen who have such kind of MSS. in their possession would wish to render them as useful as possible to the public, I shall expect them so far to encourage the plan as to send an account of them to the editor, by which I shall judge how far my attempt is well received, in which case you may expect occasionally to receive further information from,

Yours, &c. S. AYSCOUGH.

Cotton MS. Vespasian C. XIV. in the British Museum. Described in Smith's Catalogue "A large Volume of curious Collections, under several Heads, as Admirals, Admiralty, Advocatio Ecclesiarum, &c. in which are contained several original Patents and Letters. It may well be called a Common-Place Book of State and Government."

1. Admiralli Angliæ, temp. Edw. I. II. III. fol. 1
2. A Fragment relating to the Court of Admiralty. 3
3. A Treatise on English and Scotch Ships trading to France. 4
4. References to Cases of Advowsons of Church Livings. 6
5. De Mercatoribus alienigenis. 7
6. A Protection against unjust Towles and Exactions, 16 Hen. III. 7
7. A Declaration of the Proceedings between Mr. William Turner and Gerard Malynes concerning the Alome Works in the North. Addressed to the Earl of Dorset, Lord High Treasurer of England. 8
8. Collections relating to Ambassadors. 11
9. An original Passport of Queen Elizabeth to Sir Henry Unton, Knt. Ambassador to France. 14
10. The Danish Ambassador's Remonstrance against the English fishing in Iceland without Licence, 1599. 21
11. Vada allocata diversis Ambassadoribus Temporibus diversorum Regum. 30
12. A Letter of Pope Gregory concerning Appeals to Rome. 33
13. Notes concerning Appeals. 34
14. Account of the poor Estate of the Office and Officers of Arms. 35
15. An original Writing of Richard Earl of

-a. f. 9/3

- of Cambridge to King Henry V. (on parchment.) 39
16. Articles against Edmund Duke of Somerset (on parchment). 40
17. The original Parchment containing Charges against Michael De la Pole, 10 Ric. II. 43
18. De Camera Regis, Collectanea. 53
19. The Yearly Charge within the Office of the Treasurer of the Queen's Majesties Chamber. 55
20. An original Writing of Henry VIII, complaining of the City of London not providing Horses for the Carriage of his Wine and Provisions. 64 b.
21. A Memorial of certain Instructions and Orders committed to the Charge and Execution of Sir Peter Carewe, and Sir Thomas Wroathe, Knightes, Mr. Henry Knollis, and the Recorder of London, for Things to be done in the Tower of London, Sept. 16, 1572. 65
22. Remembrances for the Ambassador's Placing and Pastime, &c. the said Ambassador being the Admiral of France, 1546. 67
23. The Rewards given to the Ladies at the Christening of the Dolphin's Child. 76 b.
24. Ceremonie Regum. 77
25. Ceremony of entertaining my Lady of Motrell; in a Letter from William Pemfroy to the Lord Mayor of London, Aug. 24 (no Year). 79
26. Orders for the Reception of Queen Katherine. Imperfect. 81
27. Lodgings at Hampton Court used to be appointed by the Gentleman Usher, temp. Hen. VIII. 90
28. The Ordinary accustomed to be lodged within the King's Majesties House. 98
29. Warrant of James I. to Henry E. of Northampton; Keeper of the Privy Seal, appointing Sir Lewis Lewkenor Master of the Ceremonies to Ambassadors. 94
30. The Duty of the Clerk of the Market appointed by the Board of Green Cloth. 95
31. The Fee of the Clerk of the Crown for an Indictment. 95 b.
32. Fœdera et Ligæ cum Principibus transmarinis et eorum stipendia. 96
33. Constabularii Angliæ a temp. W. I. ad 24 E. III. 97
34. Exemplificatio Lit. Pat. Ric. II. constituens Rad. Asheton vice-constabularium. Datum Coventriæ 24 Die Octobris (sine Anno). 100
35. Constabularii Turris Londoniensis ab Anno 2 R. I. ad 1 Hen. V. 101
36. Expensis Jacobi Regis, Scotiæ Domini de Tutvill, et 17 aliorum militum de partibus transmarinis prisonarum Domini Regis in Turri Lond. 3 Hen. V. 105
37. A Copy of the Articles and Ordinances made by King Henry 6 Sir Thomas Lovell and Sir Richard Cholmley, Knights, and all the Yeomen of his Guard, and the Soldiers that attend in the Tower, 1 H. 106
38. Proceeding in a Suit in the Exchequer between the Gentleman Porter and Hemmyng, respecting certain Houses on the Ditch Side by the Postern of the Tower. 107
39. Collections on Proceedings for Contempt. 108
40. Coronatores Comitatum et eorum Officio. 109
41. Account of Corruptions in the Courts of Justice. 110
42. Sacramentum Regis Hen. II. in Coronatione ejus. 112
43. De Officiariis Domus Domini Edwardi Regis qui servierunt in Die Coronationis ejusdem: Et de libertatibus eisdem Officiariis pertinentibus. 113
44. Two original Warrants of Edward II. respecting his Coronation. 116
45. An original Warrant appointing the D. of Gloucester Steward at the Coronation. 118
46. An original Warrant of King Rich. II. to John Dymmock to attend the Coronation. 119
47. An original Warrant of King Henry to Philip Dymmock, &c. with an Order for making out several other Warrants. 119
48. Things to be provided for the Creation of the Prince of Wales for his Principality, Dukedom, and Earldom. 120
49. Necessaries to be provided by the Master of the Jewell-house the Day of the King and Queen's Coronation. 121
50. Coronatio Regis, & Forma ejus Juramenti, 1 Edw. II. 122
51. The Manner of the Attendance of the Judges at the Coronation of Queen Anne, the Wife of Henry VIII. as reported by Sir John Spellman, one of the King's Justices that was then present. 124
52. Collectanea de Coronationibus variorum Regum. 125
53. Epistolæ variz Alexandri Papæ ad Archiep. & Episc. Angliæ de Coronatione Hen. fil. Hen. II. Anno 1170. 127
54. Henricus I. in Coronatione sua Ecclesiam liberam reddit, malas consuetudines Regni auferit, Ecclesiæ Cant. monachis libertatem Regiasque consuetudines confirmat. 129
55. Coronatio Regis Ric. I. sic describitur in Cronicis Joh. Castoris, Monachi Westmon. Cenobii, quem Leylandus Antiquarius vocat Johannem Fiberium, vel Bever. 130
56. Coronatio Regis Hen. III. 132
57. Excerpta ex Rotulo servitiourum factorum Domino Regi Hen. IV. Die Coronationis sue. 133
58. An Account of the Coronation of Eleanor, Q. of Edw. III. 141
59. A brief Abstract of the King's Commission for Fees, dated 8 Oct. 8 Ja. I. 144
60. Custodes Regni ab 1190, ad An. 3 Hen. V. 145
61. A Letter from Sir Thomas Audley, Custos Signilli, to Mr. Cromwell with the King at Calais, Oct. 15, (no year.) 149

(To be continued)

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 14.

I AM not at all surprised to see the illiberal reflections upon the great and good Bp. of Sarum by a Layman, inserted in your Magazine for October, being fully persuaded that there is not a tabernacle in the kingdom where the preachers are not continually extolling their own inherent righteousness, and degrading the clergy of the established church by the most bitter invectives. What mischief the distempered brain of these enthusiasts may bring upon the state as well as the church, time alone can discover. We may however conclude, that at all times unsettled principles and fantastic reveries in religion will be attended with the most pernicious consequences; and I am led to this conclusion from a passage in Dr. Grey's impartial Examination of Mr. Daniel Neale's History of the Puritans, vol. IV. p. 58, where it is asserted, that "The whole nation was considerably improved in sound knowledge, though Bp. Kennet and Mr. Echard are pleased to say, that heresies and blasphemies against heaven were swelled up to a most prodigious height."

And questionless so they were, notwithstanding Mr. Baxter's assertion to the contrary. Religion was then mere farce and grimace, as appeared by the villainous actions of the greatest pretenders to it; and it is an observation made by a learned person who lived in the times, and complied too much with them, in an affize sermon preached at Reading, 'that in the little town of Reading, he was verily persuaded, if Augustin's and Epiphanius's Catalogue of Heresies were lost, and all other modern and ancient records of that kind, yet it would be no hard matter to restore them with considerable enlargements from that place; that they have Anabaptism, Familism, Socinianism, Pelagianism, Ranting (and what not); and that the devil was served in heterodox assemblies as frequently as God in theirs; and that one of the most eminent church livings in that county was possessed by a blasphemer, and one in whose house he believed some there could testify, that the devil was as visibly familiar as any one of the family.' C—o—

* We have altered this signature, having another correspondent who signs Critic.

GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 12.

I COULD hardly help smiling when I read Rusticus's letter p. 255: Lord help the poor man! where can he live? He must have been rusticated a long time indeed if he would have what he says taken seriously! "Non-residence of the clergy a matter of just and general complaint, and ought to be redressed before any of our political grievances." What, of more consequence than the Westminster election or scrutiny, or an equal representation in parliament, or shortening the duration of it? Ask the reverend Mr. Wyvill, ask parson Horne, ask parson Bate Dudley. He then calls on the "non-resident clergy to shake off their sloth, and endeavour at least to prevent matters growing worse;" and asks, "if it can be supposed that the people in parishes so neglected will ever be brought to believe the knowledge and practice of religion is an affair of the last importance to them, whilst their clergyman is too idle to tell them so himself, and leaves it to be done by proxy?" I must again ask, where does this poor man live? Is he so ignorant of the world as to suppose that the care of the parishioners souls is what engages a clergyman to accept a living? Has a rector or vicar any thing more to do than to receive his tithes, and find a journeyman, or half, or a third, of a journeyman, who may jump into the desk, and read so much of the service as to protect his master from the bishop's notice? It is well known how common the practice of buying livings (by the intended incumbent) is become; and can it be supposed that such a one can find any thing stick in his throat after swallowing the oath which he must take in order to get possession? A living is an annuity, well secured, and the cheapest you can buy (as far as money considerations go); it qualifies you to hunt and shoot, and enables you to attend Bright-helmstone, or any place of amusement you like; and as to the souls of the parishioners, if they have any, let the Methodists look after them.

Your correspondent concludes with advice to "lay the conduct of such curates, whose behaviour is scandalous, before the bishop." Better and better! their lordships would be very much obliged to him indeed for troubling them about such low matters.

To be sure, there may have been a time time when the parochial clergy thought it their duty to pray and preach themselves, if in health, and not to confine their labours to the pulpit only, but to visit the sick or ignorant at their own dwellings,—when it would have been thought scandalous for a man who accepted a living to put in a curate, and go to reside himself as a curate elsewhere,—to have refused doing duty more than once a day,—to have undertaken the care of three or four churches, and kept a curate to assist in riding or running from one to another; nay, I have heard that there are instances of persons in these days who think it their duty to go round their parishes every week, administering to the spiritual as well as bodily wants of the poor; who are so unpolite to refuse receiving visitors on the days set apart for this purpose; who perform the service twice every Sunday on a small living, and who would not go from the bed of a strumpet, or the drunkenness of a Saturday-night's meeting, to the desk or the communion-table; but then these are few, they are people whom nobody knows. The world is in general enlightened (thanks to Voltaire, Gibbon, Hume, &c. &c.), liberality of sentiment is the word, the clergy are under no more restraints than laymen, and effectually avoid the odious character of hypocrites.

Let then your friend Mr. Rusticus enjoy his reveries, but do not let him produce such dreams to your polite readers. You, Mr. Urban, as well as he, will draw on yourself the censure of diffusing methodistical cant, and must expect to have your now universally approved Miscellany thrown by with contempt.

S. H.

Sua Cuique.

MR. URBAN,

A Writer who signs himself W. B. B. in your Magazine for February last, p. 86, has pointed out some strange mistakes in Dr. Jortin's excellent printed Sermons, which no one, not even Mr. Knox, who has given them and their author a high and just eulogium, can more admire, in general, than your present correspondent. But, as the publication was posthumous, for those mistakes not the author, but the editor, alone is accountable, who, as being more conversant with law than gospel, or divinity, should have submitted his father's MS. to the revision of some of his friends of that profession, and might thereby have avoided these and some other mistakes (shall I call them?) which shall now be mentioned.

In vol. III. (Dublin edition, 1767) Sermons XX and XXI are intituled, "Woman of Canaan," Matth. xv. 22. Of these the first is literally translated from the XIVth and XVth of L'Enfant (Amsterd. 1728), Sur la Cananéenne, Matth. xv. 21—28. The second indeed is new. In the same volume, Sermon XXV, on Proverbs xx. 12. is said, in a short note at the conclusion, to be "taken partly from one of L'Enfant"—but on comparing it with the IVth of that writer, on the same text, it appears to be neither more nor less than a close version of the whole. La Religion propose de deux sortes de vérités à notre méditation, &c. begins the Frenchman. "Religion proposes two sorts of truths to our meditation," &c. begins the Englishman, and so he traces his original, word for word, throughout. The XVIIth Sermon, on Matt. xi. 30. is also taken in a great measure from the IIId of L'Enfant, and Sermon XXIV in vol. IV. on 1 Pet. 5, 6, 7, totally from the Ist*.

I must now in like manner restore to another celebrated French divine three discourses in the IVth volume, which have also been inserted as originals, but which in truth are mere translations, as a comparison will shew. Sermon V, on 1 Cor. xv. 19. is a literal translation of the IXth; Sermon VI, on Genesis xix. 14. of the Ist; and Sermon XI, on Acts iii. 26. of the IVth of Ostervald (Geneve, 1725).

If the learned Archdeacon of London thought proper to preach the thoughts of others (however good, all distinguishably inferior to his own), he certainly did not mean to publish them as such, and therefore, in justice to his memory, it may reasonably be hoped that Mr. Rogers Jortin in future editions (of which there have been many, and more may be expected), will restore this property to its right owners, either by omitting or acknowledging it. Dr. Jortin wants no borrowed fame.

Yours, &c. PHILO-JORTIN.

* A Note on the XVIIth is, "Some of the following remarks are taken," &c. and in one on the XXIVth, "L'Enfant, Sermon I" is just referred to, as "Ostervald, Sermon I" is in a note on the VIth. Had this induced the editor to consult the originals, he would not have inserted these as such; and might then also have been led to trace the others. In other Sermons Beausobre, Stillingfleet, and other writers, are also referred to; but, not having compared them, I know not how closely they are copied.

Ma.

MR. URBAN.

YOUR correspondent R. C. (p. 725) has by no means cleared up my difficulty about the statue at Oxford, inscribed Aegidius Morettus Romanus faciebat. He says, the statue "was formerly called, by some learned men, Q. P. Maximus; the inscription having been read by them so as to make the whole nothing more than the name of the artist," &c. Is the latter half of this sentence a reason for the assertion in the former half? He goes on: "Aegidius Romanus is the known name of the general whom I suppose the statue to represent." Why so? Is not Egidius sufficient to distinguish the person represented by the statue, supposing it to be the general I before referred it to, without the epithet Romanus? I cannot therefore conceive the inscription to mean any thing more than the name of the sculptor, q. d. Giles Moretti, of Rome, made it. As to the person represented by the statue, that is a separate consideration.

I do not assent to the derivation of the Labarum, p. 726, as thinking it too much like the capricious explanation of the legends of ancient coins by P. Hardouin, in his edition of Pliny's Natural History. At the same time I confess my inability to supply the deficiency, or correct former explanations.

I apprehend the lord Rofs, your correspondent R, p. 732, enquires after, was William, 5th son of Thomas lord Rofs, who, 44 and 47 Edward III, was of the retinue of the Duke of Lancaster, and had summons to all the parliaments from 36 Edward III. to 7 Richard II, when he died on his journey to the Holy Land, and son of John, who died on a like expedition 17 Richard II. William, on his brother's death, was employed by Richard II, with Walter, Bishop of Durham, Henry Earl of Northumberland, and others, in the treaty of peace between the King and his adversaries the Scots, and he was appointed treasurer of England 4 Henry IV*. Shakspeare joins him in the same party with the Earl of Northumberland. If your correspondent who asks this question is a commentator on Shakspeare, perhaps he may have better luck than his predecessors, who in this play tell us one of the quartos for Gloucester's blood reads Woodstock's blood; as if the same person was not meant; and tell us where Plasby was full thirty pages too late.

The only shadow of a reason for the ring, fig. 2 in your last month's plate being Druidical, must be the snakes intertwined on it. It is rather of rude Saxon workmanship, such figures being frequently introduced in their bas-reliefs.

The ring, fig. 3 is not unlike one found in Corton parish, co. Dorset, engraved in Mr. Hutchins's History of that County, vol. I. p. 556, inscribed with the name of JESUS, thrice repeated.

The inscription on fig. 4 is to be read "Jesus Nazarenus Rex Judæorum." The five last letters are not so easily decyphered.

This is not an uncommon form of inscription, and there is a remarkable one in the same words, on the binge of Manassæ church in Essex, of which perhaps some of your correspondents may be induced to favour you with a fac simile copy, as I have never yet seen it published. The concluding words of that inscription are equally obscure.

Fig. 5 is an old jetton, or counter, exhibited by Mr. Snelling in his Pl. II. 29, with some little variation of legend, which, however, should be read,

"Jesus Christus Dominus laudetur,
"Resurrexit Dominus."

Fig. 6 is a Nuremberg token, the legends and repetitions different from any in Snelling's Pl. IV.

The seal-ring bears the impression of what is commonly called a merchant's mark, such as they put on bales of goods, and the initials of the owner's name, H. C. P.

A print of the pulpit at Paul's Cross* may be seen in the title of "St. Paul's Church her Bill for the Parliament. Lond. 1621." By Henry Farley, a madman, who got into Ludgate by his schemes about the repairs of that cathedral†; and another view of it, on a larger scale, in that old painting described in your 14th volume, p. 179—181, which was probably another effort of Farley's, and, being bought at a country sale for a few shillings, was repurchased; for FIFTEEN GUINEAS, by the treasurer of the Antiquary Society, who reimbursed him, and fixed it up in their library. I do not know whether a view of the pulpit be prefixed to Bp. King's Sermon, preached in it on occasion of James the First's visit to it.—

* See a print of it in the present Month's Magazine, p. 810. EDITOR.

† See Brit. Top. I. 608.

* See Dugd. Bar. I. 550, 551.

There

There is a drawing of it in the Papyrus Library*.

Your correspondent BICKERSTAFFE has grievously mistaken the black letter mark for et, or and, or for a seemingly capital I, or a sign of the cross. The inscriptions, as far as they are not reversed, may be read

———— barkar &
& rafe wilson — Blakwyn asabys.

Plans of the Houses of Parliament have been engraved by Pine; but we should be obliged to your correspondent that would furnish one of Westminster-Hall, cum pertinentiis. P. Q.

MR. URBAN,

THE mention of the dispute about Options on occasion of the death of the late Dr. Chapman, induces me to send you an abstract of a pamphlet printed, not published, pendente lite †, intitled, “The Option, &c.” Q. P.

Abstract of “The Option: or, an Enquiry into the Grounds of the Claim made by the Archbishop on all consecrated or translated Bishops, &c. 1756,” 4to.; upon Abp. Herring’s demand of the rectory of St. George’s, Hanover-square, on the translation of Bp. Sherlock to London, 1748, who refused to sign the grant thereof, binding his Executors and Assigns.

A copy of these papers was sent to the person principally concerned [the Abp. above-mentioned], Dec. 28, 1749, and returned Feb. 16 following, to which some few additions were since made. Pref.

After this follows a N. B. that the author [Bp. Sherlock] let the affair drop from Feb. 16, 1749, to Aug. 21, 1756; and then sent a printed copy with the additions to the Abp. when he knew his grace’s health prevented his giving an answer to it ‡. One was, however, drawn up by one of the first lawyers in the kingdom [Paul Jodrell, Esq.], and deposited in the Abp’s hands, and when produced will shew that this author stands very much in need of that light which, he says, he could not procure, and without which he has not done full justice to his argument.

OPTION is a word unknown in common or civil law, and in the abp’s registers.

No abp. in the Christian church but the abp. of Canterbury, and, in imitation of him, the abp. of York, claimed the right, and that probably in virtue of the legatine power annexed to the see of Canterbury.

Abp. of Canterbury had by ancient usage a custom to claim preferment from the new bp. for a clerk of his own.

Abp. Winchelsea contulit gratiam [so the term is] Reginaldi epi. Wig. quam tenetur facere ratione consecrationis sue dno G. Bruton ||. 1308 and 1309, the bps. of Exeter’s and of Ely’s gratia. These were free gifts to the abp. for his trouble, afterwards considered as dues, like papal provisions.

Gratia in the registers is a promise of preferment from a nobleman, by which a title for ordination is obtained.

Hence 1^o the abp’s claim was only for consecration.

2^o he could only nominate to the new bp. the person to be provided for.

3^o the new bp. was to be judge of the competency of the benefice, and of the pension to be allowed in the mean time.

Abp. Reynolds claimed this of the

* See Brit. Top. II: 613.

† This is a mistake. These were two litigations that had not the least connection. In the one, Abp. Potter’s right was undisputed, and the question only turned on the conduct of Dr. Chapman in the execution of his trust. This originated in 1759, on the death of Dr. Trimmell, whose precentorship of Lincoln was the option disputed. The other (as mentioned above) in 1748, between persons, and on an occasion, totally different, in which the Abp’s right to options on translated bishops was absolutely denied and arraigned. Bp. Sherlock printed only 50 copies in 8vo. Abp. Herring reprinted it in 4to. with a short answer by Mr. Jodrell and Archdeacon Denne (it is supposed); and the matter was compromised by his grace’s consenting to wave his demand of St. George’s, and to accept St. Anne’s, Westminster, to which (on the death of Dr. Pelling in 1750) he presented Dr. Squire. See Anecdotes of Buryer, p. 469. As an acknowledgement to Mr. Jodrell for his gratuitous assistance, the Abp. bequeathed to his brother his option of Dr. Denne’s archdeaconry of Rochester. EDIT.

‡ Abp. Herring died March 13, 1757.

|| Regist. Winchelsea. Two more instances in the archiepiscopal registers relative to Bath and Wells.

bp. of St. Asaph post confirmationem, not RATIONE confirmationis, and admission of his clerk to any prebend or a pension, and was refused.

The bp. of St. David's grants by deed to abp. Warham "primam et proximam advocacionem primæ et proximæ prebendæ seu alterius beneficii, to present a fit person for one turn only." The first instance of such grant by deed and acceptance. But here is no particular benefice specified.

In Cranmer's register, among the fees for confirmation and consecration is "the disposition of the first prebend that becometh void after consecration, by advowson to be granted to the abp."

This is the utmost of the abp's claim; and is expressly limited to consecration, and not extended to translation; he has no pretence to chuse a particular benefice, and the grant is by advowson.

The grants both to Pole and Parker run "apo consecratori meo." Cranmer, 1541, seems to have attempted to extend the right to translated bishops, in the case of Knight then consecrated bp. of Bath and Wells. The grant on the occasion, published in Oughton's Formulary, if genuine, was not executed, but the original one. In the other in which translatio is mentioned, it is awkwardly inserted, and in the deed on the bp. of St. David's consecration changed into "post postulationem," though there was no such thing as postulation in Cranmer's time, nor could it be used in the option claim. This claim was first exerted on Thirlby's translation from Westminster to Norwich 1550, probably he having no benefice to grant at consecration. It was inserted in the deeds of consecrated bishops, who admitted it as not affecting themselves. It dropped in Pole's time, and ever since; yet the present deeds run upon the old plan of granting post confirmationem, which anciently denoted only the time of demanding, but is now understood as if every bishop only consecrated, and not consecrated, was bound to it. In Pole's and before Cranmer's time no translated bp. had or could have even confirmation from the abp.

But Parker's deeds extended to dig-nities, of which there is only one instance, and that in Cranmer's time, to his executors; and sometimes binding the bp's successors, or for a term of 21 years. These last may be private agreements, and the other to avoid the chance of taking the worst or giving the worst benefice.

Of late some of the abp's officers have intimated to the bp. what benefice was expected; but the deed, pared at Lambeth, gives a right in the abp. to chuse the grantee expressing it to satisfactionem of the old cl the abp. may accept the c or demand the old custom these grants is the act of a single bp. binding only himself, but a new form was soon introduced, expressing the grant to be a compensation for an old right, and so the abp. claimed a compensation instead of his right.

All the grants to Grindal are from consecrated bps. except Piers bp. of Rochester, who was so soon removed to Salisbury that he perhaps had no time

Bancroft took t for consecration : they were made for his assigns, and he his clerk as soon as 1 to successors, and new bp. judging satisfaction he would n of which Barlow, presely by another ings in his own gif cence to hold in probably occasioned the abp. the first d the Reg. f. 36. da 273. after deeds dated itself 1605.

Abbot left off the clause "for 21 years," but not that "for successors," and introduced another, that "if the first turn of the benefice he chose should be granted away by the bp. or his predecessors, the 2d, 3d, 4th, and so on, should be the abp's," which is continued with enlargements and improvements.

From his time the grants have not varied much, except that it being discovered

vered that a bp. could not by law grant for his successors, this practice was discontinued.

Popish abps. could not take such grants, because the council of Lateran forbids even promising beneficium vivit et superstitis hominis; though the first prebend that fell might be granted, a particular one could not; and cardinal legates, much less abps., could not make reservations on dignities.

Protestant abps. varied their forms:

1. Naming a clerk to the bp. to provide for,
2. the first void prebend was claimed

, and er to it not nd af-time;

;
flom.
subject ich is under 3 or 4
an u-ich it opped

ve the ks fit; s time in the signs,

e abp.
ase of -mennporal
y tem-d even

to executors and administrators; and so it actually was soon after, and executors and administrators added to assigns in the deed itself.

The instances of abps. presenting to prebends and dignities in provincial churches were by virtue of papal bulls of provision, and do not affect the point in question.

The right in this case might be rested upon this comparison between the claim set up against the provincial bps. of late days, and the ancient practice and custom verified from the authority of the Canterbury registers. We are now to consider how far the claim of an option, as now understood and practised, consists with the law of the realm.

The act passed 25 Hen. VIII. [the year after Cranmer's consecration, and the first of his sitting in parliament] against payment of annates, and concerning electing and consecrating abps. and bps., empowered them to take and recover such temporal and spiritual profits as had been by usage and custom appropriated to their sees. Supposing Cranmer to have collected an account of these profits, and entered it in his registers, and among the rest the Option as a consecration fee, it must be admitted as decisive evidence of what was the ancient custom.

In the act 1 Edw. VI. by which the king's letters patent supersede the consue d'elire, election, and confirmation, is a clause securing to the abp. and all others the accustomed fees, and another clause provides that no more than such be taken.

The act 21 Hen. VIII. c. 19. puts all our ecclesiastical laws under the examination of the king and 32 commissioners by him appointed; the ancient canons and constitutions under some restrictions being still to be used as they were before this act. As the former part for reforming the ecclesiastical laws was never carried into execution, they subsist in virtue of this proviso. It has been determined that no canon or constitution can now be used that was not used before 25 Hen. VIII. and the proof is put upon the ecclesiastical court, to shew that they have used any law in question, as they now use it, before the act. Both clauses being couched in the same terms, must not the same judgement be made upon both cases?

Sir J. Strange was of opinion the abp. had no legal claim upon new bps., and grounds his opinion on the acts before recited; but he thought uninterrupted usage from Bancroft's time a much stronger foundation for a claim upon translated ones. "For though (he lays) from the accounts of the matter before this time, there are strong reasons to conclude the claim was originally confined to consecrated bps., the use of the word confirmation in the case of a translated bp., and the subsequent usage and expressions pressions in the grants themselves incline me to think this claim not now to be got over."

• But all translations of bps. are contrary to the canon law, and a dean and chapter could not elect for their bp. one already a bp., but must petition the pope for a dispensation, and this was called Postulatio, and the bp. Postulatus. A consecration could not be repeated, the abp. had nothing to do in this case, and as there was no election, there could be no confirmation; in the registers there was entered only a mandate from the pope to the abp. to deliver the jurisdiction to the translated bp., which according to custom the abp. had seized during the vacancy. As the pope who was prime agent in this transaction claimed no fee, still less could the abp.

MR. URBAN,

THE massacre of the protestants in France on St. Bartholomew's day, which proclaimed the court of France the most perfidious that ever was in the world, concerted by a bloody and violent prince, who wanted fortitude to carry it into execution till instigated by his mother Catherine de Medicis and the Duke of Guise, has been branded with every stigma it deserves by contemporary as well as later writers. The event of so violent and execrable a measure must soon have exposed the fallacy of its intention, considered in a political light. None but Naude, a catholic writer, justified it*. All the princes of Europe beheld it with the utmost abhorrence, except the Pope (Greg. XIII.) and the K. of Spain (Philip II.), who seemed to approve it. They gave thanks to heaven for it by processions and public prayers. The former, whose approbation has been supposed to be purely political, struck a medal on it, "reversing his stern effigies with a representation of that base and anti-christian murder of the admiral, the words HUGO-NOTORUM STRAGES †."

A more open avowal of it than even his processions and public prayers, and the indulgences which he granted on the occasion. The illustrious and learned Thuanus ‡ tells us, "that nothing might be wanting to complete the madness of the times, the example of the ancient emperors was made subservient to this detestable action. Medals were struck with the King seated on his throne, and an inscription," &c. &c.

The inclosed translation of a very curious book purchased at the Duke de Valliere's sale last year establishes this fact beyond contradiction, and gives plates of the medals, which you are at liberty to copy for your valuable miscellany. P. Q.

The title of this book in the original runs thus:

"Figure et exposition des pourtraicts, et dictions contenuz es medailles de la conspiration des rebelles en France opprimee et estaincte par le Roy, Tres-Chrestien Charles IX. le 24 iour, d'Aoust. 1572. Par Nic. Favayer, conseiller dudit Sieur, et general de ses monnoyes. A Paris chez Jean Dallier, sur le pont S. Michel a la Rose blanche, 1572, avec privilege."

Explanation of two sorts of medals struck by the king's command.

"SIRE,

"After your Majesty was pleased to express your satisfaction in the patterns which I presented of the two sorts of medals to be struck both in gold and silver, as a perpetual memorial of your rebellious subjects against the divine majesty and your royal majesty, which God, the protector of this crown, by his grace discovered to you, and inspired the means of extinguishing in your city of Paris, the 24th day of Aug. last, in 24 hours, as by his immediate interposition. What it would have been impossible for the power of man to have compassed in 10 years, and even by four pitched battles, the most just opportunity of doing presented itself by Gaspar de Colligni, late admiral of France, two days before having been wounded by a and serious occasions, raillery on medals being not then in use," adds, "we find no such sharp and provoking instances in noble medals which were lasting, and had been of equal consequence, to the keeping up of eternal feuds, and glorying in acts of cruelty; such as is that medal of Pope Greg. XIII. reversed with the representation of those inhuman butcheries committed on so many thousands of innocent and brave persons as perished in the Parisian massacre." And another, commemorating the revocation of the edict of Nantz.

* In his "Considerations politiques sur les coups d'etat, p. 124, &c.

† Evelyn's Numismata, p. 169.

‡ Hist. l. 3. A. D. 1572. Mr. Evelyn (Numism. p. 25.) after enumerating various medals of antiquity "impressed on grave musket in the hands and in one arm by a soldier whom he had formerly offended: he was not content with your kind wife, nor the satisfaction of justice which you promised him, but threatened to avenge himself, saying, that if his arm was wounded, his head was not; so that the next day he held a secret council against your Majesty, the Queen your mother, Messieurs your brothers and the princes, contrary to his league; which being discovered was prevented the Sunday following at day-break by the speedy execution of him the head, and his principal accomplices.

"I have considered, Sire, that, as these number of pieces can be distributed among but a few princes and potentates both foreign and of your own realm, it would be proper, in order both to explain the medals to them, and to extend to all succeeding nations and ages the knowledge of so memorable a fact, to reduce it to writing, and, if you please, to publish it."

Description of two Medals.

The better to express, after the example of ancient kings by medals, the oppression of the said Colligni, late admiral of France, and his accomplices, and to leave a testimony of it to posterity, the popular medal contains the figure of K. Cha. IX. seated on his royal throne, holding in one hand his sceptre, and in the other a drawn sword, round a palm branch, with a close crown on; under his feet the is rebellions subjects. the circumference is, ILLES seu perduelles, aut nefaria seditionis reverse are the arms ie two columns of the assumed by the king, I, PIETAS EXCITA-

VIT IVSTITIAM; meaning that piety towards God and true religion raised the sword of royal justice against the rebels. On the two pillars are two olive-wreaths, signifying peace obtained by the reduction of the rebels, and near them two branches of laurel, expressive of triumph after victory. The letter T in the word Excitavit in the legend is contrived to be on the point of the crown, representing the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, and among the Jews consummation, as being their final letter, as we hope this blow will prove to the new sect: Then it was, as a true enign to the soldiers of the Christian church, worn from that 24th day as a signal in the hats of the good catholics and loyal subjects of his majesty, as Ezekiel saw it marked by the angels on the foreheads of the faithful.

The other medal, after the ancient fashion, contains the king's head after the life, with his arms, and the inscription in French, Charles IX. R. D. F. Dampneur des Rebelles le vingt-quatrieme Aoust, 1572. On the reverse is represented Hercules in his lion's skin, holding his club armed with iron in one hand, and in the other a flaming torch, with which he is destroying the many-headed hydra, whose heads as fast as they were cut off, were succeeded by others, representing the faction of these rebels, which, notwithstanding many of their leaders were cut off, recovered itself, and thrice renewed open war, and in a fourth instance formed this secret attempt. But for their extirpation not only sword and fire, but water and the halter, were employed, which are added on the edge of this medal. Thus was satisfaction made to God, the king, and his people, and to all the principal sovereigns and potentates of Christendom, as they shewed by public processions, bonfires, and other demonstrations of joy.

These medals were presented to the king on Wednesday the 3d of Sept. 1572, by the said Favyot the inventor.

Privilege.

John Dallier, bookseller in the city of Paris, is permitted to print, and cause to be printed, the explanation of the medals struck on the suppression of the conspiracy and the rebellion; and all other booksellers and printers are forbidden to print the same medals without the consent of the said Dallier, on pain of forfeiting the said books, and an arbitrary fine. Given at Paris, Oct. 14, 1572. Signed, SEGVIER.

PHILO-HISTORICUS desires our correspondents versed in Heroic History to give some memoirs on the rise of romance, romantic adventures, and particularly on those popular books (what time they were written), The Seven Champions—Cleopatra—Valentine and Orson—Parisinus Prince of Bohemia—Fortunatus—The Shoemaker's Glory, &c. &c.

MR. URBAN,

NOT thinking, with A. JACOB, p. 595, that the name of President Bradshaw will shock his surviving relations, if he has any (which I much doubt), I present you with a few anecdotes I have lately collected concerning him, and which may serve as an appendix to those already given in your valuable Magazine. When the Parliament appointed him President of the High Court of Justice, they assigned him a guard for the security of his person, and the Dean's house at Westminster for his habitation, together with £. 5000 in money. It is not my intention to defend the proceedings of that Court; but I cannot help thinking, that the part which Bradshaw took is not, in any degree, more infamous than that of the rest. To preserve the dignity of his office made him more conspicuous than some others, and more the object of the Royalists' resentment; yet it is very evident he had not more recourse against the King than Cromwell and Ireton, nor was half so instrumental in bringing him to the block. We learn, from Sir Roger Manley, that on the morning before Bradshaw passed sentence on the King, his wife rushed into his chamber, and falling upon her knees besought him, 'That he would have nothing to do with his Majesty, nor sentence this earthly king, for fear of the dreadful sentence of the King of Heaven. You have no child,' continued she, 'and why should you do such a monstrous act to favour others?' To which Bradshaw replied, "I confess he has done me no harm; nor will I do him any, but what the law commands." Was there any person who sat in the High Court of Justice who would not have condemned the King, in case Bradshaw had declined it? We must not forget that even Ingoldsby, who was created a knight of the Bath by Charles the Second, before his restoration, signed the warrant for beheading the first Charles; and also divers others, who were taken into favour afterwards, approved of the King's execution. The author of the Life of Mr. John Barwick informs us, that President Bradshaw was by no means pleased with Cromwell's usurping the government, as it was most clearly his desire to have a commonwealth established. He even spoke respectfully of the royal authority exercised within those bounds prescribed by law, which is a plain proof that he acted entirely out of principle in the part which he took in his sovereign's condemnation. He was turned out of his post of President by Oliver Cromwell; and was succeeded in his office by John Lisle, Esq. whose lady fell a victim to the unrelenting cruelty of Judge Jefferies. Other persons, of the name of Bradshaw, were active in the cause of the Parliament. A Colonel Henry Bradshaw sat on the court-martial which tried the Earl of Derby at Chester in 1651. A nephew of President Bradshaw was agent for the Parliament at Hamburg; from whence he was sent to Copenhagen, to demand the release of some English merchant ships which were detained by the King of Denmark. Heath's Chronicle, p. 334.—Whilst he was at Copenhagen, a conspiracy was formed against him, to murder him. See a particular account in Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. II: p. 485, et seq.—A. JACOB may perhaps be pleased to be informed, that some of the Bradshaws were eminently loyal; I will not deny him the pleasure. A John Bradshaw was ejected by the Parliament Commissioners from the vicarage of St. Paul's in Bedford; as was a James Bradshaw from the vicarage of Chalfont St. Peter's, in the county of Bucks. Not only the Bradshaws were on both sides the question: Gregory Clement, one of the King's judges, who suffered death at the Restoration, had a brother, Robert Clement, who, for his attachment to the King, was deprived of the rectory of Dinnington, in Somersetshire. Other instances might be given.

GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

There can be no reason for supposing that President Bradshaw died at Barbadoes, or at any other place abroad; and, if I mistake not, Mr. A. G. does not mean to say that it was the President who retired to Barbadoes, to avoid persecution, but that it was one of his descendants. I find no mention of the President in History after the death of Oliver Cromwell, who died in 1658, one year before Bradshaw, whose infirmities perhaps prevented him from engaging in business for some time before death put an end to his life and labours. The restoration of Charles II. was not determined upon at so early a period as the President's decease. Indeed, if it had, it would not have been unnatural for Bradshaw, in imitation of Ludlow, and some other of the judges of the first Charles, to have left his native country, in search of a place of refuge. Switzerland, or some other independent state, would certainly have been his choice; and it is, in my opinion, a great insult to the good sense and penetration of Bradshaw, to suppose that he would have chosen an English settlement in the West Indies as a place of refuge against the fury of the King of England.—With respect to the Epitaph*, is it common for those who die at Barbadoes to be buried at Jamaica? Cannot Barbadoes find room enough for its own dead? Would the ministers of Charles II. have suffered one of his father's judges to remain quiet in an island which was entirely in the king's power? Certainly not. They would have taken him from his retreat, and butchered him with the same barbarity as they did Harrison and his companions. So many unlikely circumstances attend this supposed retiring and concealment of Bradshaw, that even if no historian had mentioned him after the beheading of Charles I, I could not have believed it. In the present case, the death of Bradshaw in England is recorded by so many contemporary writers; and the mean and brutal revenge of Charles II. is also so well ascertained; that I cannot see how W. N. or any other person can entertain the least doubt. Even the sagacity of Mr. Walpole would here be exercised in vain to find out a foundation on which to build an hypothesis, and form conjectures in the place of true history; not but that I think there are many circumstances recorded of Richard III. (though not of Bradshaw) which Mr. Walpole, or any other person, may pronounce to be fictitious and absurd.

some

A letter in my possession, written by a gentleman in London to his friend in the Country, dated Jan. 31, 1660, has these words:—"Yesterday Nol, Bradshaw, and Ireton, were hanged at Tyburn." Of the last person, who was as great a man as Bradshaw, some memoirs would be very acceptable. I wish also to know whether any original portraits of Ireton and Bradshaw are now existing, and should be glad to see them preserved from oblivion by means of your valuable Magazine. Yours, &c. B. R.

P. S. It has already been proved, that Bradshaw was not born in Wales. His magnificent interment in Westminster-Abbey (of which I hope Mr. Ayscough will favour the world with a particular account from the Mercurius and Intelligencers preserved in the Museum) is also very well authenticated.

MR. URSAN,

I supposed the evidence which I produced of the time of President Bradshaw's death had been sufficiently conclusive, but I observe that one of your correspondents seems still to retain his doubts. As a farther evidence, give me leave to produce an extract from a copy of Smith's Obituary, which seems to be the only ground remaining on which a doubt can be formed of the day of his death, and that an error, which must have proceeded from Mr. Peck or Mr. Baker, from whose abstract he copied it, has been the occasion of it. The MS. which I now make use of is in the Sloanian Collection, N^o 886, "A Catalogue of all such persons deceased whom I knew in their life-time, wherein are set down the several years of our Lord and the days of the month when every

* The original of the following epitaph is engraven upon a cannon at the summit of a steep hill near Martha Bray in Jamaica. (See Memoirs of Mr. Hallis, vol. II. p. 789.)

"STRANGER,
Ere thou pass, contemplate this cannon,
Nor regardless be told
That near its base lies deposited the dust
Of JOHN BRADSHAW;
Who, nobly superior to selfish regards,
Despising alike the pageantry of courtly splendour,
The blast of calumny,
And the terrors of royal vengeance,
Presided in the illustrious band of Heroes and Patriots,
Who fairly and openly adjudged
CHARLES STUARD,
Tyrant of England,

To a public and exemplary death;
Thereby presenting to the amazed world,
And transmitting down through applauding ages,
The most glorious example
Of unshaken Virtue,
Love of Freedom,
And impartial Justice,
Ever exhibited on the blood-stained theatre
Of human actions.
Oh, Reader, pass not on,
Till thou hast blest his memory,
And never, never forget,
That REBELLION TO TYRANTS IS OBEDIENCE TO GOD."

† Perhaps some friend at Cambridge will oblige your readers with an abstract from Baker's MS. volume, that it may be known on whom to lay the mistake.

"one of them dyed or were buried, from the year 1628, successively, to 1675." 1659.

"Oct. 31. Mr. John Bradshaw, Judge of the Sheriff's Court in Guildhall, who pronounced sentence of death upon his Sovereign, died afterwards rediged, and his head sett upon a pole over Westminster as a traitor."

As to the historic doubt, whether he was actually buried at Westminster, or his body clandestinely removed by the undertaker to Barbadoes, or to surgeon Sheldon's, it is a matter of no consequence; and therefore I shall not trouble your correspondents with any disquisition on the subject.

Perhaps I may, at a future time, give some extracts from this MS, as I observe that there are many more persons mentioned in it than in Peck; and as names occur in Peck, which are not in this MS, I conclude them both to have been only extracts. S. AYS COUGH.

MR. URBAN, Chesterfield, Aug. 28.

I HAVE observed, in several of your Magazines, very different, and even inconsistent, accounts of the birth-place and family-seat of President Bradshaw, and waited to see if any true narrative would appear. The short relation inserted in your last February Magazine, signed M. Y. K. gave me much satisfaction, because it is most assuredly right.

I was born in the neighbourhood of Marple, the family residence, and remember the last Mr. Bradshaw, who died, I suppose, more than fifty years ago. It was a tradition, generally embraced, that the President's estate never descended lineally after his time, but always collaterally: and as the common people (you well know) are very liberal dispensers of the Divine wrath, so they considered this event as a judgement of God upon the family for the concern which the President had in the King's death. I never was at Marple Hall, but have often travelled near it. It is situated at the distance of 2 or 3 small inclosures from the high road that passes through the centre of Marple liberty, and has the appearance of an ancient, substantial stone building: close adjoining to the road is an old summer-house, with a dial, and the common motto, Sic transit gloria mundi! The Bradshaw male line failing, the estate passed to a Mr. Pimlott; and he also dying without male issue, it is now in the possession of Mr. Isherwood.

M. Y. K.'s information of the late Mr. Watton's design of publishing many particulars relative to the President, is highly probable, as he was not only an inquisitive and scientific gentleman, but also very happily situated for making such enquiry, because Marple Hall is distant only about four miles from the town of Stockport, of which he was rector.

During the life-time of the late Mr. Bradshaw, John (who was not very wise, as will appear in the sequel) lived in the neighbourhood, and was employed every day at the hall in affairs suited to his capacity; such as cleaning shoes, assisting in the stables, going on errands, &c. One afternoon Mr. B. ordered John to come early in the morning, to go for him to Mr. Leigh's†, of High Leigh, about an affair that was in agitation betwixt them two, and gave him a strict charge not to fail. John promised punctual obedience, and accordingly came to the hall very early, but finding no person up, and the morning being fine, he thought it mere waste of time to stay for Mr. B.'s rising, and therefore (very wisely as he thought) immediately set out for High Leigh; arrived there before Mr. Leigh was stirring, and became exceedingly importunate with the servants to introduce him to their master; declaring that he came from Marple that morning, and such was the importance of his business, that he must speak to Mr. Leigh himself, and could not wait for his getting up. The servants were very unwilling to disturb their master; but John was so extremely urgent, that at last one of them went up, and informed his master of what the man had said, and of his great impatience to be admitted. Mr. L. rather alarmed lest any thing was amiss with his friend at Marple, ordered him to be brought up stairs into his bed-chamber. John, as soon as he saw him, making his best bow and scrape, said, "Good morrow to ye, Mr. Lee * Lee †; my master, Mr. Bradshaw, sends his service § to ye, and last night desired me to come to you, very early this morning, about the affair that is between you two." "What, John, have you brought no letter, or more

* I have forgot his surname.

† Pronounced Lee and High Lee.

‡ The vulgar method of pronouncing.— John thought Mr. Leigh's name was the same as his place of residence.

§ The word compliments was not then become fashionable.

“particular message from your master, to inform me concerning the business you are come about?” “No, an’t please your worship; my master does not always acquaint me with his business, nor did I think it necessary to tell him this morning, that I might be here the sooner, or else mayhaps he might have told me something about it; but I think it not right to pry into master’s secrets; and I suppose you knows much better than me what I come for, as my master said it was a matter acting betwixt you two; and I shall be glad to go back as soon as your worship pleases.” Mr. Leigh, smiling at his egregious simplicity, directed his servant to give John whatever meat and drink he chose to have, and lay meditating in what manner he should dismiss the simpleton. After revolving the matter for some time in his mind, it occurred to him, apropos, that a heavy grindstone had lain useless in his orchard for several years. He therefore ordered his servants, as soon as John was sufficiently refreshed, to bind this stone upon his back, in such a manner that he himself could not possibly unloose it; desiring that his service might be given to Mr. Bradshaw, and he had sent it by the bearer. John suffers himself to be thus enormously loaded, and sets out on his return with great glee, in a hot, broiling summer’s day, for Marple, which was at the distance of about twenty miles. Mr. Leigh, afraid of John being over-powered and hurt by his mauly load, directed one of his servants to follow him several miles upon the road, at a proper distance, to see that no harm came to him from this unlucky trick: but John marched on so lustily with his uncommon burthen as totally removed every apprehension of that nature, and in due time he arrived safe at his journey’s end, with only resting once or twice at a stile. But, being very much fatigued, he sat down in the hall, and fell fast asleep; soon after which, Mr. B., passing through the hall, awakens John in some displeasure, demanding why he did not come in the morning, according to order, to go to High Leigh. As soon as John had rubbed his eyes open, and perceived who it was that interrogated him so sharply, he jumped up, and hastily exclaimed, “I’ve been, I’ve been, Sir; and he has sent it, he has sent it; and I’ve brought it, I’ve brought it, Sir.” “Brought what?” replies Mr. B.—The particulars being explained, and the grindstone shewn to Mr. B., he was highly entertained with the laughable contrivance of his friend Mr. Leigh, and the almost incredible simplicity of John. For some time the stone was shewn, and the above account given, to all Mr. B.’s visitors, as a memorial of John’s great weakness of mind, but most uncommon strength of body; for it was generally supposed that very few men were capable of performing the same. By the lapse of time, perhaps both the stone and the story may be now forgotten at Marple Hall, though I have often heard this account related within a mile or two of the place.

In Cheshire and Lancashire the Foomart [see p. 732] (an almost imperceptible difference in the pronunciation) is a very common animal. It is neither the weasel or the pole-cat, as supposed in the marginal note; but the true name of it is the Fillemart, the description of which may be found in the natural histories of animals. The hunting of it in the aforesaid counties is a common diversion amongst the lower sort of people, who have a peculiar breed of dogs for this purpose. They are very keen, and bite hard; of a pale or light brown colour; of the terrier kind; and are there known by the general appellation of Foomart Dogs. This diversion is always followed in the night-time; and those who are once initiated are said to be extremely fond of the sport.

If I mistake not, Mr. Urban, you are fond of recording any uncommon custom, in order to perpetuate the remembrance of it. I therefore take the liberty of mentioning the following one. At the village of Findern, in Derbyshire, situated near the mid-way betwixt Derby and Burton, the boys and girls go, every year, in the evening of the second of November (being All Souls day), to the adjoining common, and light up a number of small fires amongst the furze growing there, and call them by the name of Tindles. Upon enquiring into the origin of this custom amongst the inhabitants of the place, they suppose it to be a relique of popery, and that the professed design of it, when first instituted, was to light souls out of purgatory; but as the commons have been inclosed there very lately, that has most probably put an end to the custom, for want of the wonted materials. A. B.

Recipe for all Kinds of Agues.

Take two table-spoonfuls of the juice extracted from sage, and an equal quantity of vinegar, and let the patient swallow the dose when the fit comes on.

GERMAN

GERMAN LITERATURE.

114. Oberon. Une Poëme, heroi-comique, Traduite d'Allemand de M. Wieland. Par M. de Boaton. Berlin.

THE original Oberon has the highest reputation in Germany, being deemed, by the best judges, one of the most perfect poems of its kind in any language. But such is the facetious elegance of the original, that it seems very difficult to transfuse it. M. de Boaton, however, has succeeded beyond expectation. The author, M. Wieland, who was formerly preceptor to the Duke de Wiemar, is allowed to be the greatest genius now in Germany, being a perfect Proteus, and knowing how to assume all forms; but in versification, and in the art of relating and of painting, he is unique and inimitable. His compositions, both in verse and prose, are very numerous. Oberon is in the stanza of our Fairy Queen, and from the character it bears on the Continent, and from the specimens we have seen of it, it would give us great pleasure to be able to announce a good English translation; though we could wish that some of the scenes were less voluptuous, and that his principles had no tendency to the fashionable scepticism of the age. These a translator of different principles will soften or omit.

115. The Confession of Faith of the Princess Frederica, eldest Daughter of the Prince of Prussia. Published by Order of the Court. By F. G. Sack. With Six Sermons. Berlin.

THIS publication (in German) is by Mr. Sack, jun. (whose former Sermons we mentioned in vol. LIII. p. 686), one of the King's chaplains, who instructed her Royal Highness in the principles of christianity, and received her to the communion. The Confession, which is only 30 pages, would interest our divines, if well translated.

116. The Moral Duties of Cicero. Translated by M. Garve. Berlin.

THIS translation of Cicero de Officiis is also in German. M. Garve is a philosopher of the first rank. The remarks and dissertations which he has annexed do him great honour, and deserve to be universally known. M. Garve undertook this work at the desire of the King, who, in his last journey to Breslau, where the author resides, expressed his entire approbation, and made him a gratuity.

117. Familiar Letters on Religion. Berlin.

THIS work, in German too, but anonymous, is one of the best apologies for religious principles in general that ever was written. The author does not enter into the controversy with the Deists, but seems to confine himself to the Atheists.

118. Memoirs of the Life of Voltaire. Berlin.

THOUGH this infamous libel, we are told, was seized on its first publication at Paris, the great Frederick has exhibited a fresh instance of his magnanimity, in suffering not only the original, but this German translation, to be publicly sold to his subjects in his own capital. The liberty of the press would hardly extend so far even in England.

119. Epitome of Philosophical Transactions. Volume LXXIV. For the Year 1784. Part I. 4to.

ART. I. An Observation of the Variation of Light in the Star Algol. By Sir Henry C. Englefield, Bart. F. R. S.

This observation, in which Mr. Aubert agreed, was made June 10, 1783. It fully confirms "the fact of the diminution of Algol, and the accuracy of the period fixed by Mr. Goodricke (see p. 691), as the phenomenon was certainly within half an hour of the time fixed by Mr. G. which, divided on eight periods, gives only an error of 4 minutes in the length of it; and a nearer coincidence in a matter of this nature is not to be expected."

ART. II. Observations on the Obscuration of the Star Algol, by Palitch, a Farmer. Communicated by the Count de Bruhl, F. R. S.

M. Cansler, one of the Elector of Saxony's librarians, transmitted this account. Palitch, a farmer of Prolitz, a village near Dresden, saw the greatest obscuration of Algol on Sept. 12, 1783, at 8 h. P. M.; Oct. 2 and 5, some minutes before 7, "when he judged it nearly of the size of a star of the 4th magnitude." At a quarter past 10, it had nearly recovered its usual brilliancy and size. He estimates the period of that remarkable phenomenon at 2 days, 20 hours, and 53 minutes.

ART. III. Farther Observations upon Algol. By the same.

Oct. 22, 22, and 29, Palitch saw this obscuration.

obscuraton again. He now thinks the period a minute less, viz. "2 days, 20 hours, and 52 minutes."

ART. IV. Description of the King's Wells at Sheerness, Landguard Fort, and Harwich. By Sir Thomas Hyde Page, Knt. F.R.S.

These works have long engaged the attention of the publick, and have been frequently mentioned in our Magazine (see vol. LII. p. 405, &c.).

"The dock-yard and garrison of "Sheerness" being "supplied with "water from Chatham, at an enormous "expence, (near 2000l. per annum,) "or occasionally from Queenborough, "neither of which supplies could be "continued in case of a siege, which of "course would be of short duration," an experiment, which seemed scarce likely to succeed, but which his Majesty, when he visited Sheerness, and saw the well, highly approved, and the governor, Gen. Craig, countenanced and supported, was made, in Fort Townshend, by Sir Thomas Page, at the instance of Lord Townshend (then master-general of the Ordnance), in 1781 and 2, the work being begun June 4, and finished July 4. For the process, or operation, which seems most masterly, we must refer to the article. Suffice it briefly to mention, that after discovering "a piece of a tree, at the "depth of 300 feet from the top of "the well, water appeared at 328 feet "deep, and at 330 feet, upon boring, "the whole bottom of the well blew "up, and it was with difficulty the "workmen escaped the torrents of water that followed them, which was "mixed with a quicksand that rose 40 "feet in the bottom of the well, at "which height it still remains. The "water rose, in six hours, 189 feet, "and in a few days within eight feet "of the top of the well." Though the well has been constantly drawn ever since, "a depth has always been left in "water of 130 feet," which is soft, perfectly good for every purpose, and, when drawn, unusually warm; "a fortunate circumstance, as it proved "wholesome," though "whence that "warmth proceeds remains yet to be "determined."—A plan, on a scale of eight feet to an inch, shewing the different strata of blue marl, quicksand, and gravel, with the high and low water marks, and the construction of the works, is annexed.

The King's wells at Landguard Fort were begun and finished in 1781. A well of good water "was, with great "difficulty, sunk to the depth of low-water mark at spring-tides, about 18 "feet from the upper surface of the "sand, when, on a sudden, to the surprise of every person, the water that "rose from the bottom became entirely "salt." As good water had been found "eight feet from the surface, which "continued in great quantity almost to "the spring-tide low-water mark," Sir Thomas "directed sand to be thrown "into the well, to bring it a little above "what had been the lowest fresh water "line (twelve feet), and then drew "the water out which had been mixed. "After this, the filtration into the well "became again perfectly fresh, and in "equal quantity to the first appearance." Twelve feet were therefore "fixed as the greatest depth, and another well sunk at 40 feet distance, "with a horizontal brick drain, having "holes left in the sides for filtration, to "collect the water, and the bottoms "of both wells were secured with hard "materials; that the whole supply of "water might be reduced to the drain, "which is constructed to prevent, as "much as possible, the mixture of sand "with the water, and is found to answer the desired end.—For the cause "of the fresh water, or whence it "comes," Sir Thomas is "yet at a loss," though he endeavours to account for it in a scientific manner, for which recourse must be had to the article itself.

The King's wells at Harwich were begun May 6, and finished Sept. 29, 1781.—"The wells in that neighbourhood" being "shallow, and only depending on springs from the upper "surfaces of the ground," having "but "little water in the summer, and the "quality of it" being "very bad," a resolution was taken "to sink a well "from higher ground, and to endeavour to penetrate through a rock "which lay a few yards under the level "of the country... The experiment "answered in every respect, as there "was not a drop of water found till the "rock had been entirely cut through, "when, upon finding a considerable "quantity of moist sand, and boring "into it, a plentiful spring was discovered, and has supplied the troops "with very good water ever since."

The construction also of these wells is described by some plans and sections annexed.

nexed. This very expert engineer concludes his intelligent and modest account with recommending (what his own success abundantly warrants) "where it is apprehended any mineral " or drain from the upper surface of " lands, by mixing in wells, may hurt " the water, the sinking from the " heights, as there are few countries " (he adds) where very good water " may not be found, by a proper attention to locality in making wells."

ART. V. Extract of a Letter from Edward Pigott, Esq. to M. de Magellan, F. R. S. containing the Discovery of a Comet.

This comet was discovered by Mr. Pigott at York Nov. 19, 1783, at 11 h. 15 min. R. Asc. 41° , N. Decl. $3^{\circ} 10'$. He saw it again on the 20th and 21st. It looked "like a nebula, with a diameter of about $2'$."

ART. VI. Project for a new Division of the Quadrant. By Charles Hutton, LL. D. F. R. S.

This project consists in adapting "the " tables of sines, tangents, and secants " to equal parts of the radius, instead " of to those of the quadrant;" but for the particulars, mathematicians, to whom this seems a meritorious and useful service, must consult the article.

ART. VII. On the Means of discovering the Distance, Magnitude, &c. of the Fixed Stars, in consequence of the Diminution of the Velocity of their Light, in case such a Diminution should be found to take place in any of them, and such other Data should be procured from Observations, as would be farther necessary for that purpose. By the Rev. John Michell, B. D. F. R. S.

These "outlines," as the author modestly styles them, "of the use that " may be made of the observations on " the double stars," &c. proceed on a supposition, that "the particles of light " are subject to the same law of gravitation with other bodies, as in all probability they are, and also that some " of the stars are large enough sensibly " to diminish their velocity." But they are much too complex to admit an abstract or analysis, though highly deserving the attention of astronomers, as is every thing on this subject that is suggested by Mr. Michell.

ART. VIII. A Meteorological Journal for the Year 1782, kept at Minehead in Somersetshire. By Mr. John Atkins.

The barometer this year took "a " greater range than" usual, "being

" 2.44 inches. The thermometer likewise from 21° to 81° ; and in October, November, and December, there " fell little more rain than in August " alone." An halo, "exactly similar " to that of the sun," was observed by Mr. Atkins Feb. 9, "between" him and the sun. "The centre of the arch" was "about 15° high, and both ends " terminated in a field of snow."—Total of rain "from Jan. 1, 31.26 inches." The Journal fills 48 pages.

ART. IX. Description of a Meteor observed August 18, 1783. By Mr. Tiberius Cavallo, F. R. S.

For various accounts of this meteor, at the time, see the Index of our last year's volume.—It was observed by Mr. Cavallo, "in company with Dr. " Lind, Dr. Lockman, Mr. T. Sandby, " and a few others," from the N. E. corner of Windsor Castle, "about " 25 minutes after 9 o'clock in the " evening*."—"Its duration was " half " a minute, or rather less;" its altitude " about 25 degrees above the horizon;" its direction "from N. by W. half W. " at first 5 or 6 degrees obliquely towards the E.; then towards the E.; " and at last to the S. E. by E. where " it disappeared." Its light, when it emerged from "a small oblong cloud," that at first obscured it, was "prodigious, the whole country being instantly illuminated." It was then "oblong, but it presently acquired a " tail, and soon after parted into several " small bodies, each having a tail, and " all moving in the same direction;" and "about ten minutes after its disappearance, in the S. E. by E. a rumbling noise" was heard, like distant thunder, the report, probably, of its explosion, which "happened when it " parted into small bodies, viz. at about " the middle of its track." From these data, "and on the supposition that " sound travels 1150 feet per second," Mr. Cavallo forms the following calculations:

" Distance of the meteor from Windsor Castle - - 130 miles

" Length of the path it described in the heavens - 1550 miles

" Diameter of the luminous body when it came out of the clouds - - - 1070 yards.

" Its height above the surface of the earth - - 56½ miles."

* "Mr. Sandby's watch was 17 m. past 9 nearest; it does not mark seconds."

" The

"The explosion must have happened perpendicularly over Lincolnshire."

ART. X. An Account of the Meteor of the 18th of August and 4th of October, 1783. By Alexander Aubert, Esq. F. R. S. and S. A.

Mr. Aubert saw the first of these meteors (mentioned above) as he "was returning on horseback to" his "observatory at Loampit-hill, near Deptford, in Kent, at the foot of Lewisham bridge." His description agrees in general with that just given, save in the time of its disappearing, which, Mr. Aubert says, was "at 17 minutes and a half after 9, mean time," and its duration, which, he thinks, "did not exceed 10 or 12 seconds of time, during which it moved a space corresponding to about 136° in azimuth." He computes it also to have been "not at less than 40 or 50 miles distance from the earth," though he did not hear the report on which Mr. Cavallo founds his calculation.

The meteor of Oct. 4 was seen by this observer in Blackman-street, Southwark, at 43 minutes past 6, at an altitude of near 30 degrees, moving from the N. N. E. Eastward. It was much more luminous than the moon, then "beyond the first quarter; it extinguished quickly; its whole course did not exceed 25 degrees, nor the time of its appearance two or three seconds."—Mr. A. does not recollect hearing any noise or report, either during or after the appearance of these meteors.

ART. XI. Observations on a remarkable Meteor seen on the 18th of August, 1783. By William Cooper, D. D. Archdeacon of York.

This "awful meteor" is here described as appearing at first stationary, near the sea-side (where is not said) "towards 9 o'clock at night," in "the N. W. by N." taking "its course to the S. E. by E. and dividing into several glowing parts or balls of fire, the chief part still remaining in its full splendor."—"Two great explosions" were heard "soon after;" but no calculations are formed as to its size, distance, velocity, &c.

ART. XII. An Account of the Meteor

* This, however, agrees very nearly with Mr. Sandby. It is needless to add, that Mr. Sandby has published a beautiful drawing of this. See vol. LIII. p. 385.

of the 18th of August, 1783. By Richard Lovell Edgeworth, Esq. F. R. S.

"Edgeworth's town, Mullingar, Ireland," is the place from whence this observation is dated. The meteor was there seen "at half past 9; its size appeared to be about half of the moon's diameter; it moved from the N. at an elevation of 10 or 12 degrees, and in a line parallel to the horizon, and was visible during 10 or 15 seconds." No explosion is here mentioned, nor calculations or conjectures formed.

ART. XIII. Experiments on Air. By Henry Cavendish, Esq. F. R. S. and S. A.

These "experiments," we are told, "were made principally with a view to find out the cause of the diminution which common air is well known to suffer by all the various ways in which it is phlogisticated, and to discover what becomes of the air thus lost or condensed." Mr. Cavendish supposes that "this diminution is not owing either to the generation or separation of fixed air from it;" for which he gives his reasons. But for them we must refer to the article.

ART. XIV. Remarks on Mr. Cavendish's Experiments on Air. By Richard Kirwan, Esq. F. R. S.

"Some of Mr. Cavendish's deductions" being opposite to those laid before the Society by this gentleman about two years ago, he here gives the reasons of his dissent.

ART. XV. Answer to Mr. Kirwan's Remarks upon the Experiments on Air. By Henry Cavendish, Esq. F. R. S. and S. A.

This is a controversy into which we are not inclined to enter, and therefore will only give the titles of this and the next article.

ART. XVI. Reply to Mr. Cavendish's Answer. By Richard Kirwan, Esq. F. R. S.

ART. XVII. On a Method of describing the relative Positions and Magnitudes of the Fixed Stars; together with some Astronomical Observations. By the Rev. Francis Wollaston, LL. B. F. R. S.

A proposal here made to astronomers in general well deserves, and we therefore hope will engage, their attention; viz. "that each should undertake a strict examination of a certain district in the heavens, and not only by a re-examination of the catalogues hitherto published, but by taking the right ascension and declination of every star in

"in their several allotments, frame an exact map of it, with a corresponding catalogue, and communicate their observations to one common centre." But this being "a work of time, and not within the compass of every one," Mr. Wollaston here proposes a method more general, immediate, and easy, by noting down at the time the exact appearance of what is seen, or making a drawing of apparent situations on a large message-card, which thus "becomes a register of the then appearance of that small portion of the heavens." The method which he has adopted and recommends is here described at large, and, to explain it more fully, he has added a card of 107 stars, so marked. Corona Borealis was the constellation chosen, of which the stars α , β , γ , δ , ϵ , ζ , η , θ , ι , κ , λ , μ , ν , ξ , \omicron , and π , were successively made central, together with one or two belonging to Bootes. His glass is a night one, of Dollond's improved construction, which magnifies about six times, to which cross wires are added, intersecting each other at an angle of 45 degrees. This telescope is mounted on a polar axis. Other particulars and hints must be learned from the article; to which is subjoined a list of such occasional observations as the author has made since his last communication. They are on three eclipses of the moon, 1776, 1779, and 1783; two eclipses of the sun, 1778 and 1781; transit of Mercury, 1782; occultation of Saturn by the moon, 1775; occultations of stars by the moon, 1775, 6, 7, and 83; and eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, 1775 to 1781.

ART. XVIII. An Account of some Late Fiery Meteors. By Charles Blagden, M. D. Physician to the Army, Sec. R. S.

Dr. Blagden considers these meteors, or fire-balls, under the following heads:

1. Their general appearance. 2. Their path. 3. Their shape or figure. 4. Their light and colours. 5. Their height. 6. Their noise. 7. Their size. 8. Their duration. 9. Their velocity." Beginning with that of the 18th of August, he describes it, traces its progress, and gives a summary review of the whole, with much more minuteness and precision than any preceding observer, in this volume at least. The time of its appearance he estimates to have been "9 h. 16 min. P. M." mean time, of the meridian of London. GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

"don," and its duration "about half a minute." He then traces its course from the N. N. E. "beyond the farthest extremity of this island, a little Westward of Perth, and probably a little Eastward of Edinburgh, over the South of Scotland, and the Western parts of Northumberland and Durham, and somewhat to the Westward of York." Hitherto nearly S. S. E.; "but somewhere near the borders of Yorkshire, or in Lincolnshire, gradually deviating to the Eastward and bursting, it moved, for some time, almost S. E. cross Cambridgeshire, and perhaps the confines of West Suffolk; but, gradually recovering its original direction, it proceeded over Essex and the Straits of Dover, entering the Continent probably not far from Dunkirk, and being afterwards seen at Brussels, Paris, and Nuits in Burgundy &c. say," it has been said, but by "doubtful authority," at Rome, thus traversing, in all, 13 or 14 degrees of latitude, or "a track of 1000 miles at

"of the earth."

"times round, at its tail was "betw

"long;" its expl

"near the comme

"Lincolnshire,"

its altitude, from

vations, is here

"been more than

"earth, in a region where the air is at "least 30,000 times rarer than here be"low," its report appears to have been "loudest in and near Lincolnshire,

"and again in East Kent," the consequence of two explosions; "its trans-

"verse diameter, when it passed over

"the zenith, subtended an angle of 30

"minutes, probably almost half a mile

"across;" its duration is estimated by Mr. Herschel at Windsor (whose observation, however, has not reached us) at "forty or forty-five seconds," its apparent motion or velocity, at

"the lowest computation of 20 miles

"a second, exceeds that of sound above

"90 times," and therefore "it must "have passed over the whole island of "Great Britain in less than half a mi"nute, and might have reached Rome

"within a minute afterwards." But

* It was seen in Ireland. See vol. LIII. p. 385.

† Journ. de Paris, Aût 14, 1783.

‡ Parker's G. M. Advertiser, Oct. 7, 1784. this these particulars, though highly curious, we can only thus briefly notice, and recommend to every philosophical and curious enquirer. All calculations of the distance and height of this meteor, founded on "the velocity of sound in air so much rarer than where our experiments have been made," Dr. Blagden is inclined to distrust. Those above-mentioned are drawn from different observations of its altitude, especially that of 25 degrees, determined at Windor in Article IX.

The fire-ball of Oct. 4. "which was much smaller and of much shorter duration," Dr. Blagden saw from Sir Joseph Banks's library, [in Soho-square, we suppose,] and ascertains the time to have been exactly the same that Mr. Aubert saw it in Southwark (see Art. X.) viz. "at 43 minutes past six in the evening, moving from the N. W. to the S. E." Its colour he compares to "the blue lights of India, and some of the largest electrical sparks." It "had no tail, but was nearly round, or perhaps a little elliptical, and after moving with an intensely bright bluish light not less than 10 degrees, it became suddenly extinct, without any bursting or explosion." Its altitude, "even when it became extinct," being found by a quadrant to be 32 degrees, on comparing this with "an observation made by Mr. Boys, of Sandwich*," that "it disappeared just under, and a very little to the Westward (rather Northward) of the star γ in the foot of Cepheus, γ Cephei being then about 57 degrees high, and bearing above 21 degrees to the Eastward of North, this meteor, after all proper allowances are made †, must have been between 40 and 50 miles above the surface of the earth." "Its breadth," as it appeared to this observer, was "not above one quarter of the moon's diameter," though some thought this also near as big as the moon, "some what above a furlong," and its duration "three seconds."—"Supposing it described an arc of 14 degrees in one second and a half, or, according to Mr. Aubert's observation, of 25 degrees in 3 seconds, its real velocity was about 12 miles a second."—"A similar meteor had appeared the same day from the Northward, about three in the morning."—Rejecting former hypotheses, from the velocity, lambent flames, hissing noise (heard by many), connection with, and resemblance to, the aurora borealis, and constant direction of the largest meteors, from or toward the N. or N. W. and indeed approaching very nearly to the present magnetical meridian, Dr. Blagden is inclined to ascribe their origin to electricity.—With this very interesting article the volume concludes.

120. Poems, Moral and Descriptive. By the late Richard Jago, M. A. (Prepared for the Press and improved by the Author, before his Death.) To which is added [rather prefixed], Some Account of the Life and Writings of Mr. Jago. 8vo.

RICHARD JAGO, born Oct. 1, 1715, was the third son of the rector of Beaudesert, in Warwickshire. At Solihull school his friendship commenced with Mr. Shenstone, which continued till his death. He completed his education at University College, Oxford; married, 1. a daughter of the rev. Mr. Fancourt, of Kilnicote in Leicestershire, who died in 1751; and, 2. a daughter of James Underwood, Esq. of Rudgely in Staffordshire, (who survived him,) and died May 8, 1781, aged 65, being then vicar of Snitterfield, Warwickshire, worth 140l. per annum, and rector of Kilnicote (above-mentioned), worth near 300l. He had only children by his first wife.—Truly honourable was his character, and eminent were his poetical talents, as appears by his poem of Edge Hill, his Fable of Labour and Genius, and his Elegies on the Blackbirds and Goldfinches, all excellent in their kind. Such are the scanty outlines of his life and character.—The Elegy on the Blackbirds, when it first appeared with Mr. Jago's name, in Doddsley's Miscellanies, was claimed, with unparalleled effrontery, by a manager of the Bath theatre, who pretended that Jago was a fictitious name, which he had adopted from Othello. And even Dr. Johnson, in his Life of West, has left this matter still dubious, though Mr. Shenstone's letters, to which he refers, proves the fact. The principal poem, besides those above-mentioned, is, "Adam: or the Fatal Disobedience. An Oratorio. Compiled from the Paradise Lost of Milton,

* This observation has not yet appeared in the Transactions.

† "It appears, from observations taken by General Roy, F. R. S. that the bearing of Sandwich from London is not so much to the Southward of E. as it is laid down in our maps."

"Milton, and adapted to Music."—
On one of the short pieces intitled
"Peyto's Ghost," (which is here selected as a specimen,) is the following note: "Was the late Lord Willoughby
"de Broke." This is undoubtedly a mistake, as that nobleman had neither the name nor estate of Mr. Peyto. The present Lord, indeed, his godson and heir, has both. But in fact this refers to the said Mr. Peyto, who lived at Chelsterton, where the scene lies, and formerly represented the county.

"PEYTO'S GHOST.

"To Craven's * health, and social joy,
The festive night was kept,
While mirth and patriot spirit flow'd,
And Dullness only slept.

"When from the jovial crowd I stole,
And homeward hap'd my way;
And pass'd along by Chelsterton,
All at the close of day;

"The sky with clouds was over-cast;
An hollow tempest blow'd.
And rains and foaming cataracts
Had delug'd all the road.

"When thro' the dark and lonesome shade,
Shone forth a sudden light;
And soon distinct an human form
Engag'd my wondering sight;

"Onward it mov'd with graceful port,
And soon o'ertook my speed;
Then thrice I lifted up my hands,
And thrice I check'd my speed.

"Who art thou, passenger," it cry'd,
"From yonder mirth retir'd?
"That here pursu'st thy cheerless way,
"Benighted and bemir'd?"

"I am," said I, "a country clerk,
"A clerk of low degree,
"And yonder gay and gallant scene
"Suits not a curacy.

"But I have seen such sights to-day,
"As make my heart full glad,
"Altho' it is but dark, 'tis true,
"And eke—my road is bad.

"For I have seen lords, knights, and squires,
"Of great and high renown,
"To chuse a knight for this fair thire,
"All met at Warwick town.

"A wight of skill to ken our laws,
"Of courage to defend,
"Of worth to serve the public cause
"Before a private end.

"And such they found, if right I guess—
"Of gentle blood he came;
"Of morals firm, of manners mild,
"And Craven is his name.

* "Hon. Wm. Craven, of Wykin. He was afterwards Lord Craven."

"Did half the British tribunes share
"Experienc'd Mordaunt's * truth,
"Another half, like Craven, boast
"A free nubials'd youth;

"The sun, I trow, in all his race,
"No happier realm should find;
"Nor Britons here for aught in vain,
"From warmth with prudence join'd."

"Go on, my country, favour'd soil,
"Such patriots to produce!
"Go on, my countrymen," he cry'd,
"Such patriots still to chuse."

"This said, the placid form retir'd
Behind the veil of night;
Yet bade me, for my country's good,
The solemn tale recite."

121. *Trial of the Rev. William Davies
Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph, at the Assizes at Shrewsbury, on August 6, 1784, for a Libel. folio.*

OF the dialogue which occasioned this prosecution and trial, and which was the composition of the Dean's brother-in-law, the learned and ingenious Sir William Jones†, (now one of the judges in Bengal,) a short account was given in our last volume,
p. 332. Many friends of the government, who are also friends to the Revolution, saw no harm in it. Dis aliter visum. A Mr. William Jones, attorney at law, the hon. Mr. Fitzmaurice, high sheriff, and a Welch Grand Jury, thought otherwise; and therefore the first of these prosecuted (the Treasury and the Attorney and Solicitor General declining it), and the last presented it as a libel; and in consequence a bill of indictment was found at Wrexham against the Dean of St. Asaph, as the publisher, in April 1783. The trial came on at the same place in September following; but was put off, on application of the prosecutor, to April 1784, when, the prosecutor having obtained a writ of certiorari, the Court of King's Bench ordered it to be tried at the next assizes at Shrewsbury‡. Mr Justice

* "The late Sir Charles Mordaunt, Bart."

† See his first Charge to the Jury at Calcutta, p. 672.—It is remarkable, Mr E. affirms, that, immediately after avowing himself the author of this obnoxious dialogue, he was appointed by the King one of the supreme judges of India.

‡ This trial is said, by mistake, p. 633, to have been at Gloucester. In the same page Maidstone is said to have been a maiden affize, though 12 were capitally convicted, and three executed.

Buller

Buller sat as judge. Mr. Bearcroft was the principal counsel for the Crown, and Mr. Erskine for the defendant. But for a farther account of it see p. 633.

A few verbal mistakes are all that we shall notice.

The Dean is, or was, of "Llan-nerch," not Llannorck, Park, as misstated in the indictment; and Mr. Bearcroft, has unwittingly dubbed him a Doctor, which he is not.—The late Judge Foster (not Forsler) is made by the same gentleman (or rather by the short-hand writer) a "Lord Chief Justice," p. 24; and (stranger still) Lord Mansfield is said by Mr. Erskine, p. 18, to have "administered the justice" of this country for above half a century, though it is certain he became Chief Justice in 1756.—Mr. Erskine has since failed in his application to the Court of King's-Bench for a new trial, but has succeeded in obtaining an arrest of judgment, so that the matter still sleeps. May it never be awakened!

322. Knox's View of the British Empire, particularly Scotland, &c. (Concluded from p. 610.)

WE now enter on this interesting pamphlet, whose indefatigable author, ardent to ascertain the real state of his native soil, and to discover how the country and its produce may be best improved and turned to advantage, is gone on a fresh tour into the Highlands, in order to enable himself to add to the fund of information he has already been the instrument of presenting to the curiosity of the publick on a most important subject.

In his account of the "Ancient and present State of Scotland, particularly the Low Countries," Mr. Knox gives us its commercial annals, commercial establishments, present state of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; treats of the various classes and degrees of people in the Lowlands, and their propensity for the manufactures of England; shews that Scotland is the most valuable nursery for seamen in the British empire, England excepted, the Scottish fisheries, and of one species only, employing in the proportion of ten seamen to one who are engaged in the whale fishery; above two to one of those who carried on the whole North American commerce, while in our possession; and nearly equal to the number now employed in all our remaining settlements*; considers the great importance of Scotland to England as a commercial nation, and offers some proposals for a more liberal system of polity relative to Scotland, with some conjectural estimates of the beneficial consequences which would result to the whole island.—In his "View of the Highlands" he treats of the division and face of the country; the distresses of the Highlanders, which, he says, "no language can describe, nor fancy conceive," and which occasioned an emigration of above 20,000 between 1765 and 1775; their manners in former times; the character of the modern Highlanders, and their qualifications for the arts of civil life, as well as those of war; of the comparative state of the Highlands, and the Northern countries of Europe, in respect of towns, commerce, and navigation; the produce of the Highlands by sea and land; and of inland navigation, viz. 1. "The South-ern Navigation between the Forth and Clyde;" a most important junction of scarcely 24 miles, which would "open a communication across the kingdom, and thereby cut off the long, dangerous navigation by the Land's End and the Pentland Firth." This business, after having been taken up on a large scale by Charles II, and again in the late reign by the Earl of Chatham, but each time abandoned, was again undertaken, on a more contracted plan, by subscription, for vessels of 80 or 100 tons, in 1768; "and in 1775 it was completed to the neighbourhood of Glasgow, and within six miles of the intended junction with the Clyde." £. 150,000 has been expended, which is 10,000l. more than was actually paid, though subscribed. The Company therefore is in debt, and 50 or 60,000l. more is required for "the remaining six miles, the most expensive of the whole, which they have not thought it expedient to raise." Our author therefore proposes either that this company should be reimbursed and dissolved, and the work completed, as at first

* "Previous to the American war, and when the bounty, at present limited to the herring busses, was regularly paid, the fisheries of Scotland and its islands employed 20,000 men. All North America, when in our possession, Canada, &c. included, employed 8000. The whale fishery 2000. Africa 3900. West Indies 12,000. East Indies 6000. Newfoundland fisheries 20,000." intended, ntended, at the public expence, or at least that the sum still deficient should be voted. "The depth of this canal is "seven feet, and its breadth, at the surface, fifty-six feet. The locks are 75 "feet long, and their gates 20 feet "wide. The English canals are generally from 3 to 5 feet deep, 30 or 40 "wide, and the lock gates from 10 to "12 feet. The distance between the "entrance into the Clyde and Forth is, "by the Pentland Firth, 600 miles; by "the canal scarcely 100; all vessels, "therefore, not exceeding 80 or 100 "tons burthen, will, by this passage, "save 500 miles of a navigation at all "times dangerous, and in winter almost "impracticable. The voyage by the "Land's End is still more extensive, "and in time of war doubly hazardous." The great utility of this work is self-evident, and in an age of improvements, that it should have been so long neglected is unaccountable.—2. "Navigation between the Atlantic and Loch "Fyne." The voyage from Cape Wrath to Glasgow cannot be estimated at less than 400 miles. "Between "Loch Fyne and Loch Crinan a canal "would open at once to the Atlantic "Ocean, the Hebrides, the whole region of the West Highlands, and the "great Loch Linnhe; whence a communication (as mentioned afterwards) "may be opened to Inverness, and the "British Sea (commonly, but improperly, styled German Ocean), in the "Northern division of the kingdom. It "would also shorten the passage from "Clyde to the Orkney and Shetland Islands, and, for large vessels, to the "extensive shores of the Baltic." By cutting only 11 miles, that is, by cutting off the peninsula of Cantire, all these desirable purposes would be attained; a voyage, which frequently takes up three weeks, would be performed, with fewer hands, and in all seasons of the year, in four or five days; and, "the surface being perfectly level," this might be effected for 17,000l.—3. "Navigation between Fort William and Inverness." "The whole line of communication from "the Sound of Mull to Inverness comprises an extent of 93 miles, and is thus "composed of land and water, viz.

Linne Loch	34	River Lochy	7
Loch Lochy	14	— Oich	4
— Oich	4	— Ness	6
— Ness	22		—
	—		17
	74

Land from Loch Lochy to Loch Oich, the level 14 feet above the flood-mark at Inverness,	2
Lakes	74
Rivers	17
Land	2
	—
	93

"Thus, by cutting two miles of land, "and deepening seventeen miles of almost navigable rivers, a direct communication may be opened between "the two seas."

"In closing this subject it may be proper to remark, that the three canals, here recommended, would open a circumnavigation within the heart of the kingdom, to the unspeakable benefit of commerce, and the fisheries. A vessel setting out from Inverness to Edinburgh, and the east side of the island, might return by Glasgow, the Hebrides, and other parts on the west side, and so vice versa, as might seem most beneficial to the parties concerned.

"This inland navigation, amounting to about 500 miles, would include almost the whole trading part of the kingdom; a circumstance which requires the most serious attention; and the more so, when we consider with what facility it might be accomplished, and the smallness of the expence, compared to the solid and permanent advantages to the Highlanders in particular, and to the trade of these kingdoms in general, as will further appear by the following estimates:

"By completing six miles of the canal between the Forth and Clyde, by which vessels under 100 tons would save near 500 miles, and elude all privateers.	60,000
"By cutting two miles of land, and deepening seventeen miles of rivers, between Fort William and Inverness, which would save 200 miles,	50,000
"By cutting five miles between Loch Crinan and Loch Fyne, which would save 100 miles.	17,000
Expence £.	127,000

Land to be cut,	13
Rivers deepened,	17
	—
	30

Navigation saved, 800 miles.

"The accumulated ills sustained by the tedious and hazardous passage round the Pentland Firth, in delays, damages at sea, shipwrecks, captures, extra-freight, and insurance, amounts in one year only, to more than would complete the above works of general utility; and, if to this we add the great object of relieving the distresses of 400,000 people, of bringing them into the line of action, and of opening new sources of wealth and commerce within our own island, it is matter matter of astonishment that these works have not been completed long ago."

We are then presented with "A Review of the Herring Fisheries, viz. 1. The Western, or Loch Broom Fishery; 2. The Northern, or the Orkney and Shetland Fishery; 3. That on the East Side of the Kingdom; the Expediency of erecting Villages and Harbours in the West Highlands; the Plan of those Villages; the most proper Situations; and Estimates of the Expence." And the pamphlet concludes with an account of "the Famine, the Failure of the Fisheries, and the Hurricanes of 1782;" with which, though so recent, it is little known in England, we will also close our extracts from a work which well deserves, and has already engaged, the attention of our legislators.

"While I was engaged in the preceding pages, an event of the most calamitous nature befell the inhospitable regions which I had been describing. The year 1782 proved remarkably cold and wet, the crops over great part of Europe were more or less injured, and the northern climates experienced a scarcity, amounting to a famine. The scanty crops in the Highlands of Scotland were green in October, when a fall of snow, attended with frost, prevented every species of grain from arriving at maturity. The labour, the seed, and the straw were lost. Potatoes, which in bad seasons had proved a substitute for grain, were this year frost-bitten, and rendered entirely useless. Thus the earth withheld its bounty for the support of man and beast. During this distress at home, no relief could be obtained from abroad. Ireland, the granary of the Hebrides and western shores of Scotland, shut its ports against the exportation of grain; those of the Clyde were unable to give any assistance; while, on the eastern side of the kingdom, the hazards of enemies cut off the necessary supplies from Germany, the Baltic, and, in a great measure, from England.

"Thus deprived of every resource, by the double calamity of war and scarcity, many hundred persons languished and died through the want of sustenance. The husband and the parent, unable to behold these scenes of distress without endeavouring to relieve them, set out, amidst frost and snow, upon the long and almost impracticable journey to Inverness, where they expected to purchase a little grain with the produce of their cloths or furniture which they had previously sold, in the districts where they resided. Several of those who had engaged in this generous enterprize, fell a sacrifice to hunger and cold, in their way to the market. They were found dead on the roads, in caverns, and amongst thickets, where they had taken shelter from the inclemencies of the weather, while the small, emaciated horses, the companions of their distress, could scarcely stand or walk.

"Such was the dreadful situation of the mainland, and the islands, during the winter and spring; and though expresses were dispatched to the Lowlands, by the clergy and others, imploring immediate relief for a perishing people, it doth not appear that application had been made to government, for that purpose, before the beginning of the summer 1783, when a generous supply was readily granted.

"Let us now suppose that a few small harbours and granaries were established at proper distances, along these western shores, and that the communications to the Lowlands were shortened by means of inland navigation; such calamities, if not in a great degree prevented, might be so far mitigated, as to save the lives of thousands, besides obviating the necessity of occasional calls upon the treasury for the relief of those parts.

"The year 1782 furnishes another argument in favour of these proposals. The annual arrival of the herrings in the West Highlands had never been known to fail completely till this remarkable year, when these little visitors seemed to conspire with the seasons, in order to rouse the notice of government towards these distant shores. While the elements kept back or destroyed the regular produce of the earth, the herrings abandoned their well-known lakes, directed their course towards the Irish channel, or stopped there, after their usual progress round the Land's End; and here the Highlanders, not being provided with proper vessels, were unable to follow them.

"This was not all. While those people were deprived of grain, roots, milk, vegetables, and herrings, their usual food in good seasons, an almost uninterrupted succession of storms, such as had not happened within the memory of man, prevented them from attempting the white fishery; neither could they, had the weather been moderate, go to sea without the means of sustenance. Here therefore was a double famine; the cup of affliction and distress, arising from every possible cause, was now full. From this ne plus ultra of human depression we entertain a hope that matters will revert into a contrary direction, under the auspices of a benevolent Sovereign and Parliament, to whose humane, as well as political attention, that country and people are most humbly recommended."

The Appendix contains, I. "Corroborating Proofs respecting the calamitous State of the Highlands," extracted from Dr. Campbell, Mr. Pen-nant, and Dr. Johnson; and II. "Remarks on the Short Tour of Scotland," com-

"comprehending the Southern Division
"of that Kingdom, and a considerable
"Portion of the Highlands."

123. Letters to a young Gentleman, on his setting out for France; containing a Survey of Paris, and a Review of French Literature; with Rules and Directions for Travellers, and various Observations and Anecdotes relative to the Subject. By John Andrews, LL. D. 8vo.

AFTER giving his young traveller some general rules for his conduct, and instructing him how to travel most profitably, Dr. Andrews recommends his associating and conversing with officers, abbés, ex-jesuits, and monastics, and to his study the present legislation, circumstances, and politics of France. He then reviews and examines French literature and French writers, tragic, comic, and poetical; novellists*, historians, orators, philosophers, and miscellaneous writers; gives a short view of the several literary institutions, academies, libraries, churches, and adds some observations and anecdotes relating to other buildings of note, public walks, and gardens, shews and fights, amusements, &c. in Paris.

At the head of French literature Dr. Andrews places Voltaire, and with him, as the "pillars of French tragedy," Corneille, Racine, and Crebillon. "Corneille paints heroes as they ought to be; Racine as they are; Crebillon as they should not be; and Voltaire as they wish to appear." Marmontel, Gresset, and Delaplace have also merit. In comedy equally popular and esteemed are Moliere and Regnard; that the greatest moralist, and this the greatest exciter of mirth. Destouches and La Chaussée are also much applauded. The latter is the inventor of la comédie larmoyante, which corresponds with our "sentimental comedy." Boileau, Rousseau, and La Fontaine are next panegyrised as French classics, but, above all, Voltaire again, as their only Epic poet, in much higher strains of eulogium than the Henriade will generally be thought to warrant, out of France, as, be it's merit what it may, French rhyme must have clogged the wings of a Homer. In short, one cannot read this panegyric without thinking that it must be penned by a Frenchman, or that the writer never heard of Milton—as much superior to the bard of Ferney as the subject of his poem, Creation and the Fall, is to that of Voltaire, The French Monarchy and the League. Gresset, Racine the son, and the royal philosopher of Sans Souci, though not a Frenchman, have their share of this incense. As novellists, next advance Marmontel, Crebillon the son, Marivaux, Prevôt, Count Hamilton, Le Sage, Fenelon, and Ramsay. All these writers are well appreciated; as are also the historians, Bossuet, Fleury, F. Daniel, Rollin, Crevier, Rapin, F. Orleans, Vertot, Dubos, Perceux, Henaut, St. Real, Tillemont, Raynal, Montesquieu, Cover, Duclos, La Bleterie, and, again, Voltaire, to whom, as usual, our author is much more favourable than we think he deserves, as in truth, an essential ingredient in a good historian, he is notoriously deficient. The following circumstance we know to be a fact. When Voltaire was writing his History of Charles XII, he used to read it at Paris, as he proceeded, to Baron Sparre, the Swedish envoy, who had served under that prince. Some mistakes the Baron occasionally pointed out. The bard made his acknowledgments; but when the book was published, he had not corrected one.—On the French oratorical, philosophical, and miscellaneous writers we shall not enlarge.—Among various anecdotes here interspersed, one letter, not one of the shortest, is engrossed by the amorous and tragical history of the Countess of Chateau Briand, one of the mistresses of Francis I.; and, from the manner in which it is related, we may be certain that this writer would have been no rigid confessor. Other anonymous personages, men of straw, are occasionally introduced, evidently to swell the volume; but we see them enter without curiosity, and depart without regret. And we are sorry to observe that this gentleman has resided so much abroad as to have in part forgotten his own language; for though only the first of the following words may be properly French, none of them are English: actual (for present), St. Bennet, am liberations, exteriorities, disorderliness, uninterestingness, distinctiveness, prosperousness, and many more of the same coin, which to Englishmen need not be pointed out, but are certainly not sterling.

124. The Speaking Figure, and the Automaton Chess Player. 8vo.

THIS writer professes to unravel the mystery of these two famous figures, falsely (he says) called Automata. That of the speaking

* Mad. Grassigny is always spelt Grassigny.

speaking doll he thus explains: "This figure (about the size of a very young child) is suspended by a ribbon round its waist, in the door-way of a room, or light closet, which is interior to that in which the company are admitted. To the mouth of the doll is fixed a tin tube, about a foot in length, the end of which is formed like the mouth-piece to a speaking trumpet; and to that mouth-piece the questioner applies his, and in a gentle whisper puts a question to the doll, in either French, English, German, or Italian; to which a rational answer is returned by this inanimate being. . . . In the very large plume of feathers on the head of the puppet the other end of the trumpet is concealed, but more expanded than that to which you put the question. There is a hole through the ceiling, over the door-way, but which is invisible to every body in the exterior room; and, therefore, whatever words are whispered at the mouth-piece below cannot fail of striking the ear of the prostrate confederate above. But as he cannot apply his mouth, as the questioner does, close to the counter trumpet in the baby's head, his reply is not heard by you so distinctly as he hears the question put; and therefore he often fails, and often whispers some reply, but too faintly to be understood. It will be said, 'But the figure may be taken down, and the reply will be made while it is held in the hands of the shewman.' It is true; but he holds it in the same place, and directly under the confederate; at which times the confederate may easily slip a tin tube through the aperture in the ceiling, above a foot or more, to hear the question, and return the reply, without its being seen by the spectators in the front room. The man indeed will tell you, that it will answer a question when hung upon a tree in the Park. But who will regard the declaration of a Charlatan? for the truth is, he will not bring it even into the exterior room; and the whole deception is, that the question and reply pass through a tin tube fixed in a human form; for, take away that, and hang a double-ended speaking trumpet in the doorway, and then it would appear too idle a deception to draw the attention of any but children of its own dimensions."—This is well illustrated by a plate.—The writer adds, that he has tried the experiment with success in his own house, with a bust of plaster of Paris, and can thus carry on the correspondence in the manner above described. He thinks the Chess Player, M. Kempfle's Turk, a still more simple trick; but in this we do not agree, nor acquiesce in his explanation, and therefore we shall say no more of it.

125. A Supplement to the Miscellanies of Thomas Chatterton. 8vo.

The "Miscellanies of Chatterton" were reviewed in vol. XLIII. p. 424. These poems, we are assured by the anonymous editor, "are unquestionable originals; the greater part of them having been immediately transcribed from Chatterton's own manuscript." They may be so; but—si sic omnia, the pretended works of Rowley would never have been honoured with the attention of the public, and the researches of a Bryant and a Warton. Acrostics and verses "to Miss Sally Clarke," and "the beautiful Miss Holland," compose the majority of them. Of these, the following, though one of the shortest, trite and trifling as it is, is not the worst:

"To Miss CL—KE. 1768.

"TO sing of Clarke my Muse aspires,
A theme by charms made quite divine;
Ye tuneful Virgins, sound your lyres,
Apollo, aid the feeble line.
If Truth and Virtue, Wit and Charms,
May for a fix'd attention call,
The darts of Love and wounding arms
The beauteous Clarke shall hold o'er all.
'Tis not the tincture of a skin,
The rosy lip, the charming eye,
No, 'tis a greater power within,
That bids the passion never die.
These Clarke possesses, and much more,
All beauty in her glances sport*,
She is the Goddess all adore,
In country, city, and at court.

Nothing but the name of Chatterton could ever gain such trash a second reading. One of the poems "to Miss Holland" begins thus:

"Far distant from Britannia's lofty isle,
What shall I find to make the Genius smile?"

How is this? Was the author ever out of England, or is this only a poetical flight? There is also a long scurrilous "Epistle to the Rev. Mr. Catcott," on his System of the Deluge, of which the following note is a full recantation:
"Dec. 20, 1769. Mr. Catcott will be " pleased to observe, that I admire many things in his learned remarks. This poem is an innocent effort of poetical vengeance, as Mr. Catcott has done me the honour to criticize my trifles. I have taken great poetical liberties, and what I dislike in verse possibly deserves my approbation in the plain prose of truth.— The many admirers of Mr. Catcott may, on perusal of this, rank me as an enemy. But I am indifferent in all things; I value neither the praise or censure of the multitude." Such were the principles, or rather no principles, of this eccentric youth. But a better poet might have taught him to think a lie in prose and verse the same.

The following "Sentiment," dated 1769, will shew that his exit was then premeditated, and that, like a true disciple of Hume, he argued much in the same absurd manner,

" Since we can die but once, what matters it,
If rope or garter, poison, pistol, sword,
Slow-wasting sickness, or the sudden burst
Of valve arterial in the noble parts.
Curtail the miseries of human life?
Though vary'd is the cause, th' effect's the same,
All to one common dissolution tends."

That is, in plain prose, a man may as well be hanged as die in his bed. It matters not whether the gallows or a fever be the cause, "death" is equally the effect. There are some verses in imitation of our old poets Heccar and Gaira, an African Eclogue, &c. and "Chatterton's Will, 1770," a motley piece, more whimsical than serious, in verse and prose, in which he satirises Messrs. Bungum and Catcott, and praises Mr. Barrett "for all his little knowledge," alludes to his intended exit, saying that his "body will be dragged by Harris to the cross-way, and superstitious mortals will wreck their hate on his remains;" that his "death will happen to-morrow night before eight o'clock," directing Paul Farr, Esq. and Mr. John Florer, if the coroner and jury bring it in Lunacy, to cause his body to be interred in the tomb of his fathers, and to add six epitaphs annexed, "one in obsolete French, on Guatercine [Qu. Catharine] Chatterton, 1210," one in bad Latin, on Alan and Alice Chatterton, who died in 1415," one in English "on (his father) sub-chaunter of the cathedral, who died in 1752," and the other three (in English also) on himself.— This is the 5th: "To the memory of Thomas Chatterton. Reader, judge not, if thou art a Christian—believe that he shall be judged by a superior power—to that power alone is he now answerable." The 6th was to have two achievements of arms (Qu. whose?); he directs the monument to be erected, "though the coroner's inquest should bring it in felo de se;" bequeaths his "vigour and fire of youth to Mr. G[eorge] C[atcott], his humility to the rev. Mr. C——n, sen. to Mr. B[ungu]m his prosody and grammar, to Bristol all his spirit and disinterestedness, parcels of goods unknown on her quay since the days of Canning and Rowley, his religion to Dr. C[utts] B[arton], D[ean] of B[ristol], empowering the sub-spirit to strike him on the head when he goes to sleep in church, his powers of utterance to the Rev. Mr. B[rough-ton*], his sincerest thanks to Mr. Clayfield, his moderation to the politicians on both sides, his generosity to the (then) mayor, his abstinence to the aldermen, &c." He thus seriously, however, concludes: "Item, I leave my mother and sister to the protection of my friends, if I have any. Executed in the presence of Omniscience, this 14th day of April, 1770. THO. CHATTERTON."

GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

How any human being, endued with reason and common sense, much more how a youth of such extraordinary abilities as this Pseudo-Rowley, if such he was, could thus dance on the brink of a precipice, with that eternity, into which he was just going to rush unsummoned, full in his view, is equally lamentable and unaccountable. But to his own master he standeth or falleth.

126. Poems on several Occasions.
By Michael Bruce. 4m. 8vo.

THIS young Caledonian bard, now no more, was first introduced to the notice of the public by the ingenious authors of the Mirror. See vol. LI. p. 84. The present collection seems a republication (and therefore should have been so styled) of the volume there mentioned, published by subscription at Edinburgh in 1769, and of which, and

* Prebendary of Sarum, and one of the writers in the Biographia Britannica. He died at Bristol, and was buried in his church of St. Mary Redcliff, in 1774.

The author, a farther account was transmitted to us by a correspondent in the same vol. p. 499. To these brief memoirs, and to the latter part of a pathetic "Elegy, written in the immediate view of death," (the subject similar, but the manner of treating it far different from that of the boy of Bristol, quoted above), we shall only add, as a farther proof of Mr. Bruce's talents, who was "no less amiable as a man than valuable as a writer," the following

"DANISH ODE.

"The great, the glorious deed is done!
The foe is fled, the field is won!
Prepare the feast, the heroes call;
Let joy, let triumph fill the hall!

"The raven clasps * his sable wings;
The Bard his chosen timbrel brings;
Six Virgins round, a select † choir,
Sing to the music of his lyre.

"With mighty ale the goblet crown;
With mighty ale your sorrows drown;
To-day, to mirth and joy we yield,
To-morrow, face the bloody field.

"From danger's front, at battle's eve,
Sweet comes the banquet to the brave;
Joy shines with genial beam on all,
The joy that dwells in Odin's hall.

"The song bursts living from the lyre,
Like dreams that guardian-ghosts inspire;
When mimic shrieks the heroes hear,
And which the visionary fear.

"Music's the medicine of the mind,
The cloud of care give to the wind;
Be every brow with garlands crown'd,
And let the cup of joy go round.

"The cloud comes o'er the beam of light;
We're guests that tarry but a night:
In the dark house, together prest,
The princes and the people rest.

"Send round the shell, the feast prolong,
And send away the night in song;
Be blest below, as those above
With Odin and the friends they love!"

This surely is truly Runic, and truly Grayan.

If Chatterton had been blessed with the principles of Bruce, or Bruce had enjoyed the health of Chatterton, both might now have survived. But,

"Whatever is, is right."

127. God the Author of Peace and Lover of Concord. A Sermon preached at the Parish Church of Deal, on Thursday, July 29, 1784. Being the General Thanksgiving Day for the Peace. By William Backhouse, D. D. Rector of Deal, and Archdeacon of

* Qu. 'claps?'

† We could wish this had been a trochee, instead of an iambic. But 'chosen' unfortunately occurs just before.

Canterbury. For the Benefit of Saint Cyprian's. 4to.

THE Text, 2 Chron. xx. 30, "So the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet: for his God gave him rest round about."—On the subject of the late unhappy breach in our Israel the Archdeacon gives this consolation:

"America is of British extraction. England is the tree: America is the branch. The branch is severed from the trunk. But it remains to be proved whether separation is, or is not, for the good of the old stock. The fruit produced never paid the expence of cultivation.

"Too much indulgence perhaps has been the root of all the evil. Nothing spoils children more effectually. It tends to make them peevish, discontented, and in the end totally ungovernable. When Jesurun waxed fat, he kicked;—then he forsook God which made him, and lightly regarded the rock of his salvation.

"It is indeed sharper than a serpent's tooth to have a thankless child."

"Natural affection, while it operated, kept every thing in order; but when a Revolution had unhappily taken place in the hearts of the children †; when love had turned into hatred, nothing was left for the issue of the matter but force; and force, which had failed in an experiment made at the distance of seven leagues, was not very likely to succeed in an experiment to be made at the distance of a thousand. Appearances, at least, did not promise success."

He thus concludes:

"Both ye and I, my beloved in the Lord, have our fears, but in a different way. The overflowings of an high tide make ye afraid lest your streets should be made waste, your property destroyed, and your lives put into hazard. The overflowings of ungodliness make me afraid lest a general corruption of morals should so far prevail as to make you fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition."

* Mr. Smith's family. See p. 152.

† "It does not follow that the American war, because it has been unfortunate in the issue, was wrong in the principle. No landlord, who thought his title good, would suffer his rent to remain unpaid, nor his right to the estate to be called in question, without an action at law. Subjects can recover by law, but princes, in many cases, by arms only.—But the right itself, and the probability of success in asserting the right, under given circumstances, are different questions. And in the prosecution of right by taking up arms, the victorious party is often made to pay more than the matter in dispute is worth."

This

This sermon is "inscribed to a Lady, who does honour to her native parish, Deal, Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, the learned translator of 'Epietetus,' the ingenious author of 'A Collection of Poems,' and a rare example of inward greatness, unaffected wisdom, and sanctity of manners, with the respect due to great yet modest merit."

128. Ode to Robert Brooke, Esq. Occasioned by the Death of Hyder Ally. By Eyles Irwin, Esq. 4^{to}.

MR. IRWIN has often embellished oriental subjects, far more pleasing than this, with the rich colouring of his poetical pencil. He has now chosen one fit only for a Dante, or a Spagnolette.— "In the structure of these stanzas he had in view (he says) the translation of an ode of Hafez, by the ingenious Mr. Jones." now Sir William, we presume. The gentleman to whom it is addressed, then Capt. Brooke, in the battle of Mulwagle (where Col. Wood commanded), by unexpectedly flanking the enemy's horse with two guns, contributed principally to the success.

"Conspicuous on a doubtful day,
When danger press'd the British force,
Thy martial genius blazon'd forth :
MULWAGLE saw the bold essay ;
And, check'd in his successful course,
The flying foe confess'd thy worth."

The oracular and truly Delphic prediction of a Bramin, whom Hyder consulted on his first entering the Carnatic, in July 1780, that "he would never leave it again," the infants that were daily slain to supply his back with their livers, as a remedy for a malignant boil of which he died, the cruelties exercised by his irregular horse, &c. the horrors of war, famine, &c. are graphically described, but justify what we have said above.

"Relentless minister of death !
Ah rather come in danger's shape,
Where battles rage, and billows roar ;
Hang on the Plague's destroying breath ;
But let Humanity escape
The horrors Famine has in store."

Thousands of poor wretches perished, we are told, in the famine at Bengal in 1770, rather than eat flesh, which their religion forbade. So lamentably and pitifully "Superstition chain'd their minds."

The poem concludes with these animated stanzas :

" 'Tis done—fall'n is the mighty foe !
In notes that joy the Indian race,
Fame winds the Tyrant's solemn knell :
And Fancy hails the show'ry bow,
That went to man returning grace,
And peace to earth reliev'd, to tell.

" Rapt with the thought, the fiery muse
O'er fairy tracts delighted strays,
Through periods big with India's good ;
And lo ! the chosen Man * the views,
Who shaming our degenerate days,
In trials uncorrupted stands.

" For him shall Virtue wreaths prepare,
Where laurels and where myrtle twine,
And olive and th' untading bower :
Come Helen †, Phœbus' vot'ry fair !
To numbers bland his praise consign,
Or to thy pencil's magic power.

" Nor thou, my friend, shall trivial hold
Thy interest in the pleasing change,
Which o'er th' Atlantic whispers peace ;
Kilbegg shall fill her Brooke, unfold :
Content his native fields to range,
The ardours of the soldier cease.

" Or if thy active mind assume Pursuits of elegance or use,
Whence poverty and toil rejoice ‡,
The barren moor, or sleeping loom,
Shall unexpected fruits produce,
And wake for thee Lerne's voice."

129. The Religious Use of Botanical Philosophy. A Sermon preached at the Church of Saint Leonard, Shoreditch, on Whittun-Tuesday ||, June 1, 1784, on the Wisdom of God, as displayed in the Vegetable Creation. By William Jones, M. A. F. R. S. 410.

WE have often had occasion to admire Mr. Jones, both as a naturalist and a divine; but never more than in the discourse before us, in which those two characters are happily united. The anniversary that gave rise to it was established, we think, by the will of Mr. Fairchild, a gardener at Hoxton. It is very properly dedicated to Sir Joseph Banks, P. R. S. who "went abroad,"

* We are left to guess at this patriot; but suppose him to be the Governor-general.

† Nor have we any clue to direct us to this fair poetess and painter, but think we shall not be mistaken in applying it to Miss Helen Williams, the elegant author of "Peru." "Bengal" would supply her with as affecting, as shocking a picture.

‡ "The approbation and encouragement which this gentleman's undertakings have received from the Irish parliament, is the best reward that public spirit can aspire to. To fertilise the sunny waste, and to improve the manufactures of his native country by imitations of foreign products, will ensure a more desirable reputation to a wise man, than the toils of war, and the trophies of victory."

|| Should not this have been "Whit-Tuesday?"

the dedicator says, "with all the botany of his own country, and added to it that of the terraqueous globe; like a vessel that carries out the commodities of Britain, and returns laden with the riches of the world."

The text is taken from Gen. i. 12: "And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good." The goodness displayed in this part of the creation, the preacher observes, is manifested, I. in the form and structure of vegetables; II. in the manner of their growth; III. in their natural uses; IV. in their moral uses, for the advancement of human prudence and religious faith. On these four heads Mr. Jones enlarges with great strength of reasoning and elegance of language. To quote all the striking passages would be to quote the whole, as an admired preacher indeed did, soon after its publication, in one of our cathedrals.—Our limits will only admit one or two specimens.

"The parts generally observable in plants are a root, a stalk, branches, leaves, flowers, fruit, and seeds. Succeeding each other in their order, and all seeming necessary to each other; but under the direction of divine wisdom, vegetable life is carried on in every possible form, and the end of fructification is attained, while the means seem to be wanting; as if providence meant to shew us, that it is not confined to any particular means; and that the work of God in this respect essentially differs from the work of man. The Capillary plants, or Ferns, have neither stalks, nor branches, nor flowers, but consist of single leaves on the pedicles, with seeds on the backs of them. The flower of the Carline Thistle sits upon the ground without a stalk; while the Euphorbium, or Torch-thistle, has nothing but a stalk, like the staff of a spear. The melon-thistle is all fruit; the Opuntia, or Indian fig, all leaf; the Jessamin has a flower without a seed; the Fig-tree has a fruit without a flower. The Tuber terra, or Truffle, has neither leaf, stem, branch, flower, nor seed; nothing but a globular root, which thrives under ground, and does not appear to be fed by fibres, like other roots; yet it increases and multiplies."

The sleep and perspiration of plants, happily investigated by modern naturalists, and, above all, their medicinal virtues, give ample scope to this Christian orator. With a view, particularly, we suppose, to antimony, he ingeniously observes,

"There is certainly a momentum in mineral preparation, which produces sudden and great effects; but the power approaches too near to violence; while the vegetable medicines, ordained for such by the Creator, are more congenial to the human constitution; and thus a reasonable alliance is preserved between the medicine of man and the diet of man; but we never eat minerals, though we use them in medicine! often with some good, but also with the danger of some bad effect. The mineral materials of a volcano will warm us, as the fuel of any other fire, but at the same time they may suffocate, or send down ruin on our heads."

Jotham's parable in the Book of Judges, the most ancient fable extant, and our Saviour's similar allusion to the natural state and condition of plants and flowers, are happily introduced; the transient nature of those vegetables gives occasion to the usual moral reflections; and the revival of seeds and roots aptly illustrates the resurrection.—In conclusion, after observing how a right use of this subject contributes to the happiness and dignity of man, whether he contemplates the beauty, variety, or uses of plants,

"Happiest of all," says the preacher, is "he, who having cultivated herbs and trees, and studied their virtues, and applied them for his own and for the common benefit, rises from thence to a contemplation of the great Parent of good, whom he sees and adores in these his glorious works. The world cannot shew us a more exalted character than that of a truly religious philosopher, who delights to turn all things to the glory of God; who from the objects of his sight derives improvement to his mind, and in the glass of things temporal sees the image of things eternal. Let a man have all the world can give him; he is still miserable, if he have a groveling, unlettered, indelicate mind. Let him have his gardens, his fields, his woods, and his lawns, for grandeur, ornament, plenty, and gratification; while at the same time God is not in all his thoughts. And let another have neither field nor garden; let him only look at nature with an enlightened mind, a mind which can see and adore the Creator in his works; can consider them as demonstrations of his power, his wisdom, his goodness, his truth; this man is greater, as well as happier, in his poverty, than the other in his riches. The one is but little higher than a beast, the other but a little lower than an angel!"

 The Author of the Curialia (reviewed p. 763) presents his respectful compliments to Mr. Urban, and begs leave to refer to p. 1. of Part II. of that work, from whence it will appear, by a note, that the Memoir had the honour of being read before the Society of Antiquaries March 21, 1782, when the Dean of Exeter was President.—As to Lord Walden, it was an oversight.

ON LORD MANSFIELD FALLING, WITH LADY EDWARD BENTINCK, FROM A BENCH IN THE BALL-ROOM AT TUNBRIDGE-WELLS, AND LOSING HIS WIG. BY A LADY.

WHO would not think it perfect bliss,
In such a gallant cause as this,
With such a fair to fall?
How could a courtier be afraid?
When youth and beauty claim'd his aid,
The sacrifice was small.

Fair nymph! for thee, the rustic 'squire
Would leave his hounds; the bard his lyre,
His quill, and laurel crown;
The monk would cease to count his beads,
The pilgrim throw aside his weeds,
The senator his gown.

Mourn not, ye judges, when we tell,
"How from the bench Earl Mansfield fell;"

For Justice thus replies:

"Without a wig, without a gown,
He still must equally be known,
Pre-eminently wise.

"Not to an outward form confin'd,
His bright, his comprehensive mind,
In every dress the same,

"Diffuses o'er the world its ray,

"And, keeping death and time at bay, Glows with one steady flame."

ON THE SAME. BY LADY.

WHEN he, to whom Astræa gave her
laws,
Became endanger'd by a trivial cause,
The Goddess caught, and sav'd the falling sage,
And bade his wisdom bless another age.

AN INVOCATION TO THE NYMPH OF THE SPRING AT TUNBRIDGE-WELLS, ON LORD MANSFIELD'S HAVING EX-PRESSED AN INTENTION OF LEAV-ING THE PLACE. BY A LADY.

ARISE, fair Naiad! from thy well;
Arise, and tune thy vocal shell,
Try every soft bewitching art,
To charm the ear, and please the heart,
'Till Mansfield shall thy voice obey,
And near thy spring consent to stay.
Sweetly warble in his ear,
"Health, and all her train, are here;
"Health, whose liberal hand bestows
"Nights of undisturb'd repose,
"Hours of social mirth and glee,
"Days of soft tranquillity."
Nymph! at thy pellucid spring
Ruddy Health delights to dwell,
Fanning, with her magic wing,
The mineral sparks that fill thy well,
And o'er the surface of the stream
Hope sheds her fascinating beam.
Bacchus, rosy god of wine,
Must to thee the palm resign.

His sweets nectarious may impart
A short-liv'd banquet to the heart;
May dissipate the gloom of care,
And shield the sufferer from despair;
May bid the slave forget his chains,
The exil'd wretch his native plains,
And by a transient joy suspend
The anguish of an injur'd friend.
Yet long the vision cannot last;
With reason, sorrow's force returns;
The dream of happiness is past,
The slave perceives his chain, and mourns.
Again the lover feels his pains,
Again the injur'd friend complains;
The artificial spirits cease to blaze,
And weaken'd nature rapidly decays.
But thou, O Nymph! canst cheer mankind;
Invigorate the drooping mind;
Bid faded Beauty re-assume
Her sprightly grace, her roseate bloom;
Give spirit to the languid eye,
And banish from the breast Dejection's sigh;
While o'er thy sparkling fountain bends
The wisest judge, the best of friends;
Nymph of the stream! indulgent heaven
The grateful task to thee has given,
To bid him from thy well receive
The renovating draught,—and live.
Thy power has made those eyes benign
With all their former lustre shine.
Science and Art no longer mourn,
Again they see his health return,
And hear his tuneful lips dispense
The words of purest eloquence.

ANSWER OF THE NYMPH OF THE SPRING
AT TUNBRIDGE-WELLS, TO THE IN-VOCATION WRITTEN ON LORD
MANSFIELD'S DECLARED IN-TENTION OF LEAVING THE PLACE. BY A GENTLEMAN.

SAY, whence that voice, which thus so sweetly sings,
Around the margin of my healing springs?
Has any sister of th' harmonious Nine
Left fair Castalia's fount to visit mine?
But ah! not one of all the Muses' choir,
Nor the soft warblings of a Burrell's lyre,
Nor all the various arts which mostly please,
The bliss of friendship, and the love of ease,
Can longer here invite a Mansfield's stay.
The public welfare hastens him away.
Enliven'd by my streams, and purer air,
Britannia's health is now his only care.
"And lo! Astræa, with a solemn call,
Remands her favourite to her sacred hall,
To poise again her scales with equal hand,
And due obedience with her sword command,
Whilst from his seat, with reverential awe,
He speaks the oracles and voice of law."
For such high duties heaven at first design'd.
The Patriot Sage—a blessing to mankind,
Thus spake the Naiad, from her wat'ry cell,
And Mansfield bids, with wishful lingering look,—Farewell.

VERSES INSCRIBED TO LORD MANSFIELD, AFTER HIS LEAVING TUNNRIDGE-WELLS, 1784.
BY A GENTLEMAN OF THAT PLACE.

WHILST Mansfield here, as good as great,

Adorn'd this healthful blest retreat,
Our suns with brighter lustre shone,
Our hours more cheerfully pass'd on;
The Muses tun'd their sweetest song,
And harmonis'd the festive throng;
The Loves and Graces form'd the ball,
And social pleasures gladden'd all.

But since Astræa call'd away
Her's and our pride—how dull the day!
How chang'd the scene!—A silent gloom
Shades every walk, and every room;
Forlorn, the nymphs and swains retire,
And mute is Burrell's vocal lyre;
Our rural plains around all seem to mourn,
And join the general prayer for his return.

L I N E S *

ON
SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS'S
Being presented with the Freedom of The PAINTERS' COMPANY,

OCTOBER 18, 1784,
The Annual Feast of St. Luke, their Patron.

HAIL! favour'd Master of that art divine,

Which bids all Nature on the canvas shine;
That ever-beauteous, ever-friendly art,
Which wakes the feelings, and which warms
the heart;

Which to our eyes restores the mighty dead,
And bids upfading laurels deck their head:
The lily mingled with the blushing rose,
Which on the cheek of Beauty transient
blows,

By thee pourtray'd, can time and fate defy,
And still with mimic beauty charm the eye.

Thus lovely Thais †, from the Master's hand, [brand:
Still blooms in youth, and still she grasps the Her power the haughty victor well might own,

If such her charms as from thy pencil shewn.

When beauteous Dido's ‡ bleeding form
we see, [thee,
And view what once she was, display'd by
We scorn Æneas for the fancied wrong,
Yet praise the poet's sweetly-erring song,
Who form'd a tale so tender, tho' untrue,
Which borrows fame from Maro and from you.

* Delivered to the Master in Office, Cha.
Catton, Esq.—Mr. Josiah Sarney, Mr. Dan.
Willshen, Wardens.—Mr. Tho. Jones,
Master elect.—Mr. William Sharpe, Mr.
Ralph Masey, Wardens elect.

† Alluding to a painting of Sir Joshua's.
‡ Another of his pieces.

Thus can thy magic pencil bring to fight
The charms of Virtue in each varied light,
And steadfast Faith ||, or melting Hope ||, display; [sway.

We feel their beauties, and we own their
But cease, vain Muse, nor too advent'rous soar,

Each happy work of Reynolds to explore;
Some pen more favour'd should record his
fame,

Some happier poet celebrate his name:
Full blest the bard, if artless lines like these,
Grac'd by that name, can for a moment
please;

That moment granted to peruse the lay,
Whilst he forgives the homage which you pay.

And ye Protectors § of that pleasing art,
Which warms, which animates, the feeling
heart;

Which bids the pencil's vivid colours glow
With all the radiance of the heavenly bow;
Who boast a Thornhill's, Aggas', Lambert's
name **,

Now add a Reynolds to your roll of fame,
In whose bright character, well pleas'd, we find

Genius and Virtue happily combin'd.
May you still flourish opulent and great,
Your country's pride, till time's remotest
date!

Health, wealth, and honour, may you ever
share,

Still worthy Cattons dignify your chair;
To future ages Reynolds be restor'd,
And future Wests and Copleys grace your board!

Painters'-Hall, }
Oct. 18. } A CITY MOUSE.

MR. URBAN,
THE following Ballad possibly may be worth inserting in your Magazine. It was suggested by a real fact, which lately happened in an obscure village:—a beautiful country girl was debauched, under a promise of marriage, by a man whom she passionately loved. Upon her proving pregnant, she was forsaken by him; in consequence of which she died soon after, of a broken heart. But, what is most remarkable, she foretold the day of her death some time before her decease.

ROSALINE'S DYING COMPLAINT TO HER SLEEPING CHILD.

ALAS, my dearest baby!
I grieve to see thee smile;
I think upon thy rueful lot,
And cold's my heart the while.

|| Other pieces.

§ Address to the Painters' Company.

 Alluding to the paintings of those Masters in the Hall.

Gaiist

Gainst wind and tide of worldly woe
I cannot make my way;
To lull thee in my bosom warm,
I fear I must not stay;

My mother will not hear me speak,
My father knits his brow;
O Venus, were they never young,
That thus they treat me so?

Ye souls unkind, a fate like mine
O never may ye prove;
Nor live to find how bitter 'tis
To lose the man ye love.

My friends they all forsake me,
Nor comfort will afford;
They laugh while I am thinking
"My true love broke his word."

May God amend their cruel hearts,
For surely they 're to blame!
They little know what 'tis to feel
The heaviness of shame.

Th' ungentle hand of rude Mischance
Has 'rest my heart of rest;
And frighten'd Hope, with cheerless eye,
Lies strangled in my breast.

'Twas yesternight, at latest hour,
I waked but to weep;
I kiss'd my baby's pretty hand,
And watch'd it while asleep.

Its cruel far-off father
My tender thoughts embrac'd;
And, in my darling's infant look,
His lovely likeness trac'd.

With smileless look the spectre Death
Advancing seem'd to appear;
And Fancy toll'd the death-bell slow,
Across my startled ear.

Full well I knew its loathsome voice,
That sternly seem'd to say,
"Go, hie thee to the clay-cold turf,
"For thou must die to day."

*To the MEMORY of Miss MARIA LINLEY.
By Capt. THOMPSON.*

*Esbia puella, vale!
Cara Maria, vale!*

IF truth, if virtue, innocence; and grace,
May in celestial records claim a place,
Linley, thy name is, with an angel's pen,
Written on golden leaves by faintest men!
If wit, if beauty, modesty, and sense,
Met earth's applause, or heaven's high recompence;
If e'er an angel left the solar sphere,
To fix in wonder every eye and ear,
'Twas thou, Maria—whose superior grace
Prov'd thee descended of celestial race;
Prov'd thee design'd to mitigate our care,
And raise our minds to know what angels are!
Maria dear, adieu! and from th' abode
Of saints, bestow thy light to point the road;
That by thy radiance we may gain the sky,
And pass with thee a bless'd eternity.

E X T E M P O R E.
EPITAPH ON GEO. ALEXAN. STEVENS,
THE FAMOUS LECTURER ON HEADS,
By Capt. THOMPSON.

A SECOND Alexander here lies dead;
And not less sam'd—as taking off a head.

ON a handsome marble monument, with a head of the Bishop against the wall, inclosed within iron rails, in the S. E. corner of the nave of Worcester cathedral:

M. S.

Viri admodum Revdi JACOBI JOHNSON,
Qui optimam indolem feliciter promovit
Collegii primum Westmonasteriensis, Deinde Aedis Christi, Alumnus.

Erat

Ingenio culto et urbano,
Animo temperato et æquabili,
Summa in suo, pietate et munificentia;
Studio in amicos ardentissimo,
Benevolentia erga omnes,

Insignis.

Aliquando scholæ Westmonastii Hypodi-dicalus,

Exinde Ecclesiæ Paulinæ Londinæ Preben-darius,

Consecratus anno MDCCLII Episcopus
Gloucester,

Postea MDCCLIX Vigornium translatus,

Ubi duas episcopales domos

Splendide et eleganter

Restauravit.

Ob omnia presulis officia rite præstita

Clero suo totique Diocesi

Acceptissimus.

Tandem dum Bathoniæ salutis ergo degebat,

Ab equo præcipitatus

Morte

Flebili heu et peno repentina,

Sed pio proboque viro nunquam intempestiva,

Abreptus est

A. D. MDCCLXXIV. Æt. suæ septuagesimo.

E P I T A P H
IN ELMSTEAD CHURCH, KENT.

SACRED to the memory of Sir JOHN HONYWOOD, Baronet, of Evington, in this parish;
Who, in times when hospitality and simplicity of manners
were giving way to fashion and refinement, maintained them pure and uncorrupt;
and was an eminent example of the virtues of private life.

In religion, of serious and unaffected piety;
in morals, of strict honesty and integrity;
in social life, of openness and freedom of conversation,

amongst all ranks of men.

His tenants, neighbours, and those who starved him,

never experienced from him oppression,
but all the good offices of kindness and benevolence.

Thus did many partake of the influence of his example, and the affluence of his fortunes.

Others may have moved in an higher sphere, but no man ever contributed more to the advantage, comfort, and happiness of the circle round him.

By his first wife, Annabella, daughter of William Goodenough,
of Langford, in the county of Berks, Esq.
he had issue, William *, Edward, Annabella, Christiana, Mary, Thomasine.

By his second wife, Dorothy, daughter of Sir Edward Filmer, of East Sutton, in this county, bart. he had issue,
Filmer, John, and Mary.

He died June 21, 1781, aged 71.

MR. URBAN, Lowriston, Sept. 14.

AT an inn on the north road, the proprietor has most laudably set up a small but select library for the entertainment of travellers. For their further amusement, he has likewise provided a large blank paper book, called the Album, in which every person that comes to the library is expected to write some passage, in prose or verse, either quotations or original productions. The following verses belong to the latter class, and have never appeared in print.

Yours, &c.

R. B.

WAITER, make haste, bring here the Album;

Do you think, sir, I'll live in thralldom,
And not write verses when I please,
Reville, lampoon, and satirize

The men and manners of the age?

Know, sir, these lines will grace your page.

The waiter, trembling, brings the book,
With consternation in his look,

Muttering these words, "I vow to Gad,

"All travellers, now, sure are mad.

"Physicians, lawyers, grave divines,

"Mind nothing now but writing lines;

"Instead of calling, What's to drink?

"The constant roar is, Pen and ink.

"Sad times, indeed! As I'm a sinner,

"They neither think of drink nor dinner.

"O Gardentone, this book remove †,

"If this poor village thou dost love;

"And if it is not done in time,

"Poor Murdoch ‡ may take down his sign."

MR. URBAN,

I WAS so pleased (many years ago) with reading an epitaph over the west door of Harlow church, Essex, in memory of Thomas Norrlington, limner and organist there,

*. Father of the present baronets.

†. The landlord.

‡. The innkeeper.

that I could not forbear copying it, especially as it was then almost, and is since quite, obliterated.

Yours, &c.

W. S.

INGENIOUS shade! whose happy art
Such various wonders can impart,
Thy graces and thy beauties shine,
And charm in every touch and line.
Soon as thy hand the influence gives;
The metal speaks, the canvas lives;
Thy colours bid the dead arise,
Thy notes exalt them to the skies.

He died January 22, 1722, aged 33 years.

ON SEEING MR. POPE OFTEN RIDE OUT WITH MR. CHESELDEN IN THE CHARIOT OF THE LATTER.

WHEN Hulse, for some trifling unorthodox jests,
As an atheist was censur'd by bigots and priests,
The politic Doctor, to remove the reproach,
For six months with a parson was seen in his coach.

When Cheselden saw this device had success,
He conceiv'd, in some sort, it might suit his own case;

Then with Pope by his side, in the pride of his soul,

"Now, d— you," says he, "now say I'm
"a fool."

MR. URBAN,

THE following epitaph abounds with wit, and was written by the hon. H—E—, late L—d A—te of S—d.

HIC jacet THOMAS YOUNG, M.D.

Obstet. Profess. in Acad. Edin.

qui ob. 1783, æt. 58.

Qui Venerem sine Lucina,

Lucinam sine Venere,

Coluit.

Filios post mille

Reipublicæ datos,

Heu, heu,

Sine liberis decessit.

Bella inter intestina

Manu fortis, sed sine Marte.

Patriæ laboratoris

Nomen adeptus est.

ON A GRAVESTONE FOR JOSEPH CHAPMAN, A TALLOW-CHANDLER, IN THE CHURCH-YARD AT BISHOP STORTFORD,
HERTS.

LIKE leaves of trees the race of man is found,
Now green in youth, now withering on the ground;

Another race the following spring supplies,
They fall successive, and successive rise.

So generations in their course decay;

So flourish these when those are pass'd away.

PROCEEDINGS

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

(CONTINUED FROM P. 786.)

Wednesday, July 21.

ON the order of the day being read, for the House to go into a committee. on the bill relative to fortifications to be built for the defence of the dock-yards; it was moved, as an instruction to the committee, that they have power to make compensation to such persons as may have been sufferers by their lands being taken from them. On the question being put, that the Speaker do leave the chair;

Mr. Huffey objected to it. He was, he said, an enemy to vast and expensive fortifications; besides, as there was no estimate before the House, though only 50,000*l.* was asked, he doubted whether 500,000*l.* would defray the charge: another objection was to the indiscriminate seizure of lands without making proper satisfaction to the owners, and to the withholding of lands from the owners which upon trial were found not to be wanted.—These persons, he thought, were fairly entitled to satisfaction, and wished a jury to be appointed, to assess the quantum, and not to leave it to the mercy of commissioners, who, he understood, were to be the assessors on the occasion.

Mr. Fitzpatrick also opposed the Speaker's leaving the chair; and stated, that the fortifications at Portsmouth had already cost 200,000*l.* and were not two-thirds finished; that, Portsmouth being insufficient to contain its inhabitants, the number of houses built at both ends, and in the centre of the fortifications, rendered the defence intended by them in a great measure ineffectual.

Capt. James Luttrell, surveyor of the ordnance, supported the motion. He stated the necessity of fortifications; and instanced the deplorable situation of the nation, when the French fleet under D'Orvilliers lay off Plymouth, and with what ease that admiral might have made himself master of, and destroyed the place.

Lord Bessborough remarked, that last year he was for postponing the business, because there was then no estimates before the House; and the Rt. Hon. Gentleman [Mr. Pitt] was of the same opinion: probably he may have received some new lights to induce him to be now of another mind; but the House has not. He therefore declared against voting 50,000*l.* for a business which might, before it was finished, cost 500,000*l.* The Board of Ordnance always wished to have large works going on, because of the concomitant advantages attending them. Such large expenditures gave patronage to engineers, sub-engineers, sergeants of the works, and a variety of other emoluments; which, with the contracts and contractors, made comfortable pickings for other-wise unnecessary clerks and other officers. He reprobated the motion.

Mr. Rolls likewise declared against plans which were injurious to individuals, without being beneficial to the public. He stated so-veral instances which bore hard on the proprietors of lands; Sir John St Aubin, the High Sheriff of Devon, and Mr. Carew, had lands taken from them; the latter had his lawn, his gardens, his pleasure grounds destroyed, and a fortification erected at his door, and no adequate satisfaction made him for the injury he had received.

GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

Mr. Rushleigh stated the hardship of Mr. Carew's case, and pointed out the vulnerable part of Plymouth as far removed from the place of that gentleman's residence, which was unnecessarily defaced.

Capt. Berkely enforced the necessity of fortifications; and particularly those at Plymouth, where, with an easterly wind and smooth water, troops might be landed, even though our ships had the command of the Channel. We could not command the elements. He gave two reasons for fortifications; one to prevent a coup de main; the other to prevent the desertion of our own men.

Mr. Steele observed, that the present bill went to invest the Ordnance with power to purchase lands, and to re-invest the owners of other lands, whose property had not been wanted; and not, as some gentlemen would insinuate, to enable them to take away any gentleman's property without a compensation.

The original motion was then put, and carried; and the House went into a committee, Mr. Gilbert in the chair, who began reading the different clauses; and when he came to that which appoints commissioners to value lands, &c.

Mr. Huffey rose, and proposed an amendment, viz. to substitute a jury instead of commissioners.

Mr. Fitzberbert seconded the motion, and inveighed against the injustice of empowering the master-general of the Ordnance, first to sell the land, and then to appoint commissioners to value it.

Capt. Luttrell was against juries, who, being on the spot, might be partial to the owners.

Mr. Powney was for the amendment being amended, by appointing the jury from another country.

Mr. Edm approved of the last proposition.

Mr. Pitt thought the commissioners appointed by the master general of the Ordnance the proper judges.

The House resolved itself into a committee on the India regulating bill, Sir G. Howard in the chair, who again read the clause for establishing a new court of Judicature (see p. 786.) which was again and again canvassed and contested.

Mr. Sheridan insisted on the minister's promise (see p. 785.), to consider this clause separately, and to make it a distinct bill.

Mr. Pitt denied any such promise, either direct or implied; but admitted many alterations, which went, in a great measure, to meet the ideas of the gentlemen in opposition; and at length it was agreed to.

The

find all those striking remarks and solid propositions resolved by the last Speaker into a few verbal omissions and critical emendations. He could account for this, he said, on no other principle than that the Hon. Gentleman had given into his infirmity, and had been napping all the whole time the Hon. Mem. was speaking. He acknowledged that the bill had undergone many very material alterations and corrections; but there certainly were many more necessary before it should pass into a law; he was therefore most strenuously for re-committing it.

Mr. Martin said, he did not know that drowsiness was any part of the character of the noble Lord who spoke last; but this he knew, that, if his Lordship had slept from the hour he was born to the present day, it had been happy for this country; for to him and his measures all the confusion and all the distresses we are now lamenting are to be ascribed.

The question being put on several amendments collected from the remarks in Mr. Sheridan's speech, the same were agreed to; after which, the report was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

Tuesday 27.

Mr. Pitt moved, for leave to bring in a bill to authorise his Majesty, to continue for a longer time the intercourse between Great-Britain and America. The question being put, granted.

Wednesday 28.

The above bill was brought in, read the first time, and a motion made, for reading the same a second time; when

Mr. Aikin rose, and expressed some dissatisfaction at the precipitancy of the measure. The question involved many propositions of the highest importance to the commerce of this country, and, whenever it was formally and effectually brought forward, the W. India merchants were ready to substantiate every fact which they had asserted in their petition.

Mr. Pitt declared, that his object went to the identical point which the Hon. Gent. seemed to have in view. He was purposely guarded, that the question might not be prejudged in any degree whatever, but left altogether open, to the full and free discussion of the House.

The House then resolved itself into a committee on the bill concerning the new duty on hackney coaches, the Marquis of Graham in the chair. These regulations took place on the 4th of September.—When a coach is hired only for a few hours, the first hour continues at the old rate of 1s. 6d. but every hour after is to be raised 6d. A coach is 14s. 6d. per day. The fare of a mile and one half as before only 1s. but every fare above that one sixpence more than it is now.

Mr. Burke rose, he said, to disburden his mind of a very serious matter, to which he must crave a few moments attention from the House.

The Reports which had been laid before the House from certain Committees appointed by the last Parliament to enquire into the state of the East India Company's affairs had been very strangely misrepresented in another place. A character of great dignity and weight, to whom, he did not doubt, many wise and many good men looked up as an oracle, had lately, on a very solemn occasion, and for a very obvious purpose, endeavoured to fix the stamp of falsehood on the Reports of that Committee. These Reports are now before the House, and he called upon the honourable and learned gentleman [Mr. D—dax], who had lately published them in six volumes folio, to support him in bringing them to the test, in order that a clear and indisputable opinion of their veracity may be formed, and formed in such a manner as to preclude all contradiction for the future. This, he said, he meant to do, either to recover the credit of the Committee in which he was concerned, or to expose its insignificance and tendency to impose on the House that information for true which should be found to be false.—No reply was made.

Chas. of Ex. bequer acquainted the House, that in consequence of what had been suggested at some meetings, that had been held with the holders of navy bills and ordnance debentures, he had re-considered the subject, and found it advisable to allow one per cent. addition to the three last classes, but the first to stand as it did originally. To this proposition he thought no reasonable objection could be made.

Mr. Fox strongly opposed this mode of commutation, and insisted that it went to the absolute and entire ruin of all public credit.

Mr. H—ffy opposed it likewise on the same ground. And

Mr. Hammer represented in a very striking manner the cruelty and injustice of the proceeding. He said, the fortunes of many people were embarked in this branch of public support, and their subsistence or ruin depended on the due course of payment, according to the established rules of government.—He insisted, therefore, that the public faith could no otherwise be preserved, than by paying one hundred pounds for every hundred pounds advanced, or to give to the creditors what should be fairly deemed an equivalent.

Mr. Dampier wished no division might take place, lest the public should be unnecessarily alarmed.

Lord North joined in the same wish; for, should the question be negatived, it would then be understood, that a bill which was brought in at the instance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be adopted; and, therefore, the gentlemen with whom he acted, by giving up one obnoxious measure, would open a way for another still more objectionable, and more severe upon the bill-holders.

Mr. Fox was struck by the force of the noble Lord's remark, and the resolution offered by the minister was carried.

Mr. Pitt informed the committee, that the letters

others from the commission of the like crime, nor must you desist till this is effected; I cannot prescribe the means; but to guard myself against the obloquy to which I may be exposed by a forced misconstruction of the order, ~~and~~ I think it proper to forbid, and protest against the use of any fraudulent artifice or treachery to accomplish the end which I have prescribed: and as Ten alone is contrary to the orders, your will of course observe the secret, that it may not transpire. But I repeat my recommendation of it as one of the first and most essential duties of your office."

Maj. Scott was sorry the right hon. gentleman who moved for the papers was not present, as he might probably, on the perusal of them, have made some motion expressive of his mistake, as what he had said had given rise to a report that the man was actually murdered.—As the report, therefore, if not contradicted, might do much mischief to the character of the hon. gentleman said to have given the orders, he must move to have the papers printed, which was agreed to.

The order of the day was then read, for receiving the Report of the Committee on the Struggling Bill, which Mr. Arden moved might be recommitted, and it was agreed to.
(To be concluded next month.)

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 3.

AS the influence of misrepresentation and prejudice seems not yet to have subsided, notwithstanding the long and peculiar hardships which Col. G—— of the Guards has suffered from a late unhappy transaction; and as there may still be some of his profession who are unacquainted with his having taken the earliest opportunity of vindicating his injured honour; I beg leave to submit to the candour of the impartial public, through the channel of your respectable Magazine, the following authentic facts; and you will oblige, &c.

L. T. I.

IT appears that, in the month of June 1783, the officers belonging to Col. G——'s corps were assembled for the purpose of taking his conduct with regard to the late Col. T—— into consideration; and at that meeting, it appeared to be their opinion, that Col. G—— had not pursued the measures that were most likely to vindicate his injured fame. It was the misfortune of Col. G—— to be absent from this meeting, as it must naturally be supposed that, had the gentlemen of the corps seen the challenge which he sent to Lieut. Col. T—— at New-York, on the 15th of October 1780, together with his answer (both which are here subjoined), they could not have thought that he had not taken proper steps to vindicate his injured reputation, at an early and seasonable period; and by the tenor of the unfortunate Col. T——'s refusal at that time, they must also have been convinced, that Col. T—— himself had limited the season for satisfaction, and that the late hour was an hour of his own fixing. It was likewise a circumstance not favourable to Col. G——, in the decision of his corps, that, among those who sat in judgment on his private conduct, there were twenty-seven very respectable young men whom he never had even the honour to see, owing to his being six years absent upon service in America, and the very rapid promotion which during that time took place in the regiment.—These gentlemen (without being uncharitable in suggestion), it is possible, might have been biased in their judgments, and deceived by reports, not founded on truth, soon after the return of his accuser to Europe in the month of November 1780. It is further to be observed, that these are but six officers of the third regiment of guards now alive in the corps, who were in America the campaign of 1780, from the period the brigade went into the Jerseys, where the ground of this quarrel originated, on the 6th or 7th of June, until they embarked for Virginia, on the 16th of October; consequently there were but six officers who could be acquainted with the merits of the reduced Col. G——'s private conduct, with regard to the vindication of his honour: and as his first challenge to Col. T—— was dated on the morning of the 15th of October, the day preceding their embarkation, it is more than probable that those six officers did not know this challenge had been sent.—In this view, the whole meeting of his corps might have concluded, that Col. G——'s first call on Col. T——, for vindication, the 20th of June 1783, was the first demand he had made of him for reparation of his injured character, especially as the language which Col. T—— had fancied to use, upon declining Col. G——'s second invitation, seems intended to make it appear to that meeting (which it is said to have been laid before) as the first, or only challenge he could have received, (vide Col. T——'s answer to that challenge, in Col. G——'s trial at the Old Bailey, the 27th of last month); whereas the demand which Col. G—— had made on Col. T——, in October 1780, was dated the very first moment it was in his power to make it, consistent with the nature of Col. T——'s situation, from the court martial, which (at the instance of a previous court of enquiry) had taken place upon him, and the hope which Col. G—— then looked for of a Curia Militari on himself.—In consequence of the actual column of the late Col. T——, Colonel G—— has

in

in the course of four anxious years, in the vindication of his injured honour, had, in a public and private manner, three trials for his life: in the event, happily for him, all most honourable.—In the first trial before a General Court Martial, on the 4th of September 1782, at New York, he “was honourably acquitted of the whole and every part of the charge exhibited against him,” (and here it is but proper to remark, that the delay of his M——y’s most gracious pleasure on Col. G——’s prayer for a Court Martial, together with a combination of vexatious circumstances in the campaigns of 80, 81, and part of 82, put it out of his power to have procured an earlier investigation). In the second trial, in the private vindication of his injuries, (when his opponent, or he himself, must have fallen) it was the will of Providence the aggressor should fall, and the oppressed escape wounded. This took place on the 4th of September 1783, and seems to be a particular event in the order of things.—On this fatal decision, at the Ring in Hyde-Park, it is hoped that Col. G——n’s most prejudiced foes will do justice to his conduct. It was then the lot of Col. G——n to become an exile for the fourth year under a shocking imputation, from a cruel verdict of the Crown’s Jury. On the 17th of September 1784, he surrendered himself to the laws of his country, as his last trial, and before the most respectable jurisdiction, he was acquitted by a jury of the county of Middlesex, in the manner that, while it must always reflect honour on their justice and humanity in his peculiar situation, can prove no less flattering and creditable to the reputation and character of Col. G——n!

It must ever be a heartfelt satisfaction to Col. G——n and his friends to recollect, that while his conduct in this unfortunate, and by him unsought-for business, seems to be marked with an uncandid disapprobation by a limited few, the general sentiment of that gallant and generous army, which served in America during the late unfortunate war, have been conveyed most kindly in his favour, through the very flattering and honourable medium of the highest rank of its officers, who, unconnected with the interest of events, only guided by unerring truth, and that superior knowledge of the past proceedings which their attention to duty and local situations afforded them, have nobly stood forth in declaring their sense of Col. G——n’s entire conduct throughout the whole of this unhappy affair.

This is a tribute to character worthy any person’s pride, for with such nice and proper guardians of honour, none but the injured and deserving ever find countenance—the numerous list of high and distinguished officers of that army, with and under whom Col. G——n had the honour to serve in America, who appeared at his late trial (even at a season of the year so inconvenient to their attendance), proves beyond a doubt, that Col. G——n, in their opinions, had omitted no proper step to vindicate his honour, both as an officer and a gentleman, that time, reason, or circumstances could possibly justify.

Nor indeed is it possible for the most vindictive gentleman seriously to lay his hand on his heart and say, that Col. G——n has not vindicated his honour with the exertion of every effort and propriety that man can do, on this side of the grave.

 Copy of Col. G——n’s first Challenge (as mentioned in these Facts) and Col. T——n’s Answer.

“New York, Sunday morning,
15th October, 1780.

“SIR,

“The unwarrantable manner which you have used to traduce my character, makes my claim to personal vindication just in my own opinion, and must in that of the world.

“I desire therefore you will meet me with a friend and two pair of pistols, half an hour after four o’clock this afternoon, on the north-side of Bunker’s Hill Fort, where there is a recluse orchard near.

“I shall be at the White Conduit House, with my friend, at four o’clock, ready to repair to the spot mentioned.

“I am, SIR, your much injured, obedient servant, Cosmo Gordon.”

“Lieut. Col. Thomas.”

“SIR, New York, 15th October, 1780.

In answer to the note which I have just received, I have only this to say, that it appears very extraordinary you should, at this late hour, think yourself entitled to call on me for personal satisfaction. Whether your character has been traduced, the late court martial on me (which, as you know, is still in suspense) must determine.

“You thought your honour required a court martial on me—you obtained it, and no steps were omitted that could tend to my dishonour or ruin.

“If, Sir, you can hereafter prove to the world, that my original accusation (which I thought it my duty to make) was ill-founded, then, and then only, can you be entitled to that satisfaction from me, you, as an injured man, may have a right to demand.

I am, SIR, your most humble servant,
FRED. THOMAS.

“You may spare yourself the trouble of writing any more on the subject.”

N. B. Any officer or gentleman who may be desirous of being convinced of the authenticity of these letters, may see them by applying to Mr. Marley, at the bar of the British Coffee-house, Charing-cross, with whom they are deposited for that purpose.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Constantinople, Sept. 29. Several persons concerned in the late fire (see p. 706) have been seized and put to death. The Topgi Bachi, or chief of the Cannoners, has been dismissed; his disgrace is attributed to want of discipline in his corps, who, instead of using their utmost to extinguish the late fire, committed some excesses themselves.

Extract of a Letter from Paris, Oct. 4.

"Two young Gens d'Armes, who were detained in the Conciergerie, endeavoured to break out. As they met with a little more indulgence than the rest of the prisoners, they found means, by the connivance of a soldier on guard, to procure pistols and ammunition, and fired upon the gaolers, one of whom they killed, wounded another mortally, and severely beat a third; however, being unable to force one of the doors, they found it impossible to escape, and being taken and tried, they were, with a soldier their accomplice, sentenced to be broken on the wheel. On the 13th the sentence was carried into execution; two of them were strangled while they were receiving the blows from the bar; the third, who was the author and chief of the conspirators, was punished in a most severe manner, and survived 18 hours, exposed to the view of the spectators, who were not more surprised at the resignation with which he bore it, than shocked at the severity of the punishment, which for a while interrupted all political conversation. The person who furnished them with arms for their design is mistress of a Scotch nobleman, who has long been in prison for debt, and will soon be tried."

Paris, Oct. 15. By a late convention between this court and Sweden, it is stipulated that the subjects of his most Christian majesty shall be allowed the privilege of establishing warehouses at Gottenberg, for storing all sorts of goods imported either from France or America in French or American bottoms, without being subject to any duties, tolls, or impositions whatever. They likewise may export the same in French or Swedish bottoms. And, as a compensation for the advantages likely to result from the above in favour of his subjects, his most Christian Majesty cedes to the King and Crown of Sweden, in full sovereignty and property for ever, the island of St. Barthelemi, in the West Indies, with all its territories, bays, seas, and harbours, to hold and keep the same in manner as has been enjoyed hitherto by the crown of France.

Brussels, Nov. 8. Accounts have been received here, that last night the Dutch broke one of their dykes near Lillo, by which several persons were drowned. They attempted to break a second, but were prevented by the Imperial troops. This event has spread an alarm at Ostend, and has occasioned an extraordinary diligence in completing the works on the ramparts there.

Lord Gaz. Other papers say, that more than 50 persons were drowned by this precipitate act; and that the whole country from Lillo to Lefsevehoeck and Destract are now entirely under water. They have also opened the sluices between Utrecht and Deederdenandst, and laid that part of the country in the same condition.

"His Imperial Majesty cannot therefore look on this fact but as a declaration of war on the part of the Republic.

"In consequence of which, his majesty has already recalled the baron de Reischach, who has hitherto been his minister at the Hague, with orders to quit Holland without taking leave of the States General, and all the necessary dispositions have been equally made, for assembling without delay, in the Low Countries, an army of 80,000 Imperial troops, which his majesty proposes to augment as circumstances may require."

Letter from Rotterdam to Mr. R. B. a Merchant of Dublin, dated Oct. 16.

"Though the Gazettes have not announced it, you may rely upon it as a fact, that a triple alliance was concluded the 1st or 2d of this month at Paris, between these States and the courts of Berlin and Versailles, whose basis is at all events to support the Barrier Treaty. England will be forced into the war; the Emperor has already called upon your King, in his capacity of Elector, to send his quota of troops to join the others of the circle of Westphalia, under pain of military execution and the ban, in order to compose the army which is to assemble in Brabant in March next."

Hague, Oct. 25. A charge being publicly circulated against the Prince Stadtholder, that his Serene Highness, by a private letter to vice adm. Byland, had forbid his sailing for Brest, contrary to the resolution of their High Mightinesses of the 3d of Oct. 1782, and stating that said letter had been laid before the commissioners appointed by their High Mightinesses, to enquire into the failure of the proposed expedition to Brest; his Highness, feeling himself hurt by so envied a calumny, earnestly requests their High Mightinesses strictly to enquire into that malicious charge, and having convicted themselves of the fallacy of the report, will take such steps as to their wisdom may seem meet, to convince the whole nation. The States General have, in consequence of the above requisition, ordered a copy of it to be sent to their commissioners, that the matter may be fully investigated.

According to letters from Brussels of the 10th inst. General Count de Moutake, grand chamberlain, arrived there the preceding evening from Vienna, in order to prepare for the reception of the Emperor, who was on the way to that part of his Majesty's dominions. The regiments of Lemburg, Brabant, Francfort, and a light corps (La Brulle's) marched on the 7th for Lillo on account count of some disturbances in that neighbourhood. The trade between Brussels and Holland is entirely stopped. The Dutch caravans have all returned home much mortified at what must ultimately tend greatly to their loss.

Advices from Brussels of the 13th instant declare, that most of the German princes have sent the warmest professions to the court of Vienna, of supporting the Emperor in his claim upon the States of Holland; and that his Serene Highness the Duke of Wurtemberg had appointed 2000 men to hold themselves in readiness to march for that purpose.

Paris, Oct. 24. Letters from Bologna mention, that the Sieurs David and Dronais, two young painters in the academy of Paris, in their way to Rome, were, upon the territories of Rome, cruelly murdered. It is added, that this act of barbarity was committed at an inn, and that the wife of the Sieur David and his sister shared the melancholy fate of the young artists.

ADVICES FROM THE EAST INDIES.

The Tortoise packet has brought advices from Madras, of June 12, that the peace with Tippees Sultan is carried completely into effect, by the safe arrival at Madras of all our countrymen who were made prisoners during the war and remained alive. To this account is added the following extract of a letter from an officer, who has commanded one of the Bengal regiments in the Carnatic during the war.

"The prisoners are all daily expected, and some arrived; and the Bengal detachment, which was marched from that presidency in 1781, by col. J. D. Baskin, to our assistance, was sent away on Thursday last.

"The select committee issued their thanks to these brave veterans in terms more expressive of their great merit than I can pretend to write.

"Lt. Macartney reviewed the detachment on Tuesday morning, and was much pleased with their appearance after all the fatigues they had undergone in the Carnatic."

Extract of a Letter from an Officer belonging to the Major East-Indiaman, dated Calcutta, April 30. 1784.

"After experiencing the greatest dangers to which a ship was ever exposed, the ill-fated Major was destroyed by fire between nine and ten o'clock in the morning of the 23d of April, as she lay at her moorings at Calcutta, about 40 miles below Calcutta. The ship had been extremely infested with a kind of beetle called Cockroaches, which eat through every thing; and it was found necessary to fumigate the holds and decks, previous to her receiving her cargo on board, in order to destroy these vermin. In performing this business, by some accident, the fore-hold of the ship caught fire. A large quantity of saltpetre had just been taken on board as ballast. This terrible combustible was instantly in a blaze, and burnt so furiously that all attempts to extinguish the flames proved ineffectual; and in less than half an hour reached the powder magazine, and the ship blew up. Captain Arthur was transacting his business at Calcutta when this melancholy event happened. All the other officers were on board, and every effort was made to save the ship. Mr. Gray, a young gentleman, who acted as fourth mate, was the only officer hurt. He was so much scorched in endeavouring to extinguish the flames, that he lived only two days after the accident. Nine foremast-men were destroyed by the explosion."

Intelligence, it is said, has been received respecting the fate of Gen. Matthews, and some of the English, who were taken prisoners by the troops of Tippee Saib, during the hostilities in the East. It is said, that the above officer experienced the most unparalleled barbarity, by the direction of Tippee himself, which put an end to his life.

ADVICES FROM AMERICA.

Philadelphia, Aug. 10. The American Congress at a late meeting came to the following resolutions: "Whereas it is necessary to expedite the holding treaties with the Indian nations, which it appears cannot be done but under the protection of an armed force; therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary in the War-Office be, and he is hereby directed to order 300 men of the militia, directed to be raised by the act of this day, to be in readiness to march when and to what place or places the commissioners for negotiating with the Indians, or any two of them shall direct; and that the commanding officer of the said troops give such protection to the commissioners as they or any two of them shall require; and that the said Secretary give order to the different keepers of the publick stores to furnish to the order of the commissioners, or any two of them, such tents, marquees, and other articles, as the said commissioners shall think proper.

Philadelphia, Oct. 9. The depredations of the Indians are not yet at an end in this country. Three days ago as Walker Daniel, esq. the State Attorney in this district; Mr. Keightley, of Philadelphia, and a Mr. Johnston, were going from the falls of Ohio to the salt works, about six miles from the works they were attacked by a party of about seven Indians, when Daniel and Keightley were shot dead on the spot, and Johnston was wounded across his breast with a ball, though he fortunately effected his escape. The dead bodies were found scalped, and stabbed in a very barbarous manner.

The above outrages do not seem the worst the Americans have to suffer. The claimants of Connecticut are already in arms, and threaten threaten a civil war if not satisfied in their demands. The events which have already happened, say the commissioners of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, are truly lamentable, and serve to confirm the opinion we have already expressed of the intended violence of the Connecticut claimants, and the distress and sufferings which we are afraid the better subjects of the State are fated to undergo.

Albany, Sept. 16. On Monday evening, his Excellency the Governor of New-York, the Commissioners of Indian Affairs for this State, with a number of gentlemen of this city, returned from Fort-Schuyler, where a treaty has been held with the Six Nations and other Indians residing within this State. We are not informed what has been the subject of this treaty, but the most perfect harmony and good understanding prevailed throughout the whole.

The legislative system for regulating the trade between America and the East-Indies has been issued by the American Congress; and it strongly recommends to the States, and to the traders to that quarter in particular, on no account whatever, to aim at territorial possessions in the East; but to trade quietly and by such regulations as the free ports in China and India allow, and according to the treaties with France and Portugal; and they leave to each separate State a free will to regulate the import duties on East-India goods as they like.

Montreal, Sept. 15. On the night of the 13th inst. a number of Savages broke into a barn of Col. Campbell's farm, at La Chine, with an intent to steal sheep; three men who lay in an adjoining house, being alarmed by the noise they made, arose and went out to know what occasioned it; they had not gone many paces when they were violently assaulted by the Savages, who stabbed one to the heart, knocked another down and cut his throat, and the third with much difficulty made his escape and alarmed the neighbourhood. The Savages, when they found the inhabitants alarmed, made off.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

ON the 18th inst. came on the trial of Behj. Matthews for killing two soldiers of the 9th regiment of dragoons, who attempted, with several others, to rescue Capt. Palliser, who was in his custody for debt. After a trial of some hours, the intended rescue being clearly proved, the jury brought in their verdict—justifiable homicide.

A robbery of a very singular kind was lately committed at Kilmainham, where a baker, in passing by the gate, was called to by one of the prisoners to let him have a loaf, and shewed him the money, which he gave him, and then desired him to divide the loaf, and give it him in at the gate: he had no sooner put the first piece in, than his hand was caught in a noose, and held fast, and the prisoners swore, that if he made the least noise they would cut it off. They then insisted on his giving them all the money he had in his pockets, which the poor man did with his other hand, in order to get the first released. He then made his complaint to the gaoler, but, not being able to identify the robbers, could get no redress.

On the 25th of October, the day appointed for the meeting of the several delegates from the counties and cities in Congress, a very respectable body of gentlemen assembled in the exhibition-room in William-street, Dublin, when Mr. D'Arcy moved, That, previous to their entering upon any business, the gallery should be closed, and that every person not a delegate should be requested to withdraw; which being complied with, Col. W. Sharman, on motion, was unanimously elected president; and John Talbot Ashenhurst, esq. secretary.

They then proceeded to business; and, after three days deliberation, came to the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That the people, in the largest sense of the word, have an undoubted right to state their grievances, to petition for redress, and to propose remedies for the same.

Resolved unanimously, That this right belongs to the people, with peculiar extent and energy, on the subject of parliamentary reform.

Resolved unanimously, That the people have a right to confer with each other, the better to digest such mode of redress as they may wish to recommend to Parliament.

Resolved unanimously, That a reform in the representation of the people in Parliament is indispensably necessary.

Resolved unanimously, That the appointment of this assembly by the people, and the steps they have taken from time to time on this subject, have been constitutional.

Resolved, That this assembly do hereby address the counties and cities, and great towns, who have not yet been represented therein, recommending to each of them respectively to elect delegates for that purpose before the 20th of January next; and to exhort them, as they respect their own consistency, as they wish for the success of a parliamentary reform, and as they tender the perpetual liberty and prosperity of their country, to seize this opportunity of effecting that great and necessary confirmation of the constitution.

The Congress separated, after the usual compliment of thanks to the president, &c.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, Oct. 9. The annual competition for the prizes given by the Highland Society of London, to the best performers on the ancient martial highland great pipe, was held in the assembly-room in this city, where a numerous company of ladies and gentlemen attended. There were sixteen competitors; all of them good pipers. After each of them had had played in succession, the first prize (an elegant pipe having a suitable inscription engraved on a silver-plate elegantly emblazoned, and forty marks) was adjudged to John M'Gregor of Fortingal, who, with the additional merit of having taught above fifty pipers himself, is the eldest of five sons taught by their father John M'Gregor, together with 90 other pipers. The second prize in money was adjudged to Donald Fisher of Bredalbane; and the third to Dougald M'Dougal of Lorn. The money arising from the tickets was distributed among the other competitors, several of whom had come many miles to exert their skill.

At a late meeting of the gentlemen and freeholders of the county of Ross, to take into consideration the late act "for licensing distillers in the Highlands of Scotland," they unanimously came to the following, among other spirited resolutions: That no county, nor any individuals of any county, can be more anxious to have all illegal distilleries suppressed, and to exert themselves to do every thing, compatible with justice and the principles of our constitution, to make every branch of the revenue effectual, than is this county. But they must, with the freedom becoming the subjects of this state, and in justice to themselves and their posterity, declare their conviction, that, if this bill is carried into effect, it will in a few years depopulate the highland parts of the country, and make an estate there not worth the holding.

The act above complained of extends to 17 counties, 12 of which have declared against it, viz. Perth, Inverness, Ross, Argyll, Sutherland, Dunbarton, Aberdeen, Forfar, Kincardine, Banff, Nairn, and Bute; five have declared their assent, viz. Lanark, Clackmann, Caithness, Sutherland, and Murray.

The business of reforming the boroughs is carrying on with spirit, but with great deliberation and decency. It is a fact, that in many boroughs the same persons possess the exclusive right of management in all public affairs; in others the magistrates are self-elected; some boroughs situated in one county have their councils composed of persons who reside in another; others have magistrates who have no property in them, and who reside altogether in London; but the greatest absurdity is, that some of the chief magistrates of towns in the North were during their office employed in the service of G. B. in the East and West Indies. The town of Nairn had very lately a provost in India; a bailie at Inverness, a treasurer who lived many miles from town, and a dean of Guild, who at the same time officiated as a side-waiter at Fort George. These are facts.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Newcastle, Nov. 11. On the 4th instant, a woman who kept a little shop at Walsingham was found strangled in her house by some villains who had robbed her of all her money, and had filled a cask with paper and set it by her, to which they had put a lighted match probably with a view to burn the house; but the paper making a smother waked a little girl that lay in the house, who alarmed the neighbourhood, but not time enough to secure the murderers.

Aberystwith, Oct. 30. This day a very singular murder and suicide was discovered here. Mr. Th. Williams, an agent at this port, who lived in a little cabin by himself, not rising as usual, nor answering when called up, it was thought proper to force the door, when he was found lying on the kitchen floor dead and quite cold, without any wound or violence. On forcing open the door of his bedchamber, a woman, one Mary Jones, was discovered, with whom the deceased was known to have cohabited. Being interrogated concerning the murder, she refused to answer; but it came out by circumstances, that she had first poisoned Williams, and then poisoned herself, for about three o'clock she died. The coroner's jury sat upon the body of the woman, and brought in their verdict Felo de se. She was put in a coffin, and buried in a hole dug near the sea. The coroner, it is said, could not with safety to himself order her to be buried in a cross-way with a stake driven through her, as the superstition of the people is such, that, if she had been so buried, they would have been in dread of her joining those malignant spirits that are supposed to haunt, and have almost depopulated the once flourishing town of Llandbadern Vawr!

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

October 24.

Being the anniversary of the King's accession to the throne, when his Majesty entered into the 25th year of his reign, the Park and Tower guns were fired at 10 o'clock; and in the evening there were illuminations and other demonstrations of joy.

October 25.

Majors Campbell and Johnson of the marines, who went with their seconds to the Continent, to decide their difference in the way of honour (see p. 632.), met in Flanders on the 25th of last month, when a full investigation of the cause of quarrel took place; the consequence of which was a perfect reconciliation between the principals.

October 27.

Capt. Faulkner, of his Majesty's ship Proselyte of 32 guns, arrived at the Admiralty with dispatches from Admiral Campbell at Newfoundland; by which it appears, that the new settlement of Port R. seway had sent two ships to the fishery, which had met with good success; one had sailed for Europe, the other returned home with winter's provisions for the settlement.

October 28.

The Court of Directors of the E. I. Company came to the following resolutions, which which the new board approved and confirmed.

"As peace and tranquillity are now perfectly established throughout India, and this court being sensible that this event has been principally owing to very able and spirited exertions of our governor general and our supreme council;

"Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this court be conveyed to Warren Hastings, esq; for his firm, unwearied, and successful endeavours, in procuring the late peace with the several powers in India.

"Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this court be conveyed to the Supreme Council, for the assistance they have given, in procuring the late peace with the several powers in India.

"Resolved unanimously, That our governor general and council be directed to inform Mr. David Anderson, that this court entertain a proper sense of his masterly conduct in negotiating with the Mahratta powers; and that they shall rank him among those who may have a claim to their favour.

"Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this court be given to the Right Hon. Lord Macartney, for his zeal and activity in the Company's service, and for his assistance in procuring the late peace in India."

October 29.

This day was landed at the custom-house, the valuable collection and library of the late celebrated Lionzus, purchased by a private gentleman in Suffolk, as mentioned in a former Magazine.

An express arrived at the Marquis of Carmarthen's office with dispatches from Lord Viscount Torrington, his Majesty's minister at the court of Brussels, containing intelligence, that letters of recall had been sent to the Imperial minister at the Hague. All the troops in Austrian Flanders were in motion; and every warlike preparation, making with all the seriousness of an approaching war.

MONDAY, November 1.

A few days ago, a young lady of fortune in the neighbourhood of this metropolis, being refused the consent of her friends to marry the man on whom she had placed her affection, came to the fatal resolution of putting an end to her existence, by shooting herself through the head with a pistol, which she did effectually, the ball passing through her brain so that she died instantly.

Wednesday 3.

In the papers of the day a robbery of an extraordinary nature is circumstantially related, but in a mysterious way, that gives room for speculation. It should seem that a complete service of plate is the official perquisite of every new minister; that preparing for Mr. Pitt was just finished, and collected from the several workmen by Mr. Hemmings of Bond-street, who had the making of it, when, on the morning before it was to be delivered, it was carried off no body knows by whom, nor does any body know where; otherwise than that a hackney coachman has been found, who deposes, that he was called off a stand in Oxford-street by three men, whom he set down towards the west-end of Conduit-street; that the coach was there ordered to stop for them, and that, in about half an hour, they all three returned with bundles of very large size, and as it seemed of great weight; that the coachman (the three men with their bundles having got into the coach) was ordered to drive to Old-street road; but in their way thither they called at a house in Long-lane, where they all got out, took their bundles with them, and discharged the coachman. This was between the hours of seven and nine in the morning, which corresponds exactly with the time the felony is supposed to be committed.

This day the question came on to be argued in the Court of Exchequer, Whether the new trial of action brought by capt. Sutton against commodore Johnstone should be at the bar of the Court, instead of being at Guildhall before a single judge. The Lord Chief Baron observed, That the Court had unanimously set aside the former verdict as given against evidence, and therefore had ordered a new trial; but that there did not appear to him, those difficulties in the case which renders a trial at bar necessary; and in that opinion the other Barons concurred.

Monday 8.

Lord George Gordon, president of the Protestant Association, sent a message to Baron Van Lynden, the new Dutch ambassador, wishing to have the honour of an interview with his Excellency, having it in his power to be of service to the States. "Lord G. Gordon's heart cleaves to the States of Holland. He has no intelligence that he would keep secret from them; but wishes to communicate every thing that may tend to give them the advantage over all their enemies."

To this message the Ambassador returned a most polite answer; and Lord George had the honour of a private conference with his Excellency, which lasted about two hours.

This day a Court Martial was held at the Horse Guards.—Prisoner. Col. Debbieg, of the Engineers.—Prosecutor. His Grace the Duke of Richmond, master-general of the Ordnance.—Charge. For indecent and disrespectful language, reflecting on the master general, made use of in letters written to the Duke, and to gen. Bramham. The letters were produced and read, and gen. Bramham was called to authenticate those which were received by him. The letters produced, his Grace said, was the whole charge; and the Col. desiring time to make his defence, was indulged till Friday next.

The rev. William Davies Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph, appeared in the Court of King's Bench, pursuant to notice, to await the sentence of that Court, in consequence of the verdict verdict obtained against him at the last Shrewsbury assizes.—The hon. Mr. Erskine, however, as the defendant's advocate, arose, and, after stating the special circumstances of the case, moved their Lordships for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted to his client. Lord Mansfield here recommended Mr. Erskine to couple the motion he then made with that in arrest of judgement, which he, no doubt, intended to make: to this, however, he objected, declaring he was bound in duty to press his Lordship for an opinion, on the sole grounds of his present motion, without the least regard to those of any other that might or might not hereafter be made.—Mr. Justice Boller, in the course of the proceedings, taking fire at Mr. Erskine's narrative of his Lordship's conduct in his judicial capacity at the late trial, said, "he must claim the protection of the Court, from reflections that were as false as they were scandalous!"—To this Mr. Erskine rejoined. A violent altercation ensued. Earl Mansfield granted the rule to shew cause; which has since been solemnly argued and over-ruled; notwithstanding which, Mr. Erskine still persisted in support of his client; and though, he said, he had failed in his first motion for a new trial, he had still another ground of proceeding, and that was by motion in arrest of judgement.

Lord Mansfield wished this motion had been made at first; it would have gone to the whole; and he was clear the publication was not sufficiently charged in the indictment to constitute a crime. It is true, he said, the Court might judge of the innuendoes, but then there must be innuendoes on the record; the criminal purpose must be clear. His Lordship said, the charge was not sufficiently laid in the indictment; and, the other Judges concurring, the judgement was arrested.

Tuesday 9.

Being Lord Mayor's Day, Richard Clarke, Esq. the new Lord Mayor, attended as usual, went to Westminster Hall; and, having taken the oaths of office at the Exchequer Bar, he returned in state to Guildhall, where a sumptuous entertainment was provided, at which many persons of distinction were present.

Wednesday 10.

Ld. Geo. Gordon had again the honour of paying his respects to the Dutch Ambassador; and to acquaint his Excellency, that his Lordship, and a number of his friends, had determined to draw and accompany his carriage to the Court of St. James, provided that mark of attachment to the cause of the republic should be thought proper before his Excellency had been introduced to the King. After some conversation, it was thought best not to appear at present in any great numbers. In consequence of this opinion, his Lordship paraded the streets at the West End of the town in blue and buff, a cockade; and a large broad sword suspended in a belt. He then went singly to St. James's, and there meeting the Ambassador, gave him a salute as he came down stairs from the Lever, and drawing his sword laid it with much solemnity at his Excellency's feet. The Ambassador was at first a little surprized, but recollecting himself walked on, without taking the least notice of his Lordship.

Thursday 11.

This day at the Admiralty Court, held at the Old Bailey, Samuel Harris and John North were indicted, for that they, in company with six other persons whose names were unknown, on the 30th of April last, fired into a boat belonging to his Majesty's Cutter Nimble, and killed John M'Mear, one of the seamen on board the said cutter.

The fact was, that Lieut. Bray, who commanded the cutter, seeing a vessel in the dead of night hovering about the coast, suspected her to be a smuggler, and accordingly ordered two boats to be manned, and went in one of them himself, to learn what she was; upon hailing her, the Lugger's people hailed them again, and asked, Who they were, and being told, they instantly fired a volley of musquetry into the boat, and a ball penetrating the right breast of John M'Mear, he instantly died. Mr. Bray then returned the fire, and boarded the Lugger. A violent skirmish took place, in which all the smugglers, except the two prisoners, were either killed, or mortally wounded. The Jury in about ten minutes brought in their Verdict GUILTY.

John England was then indicted for feloniously and piratically stealing the long-boat belonging to the Tartar, in the service of the East India Company; but for want of evidence was acquitted.

Tuesday 16.

About the dead hour of night, a man was observed in the atrocious fact of digging up dead bodies in the King's Road Burying-ground, Little Chelsea, when he was fired at by the watch, and shot through the head.

Wednesday 17.

In a letter of this day's date, Ld. Geo. Gordon acquaints Mr. Pitt, "that several hundred seamen had addressed him. Acting Lieutenants, Mates, and Midshipmen; of the Royal Navy, are among them."—This letter was accompanied with a letter addressed to his Lordship himself, as President of the Protestant Association, by way of Petition, and signed EDWARD ROBINSON and 34 more seamen, "able, willing, and ready to serve the United Protestant States of Holland against the King of the Romans and all their Popish enemies." Concluding, And your Petitioners shall ever pray for Ld. George Gordon.

Added to the above, was intelligence still more extraordinary, "That several officers of distinction in the land service had applied to him, and offered their service to the States General,

General, particularly a Field Officer of the Connecticut line, and an officer who has lately left the Irish Brigade in France. Many of the guards have requested to go volunteers. Some Athol Highlanders are on their way to town, who he makes no doubt will engage in the good Protestant cause of their H. M. M.—Thus his Lordship acquaints the Minister with, he says, in order to convince Baron Van Lynden of the general good disposition of the people of these Kingdoms, to renew their old friendship with Holland, on the righteous and solid foundation of the Protestant interest.

Next day his Lordship sent another letter to the Minister, acquainting him, that Capt. Rawlinson of Shadwell had made him an offer of the Prince William Frigate of 16 guns, to cruise against the Imperial Merchantsmen, and all the enemies of the United States; that several Artillery men, and more than 1000 seamen, with a full proportion of masters, mates, gunners, and carpenters, have already signed their requests to be employed in the same just cause.

The Minister, having been informed that many seamen had been induced to quit their occupations in expectation of being employed to serve against the Emperor, thought proper to put his Lordship in mind of the consequences of his proceedings; and that whatever steps he had taken was without the smallest degree of authority or countenance from his Majesty's Ministers.

In return, his Lordship wrote for answer, that he was glad to hear that many seamen had been induced to quit their occupations; that, as soon as his Majesty's Ministers are pleased to countenance their honest endeavours, he would make proposals to the States to take them into immediate pay. The consequences, his Lordship said, may fall on the Heads of the King's servants, if they advise their Sovereign to take part against the Protestant interest.—Such is the substance of this remarkable beginning; what the end may be, must soon be known.

Thursday 18.

This day a man, late a hater in St. John's-street, was brought up to the Court of King's Bench, to receive judgment for the crime of wilfully setting fire to his own house (in order to defraud the insurers). For this offence the prisoner was indicted for felony, and a bill found against him; but, on account of a nice distinction of law, he was not prosecuted for Arson; as the lawyers call feloniously burning, but for a misdemeanor. He is sentenced to stand on the pillory in Smithfield, to be imprisoned in Newgate two years, and to find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years.

Friday 19.

A body of sailors, ship carpenters, &c. to the number, as was supposed, of 1000 or 1200, assembled before the Queen's House, complaining of want of employment, and demanding a redress of grievances. After some conversation with Lord Sydney, who promised to make enquiry into the cause of their complaints and, if just, to procure them relief, they departed quietly.

An order has been dispatched to all the outposts, particularly those which are the nearest to France and Holland, not to permit any person whatsoever to go out of the kingdom, or to take shipping for the Continent, unless furnished with the new passports which are now issuing from the Secretary of State's Office, copies of which have been sent off, in order that the forgeries of that kind, which have been hitherto but too common, may be the more easily detected.

At the same time a proclamation was published, strictly charging all masters of ships, pilots, mariners, seamen, shipwrights, and other seafaring men whatsoever (being natural-born subjects) who may have entered into the pay or service of any foreign prince or state, that forthwith they do withdraw themselves, and return home: And further strictly prohibiting all seafaring men whatsoever from entering themselves into the pay or service of any foreign prince or state, or to serve in any foreign ship or vessel whatsoever.

Saturday 20.

About 150 sailors assembled in Wellsch-street before the house of Ed. G. Gordon, who referred them to the correspondence above stated, and that he could not serve them and his

This the man that ten day ago unhappy Alexander received from th and mo prodig arrived at o'clock, and spent near an hour in prayer with the clergyman, after which Dixon made the following confession: "That neither he nor Morgan (the unfortunate man who suffered some time since at Newgate) were guilty of the murder of Mr. Linton, but that he was in company with those who committed the murder early the same evening, but not at the time the murder was committed." He confessed the crime for which he was going to suffer, and that he was the only person concerned in breaking open Mr. Andrew's house.

An nine men were going from Deal in a boat to see the execution at Dover, the boat upset, by a sudden squall, and three of them perished, and two others very narrowly escaped.

This day Samuel Harris and John North were were taken from the Cells in Newgate, and conveyed to Execution Dock, and there executed. A Popish priest attended one of them, and both behaved decently. They acknowledged that they had fired at the King's boat, but hoped the balls had done no mischief.—The crew of the smuggling lugger consisted of eight persons, six of whom were slaughtered by the King's Cutter, and the two that remained were the men this day executed.

Monday 22.

The court-martial pronounced sentence on Col. Debbieg. The Judge Advocate read the sentence of the Court, as approved by his Majesty: That, in consequence of the Col.'s meritorious services, he should be dismissed with a reprimand from the President, after making an apology to the Master-General of the Ordnance. The President accordingly delivered the reprimand; and a paper being offered to Col. Debbieg, drawn up by the Judge Advocate, it was read by him, in which was his acknowledgment of his unmilitary and disrespectful conduct towards the Duke. The Duke then addressed the Court, declaring his intention in the prosecution to have been merely aimed to the benefit of the service; and that matters should be henceforward not only be buried in entire oblivion; but that he should be happy to reward and promote the Colonel in his corps, according to his future merit.

Thursday 25.

Intelligence from Ireland takes notice, that the zeal for Protestantism has reached Ireland, and that the armed Protestant Volunteer corps have already begun to address the President of the Protestant Association.

Friday 26.

The Papers of the day, we are happy in observing, have given the public reason to hope that the friends of an over-officious young nobleman have prevailed upon his Lordship to temper his zeal with moderation, and to withdraw himself from the anxieties of this world's affairs to the contemplation of that happier world where there is no opposition of sentiment, but all pious and good Protestants of one righteous mind.

Gen. Sloper took leave of his Majesty, previous to his going to India as Governor General of the Royal Forces, &c.

Saturday 27.

Christopher Arkinson, Esq. was brought up to the Court of King's Bench in order to receive judgement, when Judge Willes pronounced the following sentence—"To pay a fine of 2000*l.* to stand in and on the pillory, near the Corn Exchange, Mark-lane, and to be imprisoned in the King's Bench Prison, twelve calendar months.

Tuesday 30.

The latest letters from the Continent give hopes, that a Treaty of Pacification will soon take place, between the Emperor and the States General, under the mediation of the neutral powers.

About 35 years since, a person, nicknamed Castle Jacobs, concealed himself in one of the apartments among the ruins of Dudley Castle, and for some time carried on the business of coining; but being at last suspected, a number of persons set off with a determined resolution of taking him. One of the windows commanded the Castle-hill, and he observing their approach set fire to his apartments. On their arrival the place was in flames, and the man was never heard of from that time until about a week since, when some of Lord Dudley's people, pulling down the ruins, discovered a perfect skeleton, and four crucibles, with a great number of pieces of base coin. The skeleton his Lordship means to preserve as a curiosity.

In the course of the present month an eagle was shot in Lincolnshire, which measured from the tip of the wings, when extended, seven feet seven inches. It was a noble bird, and being hurt in the wing only, it was with difficulty subdued.

On the 15th of October the city of Grenoble, on the confines of Savoy, was alarmed by an earthquake. It was preceded by a rumbling noise, exactly like that which preceded the shock which threw the city of London into the greatest consternation in the year 1750, and was attended with much the same consequences. See vol. XX. pp. 56, 167.

Robberies, rapes and murders are not yet arrived at such a pitch of audaciousness in this kingdom as in Ireland.—On the 2d inst. about eight o'clock in the evening, a number of fellows, armed with pistols, &c. formed a plan to commit a robbery, which they effected in the following manner: One of them, well dressed, called a sedan chair, whilst another went before as a footman: They went to a Lady's house in Temple-street; rapt at the door, and sent in the name of a right hon. Gentleman who was known to the Lady, desiring to speak with her; the Gentleman was desired to walk in; the chair was opened, and the villain with his associates, being four in number, rushed up stairs, all of them armed; and the chairmen disappeared. The family consisted of the Lady of the house, a young lady a friend of hers, and a servant maid. The Lady, hearing some unusual noise below, looked over the railings, and saw the villains make fast the hall door, upon which she retreated and locked herself up in her bed-chamber; but the villains soon broke open the door, took what they pleased in goods and money, and during four hours which they were in the house, practised every brutality on the Lady and her friend, each of them having been held down alternately by those ruffians. They made their escape over the garden-wall, but two of them have been taken, and are committed to Kilmainham goal, and diligent search is making after the rest.

The meeting of Parliament is fixed, by Proclamation, for Tuesday Jan. 25.

AERO-

AEROSTATION.

OUR Readers may wish, in the present age of balloons, to have a short and accurate account of the different aerostatic voyages which have been made since Mr. Montgolfier's discovery. We are enabled, through the intelligence of M. de la Lande, the Editor of the Journal des Savans, to present them with the following correct catalogue:

1st Experiment. 21st November 1783, the Marquis d'Arlandes* and M. Pilatre de Rozier ascended in a Montgolfier, or balloon filled with rarefied air, from the Muette, at 54 minutes past one o'clock, and their voyage lasted from 20 to 25 minutes.

2d. The first aerostat filled with inflammable air ascended from the Thuilleries on the 1st of December 1783, at 40 minutes past one; and the ingenious discoverers as well as adventurers, were, Messrs. Charles and Robert.

Their voyage lasted two hours and five minutes. The same day M. Charles mounted alone, and continued aloft 35 minutes.

3d. The grand Montgolfier of Lyons was elevated at Lyons Jan. 19, 1784; and the travellers were Messrs. Joseph Montgolfier, Pilatre de Rozier, the Comte de Lauracien, the Comte de Dampierre, the Prince de Ligne, the Comte de la Porte, and M. Fontaine.—The immense machine took fire, but they descended without injury in about 15 minutes.

4th. At Milan, on the 25th of February, the Comte Andreani, Mess. Augustin Gerli, and Ch. Jos. Gerli, ascended, and continued in the air about 20 minutes.

5th. Mr. Blanchard made his first experiment, and ascended from the Camp de Mars, near Paris, on the 2d of March, at half past 12 o'clock, and continued an hour and 15 minutes in his voyage.

6th. On the 19th of March the Comte Andreani and two companions ascended again at Milan, to the height of 850 toises, and travelled seven miles.

7th. At Dijon, on the 25th of April, Mess. de Morveau and Bertrand ascended at 48 minutes past four, and were one hour and 37 minutes in the air.

8th. At Marseilles, May 8, Mess. Bonin and Maret were elevated in an aerostat 50 feet in diameter, named le Marseillois; they were only 7 min. in the air, and travelled 1 mile and $\frac{1}{2}$.

9th. At Strasbourg, on the 15th of May, a balloon was raised with two persons; but the voyage did not succeed.

10th. At Rouen, May 23, M. Blanchard made his 2d voyage; he travelled one hour.

11th. At Marseilles, May 29, Mess. Maret and Bremond went up again in the Marseillois. It went rather higher than before, but it took fire, and they escaped with great difficulty.

* The Marquis d'Arlandes, one of the two first persons who ever adventured in a balloon to the upper regions of the atmosphere, was broke in the beginning of the late war on a charge of cowardice.

• GENT. MAG. November, 1784.

12th. At Lyons, on the 4th of June, in the presence of the King of Sweden, M. Fleurant and Madame Tible ascended in a Montgolfier 70 feet in diameter. This was the first lady who ascended. Their journey lasted 45 minutes, and they travelled about two miles.

13th. In Spain, June 6, M. Boyche, a young French painter, ascended in a Montgolfier made by order of the Infant Don Gabriel. It took fire, and he escaped with great difficulty.

14th. At Dijon, on the 12th of June, Mess. de Morveau and de Virly ascended, and made a voyage of one hour and two minutes.

15th. The Suffrein was raised from the Orphan house at Nantes, June 13, at 10 minutes past six o'clock; the travellers were Messrs. Coustard, de Massy, and Mouchet. They were 58 minutes.

16th. At Bourdeaux, on the 16th of June, Mess. Darbele, des Granges, and Chalmur, ascended, and were up 1 hour and 14 minutes.

17th. A grand Montgolfier was elevated at Versailles June 23, at 45 minutes past four o'clock. The voyagers were Mess. Pilatre de Rozier and Prouff. They were up 47 min.

It may be mentioned in this recital, that on the 11th of July, Mess. Miollan and Janinet failed in their public experiment, though on a previous trial their machine had elevated nine persons with 700 pounds of ballast.

18th. The Mess. Roberts, and the Duke de Chartres, ascended from St. Cloud on July 15, and there continued above 45 minutes.

19th. Mess. Blanchard and Boby ascended at Rouen on the 18th of July, and were up two hours and 55 minutes.

20th. The same gentlemen ascended at Bourdeaux on the 26th of July, and traversed the Garonne, and the Dordogne.

21st. On the 6th of August, Mess. Carny and Louchet ascended from Rhodes, and were up 35 minutes.

22. On the 6th of September the Suffrein ascended again from the Orphan-house at Nantes. Mess. Coustard, de Massy, and Delaynes, were the voyagers. It was up two hours and 32 minutes.

23d. At London, September 15, Mr. Lunardi, an Italian, ascended, and continued in the atmosphere three hours and 20 minutes, in which time he travelled 25 miles.

24th. The brothers Robert, and M. Hulin, ascended at Paris on the 19th of Sept. from the Thuilleries, and in six hours and 40 minutes travelled 150 miles, which is as yet the longest journey performed by aerostation, and in every particular the most complete.

Thus far we have from M. de la Lande; but one or two to the above which have taken place since the date of his journal may now be added.

On the 4th of October, Mr. Sadlier ascended at Oxford.

25th. Mess. Blanchard and Sheldon ascended at Chelsea, near London, on the 16th of Oct. at eight minutes past twelve; Mr. Sheldon alighted at Sunbury, and Mr. Blanchard continued tinued his voyage to Rumsey, distance 73 miles.

Nov. 12. Mr. S. deir went from Oxford to Thame in three hours.

Mr. Carnet also raised himself at Philadelphia in a balloon; but the voyage was short, owing to its catching fire.

From this, and every one of the experiments which have been made with the Montgolfier, or balloon inflated with rarified air, it is evident, that for purposes of use they can never be depended on. They are so subject to accidents, and at the same time so unwieldy, that they will hardly be used, except of a small size for entertainment.

Mr. URBAN,

East Kent, Nov. 6, 1784.

THE brick-makers in this neighbourhood, and, I suppose, in others, having, since the late Act which imposes a duty of 2s. 6d. per thousand, agreed to advance their price 5s. they would do well to consider, as their employers certainly will, whether they are not liable to the penalties of the 17th Geo. III. c. 42. § 4, which enacts, that "all combinations for enhancing the price of bricks or tiles shall be void; and every brick-maker, or tile-maker, offending therein, shall forfeit the sum of 20l.; and every clerk, agent, or servant, 10l.; half to the poor, and half to him who shall sue in six calendar months in one of the courts at Westminster." — As to our tile-makers, they, in consequence of the late duty, and the trouble attending it, have all left off working. From high winds, therefore, still worse than high duties, Good Lord, deliver us!

Yours, CANTIANUS.

THEATRICAL REGISTER.

DRURY-LANE.

- Oct. 2. Beggar's Opera—Harlequin Junior.
 5. The Gamester—Irish Widow.
 7. Clandestine Marriage—Comus.
 9. Douglas—All the World's a Stage.
 11. Merry Wives of Windsor—Harlequin Jun.
 12. Isabella—The Apprentice.
 14. Love in a Village—High Life below Stairs.
 16. The Gamester—The Quaker.
 18. School for Scandal—Gentle Shepherd.
 19. Grecian Daughter—The Padlock.
 21. Love in a Village—Who's the Dupe?
 23. Jane Shore—Catherine and Petruchio.
 25. Beggar's Opera—Harlequin Junior.
 26. As You like It—Bon Ton.
 27. Tancred and Sigismunda—The Quaker.
 28. Deception—The Padlock.
 29. Provok'd Husband—Gentle Shepherd.
 30. Isabella—The Irish Widow.
 Nov. 1. Hamlet—The Double Disguise.
 2. A New Way to pay Old Debts—Harlequin Junior.
 3. The Earl of Warwick—Double Disguise.
 4. Conscious Lovers—The Spanish Rivals.
 5. Richard the Third—Ditto.
 6. The Earl of Warwick—Ditto.
 8. School for Scandal—Harlequin Junior.
 9. The Tempest—Bon Ton.
 10. Earl of Warwick—Spanish Rivals.
 11. Clandestine Marriage—Comus.
 12. School for Fathers—Harlequin Junior.
 13. Douglas—Too Civil by Half.
 15. Cato—Spanish Rivals.
 16. Fair Penitent—The Deserter.
 17. Zara—Bon Ton.
 18. The Tempest—Harlequin Junior.
 19. Cymbeline—Spanish Rivals.
 20. Venice Preserved—Ditto.
 22. The Wonder!—Arthur and Emmeline.
 23. Every Man in his Humour—Ditto.
 24. Zara—High Life below Stairs.
 25. Rule a Wife and Have a Wife—Arthur and Emmeline.
 26. Cymon—Bon Ton.
 27. Grecian Daughter—Spanish Rivals.
 29. Isabella—High Life below Stairs.

COVENT-GARDEN.

- Oct. 1. Conscious Lovers—Musical Lady.
 4. Macbeth—Harlequin Rambler.
 6. The Hypocrite—Musical Lady.
 8. The Duenna—Tristram Shandy.
 11. Richard the Third—Harlequin Rambler.
 12. Robin Hood—St. Patrick's Day.
 13. The Hypocrite—Positive Man.
 15. Robin Hood—Tristram Shandy.
 18. Cymbeline—Midas.
 20. The Hypocrite—Poor Soldier.
 21. Ditto—Positive Man.
 22. Robin Hood—St. Patrick's Day.
 25. Romeo and Juliet—Musical Lady.
 26. Ditto—Poor Soldier.
 27. Rule a Wife and Have a Wife—The Sultan.
 28. The Man of the World—Rosina.
 29. K. Henry IV. Part I.—Aerostation.
 30. K. Henry IV. Part II.—Ditto.
 Nov. 1. Romeo and Juliet—Ditto.
 2. Robin Hood—Ditto.
 3. The Duenna—The Liar.
 4. Tamerlane—Harlequin Rambler.
 5. Romeo and Juliet—Aerostation.
 6. The Hypocrite—Tom Thumb.
 8. Romeo and Juliet—Poor Soldier.
 9. Robin Hood—Lord Mayor's Day.
 10. Merchant of Venice—Love a-la-Mode.
 11. The Way of the World—Rosina.
 12. Macbeth—Aerostation.
 13. Merry Wives of Windsor—Poor Soldier.
 15. Macbeth—Rosina.
 16. Fontainebleau; or, Our Way in France—The Citizen.
 17. Ditto—Aerostation.
 18. Ditto—Lord Mayor's Day.
 19. Romeo and Juliet—Poor Soldier.
 20. Fontainebleau—Barnaby Rattle.
 22. Macbeth—Rosina.
 23. Fontainebleau—Aerostation.
 24. The Hypocrite—Poor Soldier.
 25. Fontainebleau—Aerostation.
 26. Romeo and Juliet—Rosina.
 27. Fontainebleau—Tristram Shandy.
 29. Grecian Daughter—Tom Thumb.

Page 395, l. 16, read 'W. Browne.'

P. 793, col. 2, l. 11, from bottom, for 'Maidstone, &c.' r. 'to that town, there to wait the session'—where he has since been capitally convicted, and executed. See p. 782.

P. 797, col. 1, l. 12, for 'Miss Cluck, &c.' r. 'Miss Chick, only daughter of —, C. esq; of Westham, Essex.'

P. 799. The late Earl Waldegrave, when Major Gen. W. distinguished himself at the memorable battle of Minden, in 1759, by leading, with Maj. Gen. Kingsley, those gallant six battalions which gained that remarkable victory. He is succeeded in his titles, &c. by his only son, George Visc. Chewton.

The right hon. Countess Dowager Delawar (see p. 799) was daughter of the late Lieut. Gen. Wynyard; was married to John 2d Earl Delawar, Aug. 8, 1756; and was mother to the late Earl and the present. When Miss Wynyard, she was a remarkable beauty. Witness these Tonbridge verses, in 1755:

"But let me pay a compliment to Wynyard,
Ripe as the swelling clusters of the vineyard;
Happy she smiles with unaffected joy,
Happy to dance with Monsieur Mirepoix."

BIRTHS.

OS. 14. THE Princess of Asturias, a prince, christened Ferdinand Maria.

22. Arch-duchess of Milan, a princess.

27. Lady of Maj. Gen. Wynyard, a son.

Nov. 7. Lady of Alex. Hume, esq; a dau.

8. Lady of Sir Brook Bridges, bart. a son.

22. Lady Viscountess Galway, a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

LATELY, Mr. Robert George, of Barnard's Inn, to M^s. Senior.

Mr. Charles Wislaw, attorney-at-law, of Gray's-Inn, to Miss White.

OS. . . By special licence, Mr. W. Mercy, of E. India House, to Miss Turner, of Romford, James Roger, esq; to Mrs. Smith.

20. At Hull, the rev. T. Tate, vicar of Sheriff Hutton, to Miss Fox.

21. At the Savoy church, W. Lynch, esq; of the island of Madeira, to Miss Hernon.

26. Rev. Mr. Rideout, R. of Westmeaton, to Miss Frances Woodgate, of Mounthfield.

At Pool; Dr. Sylvester Gardner, formerly of America, aged 80, to Miss Catherine Goldthwait, daughter of Thomas G. esq; late of Penobscot, in New England, aged 28.

At Chelmsford; W. S. Cooper, esq; to Miss Harvey.

Mr. John Green, an eminent farmer at Yeathom, near Holmfirth, Yorksh. to Miss Micklethwaite. They at the same time ordered the sexton to make a grave for the interment of the lady's father, then dead.

28. Thomas Van, esq; to Miss Wewitzer. Tho. Chippindale, esq; to Miss Goodlad.

31. By special licence, — Edwards, esq; to Mrs. Jones.

Nov. 2. Miss Elliott, sister to Rear-Adm. E., to Mr. Hayward.

Rev. Mr. Ellis, of Bristol, to Miss Bishop,

4. W. A. Williams, esq; to Miss Martha. Edward Lasceter, esq; to Miss M. Gibson. Sir Thomas Gascoigne, bart. to Lady Turner, relict of the late Sir Charles T. bart.

5. Mr. Hutchins, of Bowes-Farm, Edmonton, to Miss B. Raikes.

6. Mr. H. Wordsworth, of Ivy-lane, to Miss Sally Hill.

9. Mr. John Spier Hughes, surgeon, of Rushin, Denbighshire, to Miss Spier, of Southgate, Middlesex.

10. John Augustus Boyce, esq; to Miss Sophia Newell.

12. Geo. Welbeck, esq; to Miss Anne Bury. Rev. Tho. Cox, to Miss Anne Austin.

13. Mr. James Davison, to Miss Townsend, sister of the rev. Mr. T. of Merton.

Tho. Keate, esq; to Miss Emma Browne, dau. of Lyde B. esq.

14. W. A. Jamison, esq; of Chertsey, to Miss Sally Pearce.

16. By special licence, at Navestock, Essex, the Earl of Euston, eldest son of the Duke of Grafton, to Lady Horatia Waldegrave, 2d dau. of the Duchess of Gloucester, by her first husband, the 2d Earl Waldegrave, and sister to the present Countess Waldegrave.

17. — Burke, esq; to Miss Chillis. Mr. John Hawkins, of St. John's, Westminster, to Miss Maria Matthews, Parliament-str.

Tho. Edwards, esq; to Miss E. T. Gibson.

18. By special licence, Reginald Pole Carew, esq; of Antony, co. Cornwall, to Miss Jemima Yorke, only dau. of the hon. John Y.

20. Mr. Oliver, linen-draper, of Holborn, to Miss Andrews, only daughter of the late Mr. A. of the same place.

25. At Edmonton, Mr. Joseph Cowdell, hofier, in Milk-street, to Miss Wilkinson, dau. of Mr. W. of Bush-hill.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at his villa, near L'Isle, M. Errard, author of several remarks, in distinct treatises, on the origin of fortifying towns and cities, a descendant of the famous Errard, engineer to Henry the Great of France.

Mr. Roberts, writing-master to the young princesses, at Kew.

Rev. T. Welch, vicar of South Benfleet. At Bishop-Wilton, near York, aged 115, Mr. Whip, farmer.

Suddenly, at Spreding-green, co. Bucks, H. Plant, esq; many years a Bank Director.

At Spa, hon. Mr. Legge, a younger son of E. Dartmouth, and a groom of the bed-chamber to the Prince of Wales.

At Halfheads, Yorksh. Edw. Foxcroft, esq.

At Tours, in France, Mrs. Johnson, relict of the late H. J. esq; of Great Berkhamsted, Herts, and mother to the relict of Sir W. B. Proctor and the right hon. Charles Yorke.

Mrs. Willis, wife of Mr. R. W. saddler and ironmonger, at Stroud; and the 4th of Nov. during the interment of Mrs. W. her husband died also. They had lived together 54 years.

James Orrok, esq; a captain in the royal navy. This gentleman commanded the Conquestadore, at the Nore, during the greatest part of the last war; and after she was broke up he commanded the Prince Edward at the same place.

Mr. John Firth, master of the White Bear inn, Basinghall-street, and one of the common council of Bassishaw ward.

At Lakenheath, Suffolk, in his 54th year, John Handlip, gent. who had acquired a fortune of 30,000l.

Lady of William Egerton, esq; of Tatton-Park, Chester.

At his father's house, in Oxfordshire, Mr. Courtney, who was unfortunately wounded in a duel with Lieut. Dacre, of the marines, about three months since, of which he has lingered to this time.

Aged 86, Peter Casley, rector of Norton, co. Worc. to which he was presented by the dean and chapter Oct. 14, 1726. He was born of Roman catholic parents, and said to be a son of one of the persons appointed demy of Magdalen college, Oxford, by James II. before the Revolution. Though in advanced age, he regularly served his church twice every Sunday, and left his library, as an heir-loom, for the use of his successors in the vicarage. "I was poor," said the good old man, "when I came to the living. It cost me, from time to time, much money to purchase books; my successor may peradventure experience the same inconvenience. I will therefore, as much as in me lies, prevent it, by bequeathing my library, as an heir-loom, to the living."

On the 7th of December last, Capt. Pigou, late commander of the Blandford Indiaman. This unfortunate old officer has been singularly unlucky during the whole of his life. In a former voyage, he had the misfortune to lose his ship at Johanna, on his return to Europe, which made him a bankrupt... He then got the command of the Blanford; but, in January, 1782, that ship, on her way from Madras to Calcutta, was attacked by a French frigate off Ganjam, which she bravely fought, and beat off; but the next morning a French line-of-battle ship captured her, and her unfortunate commander was then carried a prisoner with the French fleet.

Sept. 2. In Maryland, Sir Robert Eden, bart. late governor of that province, brother to Sir John E. bart. and to the Abp. of Canterbury's lady. He had returned to that state a few months ago, for the recovery of his property, pursuant to the provisional articles of peace; and his death was occasioned by a dropsy in consequence of a fever. This property came to him from the late Lord Baltimore, whose sister he married, by whom he has left two sons, the eldest of whom, now at Oxford, succeeds to his title.

Oct. . . Suddenly, at the Chaceside, Southgate, Miss Olqver, dau. of the late Mr. G. formerly an eminent dancing master. The Scurrows of Winter were found under her pillow:

a circumstance which deserves to be known, in order, if possible to defeat the evil tendency of that pernicious work.

9. At Caen, Capt. John Burgoyne Grant, of the Royal English Fusiliers.

13. Rev. J. Barlow, M.A. V. of Leigh, Lancash.

22. In Chancery-lane, Mr. Mark Child, well known in the church and in the law, and at the city halls, for his skill in robe-making. He was the oldest inhabitant in the liberty of the Rolls.

24. At Nicoliburg, in his 83d year, Chas. de Dietrichstein Nicolibourg, prince of the Holy Roman empire, knight of the Golden Fleece, privy counsellor to his Imperial majesty, chamberlain, &c.

25. Mr. Warren, belonging to the Six Clerk's Office. His death is supposed to have been occasioned by violent rage. He had been at the play in company with a young lady, who felt herself insulted by a person who stood next her, and kept treading upon her feet, of which she at length complained to Mr. W. who remonstrated against the impropriety of the person's behaviour, but without effect. Instead of desisting, he did it so much the more, which so irritated Mr. W. as to throw him into a violent agitation, in which he continued till he reached his own house, where he had no sooner entered the parlour, and seated himself in his chair, than he expired. On opening his head, the next day, several blood-vessels were found burst in his brain.

29. At Streatham, Mr. Anthony Whitlock, of Lime-street.

At Windsor Castle, Mr. Hall, sexton to the Abbey.

30. Edward Lowry, esq; of Hampton.

31. At Taunton Dean, so. Somerset, aged 74, Saunders Welch, esq; in the commission of the peace for the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Bucks, and for the city of Westminster, whose skill, activity, and integrity, in the execution of the office of a magistrate, will long be remembered.

Nov. 1. Aged 76, Mr. Pope, father of Miss P. of Drury-lane theatre.

In Holbourn, Mr. Joseph Massie, well known for his political writings.

Of a lingering illness, at his house in Lamb's Conduit-street, Mr. Wade, jun. attorney-at-law, clerk to the governors and directors of the poor of St. Andrew, Holborne, above the bars, and St. George the Martyr, Queen-squ. and clerk to the committee for paying the same parishes. He is succeeded by his father.

3. At Evesham, Worcestershire, in a very advanced age, the rev. J. Rawlins, M.A. incumbent of the living of Badley and Lynn in Worcestershire, and of Haslerton in Gloucestersh.

4. Mr. Hayward, master of the Black-horse livery-stable in Little Britain.

5. At Bull's-cross, Middlesex, aged 65, Charles Boddam, esq; one of the directors of the East India Company, and brother to the governor of Bombay.

878 Obituary of considerable Persons; with Biographical Anecdotes.

the picture. He was not only loved, but esteemed: he delighted in performing good offices; not only by advice, which may seem to cost nothing, but with his purse, which some consider as their life's blood. He was known and approved by Garrick, Colman, and Harris. He was solicitor to Covent-Garden theatre, and a good judge of what was performing on the stage; that miniature of the whole world; and also a steward and receiver of rents to many respectable persons. Many have solicited, to use a phrase that has been employed since his decease, "to stand in his shoes." No one was ever known to repeat of the confidence reposed in him. He accepted the troublesome and unthankful offices of trustee and executor, on the importunity of many who knew his ability of carrying them into effect. No one pleased more by harmless compliance, nor made himself more useful and agreeable at the parties where he was invited. All this, though the language of friendship, is also that of truth, which is dearer to the writer of this historical morsel than all the friendships in the world. Whoever, in his middle rank of life, shall be valued for integrity, benevolence, acuteness, accomplishments, and the arts of pleasing, must not think himself under-rated when he is compared to—Theodorus Forrest.

6. Mr. John Griffies, assistant surgeon to the professor of anatomy at Cambridge.

At Achenerue, in Scotland, Richard Oswald, esq; lately a commissioner to the court of Versailles for negotiating the peace.

In Upper Charlotte-street, aged 69, William Izard, esq; formerly in the Welsh fusiliers.

7. Capt. Sampson Woolciffe, many years in the East country trade. He was one of four who wintered upon one of the uninhabited islands in the North seas, where his ship was wrecked in 1762.

In Fleet-street, Mr. Thomas Lowndes, many years master of an extensive circulating library, which he had lately given up. Without any very shining abilities, he acquired a considerable fortune by persevering industry.

Mr. Falewood, builder, in Piccadilly.

At Newbury, Berks, Mr. Tho. Litchworth, late of Kent-street-road, an eminent preacher among the people called Quakers, and editor of a periodical work under the title of "The Monthly Ledger," published a few years since. As a man, he possessed that liberality of sentiment which exalts human nature; as a christian, deeply enamoured with the divine truths of the Gospel, he assiduously laboured to implant and cultivate them in others: warm with the love of God and man, when exercised in his line of duty, the torrent of his eloquence would insensibly bear him into a degree of excess that undermined a constitution not naturally robust. He had nothing of that stiffness and constraint which sometimes disparages the actions of pious men, and obstructs the emanations of real goodness from penetrating the hearts of beholders; but in his general deportment he was courteous, generous, affable, and sincere, displaying, with peculiar energy, the pleasantness and peaceableness of religion; which must render his death not less poignant to his surviving friends than happy to himself.

8. At Wandsworth, Mr. Robert Holder, attorney-at-law, high-bailiff of Southwark, clerk to the rotation at Guildhall, and clerk to the Innholders' company.

Mr. William Sabor, a considerable wine and brandy merchant, and mayor of the borough of Colchester.

At Stoke Newington, in his 83d year, Mr. Thomas Sherwood, many years a linen-draper, in good esteem and reputation, opposite Bow-ch. Cheapside; but some time since lost his sight, and retired from business.

9. At Newington, Samuel Barney, esq.

Mr. Arkinson, distiller, in Bermondsey-st.

Suddenly, Mrs. Cumberlege, wife of Mr. Stephen Austen C. of Islington, and formerly relict of the late Mr. Hinton the bookseller.

10. Tho. Young, esq; of Bush-hall, Hert.

At her son's house at Stoke Newington, far advanced in years, Mrs. De Medina, widow, mother of Mr. Solomon De Medina, a Jew broker, and the direct lineal descendant of Sir Solomon De Medina, knt. contractor for supplying bread and bread waggons to the Queen's forces in the Low Countries, anno 1711, famous in those days on account of presents made by him to the Duke of Marlborough, and supposed to be the only Jew that ever received a British title of honour. She was buried, on the day following, in the Jews' burying-ground in Mile-end-road.

11. The lady of Col. Ferguson.

At Greenwich, Mrs. Woodd, mother of the rev. Mr. W. lecturer of St. Peter's, Cornhill.

At Shadwell, aged 61, Capt. Spanners.

Of the goot, in his 26th year, the rev. Hen. Richardson Currier, of Thornton. He was the last male heir of the Richardson family, six of whom have died within these last six years; so that on him the whole family estates descended.

12. In Bolton-row, Piccadilly, the hon. Miss Louisa Chetwynd, dau. of Lord Vife. C.

Dame Susannah Cullam, relict of the late, and mother of the present, Sir John C. bart. and daughter and last surviving coheir of Sir T. Gary, bart. of Gr. Ealing, co. Middx.

At Holt, Norfolk, in his 63th year, Edmund Jewell, esq; one of his majesty's justices of the peace, and captain of an independent company raised by himself during the late war.

13. At Richmond, Mrs. Palford, lately come from the West Indies.

At Wotton-Basset, aged 85, Lewis Long, esq.

14. Mr. W. De Jersey, merch. Cannon-st.

15. At Brompton, Middlesex, aged 89, Anne Countess of Dundonald. She was dau. of the late gallant Capt. Oildriss, of the navy. She has left five sons.

17. At Faversham, Kent, Edward Wilkes, esq; Quota-keeper of the royal powder-mills, and and in the commission of the peace for Kent.

19. Mr. Keys, formerly a considerable house-broker in Harp-alley.

At Plafsey, Essex, Peter Smith, one of the people called Quakers, aged 100 years and 2 months. He was formerly a shopkeeper at Stebbing, in the same county, and had retired from business. He has left all his relations some small legacies, and 100*l.* to the poor children at Stebbing.

21. After a few days illness, at her house in St. James's-sq. the Most Noble Catherine Duchess of Norfolk, consort of the present Duke. Her Grace was second daughter, and at length coheir, of John Brockholes, of Cloughton, co. Lanc. esq; by Mary his wife, eldest daughter and coheir of Michael Johnston, of Twisse, in co. Durham, esq; (and one of the coheirs of the barony of Scroope of Bolton.) She was born April 30, 1718, and married to the present Duke, at Workshop mason, Nov. 8, 1739, by whom she has left an only child, Charles Earl of Surrey. Her Grace's remains will be interred at Arundel.

At Bath, Sir Thomas Frankland, bart. admiral of the white, and M.P. for Thirle, co. York. He succeeded to the title upon the death of his brother, Sir Charles, at Bath, in 1768. Being brought up to the navy, he was in 1740 made a captain, and in 1744 took a rich prize off the Havannah. In 1743 he married Miss Rhett, daughter of the chief justice of Carolina, by whom he had six sons and eight daughters.

Mr. Jarvis, many years corrector of his majesty's law press.

At Comdrawleigh, co. Devon, in his 85th year, the rev. Mr. Palmer, R. of that parish.

22. At Hackney, Mr. Edw. Taylor, aged 84, formerly a wholesale druggist in London.

23. In James-str. Westminster, aged 71, Mrs. Cholmley, relict of Lewin C. esq.

ECCLESIASTICAL PREFERMENTS.

HON. and rev. Thomas Charles Lumley, Winstingham, R. co. Linc. presented by his brother the E. of Scarborough.

Rev. ——— Turner, M.A. chosen Master of Pemb. Hall, Cambr.

Rev. Isaac Milner, M.A. F.R.S. elected Jacksonian prof. of nat. hist. at Cambridge.

Rev. John Cross, Bradford V. co. York, vice ——— Sykes, dec.

Rev. James Whiteley, B. A. perpetual curate of Beclton.

Rev. ——— Benson, a minor canon of Rochester, vice Mr. Husband, refig.

Rev. A. Edwards, Chip. Ongar R. Essex.

Rev. Peter Peckard, M.A. Master of Magd. College, elected Vice-chancellor of Cambridge University for the year ensuing.

Rev. William Peters, R. of Litchborow, co. Northamp. elected chaplain to the Royal Academy, vice Dr. Franklin, dec.

Rev. James Weller, M.A. rector of the united parishes of Gifford, and vicar of Woking, Surrey, appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to the Prince of Wales, and chaplain to his Royal Highness's household.

Rev. W. Preston, M.A. presented to the united bishopricks of Killala and Achonry, vice Dr. W. C. Pery, trans. to Limerick. Gaz.

Rev. Mr. Thompson, presented to the church and parish of Markinch, in the presbytery of Kirkcaldie and county of Fife, vice John Pinkerton, dec. Gaz.

Rev. W. Tookie, LL. B. Worlington R. co. Suff.

Rev. W. Young, M.A. North Pickenham, with Houghton, co. Norf.

Rev. John Goech, M.A. (chaplain to the bishop of Norwich, R. of Benacre co. Suff. and Saxlingham, co. Norf.) archdeacon of Sudbury, vice Dr. Chapman, dec.

Rev. Edw. Beckingham Benson *, M.A. Ixning V. Suffolk.

DISPENSATIONS.

REV. Oliver St. John Cooper, M. A. W. of Puddington, co. Bedford, (author of the History and Antiquities of that town, see vol. LIII. p. 153,) and chaplain to Gertrude Duch. Dow. of Bedford, to hold Thurlough V.

Rev. Tho. Dale, M.A. to hold the living of Agnes Burton and chapelry of Hatpham, with West and East Hesterton, R. co. York.

Rev. William Martin Leake, LL.B. late of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. and morning preacher at the Foundling Hospital, to hold Wallington V. with Kencott R. both co. Oxf.

GAZETTE PROMOTIONS.

AUGUSTUS Rogers, esq; secretary to the board of ordnance, vice John Bodjington, esq; who retires.

His Royal Highness Prince Frederick B. of Osnabrug, colonel of the Coldstream reg. of foot-guards (vice Earl Waldegrave, dec.;) and lieutenant gen. in the army.

Earl Waldegrave, appointed Master of the Horse to her Majesty, vice his father, dec.

Rt. hon. Lord Howard de Walden, appointed his Majesty's Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Essex, vice E. Waldegrave, dec.

John Goghegan, esq; Accountant Gen. of his Majesty's court of Exchequer in Ireland.

Lieut. Gen. E. Cornwallis, Constable of the Tower of London, vice Lord Geo. Hen. Lennox, appointed Gov. of Plymouth.

Henry Heyman, esq; approved of as agent for the Hans towns in Great Britain.

CIVIL PROMOTIONS.

MR. Richard Gomm, formerly a capital cabinet-maker in Clerkenwell, where he failed by faults not his own, elected steward of St. Bartholomew's hosp. vice Mr. Cole, dec. Mr. Cowden, clerk of the Queen's stables.

Mr. J. Russell, crayon painter to Pr. of W. Mr. Dan. Gib, of Sherrard-str. Golden-sq. surgeon extraordinary to his Majesty's house. Sir Wadkin Lewis, bailiff of the Borough.

* This name is twice mispelt 'Benton,' pp. 555 & 557.

EACH DAY'S PRICE OF STOCKS IN NOVEMBER, 1784.

	Bank.	3 per Ct. Reduc.	3 per Ct. Confols.	4 per Ct. Confol.	New	Long Ann.	Short 1777.	Ditto 1778.	India Stock.	India Ann.	India Bond. S. dif.	S. Sea Stock.	Old Ann.	New Ann.	3 per Ct. 1751	New Navy. 1774	5 per Ct. Navy.	3 per Ct. Scrip.	4 per Ct. Scrip.	Excheq. Bills.	Lottery Tickets.
28	Spok. 110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		177 7/8	16 1/2		12 1/2			1 s. dif.					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 05 6
29	Sunday 110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 04 6
30	Sunday 110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 09 0
31	Sunday 110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 06 0
1	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 06 6
2	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 09 6
3	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 11 0
4	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 13 0
5	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 13 0
6	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 6
7	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			16 01 0
8	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			16 02 6
9	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			16 00 0
10	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 19 0
11	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 10 0
12	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 14 0
13	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			16 00 0
14	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			1					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
15	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
16	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
17	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
18	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
19	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
20	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
21	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
22	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
23	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
24	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
25	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0
26	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2		70 1/2	16 1/2		12 1/2			2					17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2			15 17 0

	Bank.	3 per Ct.	3 per Ct.	4 per Ct.	New	Long	Short	Ditto	India	India	India	S. Sea	Old	New	3 per Ct.	New	5 per Ct.	3 per Ct.	4 per Ct.	Excheq.	Lottery
	Stock.	Induc.	Confol.	Confol.	Ann.	Ann.	1777.	1778.	Stock.	Ann.	Bond.	Stock.	Ann.	Ann.	1751	Navy.	Navy.	Scrip.	Scrip.	Bills.	Tickets.
28	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1 s. dif.	—	—	—	—	17 1/2 dif.	88	54 1/2	—	—	15 05
29	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 04
30	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 09
31	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 11
32	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 13
33	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 15
34	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
35	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 19
36	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 14
37	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 00
38	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
39	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
40	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
41	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
42	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	2	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
43	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
44	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
45	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
46	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/2	—	12 1/2	—	—	1	—	—	—	—	17 1/2	88 1/2	54 1/2	—	—	15 17
47	110 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	54 1/2	179 1/2	16 1/

N. B. In the 3 per Cent. Consols, the highest and lowest Price of each Day is given; in the other Stock the highest Price only.

882 Meteorological Diary for December, 1783.—Average Prices of Corn.

Decemb. Days.	Thermom.	Barometer. Inch. 20ths	Wind.	Rain. 100ths of inch.	Weather.
1	52	30 2	E		fair.
2	46	30	E		fair.
3	42	29 18	E		fair, bright, and still.
4	36	29 16	E		white frost, bright.
5	45	29 12	E		overcast, bright.
6	42	29 15	W		overcast.
7	40	29 16	E		overcast.
8	39	29 19	E		overcast.
9	41	30 1	E		overcast.
10	34	30	E		white frost, overcast ¹ .
11	36	30 2	E		overcast and still.
12	32	30 3	E		overcast and still, sun, fog ² .
13	29	30 4	E		freezing fog, still ³ .
14	32	30 5	E		ditto.
15	34	30 2	W		overcast and still.
16	36	29 19	SW		ditto.
17	40	29 19	E	.24	small rain ⁴ .
18	41	30	E		fog, fair, frost.
19	27	30 2	E		sharp frost.
20	27	30	W		very white frost, fair ⁵ .
21	34	29 18	W		fog.
22	30	29 13	SE		mist, small flight of snow.
23	34	29 15	E	.20	fair, rain.
24	38	29 13	W		fair.
25	31	29 8	E	.53	rain and snow ⁶ .
26	27	29 7	W		fog, sharp frost.
27	27	28 16	NE		freezing fog.
28	29	29 6	NE	.15	snow.
29	25	29 13	NE		hard frost.
30	21	29 13	NE		very hard frost ⁷ .
31	16	29 10	E	.10	snow, cutting wind ⁸ .

OBSERVATIONS. ¹ Thin ice.—² White frost, ice.—³ White frost, strong ice.—⁴ Several small showers, and condensation of fogs, since the 21st of November.—⁵ Bearing ice.—⁶ Dist ant lightning.—A great storm of thunder and lightning in Hants and Wilts.—⁷ Frost penetrated through double mats into the greenhouse.—⁸ Freezes within doors.

AVERAGE PRICES of CORN, from Dec. 13, to Dec. 18, 1784.

	Wheat				Rye				Barley				Oats				Beans
	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
London	5	4	3	3	3	0	2	4	3	3	0	2	4	3	3	0	2	4	3	3
COUNTIES INLAND.
Middlesex	5	5	0	0	2	11	2	5	3	9
Surry	5	3	3	7	2	11	2	3	4	3
Hertsford	5	3	0	0	2	3	2	5	4	2
Bedford	5	0	3	6	3	0	2	3	3	8
Cambridge	5	5	3	2	2	11	2	3	3	4
Huntingdon	5	7	0	0	2	9	2	1	3	1
Northampton	5	1	3	1	2	9	2	0	3	2
Rutland	5	8	0	0	3	7	2	3	3	4
Leicester	5	6	4	6	3	9	2	0	3	11
Nottingham	5	6	3	6	3	8	2	3	3	4
Derby	6	0	0	0	3	3	2	4	4	0
Stafford	5	8	0	0	2	11	1	11	3	11
Salop	5	7	3	9	2	10	1	11	4	6
Hereford	5	2	0	0	2	8	1	7	3	6
Worcester	5	11	3	5	2	10	2	2	3	10
Warwick	5	0	0	0	3	0	1	10	3	0
Gloucester	5	9	0	0	2	10	2	2	3	8
Wilts	5	6	0	0	2	8	2	3	4	4
Leics	5	6	3	9	2	10	2	6	3	8
Oxford	5	5	0	0	2	11	2	3	3	10
Bucks	5	0	0	0	2	11	2	2	3	8

COUNTIES upon the COAST.

Essex	4	10	0	0	2	7	1	11	3	5
Suffolk	5	0	3	0	2	8	2	2	3	1
Norfolk	5	10	2	10	2	9	2	5	0	0
Lincoln	5	3	3	0	3	1	2	0	3	3
York	5	8	3	10	3	3	2	0	3	10
Durham	5	8	4	7	3	1	2	0	4	5
Northumberland	5	6	3	10	2	11	2	1	4	1
Cumberland	6	1	4	5	3	3	1	11	5	2
Westmorland	6	2	4	6	3	3	1	11	4	0
Lancashire	6	3	4	0	3	7	2	3	3	11
Cheshire	6	1	4	6	3	1	2	3	0	0
Monmouth	5	9	0	0	2	9	1	7	0	0
Somerset	5	9	3	2	2	7	2	0	3	4
Devon	5	9	0	0	2	9	1	7	0	0
Cornwall	5	10	0	0	2	9	1	7	0	0
Dorset	5	8	0	0	2	7	1	1	3	11
Hampshire	5	2	0	0	2	10	2	5	4	1
Suffex	4	11	0	0	2	9	2	0	3	4
Kent	5	0	3	3	3	0	2	3	3	7

WALES, Dec. 6, to Dec. 13, 1784.

North Wales	6	2	4	8	3	6	1	10	4	1
South Wales	6	1	4	5	3	3	1	6	4	0

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For DECEMBER, 1784.

BEING THE SIXTH NUMBER OF VOL. LIV. PART II.

MR. URBAN, Edinburgh, Dec. 24.

WHEN I see money and pleasure becoming every day more and Virtue and Learning every day less the pursuits of my countrymen, I cannot help deploring the loss of a veteran in the little phalanx of the Learned, which was formed when we were a great people, and made our enemies fear and envy us, whilst at the same time they could not withhold their esteem.

Allow me to lay on the altar of British fame the following classical tribute of incense to the manes of Dr. JOHNSON, from a man grown old in studies congenial to the good man who is the subject of his eulogy.

M. S.

SAMUELIS JOHNSONI, LL. D.
Viri subacti & firmi ingenii,
In literis Angliæ ornamenti,
Cum non vita erepta, sed mors
Donata esse videtur;
(Etsi sit & erit luctuosa amicis,
Matura forsan sibi
Sed acerba patriæ,
Gravis bonis omnibus :)
Ne diutius videret Britanniam,
Vestigalibus petulanter oppressam,
Ardentem invidia Senatam,
Sceleris nefarii principes reos,
Civitatem eam denique
In omni genere deformatam,
In qua ipse florentissima
Multum omnibus gloria præstitit.
Obiit anno ætatis septuagesimo sexto
Decembris MDCC LXXXIV.

G. S.

He who wishes to strow these purple flowers on the grave of JOHNSON flatters himself that they are such as the venerable old man whom they are ac-dedicated to would have approved of, as coming from Scotland, where flattery on his subject was not to be expected.

It was the misfortune of Johnson, and of his contemporaries, to be born as it were out of due time, and to survive the age of Erudition, which he himself enriched and adorned; and he saw, and many of these still see, laborious attention to the unfolding the principles of science and of literature yielding to the flimsy ornaments of style, where point and antithesis, embroidered with metaphor, lord it over argument, and where hypothesis wages war a second time with true philosophy, and we shall soon see, I fear, a compleat victory obtained by News-papers, Magazines (Mr. Urban's Miscellany is a rare exception to the censure), Translations, Abridgements, Beauties, Reviews, and Fugitive Pieces, with the light Summer Infantry, to compleat the rout over the heavy-armed Legion of the Learned.

While I breathe the breath of life, I will endeavour to avert this catastrophe, and, in honouring the shade of JOHNSON, I prove the sincerity of my intentions; for he had many of the innocent weaknesses of a learned man, and he did not see with the eyes of a philosopher or of a partial guest the country of ALBANICUS.

DR. JOHNSON.

Monday, the 13th December, 1784, closed the remarkably affectionate suspension of the publick, during his long and painful illness, by the removal of Dr. Samuel Johnson; who was born at Lichfield in September 1709.

A splendid

A splendid series of almost 50 years, devoted to the literature of his native country, with unparalleled elegance and success, renders all praise superfluous; and will, perhaps, perpetuate the language he was thus destined to exalt.

His observation, in 1779, on losing the Author he so long loved †, we must now appropriate to himself, with exquisite propriety and regret. "This man has left a gap in our world, which, to supply, we must for ever look round in vain."

If, in his convivial, or private conversation, any individuals, that enjoyed it, became not wiser or better, the fault was entirely their own. Impurity or infidelity never escaped his lips; and generally found severe reprehension, when obtruded by others, during "That Feast of Reason and that Flow of Soul."

Dr. Johnson rejoiced to share his present property, be it little or be it much, with every child of distress that sought his door; becoming literally "Eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame."

Bred in the ecclesiastical discipline, and politics, which distinguished the Royalists in the last century, he never abandoned them,

Fearing God as a man, and loving him as a Christian, perfectly equal to his former self in the most solemn moments of his declining life, he met death at last with dignity and comfort; not only knowing, but declaring "in whom he trusted."

Of his descent Samuel Johnson had no cause to be ashamed; and, for the only partner of his life and fortune, of whom he had been deprived 30 years, an epitaph, inscribed on a black marble grave stone in Bromley church, Kent, can best relate her merit, and his affection † :

Hic conduntur reliquie

ELIZABETHÆ

Antiqua JARVISIORUM gentis,

Peatlingæ, apud Leicestrenses, ortæ;

Formosæ, cultæ, ingeniosæ, piæ;

Uxoris, primis nuptiis, HENRICI PONTAR, secundis, SAMUELIS JOHNSON,

Qui multum amaram, diuque deflectam,

Hoc lapide contextit.

Obiit Londini, mense Mart.

A. D. MDCCCLIII.

On the Monday after his decease, he was interred in Westminster Abbey, at the foot of Skakspeare's monument, and close to the remains of his beloved pupil David Garrick.

His friends, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. Scott, attended as executors.

Sir Charles Bunbury, Sir Joseph Banks, Edmund Burke, William Windham, Bennet Langton, and George Colman Esqrs, as pall-bearers; and the several other gentlemen whose names appear in p. 947, with his faithful black servant for whom he has amply provided, as mourners.

The Rev. Dr. Taylor performed the burial office, attended by some gentlemen of the Abbey—but, it must be regretted by all who continue to reverence the hierarchy, that the cathedral service was withheld ‡ from its invariable friend; and the omission was truly offensive to the audience at large.

 Our Readers will find in p. 899 an ample Biographical Sketch of Dr. Johnson by his Friend Mr. Tyers; in p. 893 some original Letters from the Doctor to our Printer; and in our Obituary, some original Particulars of his Life and Character. These grateful Tributes, to a Man who deserved so well of the Republic of Letters, we doubt not, will plead our Excuse to the many Correspondents whose Favours are for the present postponed.

* Dr. Johnson and Dr. Hawke worth honoured this collection with their earliest attention to periodical publications. EDIT.

† The Doctor, not many days before his death, wrote to Lichfield, desiring that a large stone might be placed over the bodies of his father, mother, and brother; who were buried in St. Michael's (or Green Hill) Church, and hoped it might be done "while he was yet alive." This letter inclosed the inscriptions, which we hope to present to our readers next month. EDIT.

‡ How this omission happened, we are unable to account. Perhaps the Executors should have asked for it; but at all events it should have been performed. That the fees for opening the ground were paid, was a matter of indispensable necessity; and there can be no doubt, from the liberality of the present Dean and Chapter, but they will be returned, as was offered in the case of Dryden, and was done in that of St. Evremond, who "died," says Atterbury, "renouncing the Christian Religion: yet the Church of Westminster thought fit, in honour to his memory, he gave his body room in the Abbey, and allow him to be buried there gratis, so far as as the Chapter were concerned, though he left 800l. sterling behind him; which is thought every way an unaccountable piece of management. Sarré buried him roundly, and hoped that his brother would rise to life eternal." See Atterbury's Epistolary Correspondence, vol. III, p. 111; who adds afterwards p. 200, "His epitaph written by Dr. Garth, is to be put up in the Abbey, if the Bishop will suffer it, where Evremond is commended for his indifference to religion." How striking the contrast betw. ST. EVREMOND and JOHNSON! EDIT.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 22.

MEETING at p. 731 of your Magazine for October with an attempt to define the etymology of the word Aroynt in the play of Macbeth; I was induced to look into Mr. Steevens's edition of Shakspeare; where I found, that Dr. Johnson, in a note on this passage, refers us to an old drawing (print he should rather have called it) in Mr. Hearne's Collections. But, as the Dr. in my humble opinion, has partly misconceived the print itself, and is besides totally silent as to the particular work in which it is contained, I shall trouble you with a few words on the subject in question.

The print alluded to is taken from an old Calendar, supposed to be written in the reign of Edward III. formerly in the possession of Bp. Fleetwood, but given by that prelate to Mr. Hearne; who has inserted it in the appendix to a work by him published, in 5 vols. 8vo. Oxon. 1712, intitled, "Johannis de Fordun Scotychronicon Genuinum, &c." It represents Our Saviour (not St. Patrick, as the Dr. supposes; and my reasons for so thinking I will assign hereafter) holding in his left hand a cross and banner affixed. A monstrous kind of head is seen immediately in front of him; the jaws of which he appears to keep open with the end of his cross; whilst, with his right hand, he is in the act of delivering the foremost of thirteen human figures from this place of their confinement (intended doubtless for purgatory); which foremost figure has likewise hold of the next behind it. Close to the back part of this head is placed a devil, having a prong with three crooked tines in his left hand, and with his right uplifting to his mouth a horn. Over his head (and not, according to the Dr. in a label issuing out of his mouth) we read, in old characters. Out out Aroynt—I might here observe, that the Dr. is likewise guilty of an error, when he talks of St. Patrick's—putting the Devils into great confusion—whereas one Devil only is represented throughout the whole.

Now my reasons for supposing, that the principal figure in this print is designed to represent Our Saviour, and not St. Patrick, are, that such parts of the body, as are naked, viz. the neck, arms, legs, and thighs, are thickly covered with certain irregular marks denoting, as I conjecture, drops of sweat, or blood; and in each hand and foot is one larger than the rest, expressive of the wounds made by the nails at the time of his crucifixion. To this, might be added, as a farther proof I am right in my supposition, that forked beard, which we see in the portraits of Our Saviour; and, above all, a number of small dots discernible in the forehead, evidently intended to describe the effects of the crown of thorns.

But, should it be urged, that some of the proofs I have here advanced are the common types and symbols of Crucifixion; and (supposing St. Patrick to have suffered in that manner, which however I cannot find in the Romish Martyrology) are as applicable to him, as to Our Saviour; still the legend over this print, viz. Ihesus Christus resurgens a mortuis spoliavit infernum—must clearly, I think, and beyond a doubt, decide the question.

The meaning of this word, viz. Avaunt! Begone! few, I believe, were strangers to before. Its etymology, a more doubtful point, your ingenious Correspondent has probably hit upon; at least the definition he offers is too plausible, to be hastily rejected.

Having said this much, I would wish to disclaim the remotest intention of entering the lists with so powerful an antagonist as Dr. Johnson; too conscious of my own very inferior abilities not to know it were—impar congressus—a pigmy opposed to a giant. My sole design was, to describe an old and curious print with that exactness and precision I was enabled to do, from having it before me. The most tenacious memory will sometimes fail us; and a later acquaintance with this print, when the Dr. wrote, was all, I am persuaded, wanting to have rendered the present task idle and superfluous.

Having already, Mr. Urban, trespassed too long upon your patience, I will but just speak to another passage or two in Shakspeare, and so conclude.

O, well flown, bird!—i'the clout, i'the clout: hewgh! K. Lear, Act 4.

Lear is here raving of archery, and shooting at buts, as is plain by the words i'the clout, that is, the white mark they set up and aim at: hence the phrase to hit the white. So that we must read—O, well flown, barb! i. e. the barbed, or bearded arrow. Warburton.

To confirm Dr. Warburton's opinion, in which most of the other commentators mentators seem to join him, I find the following speech in Green's Tu quoque—a comedy written by John Cooke, in the reign of Q. Elizabeth.

"Now if you can do any good, why so; the silver game be yours; we'll stand by, and give him, and hollow, if you hit the clout."

Time and the hour runs through the roughest day. Macbeth, Act I.

None of the Editors seem reconciled to the word—hour—Were it not for offering too great a violence to the text, I could wish to substitute—tide—in its place; alluding to the old proverb—Time and tide stay for no man.

"What scene of death hath Roscius now to act?" Henry VI. P. III. Act V.

The passages here quoted by Mr. Steevens, to prove that Roscius, as well as Æsop, performed in tragedy, can, I think, have little weight against the joint testimonies of Horace and Quintilian.

Quæ gravis Æsopus, quæ doctus Roscius egit. Horat. Epist. II. lib. II. v. 62.

Where the epithets assigned them are clearly intended to distinguish their different walks.

And Quintilian is still more explicit:

"Roscius citator, Æsopus gravior fuit, quod ille Comedias, hic Tragedias egit."

Lib. II. cap. 3.

I am, Sir, your constant reader,

S—Hall, Suffolk.

W. R.

P. S. Since I wrote, as above, the learned, the good Dr. Johnson, has paid his last debt to Nature. By whose death the Republic of letters has sustained an almost irreparable loss, and true and orthodox Religion been deprived of one of her strictest votaries, as well as ablest defenders.

Dec. 15.

W. R.

MR. URBAN,

Dec. 22.

THE medal engraved in the Gentleman's Magazine last month, p. 817. No. 2, was struck in Sweden to the memory of that eminent naturalist doctor Charles Daniel Solander, late one of the librarians of the British Museum. The obverse presents us with his head, on the side of which is represented a flower of the class of PENTANDRIA MONOGAMIA, called, in an unpublished oration of Linnaeus the younger, Solandra. Of this flower I have seen a beautiful dried specimen from Jamaica in the collection of Sir Joseph Banks.

It will not be improper to observe that Dr. Murray, professor of physick at Gottingen, not knowing this intention of Linnaeus the son, has, in his new edition of the Systema Vegetabilium by the father, called another plant of the class of MONADELPHIA POLYANDRIA after the name of Solander. Which of the two plants will continue to bear the honours of its name must be left to the determination of future botanists.

The reverse informs us that the medal is dedicated to the present worthy President of the Royal Society, the friend and patron of the Doctor, by Baron Claes Alströemer, and his brother John Alströemer. The former is commander of the Order of Wasa; and both of them, I am informed, were his fellow students at the University of Upsal. The medal does honour to all the parties concerned in it: and it were to be wished that this mode of handing down to posterity the memories of ingenious and scientific men was more practised in this country.

R. S.

P. S. A silver coin published in your Magazine for May last, fig. 7 p. 324. is supposed by a correspondent of the last month to have been struck at Hamburg. Not to mention that it is not to be found, nor indeed any at all similar to it, in Langermanus' full and accurate account of the coins and medals of Hamburg, in German, the legend proves that it belongs to a different city. It is this; on the obverse CIVITAS SCI M. T. I. E. ET B. KA. On the reverse SERVORVM IN PATORIS. The type of the obverse is not uncommon on the coins of the middle age; that of the reverse is manifestly borrowed from the pennies of our Henry II. I am inclined to think that it was struck at Lucca in Italy; as it is probable that SCI M. is intended for SANCTI MARTINI, the patron saint of that city, whom they represent upon their coins at this very day, and that the Emperor, to whose service they profess themselves addicted, is Otho IV, who conferred upon them many valuable privileges, and confirmed to them in particular the right of striking money.

—Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes,
Emollit mores, nec fuit esse seros.

MR. URBAN,

If your disposition is agreeable to your name, which I have no reason to doubt, you will find room in your Magazine for the two following quotations from from authors of established reputation. I do not mean to make any application of them; Let the stricken deer go weep; but it is to be hoped they may produce consequences that may not be disagreeable to the generality of your readers.

"It is a misfortune to learning, that men bred to letters are not always bred Gentlemen. The narrowness of their circumstances, or the reservedness of their natural dispositions, both or either of which may contribute to seclude them from the world, to confine them to their studies, and to deprive them of the open and generous conversation of well-bred company, contributeth also to the narrowness of their manner of thinking, to make them positive and dogmatical, and by degrees sours their tempers, and maketh too many of them impatient of contradiction; which when they cannot answer by ratiocination, they fly into a passion, and make up the deficiency, like most low-bred people, with abuse."

Bishop Clayton's Vindication of the Old and New Testament, Part II. p. 33.

The present Bishop of London, in his well-known letter to Bishop Warburton, p. 63, addresses him thus:

"It is commonly said that your Lordship's education was of that particular kind, concerning which it is a remark of that great judge of men and manners, Lord Clarendon, that it peculiarly disposes men to be proud, insolent, and pragmatical. Now, my Lord, as you have in your whole behaviour, and in all your writings, remarkably distinguished yourself by your humility, lenity, meekness, forbearance, candour, humanity, civility, decency, good manners, good temper, moderation with regard to the opinions of others, and a modest diffidence of your own, this unpromising circumstance of your education is so far from being a disgrace to you, that it highly redounds to your praises."

The passage alluded to above is to be found in Lord Clarendon's History, 8vo. vol. III. p. 246; and runs thus;

"Colonel Harrison was the son of a butcher near Nantwich in Cheshire, and had been bred up in the place of a clerk under a lawyer of good account in those parts; which kind of education introduces men into the language and practice of business; and, if it be not resisted by the great ingenuity [ingenuosities] of the person, inclines young men to more pride than any other kind of breeding; and disposes them to be pragmatical and insolent."

S. R.

MR. URBAN,

Dec. 9.

As you have shewn so much willingness to record the Eccentricities of the New River in your useful and entertaining Miscellany, I now mention to you one more, which perhaps you may think worthy of notice, and which I am sorry I did not recollect when I sent you some short memoirs of the boarded river and neighbouring country.

In the meadows near the northern extremity of the parish of Stoke Newington, and which are a part of the demesne lands of the manor, about half a mile to the west of Stamford hill turnpike, and a mile and a half (reckoning by the course of the river) to the north east of the boarded river, being the easternmost point of the river in this neighbourhood, it formed an angle; and in order to save that angle, the company entered into an agreement with Lady Abney, the Lessee of the Manor, (of whom see more in the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, Numbers IX. and XIV.), by which they were empowered, under certain conditions, to cut a channel through the earth, about as long, perhaps, as the boarded river: this was accordingly done, and on the mouth of the arch at one end the date appears inscribed in stone, 1724: the old channel of the river still remains as a ditch, and probably serves upon occasion to carry off some of the waste water.

Whether the late Master Holford was then governor of the company, I know not; but they seem about that time to have been very attentive to the preservation and improvement of the river; for between this place and the boarded river, where it crosses the Green Lane which separates the parishes of Newington and Hornsey, a strong stone sluice is built, bearing date 1729, from whence the waste water runs down to that little stream, which is afterwards called Hackney Brook: but within these two years they have made several new drains in this neighbourhood, which are very neatly contrived, form little cascades, and are much more simple than sluices in their execution.

With respect to the way leading from the boarded river to Highbury Barn (mentioned in your last Magazine), which Mr. Colebrooke stooped up, I do by no means give it as my opinion that it is no thoroughfare, being fully satisfied in my own mind that it is an ancient road: there is indeed no intermission of road, but cross one field; and though it may seem extraordinary that there should be so many parallel roads through the neighbouring country, some now turnpike roads, others bye-roads, and in winter scarcely scarcely passable, but all leading ultimately to the same place; yet those of your readers who have ever turned their thoughts to the multiplicity of parallel roads that are to be found in such profusion through the country, made at a time when our ancestors could not dream of pasture land being left for three or four pounds an acre, will never, I think, be persuaded to believe that the road in question could end in a Cul de sac at the boarded river, especially as a raised road begins at the other end of a little field.

If these trifling thoughts are worth your attention, Mr. Urban, they are much at your service. Yours, &c. E.

MR. URBAN,

Dec. 9.

IN looking over your valuable Miscellany, which I always do with much pleasure and attention, I find an unlucky mistake in the Magazine for October, p. 728, line 2 of the note, where Sir Henrice Finch is said to have been Speaker of the House of Commons in 1605, instead of 1625.

Upon seeing the ancient knife represented in your plate, I immediately supposed the arms in the 1st and 4th quarters to be those of Fortescue, though I could not appropriate the 2d and 3d quarters, nor account for a phoenix being given as the crest, the crest of Fortescue being a plain shield: but when I came to p. 746, col. 1. I found the very same coat mentioned as the coat of Sir Adrian Fortescue, allowing for a trifling difference, arising probably from the smallness of the engraving on the handle of the knife.

Will any of your philological correspondents account for an impropriety frequently met with, of writing the name Antony with an b, Anthony? I say an impropriety, because as I was once turning it in my mind, I resolved to explore its origin: it is not, said I, a Greek name, it is not in the Greek Lexicon, though Bailey, in his Dictionary, without hesitation, derives it from ἄνθος: I then referred to Ainsworth, who answered the question to my full satisfaction—it is, says he, “the name of many great Romans, their family was derived from Antæus the son of Hercules”—certainly then there is no place for an b in the word, and yet I believe that in the German and other northern languages, and b is always inserted: whence this Kaxoyφaφia?

Can any of your numerous readers, Mr. Urban, favor the public with an account of what is meant by the titles of the Psalms inscribed over the stalls of the thirty prebendaries in the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral? what is the design of them, and what do they refer to? I cannot discover any clue by which to explain the rationale of them in any respect, and I understand it has been a matter of speculation with some of the prebendaries themselves at their installation: their duty, I am told, is to read prayers here, in person, or by proxy, on Sunday afternoons; but the titles of the Psalms here inscribed can have no reference to that, because in some instances it is the title of a Psalm which is neither for the evening service, nor the first of the two or three for the day, particularly Confitemini Domino, the title of the XVIII, which is the third Psalm for the 24th day, morning prayer. Had it borne any reference to this, it would have been something like what I observed in the choir of Hereford Cathedral, (and in no other cathedral in England) where, on the back of the Dean's Stall is inscribed, “Decanus in festo Paschatis concionabitur,” and the stalls of all the clergy, of whom there is a great number, twenty-six prebendaries, besides other dignitaries, have a similar inscription, a day fixed for each. I should think a satisfactory resolution of this question would be agreeable to some of your curious readers, as well as to

Yours, &c.

E.

MR. URBAN,

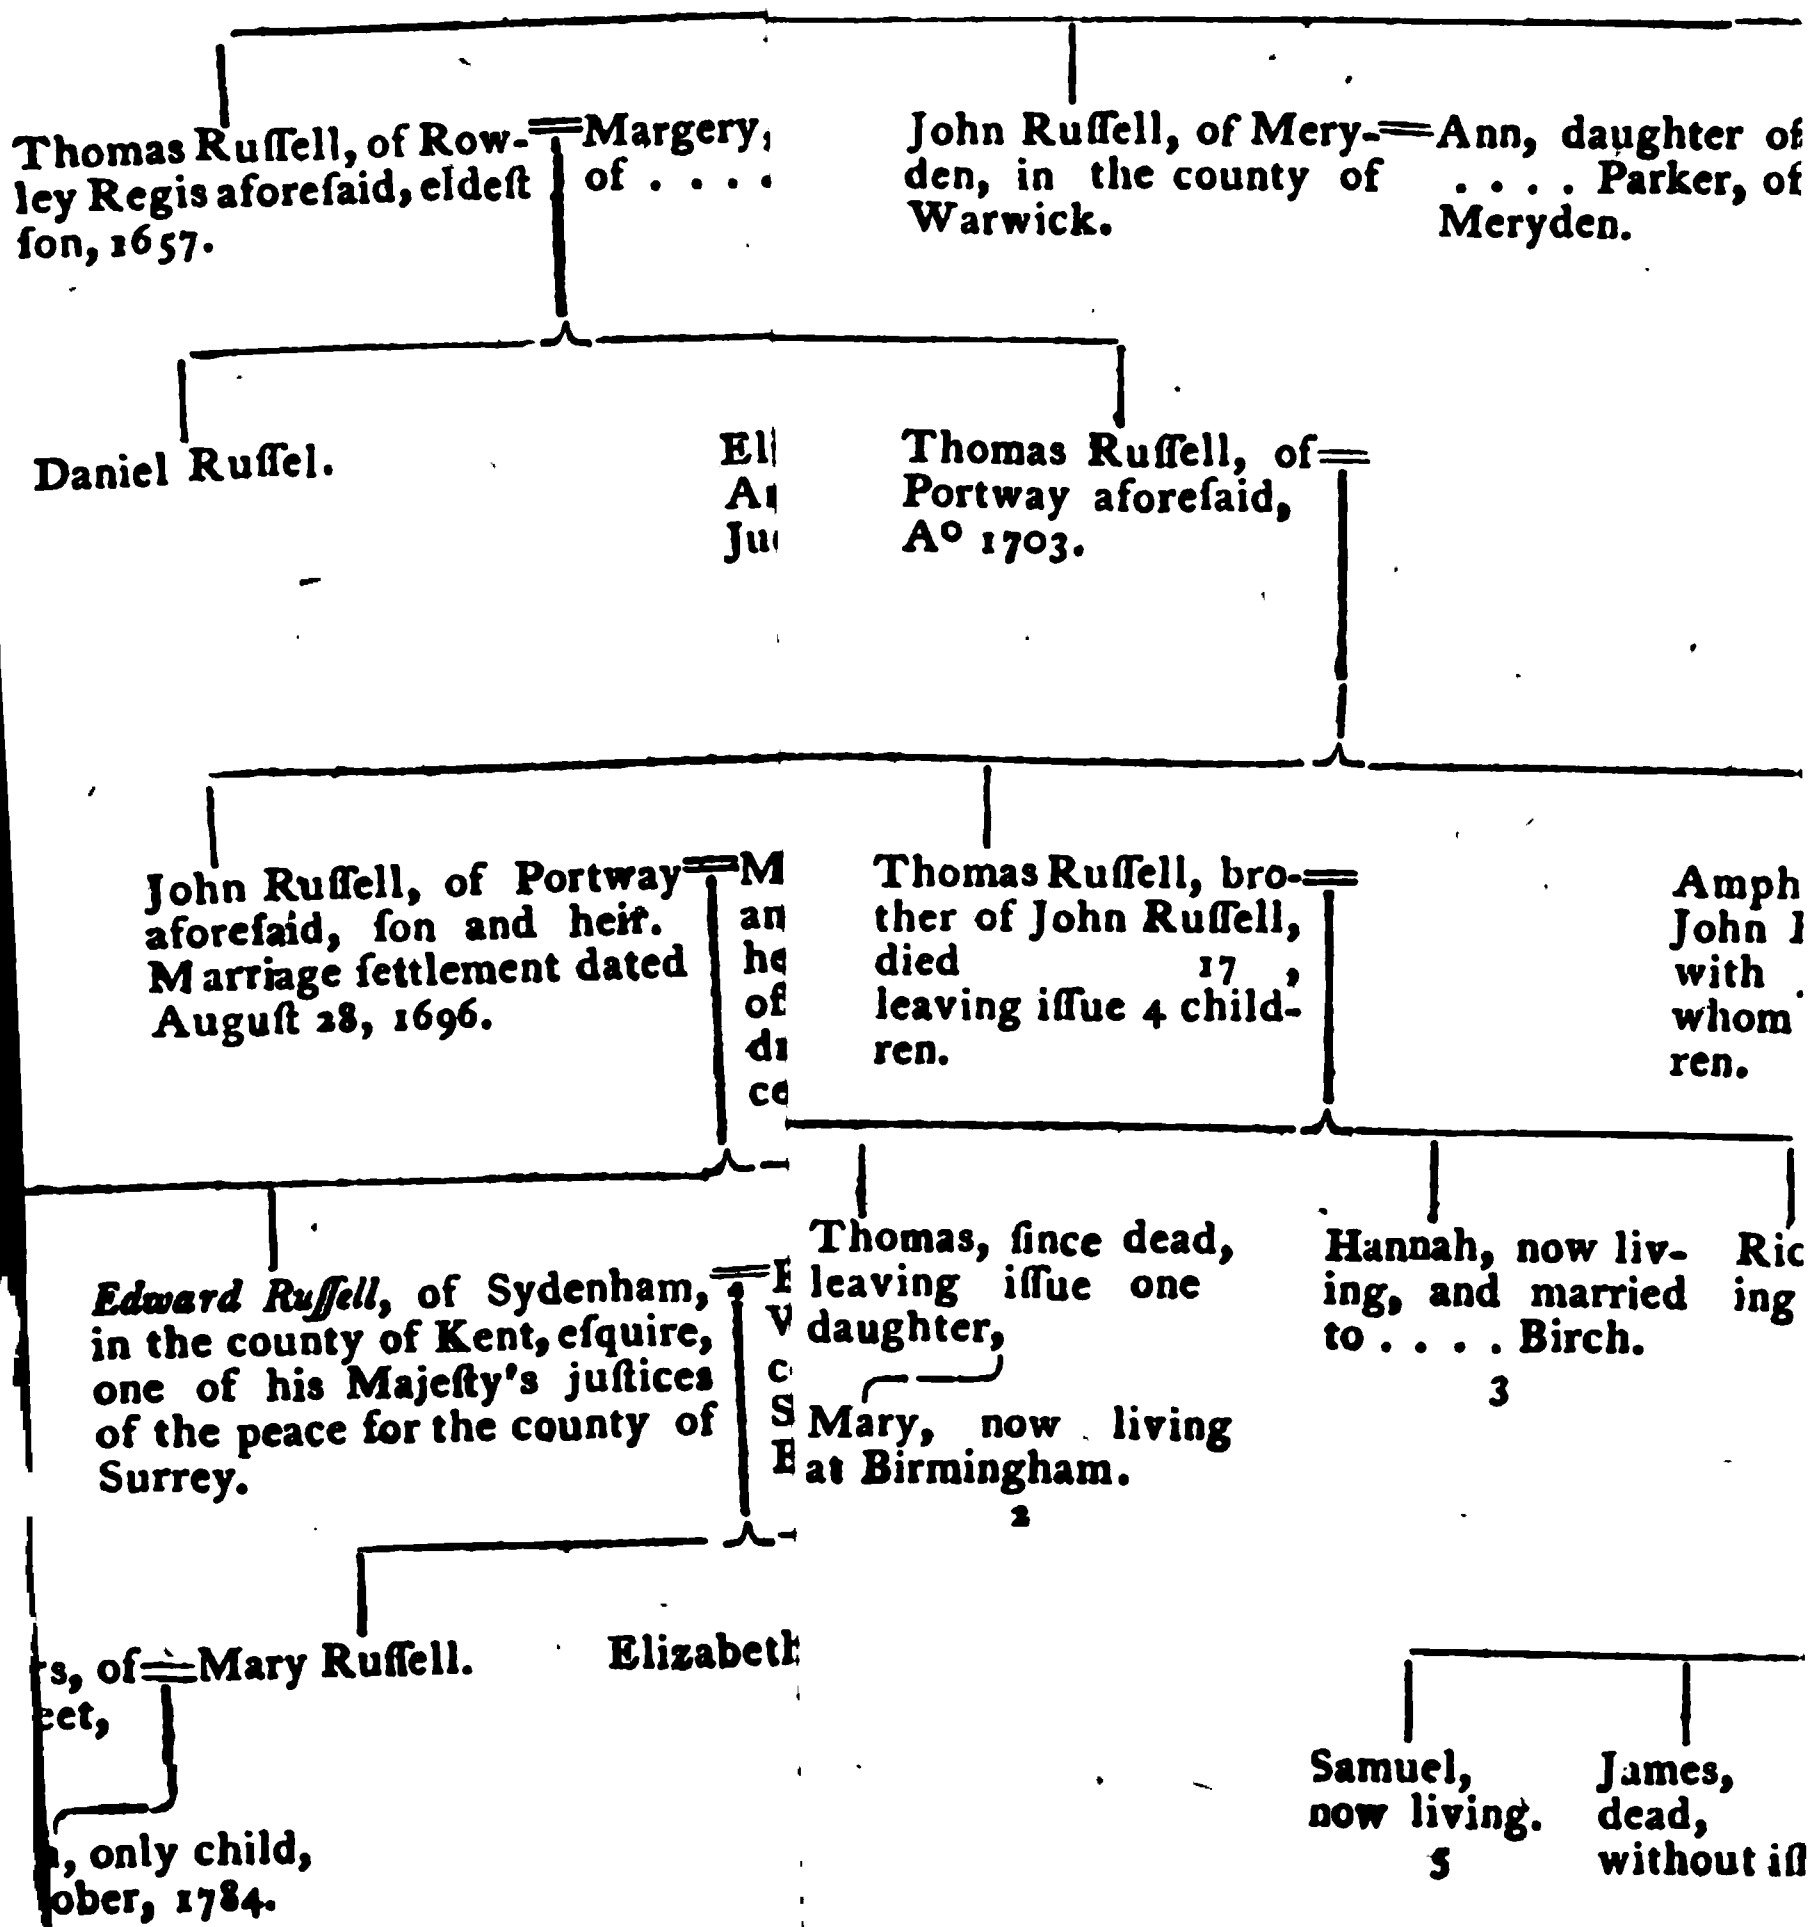

IT appears from your volume XXXV, p. 193, that a procession was annually made at Toulouse, May 13, to celebrate the massacre of the Protestants in 1562, till in 1763, the Parliament of Toulouse petitioned the King of France to put an end to it.

It further appears from your volume XXXVIII, p. 560, that Juvenal de Ursins, a Knight of the Holy Ghost, in his memoirs of the time, relates various well-attested voices heard in the air, after the shocking event: so much was the national conscience, if I may so call it, wounded by this atrocious deed.

I wish your correspondent B. H. p. 486, would favour you with fuller accounts of the emaciated Kings in the Royal Abbey of St. Denis near Paris, and likewise that he would inform you whether there are any good engravings of the royal and other monuments there, for those in Corrozet and Montfaucon are not to be depended on; or how correct draughts of them could be procured.

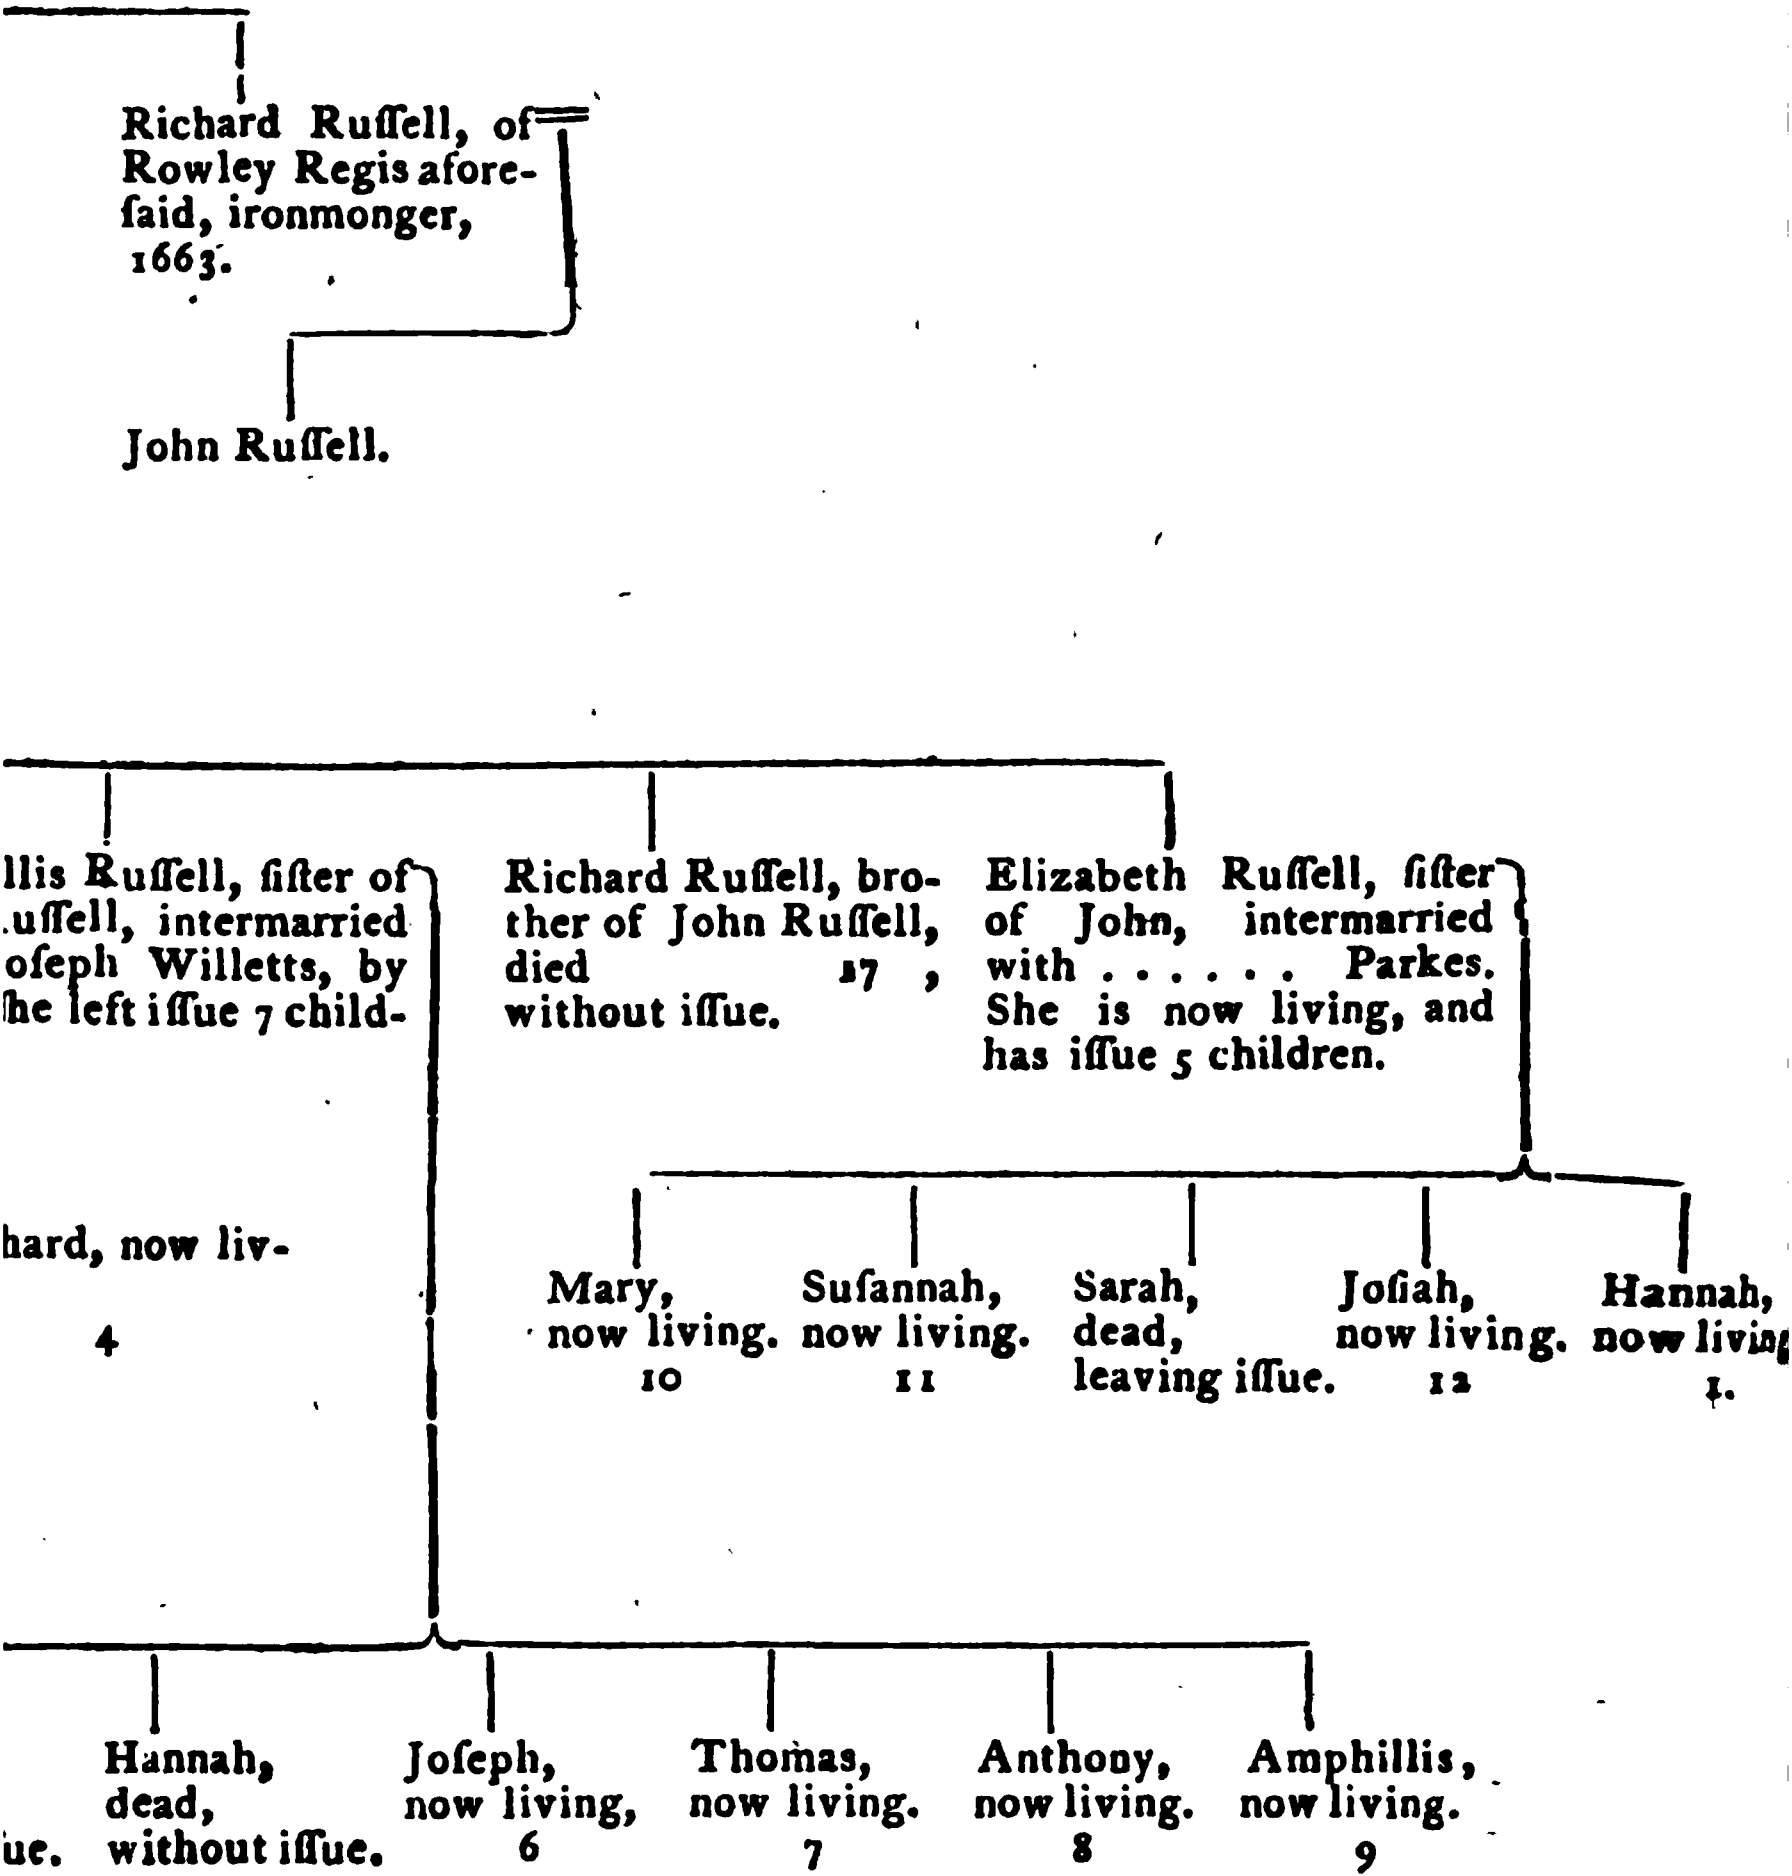

Ma.

The PEDIGREE of the County of SURREY; and of ended from STAFFORDSHIRE;
, by JOHN HARRISON, Norroy King o

EDWARD RUSSELL, of SYDENHAM,

Arms, A° 1784.

Abstract of the Will of RICHARD RUSSELL, Esq. lately deceased.

IN the Name of God, Amen. I, RICHARD RUSSELL, of the parish of St. Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey, Esq. do make this my last will.

And, first and principally, I commit my soul into the hands of my Creator; and my body to be interred at the east end of the vault of the parish church of St. John, Southwark; and my funeral to be conducted in manner hereafter directed. I direct that my coffin be of oak, and plain, without ornaments, like those usually made for Quakers, but with an inscription and handles thereon; which coffin I desire may be placed in one made of stone, without a lid; and I do desire that six young women of good character, between the age of 21 and 30, be required to support my pall; and that they be dressed in black silk or velvet, according to the season of the year, but all alike, with silk scarfs, favors, and gloves, and whatever other trophies my executors shall think proper; and that they be taken from their houses, or where they shall appoint, on the night of the burial, and carried back in the coaches that shall attend; and that a room be appropriated for their accommodation: and I also desire that four young women, dressed in white, and with favors and gloves, do wait on the pall-bearers, and attend the funeral in one coach; and that when the body shall arrive at the church gate, and from thence to the place where the body shall rest during the service in the church, they strew flowers before the pall-bearers: and I direct that neat baskets, with flowers, be delivered to them as soon as they shall come to the church-yard gate; and that, after the funeral is over, the baskets shall be their property.

I desire my executors to invite to my funeral eight gentlemen, in the commission of the peace, and who act as magistrates for the county of Surrey; and that they be presented with handbands and gloves, and other things usually given at funerals.

And further I desire that the two rectors of the parishes of Bermondsey and St. John be invited to my funeral; but in case either or both should excuse himself or themselves, then I desire that the officiating minister of each parish be invited, and that each of them who shall attend be presented with a scarf, handband, and gloves, and such other things as are usual at funerals.

And I do desire my executors will apply to the rector of St. John aforesaid, to preach a short sermon the evening of my funeral; but if he cannot attend, that he be required to appoint one in his stead.

And further I desire that the organist of St. John, or any person he shall appoint, be required to play on the organ the dead march in the Oratorio of Saul or Sampson, while the bearers are removing the body from the church to the place of interment, and continue the same till the burial service begins; and, after it is over, to immediately reassume and continue the same march till the company who attend the funeral be in the coaches.

GENT. MAG: Dated, 1784.

And I desire that a proper number of people be employed to attend with lights, and to keep good order and decorum, and more especially to prevent the pall-bearers and their attendants, and others, from being incommoded.

And it is my will, that only two persons go in a coach together (except only the flower-strewers, they to go all in one coach, and which is to precede the hearse); and that the procession do not move before nine of the clock in the evening, from the place where I shall lie.

And my will is, that my funeral expences do not exceed 500l. and that a sum not less than 200l. be expended thereupon.

I give to each of my pall-bearers 50s.; to each of the flower-strewers 20s.; to be paid as soon as possible after my funeral, and not to be considered as part of my funeral expences.

And I desire, that escutcheons, with my arms, be affixed on the hearse, and silk escutcheons on the pall; and every pall bearer, and the other young women, and the magistrates, be presented with a silk escutcheon, rolled up in paper, after the funeral is over.

I give to the rectors of Bermondsey and St. John, five guineas each; but if they, or either of them, should not attend my funeral, then I give the same to the officiating minister that shall attend.

I give to the organist of St. John, if he plays, five guineas, to be paid the night of my funeral, or the next day.

And I do hereby direct, that my executors lay out 100l. in the purchase of bread, beef, and mutton, to be disposed of in the vestry-hall of church yard of St. John aforesaid, the morning of my funeral, to the greatest objects of charity that shall apply for the same, and to be disposed of before 12 o'clock the same morning.

I give to William Hammerton, now or late of Horncastle, in the county of Lincoln, fellmonger; and John Shipton, now or late of Watford, in the county of Herts, leather-dresser, 100l. to each, as a token of my former trading with them.

I give to Mary Clarke, formerly servant in my father's family, 100l.

I give to Mr. Wm. Donaldson, of Messrs. Child house, my gold watch, remembering the promise I made him many years ago.

I give to Isaac Stapleton, esq; 100l.

I give to every servant who shall be in my service at the time of my decease, 10l. each.

I give to Sir Joseph Mawbey, of Botleys, in Surrey, barr. Samuel Gillam, of Rotherhithe, Thomas Bell, of Bermondsey, wool-stapler, and William Leavis, of Vauxhall, esq; my executors herein after named, 100l. each.

I give, devise, and bequeath, to the said Sir Joseph Mawbey, Samuel Gillingham, Thomas Bell, and William Leavis,

All that my freehold messuage, No 6, in Lombard-street, now in the tenure of — Irene:

Also all that my freehold messuage in Hedge-row, Islington, now in the tenure of — Singleton:

Also all those my freehold lands, messuages, &c. in the parish of St. Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey, aforesaid:

And also all those my four freeholds in Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, London, and all other my freehold estate wheresoever situate;

To hold the same, their heirs and assigns, for ever:

Upon trust nevertheless, to the intent and purpose that they, and the survivors or survivor of them, do sell and dispose of the same, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease, for the best price and prices that can be reasonably got: the money so to be raised to be applied in manner following:

2000l. to be laid out in erecting and placing up a monument, to perpetuate my memory, in the parish church of St. John, Southwark, aforesaid.

And the further sum of 100l. I give to Dr. Samuel Johnson, now or late of Bolt-court, Fleet-street, upon condition he writes an epitaph, to be inscribed on my said monument.

And the further sum of 20 guineas I give to the rector of St. John, upon condition he consents to the placing up the said monument in the parish church of St. John aforesaid.

And I direct that the said monument be immediately set about after my decease, and completely finished in one year; the same to be paid for as soon as completely finished.

And my mind and will is, that the receipt of them the said trustees, &c. shall be a good and sufficient discharge to the purchaser or purchasers of my said freehold estate or estates as aforesaid.

And I do hereby order and direct, that my said trustees shall not be answerable the one for the acts of the other, nor for any involuntary loss that may happen; but that they, and each of them, be saved harmless out of my estate for all costs, damages, and expences whatsoever, which they, or either of them, shall incur in the execution of the trusts hereby in them reposed.

And I expressly direct, that all and singular the monied legacies hereinbefore given, shall be paid out of the residue and remainder of the monies that shall arise by sale of my freehold estates hereinbefore devised, except the legacies given to my executors, which I desire in the first place they may retain, but likewise to be issuing out of the produce of my freehold estates as aforesaid, if that shall be sufficient. If not, the deficiency to be made up and paid out of the residuum of my personal estate.

I give to the President, Vice-President, and Governors of the Magdalen Hospital in St. George's-Fields, 3000l. to be paid out of my personal estate, and to be applied towards carrying on the charitable designs of the said hospital.

I give to the President and Treasurer of the New Lying-In Hospital in Lambeth, 3000l. to be paid and applied in like manner.

Also I give to the President and Treasurer of the Small-Pox Hospital in Cold Bath-Fields, Middlesex, 3000l. in like manner.

Also I give to the President and Treasurer of the Surrey Dispensary, held in Southwark, 500l. to be paid in like manner as the former bequests, and to be laid out in decorating and ornamenting the Dispensary lately erected in Union-street, Southwark.

Also I give to the Treasurer of the Charity School of the parish of St. Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey, 100l.

Also I give to the Treasurer of the Charity School of the parish of St. John, Southwark, 100l.

N. B. The bequests of 20 guineas to the rector of St. John, the 100l. to be given away in provisions, and the 100l. to the charity school, are all revoked in case the said rector should refuse the executors the liberty of erecting his monument in the said church.

And in case of such refusal, I desire to be interred in the parish church of St. George the Martyr, in the borough of Southwark. And all the above legacies to be disposed of, mutatis mutandis, to the said parish of St. George.

I give to my trustees 10 guineas, to be expended in a dinner at the final execution of this my will; the four treasurers of the hospitals to be invited to such dinner.

All legacies and charges to be paid as soon as possible; and the will to be fully and finally completed within one year.

The will to be proved immediately, copied, and printed, and one printed copy delivered to the treasurer and clerk of the four hospitals, Surrey dispensary, and treasurer of the schools, and to each legatee.

All the rest, residue, and remainder of his personal estate, of what nature or kind soever, he gives to the Treasurer or Treasurers for the time being, of a society who now call themselves The Guardians of the Asylum, or House of Refuge, situate on the Surrey side of Westminster Bridge, for the reception of orphan girls; to be applied towards carrying on the charitable designs of the said charity; subject to maintain and keep his monument in good repair; and to the payment of four guineas a year, payable quarterly, to the sexton of the parish where the said monument shall be erected, to keep the same clean and decent.

His portrait in blue drapery (which we have copied) he directs to be placed up in the court or committee-room of the said Asylum.

The part of his will relative to the bequests he directs to be read once in every year, year, at some or one of their general meetings; and that the secretary, clerk, or other officer, be paid half a guinea for his trouble.

If the executors of his will as aforesaid should refuse to act, then he constitutes and appoints the treasurers of the four hospitals for the time being to be executors in their stead, viz. Treasurer of the Magdalen, in room of Sir Joseph; Treasurer of Small-Pox Hospital, in room of Mr. Gillam; Treasurer of Asylum, in room of Mr. Bell; Treasurer of Lying-In Hospital in Lambeth, in room of Mr. Leavis.

All former wills revoked; as is the legacy to Dr. Johnson, and given to the Rev. Mr. John Grose, by codicil dated Apr. 12, 1784. By another codicil he directs his books of prints to be sold for 200 guineas, if any one will give it; and his letter-press books and pamphlets for 100l.

Note. His will is executed and witnessed Apr. 10, 1784. Q. Whether not subject to the statute of Mortmain *?

MR. URBAN,

Dec. 6.

NO apology will be necessary, either to yourself or to your learned readers, for introducing to their notice the following very curious anecdote in literary history, authenticated as it is by the introductory letter of my most respected and respectable friend Dr. Johnson. I will only observe, that it confirms (what, as far as it went, appears now very evidently to be authentic) a memorandum which I communicated in your volume for 1781, p. 370; whence it appears that the Proposals for the Ancient Universal History were published Oct. 6, 1729; and that the authors of the first seven volumes were the gentlemen whose names appear below †. The MS. of Mr. Swinton shall be presented to the Curators of the Museum.

Yours, &c. J. NICHOLS.

P. S. Dec. 14. The date to the above biller, and to Dr. Johnson's letter, will shew that, amidst the pangs of illness, the love of truth, and an attachment to the interests of literature, were still predominant. His letter, I may add, appears in public, not only by his permission, but by his express desire. And it may be matter of some exultation to Mr. Urban, whom Dr. Johnson always acknowledged to have been one of his earliest patrons, that the GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE should have been by him selected as the repository of perhaps the last scrap he ever dictated for the press. That he had a considerable share in compiling the "Parliamentary Debates" in your early volumes is well known, and will ever be an honour to his memory. Yet such was the goodness of his heart, that no longer ago than Tuesday last, the 7th of December, he declared to the writer of these lines, "that those debates were the only parts of his writings which then gave him any compunction; but that at the time he wrote them he had no conception he was imposing upon the world, though they were frequently written from very slender materials, and often from none at all, the mere coinage of his own imagination. He never," the good man added, "wrote any part of his work with equal velocity. Three columns of the Magazine in an hour," he said, "was no uncommon effort, which was faster than most persons could have transcribed that quantity. In one day, in particular, and that not a very long one, he wrote twelve pages, more in quantity than ever he wrote at any other time, except in the Life of Savage, of which 48 pages in octavo were the production of one long day, including a part of the night." Of his friend Cave, he always spoke with great affection; yet says he, "Cave (who never looked out of his window but with a view to the Gentleman's Magazine) was a penurious paymaster ‡; he would contract for lines by the hundred, and expect the long hundred; but he was a good man,

* By the 9 Geo. II. c. 30, all bequests of land to charitable uses are void, unless they are given twelve months, and enrolled in Chancery six months, before the death of such donor, and be made to take effect immediately. EDIT.

- † Vol. I. Mr. Sale, translator of the Koran.
II. George Psalmanazer.
III. George Psalmanazer,
Archibald Bower,
Capt. Snelvoike,
Dr. Campbell.

- IV. The same as vol. III.
V. Mr. Bower.
VI. Mr. Bower,
Rev. John Swinton.
VII. Mr. Swinton,
Mr. Bower.

‡ It appears, however, from an account now before us, under his own hand, that he received from Mr. Cave by different payments, from Aug. 2, 1738, to Apr. 21, 1739, 47 guineas, "in relation to a Version of Father Paul, begun Aug. 2, 1738." Of this version, which was intended to have been published by subscription, 6 sheets were actually printed; but another translation being at the same time announced under the patronage of Dr. (afterwards Bp.) Pearce; the designs of both proved abortive. See Dr. Johnson's Life of Father Paul in our vol. VIII. p. 581. EDIT.

"and

"and always delighted to have his friends at his table."

To Mr. Nichols.

THE late learned Mr. Swinton of Oxford having one day remarked that one man, meaning, I suppose, no man but himself, could assign all the parts of the Ancient Universal History to their proper authors; at the request of Sir Robert Chambers*, or of myself, gave the account which I now transmit to you in his own hand, being willing that of so great a work the history should be known, and that each writer should receive his due proportion of praise from posterity.

I recommend to you to preserve this scrap of literary intelligence in Mr. Swinton's own hand, or to deposit it in the Museum, that the veracity of this account may never be doubted.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

Dec. 6, 1784. SAM. JOHNSON.

Mr. S——n.

The History of the Carthaginians.
 ————— Numidians.
 ————— Mauritians.
 ————— Gætulians.
 ————— Garamantes.
 ————— Melano Gætulians.
 ————— Nigritæ.
 ————— Cyrenaica.
 ————— Marmarica.
 ————— The Regio Syrtica.
 ————— Turks, Tartars, and Moguls.
 ————— Indians.
 The History of the Chinese.

* Now a judge in India.

† As many people are at a loss to conceive how the copy of this letter got abroad in the world, the following is given as a true statement of that affair: Mr. Boswell, having conceived an idea that the air of Italy would be of great service to the constitution of Dr. Johnson (though it was never the opinion of his physicians), expressed to many of the Doctor's friends an earnest wish that some mode of augmenting his pension could be devised. Sir Joshua Reynolds was of course among those who were consulted; and knowing well that accumulation was never the good Doctor's talent, and thinking that a temporary enlargement of the pension would be the handsomest manner of supplying his wants, spoke to the Lord Chancellor about it, who took the first opportunity to mention it to the K——. His M—— had been before apprised of the Doctor's intentions, and seemed to approve of them; but whether thinking the Chancellor's application not official, or from accident, when thus mentioned to him, he turned the conversation to something else, which decided the Chancellor to do it himself; he accordingly wrote to Dr. Johnson, informing him, that he had good at his banker's, and requesting his acceptance of it. The Doctor melted at this voluntary offer, and though in a very bad state of health at Lichfield, wrote an answer, unsealed, and under cover, to Sir Joshua Reynolds, to be delivered by him to the Chancellor. (This part of the story the writer of this parenthesis had from his own mouth before the letter had appeared in print.) Sir Joshua received this letter whilst he was in company, which so pleased him, that he could not resist communicating that pleasure to Lady L——, who happened to be present. Her ladyship's memory being remarkably good, she put the whole to paper when she went home, with only the mistake of a single word, "rested" for "rioted," and from thence other copies getting abroad, it soon found its way into the public papers. This, without the least delicacy on either side, a circumstance has come to light, which ought to be made public for the honour of both their characters.

————— Dissertation on the People of America.

————— on the Interdependency of the Arabs.

The Cosmogony; and a small part of the history immediately following. By Mr. Sale.

To the Birth of Abraham. Chiefly by Mr. Shelvock.

History of the Jews, Gauls, and Spaniards. By Mr. Psalmanaazar.

Xenophon's Retreat. By the same.

History of the Persians, and the Constantinopolitan Empire. By Dr. Campbell.

History of the Romans. By Mr. Bower.

At the request of several of our Correspondents, we republish the Letter which is said to have been written by the late great Luminary of Literature to a great Officer of State. And as every thing that is but the supposed production of Dr. Johnson's pen has its merit with the public, we shall subjoin a copy of that gentleman's letter to Mrs. T——. That this is at least as genuine as the other, we have not the smallest doubt. That both may have been mutilated, we are ready to believe. Certain it is that different copies of the letter to the Ch——r admit of different readings†. The internal evidence of either is just strong enough to create a variety of opinions; but, by what means either of them got abroad, is a query more easily started, than answered.

1. "To the Right Hon. Lord T——-L——-w.
 "AFTER a long and not inattentive observation of mankind, the generosity of your Lordship's offer raises in me not less wonder than gratitude. Bounty so liberally bestowed I should gladly receive, if my condition made it necessary; for to such a mind, who would not be proud to own his obligations? But it has pleased God to restore me so great a measure of health, that if I should now appropriate so much of a fortune destined to do good, I could not escape from myself the charge of advancing a false claim. My journey to the Continent, though I once thought it necessary, was never much encouraged by my physicians; and I was very desirous that your Lordship should be told of it by Sir Joshua Reynolds, as an event very uncertain; for if I grew much better I should not be willing, if much worse I should not be able, to migrate. Your Lordship was first solicited without my knowledge: but when I was told that you was^{*} pleased to honour me with your patronage, I did not expect to hear of a refusal; yet, as I have never rioted in imaginary opulence, this cold reception has been scarce a disappointment; and from your Lordship's kindness I have received a benefit which only men like you are able to bestow. I shall now live mibi carior, with a higher opinion of my own merit.

I am, my Lord,

"Your Lordship's most obliged,
"most grateful, and most humble servant,
"S—L J—N."

2. "To Mrs. THR—E.

"MADAM,

"If you are already ignominiously married, you are lost beyond redemption—if you are not, permit me one hour's conversation, to convince you that such a marriage must not take place. If after a whole hour's reasoning you should not be convinced, you will still be at liberty to act as you think proper. I have been extremely ill, and am still ill; but, if you grant me the audience I ask, I will instantly take a post-chaise, and attend you at Bath.—Pray do not refuse this favour to a man, who hath so many years loved and honoured you!"

Of the Three following Letters the Authenticity is unquestionable. To Mr. Nich.

1. SIR,

Oct. 10, 1782.

While I am at Brighthelmston, if you have any need of consulting me, Mr. Strahan will do us the favour to transmit our papers under his frank. I have looked often into your "Anecdotes;" and you will hardly thank a lover of literary history for telling you, that he has been informed and gratified†. I wish you would add your own discoveries and intelligence to those of Dr. Rawlinson, and undertake the Supplement to Wood. Think on it.

I am, Sir, your humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON.

2. SIR,

Jan. 10, 1783.

I am much obliged by your kind communication of your account of Hinckley†. I knew Mr. Carte as one of the Prebendaries of Lichfield, and for some time Surrogate of the Chancellor. Now I will put you in a way of shewing me more kindness. I have been confined by illness a long time; and sickness and solitude make tedious evenings. Come sometimes, and see,

Sir, your humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

3. SIR, Lichfield, Oct. 20, 1784.

WHEN you were here, you were pleased, as I am told, to think my absence an inconvenience. I should certainly have been very glad to give to skilful a Lover of Antiquities any infor-

* Dr. J. wrote this, a plural and a singular, he could not then have been qualis erat.

† In a subsequent letter, dated Oct. 28, Dr. Johnson adds, "I wish, Sir, you could could obtain some better information of Jortin, Markland, and Thirlby. They were three contemporaries of great eminence." It was in consequence of this request that I drew up the account of Thirlby, which is printed in the Magazine for April 1784, p. 260; which having been shewn to Dr. Johnson in the state of a proof sheet, he added to it nearly half of what is there printed. The Doctor's MS. is now before me, and begins with "What I can tell of Thirlby, I had from those who knew him; I never saw him in my life." The communication concludes with "This is what I can remember." I will take this opportunity of adding, that, on my shewing Dr. Johnson the "Remarks on his Life of Milton," which were published in 8vo. 1786, he wrote on the margin of p. 14, "In the business of Lauder, I was deceived; partly by thinking the man too frantick to be fraudulent. Of this quotation from the ["Literary"] Magazine ["a POETICAL SCALP"], I was not the author. I fancy it was put in after I had quitted that work; for I not only did not write it, but do not remember it." J. N.

‡ For this work Dr. Johnson had contributed several hints towards the life of Anthony Blackwall, to whom, when very young, he had been some time an usher at Market Bosworth-school. Blackwall died in April 1730, before Johnson was one and twenty. J. N.

mation about my native place, of which however I know not much, and have reason to believe that not much is known.

Though I have not given you any amusement, I have received amusement from you. At Ashbourne, where I had very little company, I had the luck to borrow "Mr. Bowyer's Life," a book so full of contemporary history, that a literary man must find some of his old friends. I thought that I could now and then have told you some hints worth your notice; and perhaps we may talk a life over. I hope we shall be much together. You must now be to me what you were before, and what dear Mr. Allen was besides. He was taken unexpectedly away, but I think he was a very good man.

I have made little progress in recovery. I am very weak, and very sleepless; but I live on, and hope. I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

MR. URBAN,

THE following original letter of the last century may probably illustrate some points in our national history. As such, I request its insertion.

Yours, &c. C. C.

"WORTHY SIR,

The good acceptance my imperfect endeavours have founde wth you, doth encourage me againe to present you wth these few lines, to testify my redines to serve you in your desires. I am very glad to heare your business goeth on so happily wth you; I heartily wish I weare able to give you so good an account of our proceedings heere.

My Ld Lifetenant of Ireland, is ordered to bringe in his instructions to the house yt they may be read theare, and it was further ordered yt no instructions, coming from ye kinge, be put in execution by ye Lord Liftenant, his deputy, or any other governor theare, but by ye advice of both houses of Parliment: heere comes daily many sad complaints, of ye great miseries and distresses of Ireland, desiring present releife, otherwise they shall not be able to subsist. Collonell Preston, wth 3 other greate commanders are lately come into Wexford wth 5 barkes, laden with ammunition, wch makes ye rebels to insult very much; they now hold a councell wch they call a parliment at Kilkenny for the ordering of their army, and government of that kingdom.

Theare appeared neere Trimme, wch is wthin 20 miles of Dublin, a body of 4000 foote and 700 horse of ye rebels; it was conceived they intended to beseege Sir Rich. Greenville, who is in a Castle neere yt place; ye Ld Justices have sent from Dublin such forces as they can spare, to prevent it, for if they should prevaile theare, they might easily march up to Dublin, wch is not able to holde out 14 dayes sege, In the conditions now it stands in, beeing in great want of victuals and amunition. Theare is now order given for the speedy sendinge over into Ireland 600 barrells of powder, 40 tunne of match, and 1000 l. is put into the hands of the committy of adventurers for the citty, to provide victuals, and other necessaryes to be sent to them. I should be glad to heare it weare safely come to them.

One of ye instructions sent to my Ld Generall is, That he shall publish and declare, yt if any seduced by false aspersions raised of ye proceedings of parliment, shall wthin 10 days after publication of this (not doeing any hostile acte within yt time), retorne to the parliment, and assist wth their persons and estates, for ye maintenance of the true protestant religion, ye kings person and honour, ye laws of ye land and ye privileges of parliment, shall be received and they shall have cause to acknowledge yt they have been used wth clemency and favoure, except such as have bin impeched or voted as delinquents, or such as have bin impeched for treason, and all such eminent persons as have appeered cheife actors wth them. By name are excepted the Erls of Brisfowe, Cumberlan, and Newcastle, Ld Rivers, Endimion Kente, secretary Nicholas, and Mr Edward Hide, to wch ye lords have added the Duke of Richmonde, ye Erls of Newarke and Carnarvan, wth ye Ld Faulkland: theare are many other instructions, but this I was desirous to relate at large, yt you might ye better see, and bewaile wth me, ye litle hopes we have of peace when, so many of highe birth, and fortune, are made desperate.

The Lord make us worthy of so greate a blessing as peace, and then bestowe it on us, and in the meane time sanctify all his dealings to us, yt we may cheerfully submit to his will [and] plesure. The king is now at Shrewsbury, and my Ld Generall at Worcester: he sent to the Erle of Dorset, desiring him to acquaint ye king yt he had a peticon from both houses to present to him, desiringe to knowe knows his ma'tys plesure how, and when he would please to receive it. Answer was returned from ye kinge, that ye peticon of the houses shall never finde his care shutt against them, and yt those he should appoint to bring it (so they be none of those he hath by name accused of treason) should come and go very safely. My Ld Generall sent this to ye house, desiring theire further direction in it. The house returned this vote; That it doth not stand wth ye honour and priviledge of parliment, yt a peticon of both houses should be delivered wth any restraint; and he is desired to give signification to the kinge, in such a way as he shall think fitt, of this resolution; and in ye meane time yt he should proceed according to his former instructions. The distractions in Yorkshire are like to be very greate, our committy theare having consented to very disadvantageous articles, and Sr Ed. Rider and Mr John Hotham having now a 1000 men wth them in another parte of ye county refusing to join wth them or consent to them. The carryer is now redy to goe away. I shall not therefore trouble you any longer; but wth ye tender of my best respects to your worthy selfe in hast rest, and ever remaine desirous to be esteemed by you

Your affectionate friend to serve you,
October ye 4th 1642. J. F.

I do not heare it confirmed yt the Earle of Bathe is taken.

The superscription is

To my much honoured friend Sr
John Holland Kt and Barronet at Quiddenham in Norfolke present these.

Leave this at Larlingford to bee conveyed as above said.

[The Seal is engraved in our Plate, fig. 6.]

In Twickenham church-yard is an inscription to the memory of an old woman, "who nursed Alexander Pope *;" remarkable for occasioning the following sarcasm, soon after it was put up, by Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, which was written under it with a piece of chalk:

No wonder that he's so stout and so strong,
Since he lugg'd and he tugg'd at the bubby
so long.

"* To the memory of
MARY BEACH,

who died Nov. 5, 1725, aged 78.

Alexander Pope, whom she nursed in his infancy, and whom she affectionately attended for twenty-eight years, in gratitude for such a faithful old servant, erected this stone."

MR. URBAN,

HAVING seen many imperfect accounts of the additions made to the British Peerage in the present reign, give me leave to send you the following, which I can warrant to be exact.

Peers created by King George III.

3 Dukes of the Blood Royal (Pr. of Wales not included). viz. York, Gloucester, and Cumberland. Advanced from inferior titles granted in former reigns, 2 Marquisses, ditto.

8 Earls, viz. * Spencer, Chatham, * Hillsborough, * Mansfield, Lonsdale, Norwich, * Grosvenor, and * Beaulieu. Advanced 9.

4 Viscounts, viz. Courtenay, Sackville, Howe, and Keppell. Advanced 6.

44 Barons, viz. Grantham, Scarsdale, Boston, Pelham, Holland, Lovel, Milton, Vernon, Ducie, Camden, Digby, Sundridge, † Greenwich, Cardiff, Hawke, Amherst, Brownlow, Rivers, Harrowby, Foley, Thurlow, Loughborough, Gage, Brudenell, Walsingham, Bagot, Southampton, † Dinevor, Portchester, Ashburton, Grantley, Rodney, Sydney, Rawdon, Camelford, Lovaine, Carteret, Eliot, Bulkeley, Grey, Somers, Boringdon, Berwick, and Sherborne.

59 Peers, therefore, which is above one fourth of the whole House (see below), have been added to the British Peerage by his present Majesty. Of these the thirteen in Italics have been created since January last; and though the five Earls thus * marked were only advanced, yet four of them, having been originally ennobled by the present King, are properly Peers of this reign, and the fifth Earldom, that of Mansfield, has been granted in reversion to Viscount Stormont, and is therefore a new creation. The two baronies thus † marked are at present held by females. That of Lovaine is a reversion, granted after the Duke of Northumberland's demise to his second son, Lord Algon Percy. In this list no Peerages since extinct, or merged in others, such as Melcombe, Montagu, Hume, and Cranley (I recollect no others), are included, nor the three female Baronies of Mount Stuart, Chatham, and Hamilton, as they will all merge in their sons, who are Peers already. Lord Brudenell, it may be added, will probably succeed to the Earldom of Cardigan, on the death (without issue) of his brother the Duke of

MR. URBAN, Westminster, Dec. 6.

FROM a long course of reading, and much serious reflection, I am inclined to believe that the complaints which are directed so seriously against the luxuries and refinements of modern times; are altogether ill founded, and chimerical. Indeed I think that, without any want of candour, I may go yet farther, and may be justified in asserting that, all things considered, we are really in many respects less accomplished, and less refined, than our more enlightened forefathers. Be this as it may, I have been often present, where, amidst complaints of many arts that were lost, and praises of many improvements which modern ingenuity has discovered, it seemed in a manner to have been universally acknowledged that these were at least the days of good eating; that the Divinity of the table was never adored with greater zeal, cultivated with more industry, or attended with more elegant refinement. I confess, Sir, that, unawed by surrounding epicures, in the extreme fervor of this their devotion, and unseduced by the flavor of the smoking board, I have been audacious enough to deny the assertion, and dispute the fact. I have contended that the expence of Crispinus, the profusion of Nafidienus, and the magnificence of Heliogabalus, have been hitherto unrivaled. You may believe, as this matter was disputed when every individual was employed, and every palate found but little to regret, that if I have not made many proselytes, few have taken much pains to overturn my system. I will however take the liberty of introducing, through your means, to my city friends, a gentleman, whose absence from their scenes of conviviality, however splendid, they will unquestionably deplore, when they once know the nature of his profession, the elegance of his appearance, and the utility of his virtues. I have lately seen a manuscript, of which, by the way, there is only one more copy in the kingdom, written in good French, Leyden, in the year 1669; by a Monsieur Vontet. This, Mr Urban, is the gentleman of whom I speak, and whose title, profession, and qualifications, I think worth the attention of your readers. He styles himself Ecuyer Tranchant, Anglicè Squire Carver; and he tells us that this was formerly an office of great consideration in the families of sovereigns and the principal nobility.

He professes to teach this art, and declares that he himself exercised this office in the family of a Spanish Grandee. He conceives himself qualified by much study and reflection, and by attending to the most experienced masters of Italy and Spain, to teach it in the very best manner. And he recommends it to the attention of persons of distinction, natives as well as foreigners, to prevent their being confused at banquets and entertainments.

He gives the following, as the necessary qualifications of an accomplished Ecuyer Tranchant.

He must be of a good family, as he is to be considered amongst the principal servants. He must be gentle, civil, and attentive. He must be present at table, with his sword, and cloak thrown over his shoulder with easy carelessness. His napkin is to hang on his left arm, though he says some hang it on the hilt of their sword, and not inelegantly. Upon entering the room, he is to make his reverence, then draw the table, and perform his office, carving the dishes, and dividing the meat according to the number of the guests.

He is to stand by the side of his master, and cut up the dishes as they come to table with knives of different size. He tells you the times when the provisions he recommends are in season, and he takes particular care to instruct his reader in the knowledge of the parts to be offered to guests according to their rank. And this to avoid offence, for he says it is by no means proper that persons of inferior rank should receive in quantity, or quality, equal with their superiors.

It does not appear that Monsieur Vontet published his works, but that he made presents of them to his patrons and friends. His performance is embellished with drawings of birds, fish, and fruit, and is in every respect a real curiosity. I leave you, Mr. Urban, to determine how far the comforts would be extended, and their gratification increased, if with the first dish of a modern entertainment a Monsieur Vontet was to enter, and display his taste, dexterity and accomplishments. Yours, &c. A. B.

 The Critique will be inserted.

††† D. I. may probably find Canton's solution of the question, "How can what we call the shooting of stars, &c. be best accounted for?" in the Gentleman's Magazine, where it certainly was agitated.

A Biographical Sketch of Dr. Samuel Johnson.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH of DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

WHEN Charles the Second was informed of the death of Cowley, he pronounced, "that he had not left a better man behind him in England." It may be affirmed with truth, that this was the case when Dr. Johnson breathed his last. Those who observed his declining state of health during the last winter, and heard his complaints, of painful days and sleepless nights, for which he took large quantities of opium, had no reason to expect that he could survive another season of frost and snow. His constitution was totally broken, and no art of the physician or surgeon could protract his existence beyond the 13th of December. When he was opened, one of his kidneys was found decayed. He never complained of disorder in that region; and probably it was not the immediate cause of his dissolution. It might be thought that so strong and muscular a body might have lasted many years longer. For Johnson drank nothing but water, and lemonade (by way of indulgence), for many years, almost uninterruptedly, without the taste of any fermented liquor: and he was often abstinent from animal food, and kept down feverish symptoms by dietetic management. Of Addison and Pope he used to observe, perhaps to remind himself, that they ate and drank too much, and thus shortened their days. It was thought by many, who dined at the same table, that he had too great an appetite. This might now and then be the case, but not till he had subdued his enemy by famine. But his bulk seemed to require now and then to be repaired by kitchen physic. To great old age not one in a thousand arrives. How few were the years of Johnson in comparison of those of Jenkins and Parr? But perhaps Johnson had more of life, by his intenseness of living. Most people die of disease. He was all his life preparing himself for death: but particularly in the last stage of his asthma and dropsy. "Take care of your soul—don't live such a life as I have done—don't let your business or dissipation make you neglect your Sabbath"—were now his constant inculcations. Private and publick prayer, when his visitors were his audience, were his constant exercises. He cannot be said to have been weary of the weight of existence, for he declared, that to prolong it only for one year, but not for the comfortless sensations he had lately felt, he would suffer the amputation of a limb. He was willing to endure positive pain for pleasure. But he had no expectation nature could last much longer. therefore, for his last week, he unduly abandoned every hope of recovery or duration, and committed soul to God. Whether he felt the stroke of death, and met the king of terrors face to face, cannot be known: For "and the sun cannot be looked upon," Rochefoucault. But the writer of this reason to imagine that when he thought he had made his peace with his Maker he had nothing to fear. He has ta of submitting to a violent death, good cause, without apprehensions. one of the last visits from his surgeon, on performing the puncture on his and assured him that he was better, he declared, "he felt himself not so, and that he did not desire to be treated like a woman or a child, for that he had made his mind." He had travelled thro the vale of this world for more seventy-five years. It probably a wilderness to him for more than his time. But he was in the possession of rest and comfort and plenty, for the twenty years. Yet the blessings of fortune and reputation could not compensate to him the want of health, which pursued him through his pilgrimage on earth. Post equitem sedet atra cura.

"For when we mount the flying steed Sits gloomy Care behind."

Of the hundred sublunary things bestowed on mortals, health is ninety-nine. Johnson was born with a scrophulous habit, which he was touched, as he acknowledged, by good Queen Anne, with a piece of gold he carefully preserved. even a Stuart could not expell that enemy to his frame, by a touch. For it would have been even beyond the stroke power of Greatrix in all his glory, to charm it away. Though he seemed to be athletic as Milo himself, and in his younger days performed several feats of activity, he was to the last a convalescent. He has often slept aside, to let nature do what she would with him. His gestures, which were a degree above St. Vitus's dance, in the street, attracted the notice of many: the stare of the vulgar, but the compassion of the better sort. This writer has often looked another way, as the companions of Peter the Great were used to do, while he was under the short paroxysm. He was perpetually taking opening medicines. He could only keep his ailments from gaining ground. He thought he was worse the agitation of active exercise. He was afraid of his disorder's seizing his head, and took all possible care that his understanding should not be deranged. Oandum est, ut sit mens sana in corpore sano. When his knowledge from books, and he knew all that books could tell him, is considered; when his compositions in verse and prose are enumerated to the reader (and a complete list of them wherever dispersed is desirable) it must appear extraordinary he could abstract himself so much from his feelings, and that he could pursue with ardour the plan he laid down of establishing a great reputation. Accumulating learning (and the example of Barretier, whose life he wrote) shewed him how to arrive at all science. His imagination often appeared to be too mighty for the controul of his reason. In the preface to his Dictionary, he says, that his work was composed "amidst inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow." "I never read this preface," says Mr. Horne, "but it makes me shed tears."

If this memoir-writer possessed the pen of a Plutarch, and the subject is worthy of that great biographer, he would begin his account from his youth, and continue it to the last period of his life, in the due order of an historian. What he knows and can recollect, he will perform. His father (called "gentleman" in the parish register) he says himself, and it is also within memory, was an old bookseller at Lichfield, and a whig in principle. The father of Socrates was not of higher extraction, nor of a more honourable profession. Our author was born in that city; and the house of his birth was a few months ago visited by a learned acquaintance, the information of which was grateful to the Doctor. It may probably be engraved for some monthly repository. The print and the original dwelling may become as eminent as the mansion of Shakspeare at Stratford, or of Erasmus at Rotterdam. He certainly must have had a good school education. He was entered of Pembroke College, Oxford, Oct. 31, 1728, and continued there for several terms. By whose bounty he was supported, may be known to enquiry. While he was there, he was negligent of the College rules and hours, and absented himself from some of the lectures, for which when he was reprimanded and interrogated, he replied with great rudeness and contempt of the lecturer. Indeed he displayed an overbearing disposition that would not brook controul, and shewed that, like Cæsar, he was fitter to command than to obey. This dictatorial spirit was the leading feature in his deportment to his contemporaries. His college themes and declamations are still remembered; and his elegant translation of Pope's Messiah into Latin verse found its way into a volume of poems published by one Husbands. In 1735, after having been some time an usher to Anthony Blackwall, his friends assisted him to set up an academy near Lichfield. Here he formed an acquaintance with the late Bishop Green, then an usher at Lichfield, and with Mr. Hawkins Browne. As the school probably did not answer his expectation (for who does not grow tired of teaching others, especially if he wants to teach himself?), he resolved to come up to London, where every thing is to be had for wit and for money (Romæ omnia venalia), and to seek his fortune. He was accompanied by his pupil Mr. Garrick: and travelled on horseback to the metropolis in March 1737.

The time and business of this journey are before the public in some letters from Mr. Walmesley, who recommends Johnson as a writer of Tragedy; as a translator from the French language; and as a good scholar. He brought with him his tragedy of Irene, which afterwards took its chance on Drury-Lane theatre. Luckily he did not throw it into the fire, by design or otherwise, as Parson Adams did his Æschylus by mistake. He offered himself for the service of the booksellers; "for he was born for nothing but to write,"—

"And from the jest obscene reclaim our youth,
And set our passions on the side of truth."

The hurry of this pen prevents the recollection of his first performances. But he used to call Dodsley his patron, because he made him, if not first, yet best known by printing and publishing, upon his own judgement, his Satire, called "London," which was an imitation of one of Juvenal, whose gravity and severity of expression he possessed. He there and then discovered how able he was "to catch the manners living as they rise." The poem had a great sale, was applauded by the public, and praised by Mr. Pope, who, not being able to discover the author, said "he will soon be déterré." In 1738 he luckily fell into the hands of his other, early patron Cave. His speeches for the Senate of Lilliput were begun in 1740, and continued for several sessions. They passed for original original with many till very lately. But Johnson, who detested all injurious imposition, took a great deal of pains to acknowledge the innocent deception. He gave Smollet notice of their unoriginality, while he was going over his historical ground, and to be upon his guard in quoting from the Lilliput Debates. It is within recollection, that an animated speech he put into the mouth of Pitt, in answer to the parliamentary veteran Horace Walpole, was much talked of, and considered as genuine. Members of parliament acknowledge, that they reckon themselves much obliged for the printed accounts of debates of both Houses, because they are made to speak better than they do in the Senate. Within these few years, a gentleman in a high employment under government was at breakfast in Gray's-Inn, where Johnson was present, and was commending the excellent preservation of the speeches of both houses, in the Lilliput Debates. He declared, he knew how to appropriate every speech without a signature; for that every person spoke in character, and was as certainly and as easily known as a speaker in Homer or in Shakspeare. "Very likely, Sir," said Johnson, ashamed of having deceived him, "but I wrote them in the garret where I then lived." His predecessor in this oratorical fabrication was Guthrie; his successor in the Magazine was Hawkesworth. It is said, that to prove himself equal to this employment (but there is not leisure for the adjustment of chronology) in the judgement of Cave, he undertook the Life of Savage, which he asserted (not incredible of him), and valued himself upon it, that he wrote in six and thirty hours. In one night he also composed, after finishing an evening in Holborn, his Hermit of Teneriff. He sat up a whole night to compose the preface to the Preceptor.

His eye-sight was not good; but he never wore spectacles, not on account of such a ridiculous vow as Swift made not to use them, but because he was assured they would be of no service to him. He once declared, that he "never saw the human face divine." He saw better with one eye than the other, which however was not like that of Camoens, the Portuguese poet, as expressed on his medal. Latterly perhaps he meant to save his eyes, and did not read so much as he otherwise would. He preferred conversation to books; but when driven to the refuge of reading by being left alone, he then attached himself to that amusement. "Till this year," said he to an intimate, "I have done tolerably well without sleep, for I have been able to read like Hercules." But he picked and culled his companions for his midnight hours; "and chose his author as he chose his friend." The mind is as fastidious about its intellectual meal as the appetite is as to its culinary one; and it is observable, that the dish or the book that palls at one time is a banquet at another. By his innumerable quotations you would suppose, with a great personage, that he must have read more books than any man in England, and have been a mere book-worm: but he acknowledged that supposition was a mistake in his favour. He owned he had hardly ever read a book through. The posthumous volumes of Mr. Harris of Salisbury (which treated of subjects that were congenial with his own professional studies) had attractions that engaged him to the end. Churchill used to say, having heard perhaps of his confession, as a boast, that "if Johnson had only read a few books, he could not be the author of his own works." His opinion however was, that he who reads most, has the chance of knowing most; but he declared, that the perpetual task of reading was as bad as the slavery in the mine, or the labour at the oar. He did not always give his opinion unconditionally of the pieces he had even perused, and was competent to decide upon. He did not choose to have his sentiments generally known; for there was a great eagerness, especially in those who had not the pole-star of judgement to direct them, to be taught what to think or to say on literary performances. "What does Johnson say of such a book?" was the question of every day. Besides, he did not want to increase the number of his enemies, which his decisions and criticisms had created him; for he was generally willing to retain his friends, to whom, and their works, he bestowed sometimes too much praise, and recommended beyond their worth, or perhaps his own esteem. But affection knows no bounds. Shall this pen find a place in the present page to mention, that a shameless Aristophanes had an intention of taking him off upon the stage, as the Rehearsal does the great Dryden? When it came to the notice of our exasperated man of learning, he conveyed such threats of vengeance and personal punishment to the mimic, that he was glad glad to proceed no farther. The reverence of the public for his character afterwards, which was increasing every year, would not have suffered him to be the object of theatrical ridicule. Like Fame in Virgil, vires acquirit eundo. In the year 1738 he wrote the Life of Father Paul, and published proposals for a translation of his History of the Council of Trent by subscription: but it did not go on. Mr Urban even yet hopes to recover some sheets of this translation, that were in a box under St. John's Gate; more certainly once placed there, than Rowley's Poems were in the chest in a tower of the church of Bristol.

Night was his time for composition. Indeed he literally turned night into day, noctes vigilabat ad ipsum mane; but not like Tigellius in Horace. Perhaps he never was a good sleeper, and (while all the rest of the world was in bed) he chose his lamp, in the words of Milton, in midnight hour,

Were seen in some high lonely tower.

He wrote and lived perhaps at one time only from day to day, and (according to vulgar expression) from sheet to sheet. Dr. Cheyne reprobates the practice of turning night into day, as pernicious to mind and body. Jortin has something to say on the vigils of a learned man, in his Life of Erasmus, "As he would not sleep when he could, nothing but opium could procure him repose." There is cause to believe, he would not have written unless under the pressure of necessity. Magister artis ingenique largitor venter, says Persius. He wrote to live, and luckily for mankind lived a great many years to write. All his pieces are promised for a new edition of his works under the inspection of Sir John Hawkins one of his executors, who has undertaken to be his biographer. Johnson's high tory principles in church and state were well known. But neither his Prophecy of the Hanover Horse, lately maliciously reprinted, nor his political principles or conversations, got him into any personal difficulties, nor prevented the offer of a pension, nor his acceptance. Rara temporum felicitas, ubi sentire quæ velis, et, quæ sentias dicere licet. The present royal family are winning the hearts of all the friends of the house of Stuart. There is here neither room nor leisure to ascertain the progress of his publications, though, in the idea of Shenstone, it would exhibit the history of his mind and thoughts.

He was employed by Osborne to make a catalogue of the Harleian Library

Perhaps, like those who stay too long on an errand, he did not make the expedition his employer expected, from whom he might deserve a gentle reprimand. The fact was, when he opened a book he liked, he could not restrain from reading it. The bookseller upbraided him in a gross manner, and, as tradition goes, gave him the lye direct, though our catalogue-maker offered at an excuse. Johnson turned the volume into a weapon, and knocked him down, and told him, "not to be in a hurry to rise, for when he did, he proposed kicking him down stairs." Perhaps the lye direct may be punished ad modum recipientis, as the law gives no satisfaction. His account of the collection, and the tracts that are printed in quarto volumes, were well received by the public. Of his folio labours in his English Dictionary a word must be said; but there is not room for much. The delineation of his plan, which was esteemed a beautiful composition, was inscribed to Lord Chesterfield, no doubt with permission, whilst he was secretary of state. It was at this time, he said, he aimed at elegance of writing, and set for his emulation the Preface of Chambers to his Cyclopædia. Johnson undoubtedly expected beneficial patronage. It should seem that he was in the acquaintance of his Lordship, and that he had dined at his table, by an allusion to him in a letter to his son, printed by Mrs. Stanhope, and which he himself would have been afraid to publish. Whilst he was ineffectually hallooing the Graces in the ear of his son, he set before him the slovenly behaviour of our author at his table, whom he acknowledges as a great genius, but points him out as a rock to avoid, and considers him only as "a respectable Hottentot." When the book came out, Johnson took his revenge, by saying of it, "that the instructions to his son inculcated the manners of a dancing master, and the morals of a prostitute." Within this year or two he observed (for anger is a short-lived passion), that, bating some improprieties, it contained good directions, and was not a bad system of education. But Johnson probably did not think so highly of his own appearance as of his morals. For, on being asked if Mr. Spence had not paid him a visit? "Yes," says he, "and he probably may think he visited a bear." "Johnson," says the author of the Life of Socrates, "is a literary savage." "Very likely," replied Johnson; "and Cooper (who was as thick as long) is a literary Punchinello." It

It does not appear that Lord Chesterfield shewed any substantial proofs of approbation to our Philologer, for that was the professional title he chose. A small present he would have disdained. Johnson was not of a temper to put up with the affront of disappointment. He revenged himself in a letter to his Lordship, written with great acrimony, and renouncing all acceptance of favour. It was handed about, and probably will be published, for littera scripta manet. He used to say, "he was mistaken in his choice of a patron, for he had simply been endeavouring to gild a rotten post."

Lord Chesterfield indeed commends and recommends Mr. Johnson's Dictionary in two or three numbers of the World. "Not words alone pleased him." "When I had undergone, says the compiler, a long and fatiguing voyage, and was just getting into port, this Lord sent out a small cock-boat to pilot me in." The agreement for this great work was for fifteen hundred pounds. This was a large bookseller's venture at that time: and it is in many shares. Robertson, Gibbon, and a few more, have raised the price of manuscript copies. In the course of fifteen years, two and twenty thousand pounds have been paid to four authors. Johnson's world of words demands frequent editions. His titles of Doctor of Laws from Dublin and from Oxford (both of which came to him unasked and unknown, and only not unmerited); his pension from the King, which is to be considered as a reward for his pioneering services in the English language, and by no means as a bribe; gave him consequence, and made the Dictionary and its author more extensively known. It is a royal satisfaction to have made the life of a learned man more comfortable to him.

"These are imperial works, and worthy Kings."

Lord Corke, who would have been kinder to him than Stanhope (if he could) as soon as it came out, presented the Dictionary to the Academy della Crusca at Florence in 1755. Even for the abridgement in octavo, which puts it into every body's hands, he was paid to his satisfaction, by the liberality of his booksellers. His reputation is as great for compiling, digesting, and ascertaining the English language, as if he had invented it. His Grammar in the beginning of the work was the best in our language, in the opinion of Goldsmith. During the printing of his Dictionary, the Ramblers came out periodically; for he could do more than one thing at a time. He declared that he wrote them by way of relief from his application to his Dictionary, and for the reward. He has told this writer, that he had no expectation they would have met with so much success, and been so much read and admired. What was amusement to him, is instruction to others. Goldsmith declared, that a system of morals might be drawn from these Essays: this idea is taken up and executed by a publication in an alphabetical series of moral maxims.

The Rambler is a great task for one person to accomplish, single-handed. For he was assisted only in two Essays by Richardson, two by Mrs. Carter, and one by Miss Talbot. His Idlers had more hands. The World, the Connoisseur, (the Gray's Inn Journal an exception,) the Mirror, the Adventurer, the Old Maid, all had help-mates. The toilet as well as the shelf and table have these volumes, lately republished with decorations. Shentone, his fellow collector, a learned one. Though it cannot be did of his own last, not a hard word in not rattle through hard words and stalk through polysyllables, to use an expression of Addison, as in his earlier productions. His style, as he says of Pope, became smoothed by the scythe, and levelled by the roller. It pleased him to be told by Dr. Robertson, that he had read his Dictionary twice over. If he had some enemies beyond and even on this side of the Tweed, he had more friends. Only he preferred England to Scotland. As it is cowardly to insult a dead lion, it is hoped, that as death extinguishes envy, it also does ill-will: "for British vengeance wars not with the dead."

He gave himself very much to companionable friends for the last years of his life (for he was delivered from the daily labour of the pen, and he wanted relaxation), and they were eager for the advantage and reputation of his conversation. Therefore he frequently left left his own home (for his household gods were not numerous or splendid enough for the reception of his great acquaintance), and visited them both in town and country. This was particularly the case with Mr. and Mrs.

were with-as in-lived
r. He rary,
on the
to be friend friend ner-ow to d elewith epulis,
hrale,
: said,
ons of wisest oubtok or him, ntinuance, that e owed his re-

" She taught
ing of his insides a natu-
lation, she had gods had made nce Warnings"
t to be original) nd serious, and every body's writer of this s mention could
ice. At Strea-

tham, where our Philologer was also guide, philosopher, and friend, he passed much time. His inclinations here were consulted, and his will was a law. With this family he made excursions into Wales and to Brighthelmston. Change of air and of place were grateful to him; for he loved vicissitude. But he could not long endure the illiteracy and rusticity of the country, for woods and groves, and hill and dale, were not his scenes:

" Tower'd cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men."

But the greatest honour of his life was from a visit that he received from a Great Personage in the Library of the Queen's palace—only it was not from a King of his own making. Johnson on his return repeated the conversation, which was much to the honour of the great person, and was as well supported as Lewis the XIVth could have continued with Voltaire. He said, he only wanted to be more known, to be more loved. They parted, much pleased with each other. If it is not an impertinent stroke of this pen, it were to be wished that one more person had conveyed an enquiry about him during his last illness. " Every body has left their names, or wanted to know how I do," says he, " but"—In his younger days he had a great many enemies, of whom he was not afraid.

" Ask you what provocation I have had?
The strong antipathy of good to bad."

Churchill, the puissant satirist, challenged Johnson to combat: Satire the weapon. Johnson never took up the gauntlet or replied, for he thought it unbecoming him to defend himself against an author who might be retolved to have the last word. He was content to let his enemies feed upon him as long as they could. This writer has heard Churchill declare, " that he thought the poems, of " London," and " The Vanity of Human Wishes," full of admirable verses, and that all his compositions were diamonds of the first water." But he wanted a subject for his pen and for railery, and so introduced Pomposo into his descriptions. " For, with other wise folks, he sat up with the ghost " Our author, who had too implicit a confidence in human testimony, followed the newspaper invitation to Cock-lane, in order to detect the impostor, or, if it proved a being of an higher order, and appeared in a questionable shape, to talk with it. Posterity must be permitted to smile at the credulity of that period. Johnson had otherwise a vulnerable side; for he was one of the few Nonjurors that were left, and it was supposed he would never bow the knee to the Basil of Whiggism. This reign, which disdained proscription, began with granting pensions (without acquiring their pens) to learned men.

Johnson was unconditionally offered one; but such a turn was given to it by the last mentioned satirical poet, that it might have made him angry or odious, or both. Says Churchill, amongst other passages very entertaining to a neutral reader,

" He damns the pension that he takes,
And loves the Stuart he forsakes."

Not so fast, great satirist—for he had now no friends at Rome. In the sport of conversation, he would sometimes take the

the wrong side of a question, to try his hearers, or for his own exertions. But this may do mischief sometimes. "For, without aiming at ludicrous quotation, he could dispute on both sides, and confute." Among those he could trust himself with, he would enter into imaginary combat with the whigs, and has now and then shook the principles of a sturdy revolutionist. All ingenious men can find arguments for and against every thing: and if their hearts are not good, they may do mischief with their heads. On all occasions he pressed his antagonist with so strong a front of argument, that he generally prevented his retreat. "Every body, said an eminent detector of impostors, must be cautious how they enter the lists with Dr. Johnson." He wrote many political tracts since his pension. Perhaps he would not have written at all, unless impelled by gratitude. But he wrote his genuine thoughts, and imagined himself contending on the right side. A great parliamentary character seems to resolve all his American notions into the vain expectation of rocking a man in the cradle of a child. Johnson recounted the number of his opponents with indifference. He wrote for that government which had been generous to him. He was too proud to call upon Lord Bute, or leave his name at his house, though he was told it would be agreeable to his Lordship, for he said he had performed the greater difficulty, for he had taken the pension.

The last popular work, to him an easy and a pleasing one, was the writing the lives of our Poets, now reprinted in four octavo volumes. He finished this business so much to the satisfaction of the booksellers that they presented him a gratuity of one hundred pounds, having paid him three hundred pounds as his price. The Knaptons made Tindal a large present on the success of his translation of Rapin's history. But an unwritten space must be found for what Johnson did respecting Shakspeare. For the writer and reader observe a disorder of time in this page. He took so many years to publish his edition, that his subscribers grew displeased and clamorous for their books, which he might have prevented. For he was able to do a great deal in a little time. Though for collation he was not fit. He could not pore long on a text. It was Columbus at the oar. It was on most literary points difficult to get himself into a willingness to work. He was idle, or unwell, or loth to act upon compulsion. But at last he tried to awake his faculties, and, like the lethargic porter of the castle of Indolence, "to rouse himself as much, as rouse himself he can." He confessed that the publication of his Shakspeare answered to him in every respect. He had a very large subscription.

GENT. MAG. December, 1784.

Dr. Campbell, then alive in Queen square, who had a volume in his hand, pronounced, that the preface and notes were worth the whole subscription money. You would think the text not approved or adjusted by the past or present editions, and requiring to be settled by the future. It is hoped that the next editors will have read all the books that Shakspeare read: a promise our Johnson gave, but was not able to perform.

The reader is apprized, that this memoir is only a sketch of life, manner, and writings—

✓ "In every work regard the writer's end;
"For none can compass more than they intend."

It looks forwards and backwards almost at the same time. Like the nightingale in Strada, "it hits imperfect accents here and there." Hawkesworth, one of the Johnsonian school, upon being asked, whether Johnson was an happy man, by a gentleman who had been just introduced to him, and wanted to know every thing about him, confessed, that he looked upon him as a most miserable being. The moment of enquiry was probably about the time he lost his wife, and sent for Hawkesworth, in the most earnest manner, to come and give him consolation and his company.—"And screen me from the ills of life!" is the conclusion of his sombrous poem on November. In happier moments (for who is not subject to every skyey influence, and the evil of the hour?) he would argue, and prove it in a sort of dissertation, that there was, generally and individually, more of natural and moral good, than of the contrary. He asserted, that no man could pronounce he did not feel more pleasure than misery. Every body would not answer in the affirmative; for an ounce of pain outweighs a pound of pleasure. There are people who wish they had never been born—to whom life is a disease—and whose apprehensions of dying pains and of futurity embitter every every thing. The reader must not think it impertinent to remark, that Johnson did not chuse to pass his whole life in celibacy. Perhaps the raising up a posterity may be a debt and duty all men owe to those who have lived before them. Johnson had a daughter, who died before its mother, if this pen is not mistaken. When these were gone, he lost his hold on life, for he never married again. He has expressed a surprize that Sir Isaac Newton continued totally unacquainted with the female sex, which is asserted by Voltaire, from the information of Cheselden, and is admitted to be true. For curiosity, the first and most durable of the passions, might have led him to overcome that inexperience. This pen may as well finish this last point in the words of Fontenelle, that Sir Isaac never was married, and perhaps never had time to think of it. Whether the sun-shine of the world upon our author raised his drooping spirits, or that the lenient hand of time removed something from him, or that his health meliorated by mingling more with the croud of mankind, or not, he however apparently acquired more chearfulness, and became more fit for the labours of life and his literary function. But he certainly did not communicate to every intruder every uneasy sensation of mind and body. Who, it may be asked, can determine of the pleasure and the pain of others? True and solemn are the lines of Prior, in his Solomon:

“ Who breathes must suffer, and who thinks “ must mourn;

“ And he alone is blest, who ne’er was born.”

Johnson thought he had no right to complain of his lot in life, or of having been disappointed: the world had not used him ill: it had not broke its word with him: it had promised him nothing: he aspired to no elevation: he had fallen from no height. Lord Gower endeavoured to obtain for him, by the interest of Swift, the mastership of a grammar-school of small income, for which Johnson was not qualified by the statutes to become a candidate. His lordship’s letter, published some years ago, is to the honour of the subject: in praise of his abilities and integrity, and in commiseration of his distressed situation. Johnson wished, for a moment, to fill the chair of a professor, at Oxford, then become vacant, but he never applied for it. He was offered a good living, by Mr. Langton, if he would accept it, and take orders: but he chose not to put off his lay habit. He would have made an admirable library-keeper: like Casaubon, Magliabechi, or Bentley. But he belonged to the world at large. Talking on the topick of what his inclinations or faculties might have led him to have been, had he been bred to the profession of the law, he has said he should have wished for the Office of Master of the Rolls. He gave into this idea in table-talk, partly serious and partly jocular, for it was only a manner he had of describing himself to his friends without vanity of his parts (for he was above being vain) or envy of the honourable stations engaged by other men of merit. He would correct any compositions of his friends (babes consistentem), and dictate on any subject on which they wanted information. He could have been an orator, if he would. On account of his intimacy with Dr. Dodd, for whom he made a bargain with the booksellers for his edition of the Bible, he wrote a petition to the Crown for mercy, after his condemnation. The letter he composed for the translator of Ariosto, that was sent to Mr. Hastings in Bengal, is esteemed a master-piece. Dr. W——, of Winchester, talked of it as the very best he ever read. He could have been eminent, if he chose it, in letter-writing; a faculty in which, according to Sprat, his Cowley excelled. His epistolary and confidential correspondence would make an agreeable publication, but the world will never be trusted with it. He wrote as well in verse as in prose. Though he composed so harmoniously in Latin and English, he had no ear for music: and though he lived in such habits of intimacy with Sir Joshua Reynolds, and once intended to have written the lives of the painters, he had no eye, nor perhaps taste, for a picture, nor a landscape. He renewed his Greek some years ago, for which he found no occasion for twenty years. He owned that many knew more Greek than himself; but, that his grammar would shew he had once taken pains. Sir William Jones, one of the most enlightened of the sons of men, as Johnson described him, has often said, he knew a great deal of Greek. With French authors he was familiar. He had lately read over the works of Boileau. He passed a judgement on Sherlock’s French and English letters, and told him there was more French in his English, than English in his French. His curiosity would have led him to read Italian, even if Baretti had not been his acquaintance. Latin was as natural to him him as English. He seemed to know the readiest roads to knowledge, and to languages their conductors. He made such progress in the Hebrew, in a few lessons, that surprized his guide in that tongue. In company with Dr. Barnard and the fellows at Eaton, he astonished them all with the display of his critical, classical, and prosodical treasures, and also himself, for he protested, on his return, he did not know he was so rich.

Christopher Smart was at first well received by Johnson. This writer owed his acquaintance with our author, which lasted thirty years, to the introduction of that bard. Johnson, whose hearing was not always good, understood he called him by the name of Thyer, that eminent scholar, librarian of Manchester, and a Nonjuror. This mistake was rather beneficial than otherwise to the person introduced. Johnson had been much indisposed all that day, and repeated a psalm he had just translated, during his affliction, into Latin verse, and did not commit to paper. For so retentive was the memory of this man, that he could always recover whatever he lent to that faculty. Smart in return recited some of his own Latin compositions. He had translated with success, and to Mr. Pope's satisfaction, his St. Cecilian Ode. Come when you would, early or late, for he desired to be called from bed, when a visitor was at the door; the tea-table was sure to be spread, Te veniente die, Te decedente.—With tea he cheered himself in the morning, with tea he solaced himself in the evening; for in these, or in equivalent words, he expressed himself in a printed letter to Jonas Hanway, who had just told the public, that tea was the ruin of the nation, and of the nerves of every one who drank it. The pun upon his favourite liquor he heard with a smile. Though his time seemed to be bespoke, and quite engrossed, it is certain his house was open to all his acquaintance, new and old. His amanuensis has given up his pen, the printer's devil has waited on the stairs for a proof sheet, and the press has often stood still. His visitors were delighted and instructed. No subject ever came amiss to him. He could transfer his thoughts from one thing to another with the most accommodating facility. He had the art, for which Locke was famous, of leading people to talk on their favourite subjects, and on what they knew best. By this he acquired a great deal of information,

What he once heard he rarely forgot. They gave him their best conversation, and he generally made them pleased with themselves, for endeavouring to please him. Poet Smart used to relate, "that the first conversation with him was of such variety and length, that it began with poetry and ended at fluxions." He always talked as if he was talking upon oath. He was the wisest person, and had the most knowledge in ready cash. This writer had the honour to be acquainted with—Here a little pause must be endured. The poor hand that holds the pen is benumbed by the frost as much as by a torpedo. It is cold within, by the fire-side, and a white world abroad. His reader has a moment's leisure to censure or commend the harvest of anecdote that is brought in, for his sake; and if he has more reading than usual, may remark for or against it in the manner of the Cardinal to Ariosto, "All this may be true, extraordinary, and entertaining; but where the deuce did you pick it all up?" The writer perhaps comes within the proverbial observation, that the inquisitive person ends often in the character of the tell-tale.—Johnson's advice was consulted on all occasions. He was known to be a good casuist, and therefore had many cases for his judgement. It is notorious, that some men had the wickedness to overreach him, and to injure him, till they were found out. Lauder was of the number, who made, at the time, all the friends of Milton his enemies. There is nobody so likely to be imposed upon, as a good man. His conversation, in the judgement of several, was thought to be equal to his correct writings. Perhaps the tongue will throw out more animated expressions than the pen. He said the most common things in the newest manner. He always commanded attention and regard. His person, though unadorned with dress, and even deformed by neglect, made you expect something, and you was hardly ever disappointed. His manner was interesting: the tone of his voice, and the sincerity of his expressions, even when they did not captivate your affections, or carry conviction, prevented contempt. It must be owned, his countenance, on some occasions, resembled too much the medallion tokens of Magliabechi, as exhibited before the printed account of him by Mr. Spence. No man dared to take liberties with him, nor flatly contradict him; for he could repel any attack, having always about him the weapons of ridicule, of wit, and of argument.

gument. It must be owned, that some who had the desire to be admitted to him, thought him too dogmatical, and as exacting too much homage to his opinions, and came no more. For they said, while he presided in his library, surrounded by his admirers, he would, "like Cato, give his little senate laws." He had great knowledge in the science of human nature, and of the fashions and customs of life, and knew the world well. He had often in his mouth this line of Pope,

"The proper study of mankind is man."

He was desirous of surveying life in all its modes and forms, and in all climates. Twenty years ago he offered to attend his friend Vanittart to India, who was invited there to make a fortune; but it did not take place. He talked much of travelling into Poland, to observe the life of the Palatines, the account of which struck his curiosity very much. His Rasselas, it is reported; he wrote to raise a purse of pecuniary assistance to his aged mother at Lichfield. The first title of his manuscript, was 'Prince of Ethiopia.' Mr. Bruce is expected to give us a history of both these countries. The Happy valley he would hardly be able to find in Abyssinia. Dr. Young used to say, "that Rasselas was a lamp of wisdom." He there displays an uncommon capacity for remark, and makes the best use of the description, of travellers. It is an excellent romance. But his journey into the Western Islands is an original thing. He hoped, as he said, when he came back, that no Scotchman had any right to be angry with what he wrote. It is a book written without the assistance of books. He said, "it was his wish and endeavour not to make a single quotation." His curiosity must have been excessive, and his strength undecayed, to accomplish a journey of such length, and subject to such inconvenience. His book was eagerly read." One of the first men of the age told Mr. Garrick, "that he would forgive Johnson all his wrong notions respecting America, on account of his writing that book." He thought himself the hardier for travelling. He took a tour into France, and meditated another into Italy or Portugal, for the sake of the climate. But Dr. Brocklesby his friend and physician (and who that knows him can wish for more companionable, and more professional knowledge?) conjured him, by every argument in his power, not to go abroad in the state of his health; but that if he was resolved on the first, and wished for something additional to his income, desired he would permit him to accommodate him out of his fortune with one hundred pounds a-year, during his travels, to be paid by instalments,

"Ye little stars hide your diminished heads."

The reply to this generosity was to this effect: "That he would not be obliged to any person's liberality, but to his King's." The continuance of this design to go abroad, occasioned the application for an increase of pension, that is so honourable to those who applied for it, and to the Lord Chancellor, who gave him leave to draw on his banker for any sum. With the courage of a man, Johnson demanded to know of Brocklesby, if his recovery was impossible? Being answered in the affirmative; "then," says he, "I will take no more opium, and give up my physicians."

At last he said, "if I am worse, I cannot go, if I am better I need not go, but if I continue neither better nor worse, I am as well where I am." The writer of this sketch, could wish to have committed to memory or paper all the wise and sensible things that dropped from his lips. If the one could have been Xenophon, the other was a Socrates.—His benevolence to mankind was known to all who knew him. Though so declared a friend to the Church of England and even a friend to the Convocation, it assuredly was not in his wish to persecute for speculative notions. He used to say, he had no quarrel with any order of men, unless they disbelieved in revelation and a future state. He would indeed have sided with Sacheverell against Daniel Burgess, if he thought the Church was in danger. His hand and his heart were always open to charity. The objects under his own roof were only a few of the subjects for relief. He was at the head of subscription in cases of distress. His guinea, as he said of another man of a bountiful disposition, was always ready. He wrote an exhortation to public bounty. He drew up a paper to recommend the French prisoners, in the last war but one, to the English benevolence; which was of service. He implored the hand of benevolence for others, even when he almost seemed a proper object of it himself.

Like his hero Savage while in company with him, he is supposed to have formerly strolled strolled about the streets almost houseless, and as if he was obliged to go without the cheerful meal of the day, or to wander about for one, as is reported of Homer. If this were true, it is no wonder if he was an unknown, or uninquired after, for a long time :

“ Slow rises worth by poverty depressed.”

When once distinguished, as he observes of Ascham, he gained admirers. He was fitted by nature for a critic. His Lives of the Poets (like all his biographical pieces) are well written. He gives us the pulp without the husks. He has told their personal history very well. But every thing is not new. Perhaps what Mr. Steevens helped him to, has increased the number of the best anecdotes. But his criticisms of their works are of the most worth, and the greatest novelty. His perspicacity was very extraordinary. He was able to take measure of every intellectual object; and to see all round it. If he chose to plume himself as an author, he might on account of the gift of intuition,

“ The brightest feather in the Eagle’s wing.”

He has been censured for want of taste or good nature, in what he says of Prior, Gray, Lyttelton, Hammond, and others, and to have praised some pieces that nobody thought highly of. It was a fault in our critic too often to take occasion to shew himself superior to his subject, and also to trample upon it. There is no talking about taste. Perhaps Johnson, who spoke from his last feelings, forgot those of his youth. The love verses of Waller and others have no charms for old age. Even Prior’s Henry and Emma, which pleased the old and silly Dennis, had no charms for him. Of Gray, he always spoke as he wrote, and called his poetry artificial. If word and thought go together, the odes of Gray were not to the satisfaction of our critic. But what composition can stand this sharp-sighted critic? He made some fresh observations on Milton, by placing him in a new point of view : and if he has shewn more of his excellencies than Addison does, he accompanies them with more defects. He took no critic from the shelf, neither Aristotle, Bossu, nor Boileau. He hardly liked to quote, much more to steal. He drew his judgements from the principles of human nature, of which the Rambler is full, before the Elements of Criticism by Lord Kaimes made their appearance.

It may be inserted here, that Johnson, soon after his coming to London, had thought of writing a History of the revival of Learning. The booksellers had other service to offer him. But he never undertook it. The proprietors of the Universal History wished him to take any part in that voluminous work. But he declined their offer. His last employers wanted him to undertake the life of Spenser. But he said, Warton had left little or nothing for him to do. A system of morals next was proposed. But perhaps he chose to promise nothing more. He thought, as, like the running horse in Horace, he had done his best, he should give up the race and the chace. His dependent Levert died suddenly under his roof. He preserved his name from oblivion, by writing an epitaph for him, which shews that his poetical fire was not extinguished, and is so appropriate, that it could belong to no other person in the world. Johnson said, that the remark of appropriation, was just criticism : his friend was induced to pronounce, that he would not have so good an epitaph written for himself. Pope has nothing equal to it in his sepulchral poetry. When he dined with Mr. Wilkes, at a private table in the city, their mutual altercations were forgot, at least for that day. Johnson did not remember the sharpness of a paper against his description or definition of an alphabetical point animadverted upon in his dictionary by that man of acuteness ; who, in his turn, forgot the severity of a pamphlet of Johnson. All was, during this meal, a reciprocation of wit and good humour. During the annual contest in the city, Johnson confessed, that Wilkes would make a very good Chamberlain. When Johnson (who had said that he would as soon dine with Jack Ketub as with Jack Wilkes) could sit at the same table with this patriot, it may be concluded he did not write his animosities in marble.—Johnson was famous for saying what are called good things. Mr. Boswell, who listened to him for so many years, has probably remembered many. He mentioned many of them to Paoli, who paid him the last tribute of a visit to his grave. If Johnson had had as good eyes as Boswell, he might have seen more trees in Scotland, perhaps, than he mentions.

This is not the record-office for his sayings : but a few must be recollected here.

For

For Plutarch has not thought it beneath his dignity to relate some things of this sort, of some of his heroes. "Pray Dr. Johnson (said somebody) is the master of the mansion at Streatham a man of much conversation, or is he only wise and silent?" "He strikes," says Johnson, "once an hour, and I suppose strikes right." Mr. Thrale left him a legacy, and made him an executor. It came to Johnson's ears, that the great bookseller in the Strand, on receiving the last manuscript sheet of his Dictionary, had said, "Give Johnson his money, for I thank God I have done with him." The philologist took care that he should receive his compliments, and be informed, "he was extremely glad he returned thanks to God for anything." Well known is the rude reproof he gave to a talker, who asserted, that every individual in Scotland had literature. (By the by, modern statesmen do not wish that every one in the King's dominions should be able to write and read.) "The general learning of the Scotch nation (said he, in a bad humour) resembles the condition of a ship's crew, condemned to short allowance of provisions; every one has a mouthful, and nobody a belly full." Of this enough. His size has been described to be large: his mind and person both in a large scale. His face and features are happily preserved by Reynolds and by Nollkens. His elocution was energetic, and, in the words of a great scholar in the north, who did not like him, he spoke in the Lincolnshire dialect. His articulation became worse, by some dental losses. But he never was silent on that account, nor unwilling to talk. It never was said of him, that he was overtaken with liquor, a declaration Bishop Hoadly makes of himself. But he owned that he drank his bottle at a certain time of life. Lions, and the fiercest of the wild creation, drink nothing but water. Like Solomon, who tried so many things for curiosity and delight, he renounced strong liquors, (strong liquors, according to Fenton, of all kinds, were the aversion of Milton); and he might have said, as that King is made to do by Prior,

"I drank, I lik'd it not, 'twas rage, 'twas
"noise,

"An airy scene of transitory joys."

His temper was not naturally smooth, but seldom boiled over. It was worth while to find out the molliora tempora fandi.

The words nugarum contemplor fell often from him in a reverie. When asked about them, he said, he appropriated them from a preface of Dr. Hody. He was desirous of seeing every thing that was extraordinary in art or nature; and to resemble his Imlac in his moral romance of Rasselas. It was the fault of fortune that he did not animadvert on every thing at home and abroad. He had been upon the salt-water, and observed something of a sea-life: of the uniformity of the scene, and of the sickness and turbulence belonging to that element, he had felt enough. He had seen a little of the military life and discipline, by having passed whole days and nights in the camp, and in the tents, at Warley Common. He was able to make himself entertaining in his description of what he had seen. A spark was enough to illuminate him. The Giant and the Corsican Fairy were objects of attention to him. The riding-horses in Astley's amphitheatre (no new public amusement, for Homer alludes to it) he went to see; and on the fireworks of Torri he wrote a Latin poem.

The study of humanity, as was injuriously said of the great Bentley, had not made him inhuman. He never wantonly brandished his formidable weapon. He meant to keep his enemies off. He did not mean, as in the advice of Radcliffe to Mead, "to bully the world, lest the world should bully him." He seemed to be a man of great clemency to all subordinate beings. He said, "he would not sit at a table, where a lobster had been roasted alive was one of the dishes." His charities were many; only not so extensive as his pity, for that was universal. An evening club, for three nights in every week, was contrived to amuse him, in Essex-street, founded, according to his own words, "in frequency and parsimony;" to which he gave a set of rules, as Ben Jonson did his leges convivales at the Devil Tavern—Johnson asked one of his executors, a few days before his death (which, according to his will, he expected every day) "where do you intend to bury me?" He answered, "in Westminster-abbey." "Then," continued he, "place a stone over my grave (probably to notify the spot) that my remains may not be disturbed." Who will come forth with an inscription for him in the Poets corner? Who should have thought that Garrick and Johnson would have their last sleep together? It were to be wished he could have written his own epitaph with

the first five yards met, sides

which I have
I, and fect as th as it
: origi-
ev. Mr.
shire.
S. A. raile ow the nthony h were a small turned people, kest and in those is source ony or or little call the for vain
n purga-
A.

of a seal bridge of Hara mile

QUARY.

written Churchcahire.
g. 7)
was born
in

with propriety. None of the lapidary inscriptions by Dr. Freind have more merit than what Johnson wrote on Thrale, on Goldsmith, and Mrs. Salisbury. By the way, one of these was criticised, by some men of learning and taste, from the table of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and conveyed to him in a round robin. Maty, in his Review, praises his Latin epitaphs very highly. This son of study and of indigence died worth above seventeen hundred pounds: Milton died worth fifteen hundred. His legacy to his black servant Frank is noble and exemplary. Milton left in his hand-writing the titles of some future subjects for his pen: so did Johnson.

Johnson died by a quiet and silent expiration, to use his own words on Milton: and his funeral was splendidly and numerously attended. The friends of the Doctor were happy on his easy departure, for they apprehended he might have died hard. At the end of this sketch, it may be hinted (sooner might have been prepossession) that Johnson told this writer, for he saw he always had his eye and his ear upon him, that at some time or other he might be called upon to assist a posthumous account of him.

occasioned by making fire-works against the King's coming to St. Paul's, which first taking fire, blew up the house about five o'clock in the afternoon; consuming upwards of 100 houses, burning from the Thames, all one side of Water Lane, 6 or 7 houses in Tower street, the back part of all Harp Lane, Trinity House, Bakers Hall, the Vine Tavern, places of note. A great number of people killed and smothered in the ruins by blowing up some houses, being the greatest fire since the year 1666."

Fig. 2, is a view of the porch of the Temple Church, from an old shop-bill of Mess. O. Lloyd and S. Gibbons, Stationers.

Fig. 3, is a view of the old East India House, preserved in another shop-bill, of William Overley, Joiner in Leadenhall street.

Fig. 4, is a communication from Mr. Ayscough, which I shall explain in his own words:

"In the Magazine for October, p. 733, enquiry is made after a seal of St. Anthony's hospital. Some time ago I had several impressions of it in isinglass, which I have given amongst my acquaintance, and one of which I suppose The London Antiquary may have seen. I find only one impression left, and that on sealing wax, nor is it so perfect as those in isinglass were: however, such as it is, it is at your service. I think the original seal was in the possession of the Rev. Mr. Otton, rector of Raseby, in Leicestershire.

S. A."

The emblem of the pig may raise the curiosity of some readers to know the cause of it. The hospital of St. Anthony had a grant of all the stray pigs which were not owned. A little bell was hung to a small chain round the neck: they were again turned out, and fed by the devotion of the people, so that they shortly appeared the sleekest and fattest of any pigs which customarily in those times ran about the streets. From this source may be traced the name of th'Antony or t'antony pig, as also the t'antony or little bell of churches, which was used to call the devout to supererogatory prayers, or vain masses for the release of souls from purgatory."

S. A.

Fig. 5, is the representation of a seal found about 106 yards above the bridge of the river Peterill, at the foot of Harroby Hill, in Cumberland, about a mile from Carlisle.

A LONDON ANTIQUARY.

MR. URBAN,
THE following Inscription is written on a Tomb-stone in the Church-yard of Botton le Moors, Lancashire.

(See the arms in our plate, fig. 7)

John Okey, the servant of God, was born in gold-leaf as he could.

I. I.

MR. URBAN,
WHEN you are next forming a miscellaneous plate, I believe you will readily give place to the five following articles.

The first of them is a view of Thames-street in a time of dreadful calamity, of which the drawing was taken, by Mr. Gery Strong, painter, accompanied by the following memorandum:

"Thursday, January 13th, 1714-5. A fire began in the house of Mr. Walker, an oilman, in Thames street, near Bear key;

in London 1608, came into this town 1629, Married Mary the Daughter of James Crompton, of Breakmet, 1635, with whom he lived comfortable 20 Years, and begot 4 Sons and 6 Daughters, since then he lived sole till the day of his death: in his time were many great changes and terrible alterations; 18 years Civil Wars in England, besides many dreadfull sea fights, the Crown or Command of England changed 8 times, Episcopacy laid aside 14 years, London burnt by Papists and more stately built again, Germany wasted 300 Miles, 200000 Protestants murdered in Ireland by the Papists, this town thrice stormed, once taken and plundered: he went through many troubles and divers conditions, found rest, joy and happyness, only in holiness, the faith, fear, and love of God in Jesus Christ: he died the 29th of April, and lieth here buried, 1684.

Come Lord Jesus O come quickly.

MR. URBAN,
THE author of "Mercurius Rusticus," &c. inquired after by your correspondent O. G. p. 818 was Bruno Ryves, native or resident of Blanford c. Dorset admitted of New College Oxford 1610, Vicar of Stanwell Middlesex, Rector of St. Martin Vintry; chaplain to Charles I. and D. D. 1639, Dean of Chichester and Minister of the hospital there, and after the Restoration Dean of Windsor, Rector of Aiton, c. Middlesex, and of Haseley c. Stafford. He died aged 81, and was buried at Windsor 1677, where he has an epitaph, which, with more particulars of him, his sufferings, and his writings, may be seen in Wood's Ath. Ox. II. 584, 585. Hutchins Dorset. I. 76. P. Q.

Sir Thomas Ryves of Langton in Dorset, Knight, an Advocate in the Court of Admiralty in the Reign of Charles I. was a relation of Bruno Ryves, and like him was very active in the royal cause, in support of which he took arms. He was the author of divers learned works, a list of which may be seen in the Hist. et Antiq. Univ. Oxon. Lib. II. 149.

B. R.

THEATRICAL REGISTER.

DRURY-LANE.

Nov. 30. School for Scand.—Arth. & Emm.
Dec. 1. Cymon—Harlequin Junior.
2. The Carmelite—Spanish Rivals.
3. Double Dealer—Arthur and Emmeline.
4. The Carmelite—The Quaker.
6. Cymon—Harlequin Junior.
7. The Carmelite—Who's the Dupe?
8. Double Dealer—Arthur and Emmeline.
9. The Carmelite—Gentle Shepherd.
10. The Confederacy—Arth. and Emmeline.
11. The Carmelite—Deuce is in Him.
23. School for Scandal—Arth. & Emmeline.
14. The Carmelite—All the World's a Stage.
15. The Carmelite—Arthur and Emmeline.
16. Double Dealer—Ditto.
17. The Confederacy—Ditto.
18. The Carmelite—The Chaplet.
20. Cymon—Harlequin Junior.
21. Isabella—The Chaplet.
22. The Natural Son—Gentle Shepherd.
23. Ditto—The Padlock.
27. Love in a Village—Harlequin Junior.
28. Bold Stroke for a Wife—Arth. & Emm.
29. The Natural Son—The Deserter.
30. Ditto—Harlequin Junior.
31. Ditto.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Nov. 30. Fontainebleau—The Lying Valet.
Dec. 1. Ditto—The Upholsterer.
2. Ditto—Barnaby Rattle.
3. The Wonder—Poor Soldier.
4. Fontainebleau—Mock Doctor.
6. Romeo and Juliet—The Positive Man.
7. Fontainebleau—Retaliation.
8. Ditto—St. Patrick's Day.
9. The Man of the World—Rosina.
10. Robin Hood—Lying Valet.
11. Merry Wives of Windsor—Poor Soldier.
13. Barbarossa—Midas.
14. The Follies of a Day—The Citizen.
15. Ditto—Midas.
16. Ditto—Rosina.
17. Ditto—Mock Doctor.
18. Ditto—Poor Soldier.
20. Ditto—Retaliation.
21. Belle's Stratagem—Rosina.
22. Follies of a Day—Devil upon Two Sticks.
23. Barbarossa—Poor Soldier.
27. George Barnwell—She Magic Cavern.
28. The Busy Body—Ditto.
29. Romeo and Juliet—Ditto.
30. Douglas—Ditto.
31. Follies of a Day—Ditto.

Bill of Mortality from Oct. 26, to Dec. 21, 1784.

Christened.	Buried.
Males 1178	Males 1125
Females 1118	Females 1037
Whereof have died under two years old 753

Peck Loaf 2s. 3d.

Between	2 and 5	209	50 and 60	235
	5 and 10	76	60 and 70	194
	10 and 20	82	70 and 80	132
	20 and 30	184	80 and 90	56
	30 and 40	262	90 and 100	8
	40 and 50	282	100 and 110	1

Dr.

*Description of Cotton MS. Vespasian C. XIV. in the British Museum.
(Concluded from p. 824.)*

- | | | | |
|--|--------|---|--------|
| 62. Collections concerning the Authority of a Protector. | f. 150 | 92. Epitaph erected by Edmund Scory to the Memory of King James, his Queen, and Charles [Henry] Prince of Wales, with other Epitaphs on King James. | 191 |
| 63. Notes of Descent of Inheritance. | 151 | 93. The Proceeding at the Funeral of Mrs. Anne Osborne, Widow, late Wife to Peter Osborne, Esq. Treasurer's Remembrancer of the Exchequer, the last of Feb. 1615. | 196 |
| 64. Dower of Ladies in what Land restrained. | 152 | 94. Notes concerning Homicide. | 200 |
| 65. Note of an Order for feeding and relieving 6000 poor Persons, at Westminster, at the Feast of Circumcision, 28 Hen. III. | 153 | 95. A Letter from Dr. John Clerk to the Cardinal, Apr. 27 (40 Year). | 201 |
| 66. Note of an Order for the feeding and relieving all the Poor that could be found at Windsor, when the King's Children were to be weighed and measured, 28 Hen. III. | 153 | 96. Two original Warrants of Q. Elizabeth to the Earls of Huntingdon and Leicester, for creating them Knights of the Garter. | 203 |
| 67. Note of an Order from the King to the Sheriffs of London for cloathing 300 poor Persons, 14 Hen. III. | 153 | 97. Warrant of Q. Elizabeth, excusing a Knight of the Garter from attending at the Chapter, 1599. | 205 |
| 68. A Commission for the Trial of Felons, 1576. | 154 | 98. A Confutation of the Opinion of those who hold Honours and Titles of Dignity to be Hereditaments, and to pass as Lands, Leases, and Chattels, according to the Course of the Common Law, and in their Courts to be determined, and not elsewhere. Also the Difference between the Laws of the Land and the Rules and Customs of Honour concerning the Peers and Nobility of the Kingdom. By Rich. St. George, Norroy. | 207 |
| 69. Collections concerning Felony and Felons. | 157 | 99. Certain Reasons that the Professors of the Common Laws ought not to be excluded from practising in Cases of Honor. | 209 |
| 70. Daniel Dun's Opinion on the Felt-makers Petition (no Date). | 160 | 100. Collections relating to the Royal Household. | 211 |
| 71. Collections concerning Security or Pledge of Fidelity and good Behaviour. | 162 | 101. An Order of Hubert Abp. of Canterbury for easing the Charge, by diminishing the Number of Servants in Christ-Church, Cambridge. | 212 |
| 72. Forms of doing Homage and Fealty. | 162 b. | 102. An original Order of Privy Council for raising 10,000 Marks for defraying the Expense of the Household. | 218 |
| 73. Form of Forfeiture to the King. | 163 | 103. A Breefe of the Statutes of Eltham for the Government of the King's Household, temp. Hen. VIII. | 219 |
| 74. Collections relating to the Forfeiture of Office. | 164 | 104. Copy of a Warrant of Edward IV. for creating his Son Duke of Cornwall, 9 Edw. IV. | 243 |
| 75. Notes of two Cases of Forgerie. | 167 | 105. Mensale, 15 Edw. IV. | 244 |
| 76. Cases of Persons killing themselves. | 168 | 106. Lyvereyes with the King, the Queen, the Princes, and the whole Household at Greenwich, 16 Nov. 11 Hen. VIII. | 245 |
| 77. Reasons against the passing of Fynes of Informations in Fee-farme. | 169 | 107. Persons attending upon the Lady Mary's Grace and the Lady Elizabeth's Grace. | 246 |
| 78. Letter of John Young to  concerning a Grant applied for by Lord Morley, July 20, 1613. | 170 | 108. The Masse of the Household, with the Increase of new Fees and Wages. | 247 |
| 79. Proposal for the better recovering of Fines from Offenders (no Date). | 171 | 109. Orders for the King's Privy Chamber. | 249 |
| 80. Original Order for the Funeral of Queen Joan, Wife of Henry IV. with the Ceremonial, 15 Hen. VI. | 175 | 110. Remembrances unto the Queene's Grace. | 252 |
| 81. Epitaph on Sir Oliver St. John, 1630. | 176 | 111. Orders when the King goes of walking, hunting, fowling, &c. | 253 |
| 82. Epitaph on Oliver Nicholas St. John, 1500. | 177 | 112. Orders for the King and Queen's Utter Chambers. | 253 b. |
| 83. Epitaph on Bosvile, or Boswell, Prior of Norwich. | 178 | 112. Certain Ordonnances devised by the King's Highness with th' Advice of his Countail | |
| 84. Notes respecting Funerals. | 179 | | |
| 85. Epitaphs designed for Sir Francis Walsingham and Philip Sidney. | 180 | | |
| 86. The Manner of the last Funeral Exequy for the French King at St. Paul's Cathedral London, 1574. | 181 | | |
| 87. A brief Declaration of the Charges of the Diet at the Obsequies of the late French King celebrated at Powles, Aug. 7, 1574. | 182 b. | | |
| 88. Considerations concerning Sir Philip Sidney for compiling his Epitaph. | 185 | | |
| 89. The Manner of the Funeral of Prince Henry. | 187 | | |
| 90. Epitaph on Mary Billing. | 189 | | |
| 91. Epitaph on Albert Archduke of Austria. | 190 | | |

- Counsaill concerning the good Order of such Persons as his Grace hath deputed to be in his Prive Chamber. 257
114. An original Order of Henry VIII. for the Earl of Worcester his Chamberlain, and for the due Exercise of that Office. 265
115. Orders for the Board of Green Cloth. 268
116. Immunitie granted by King John to the Abp. of Canterbury to hold Assizes, &c. 270
117. An original Grant of many Immunities and Priviledges to John Gedney, Alderman of London, 20 Hen. 273
118. Another to Edmund Hampden, Knight, 35 Hen. 274
119. Another to Guido Sennet, 24 Hen. VIII. 275
120. An Exemption granted to William Bp. of Litchfield and Coventry from attending Parliament on Account of his Age and Infirmities (no Date). 277
121. Immunities granted to John Carpenter, 18 Hen. 277
122. Immunities granted to Thomas Havill, 36 Hen. 277
123. Immunities granted to John Coton, 8 Hen. 277 b.
124. An Order for leproous Persons to be removed from the Highways. 279
125. Orders respecting the Jews. 280
126. Orders concerning Usury. 282
127. Questiones Juris. 283
128. Litteræ Justitiariorum Itinerantium. 287
129. Justitiiarii Hiberniæ et alibi. 288
130. Capitales Justitiiarii de Banco. 289
131. Barones Scaccarii. 291
132. Capitales Justitiiarii coram Rege. 293
133. Justitiiarii Angliæ. 297
134. R. I. absolvit Hubertum Archiep. Cant. a Custodia Regni, et substituit Gaufridum Fil. Petri. 298
135. The original Order that Sheriffs shall not have the Charge of the Justices of Assizes Diet, but the Judges be allowed it out of her Majesty's Coffers, Feb. 21, 1573. 299
136. That Reasons are as well to be used by Lawyers in their Pleadings as Authorities. 300
137. The Common Law of the Land in Cases of granting Protections at Sea stated. 302
138. The Some of the Commission for Reformation of Officers towards both Lawes, 1594. 316
139. Collections relating to Jurisdiction. 317
140. Instructions to the Earl of Bedford, Lieutenant for the Counties of Devon, Cornwall, and the City of Exeter, 1577. 320
141. Collections relating to the King's Children. 326
142. Draught of a Patent for Liberties. 327
143. Transactandi Licentia, 1173. 329
144. Locum tenens Angliæ vel castor, Hen. VIII. 330
145. Orders for the Redress of the Custom-house and their Officers. 332
146. Original Letter of Council concerning the Assize of Bread in London, dated Mar. 20, 1573. 338
147. Henry Yelverton, Solicitor, his Report or Opinion of Encroachment upon Waste Grounds granted by the King to the City of London, &c. with the Lord Dacre's and Lord Paget's Case, Apr. 19, 1614. 340
148. The Government of the City of London, and the Dignity of the Aldermen. 341
149. Certain Remembrances seeming to me fitt to be thought of for the amending and preventing the Annoyances of the Common Sewers, &c. about London; being Sir Robert Johnson's Opinion about the Common Sewers, Apr. 20, 1605. 344
150. Instructions to Sir Francis Knolles, Knt. and other Commissioners for Provision of Corn, Mar. 20, 1573. 346
151. Collection of Priviledges granted to the City of London. 347
152. Books of the Common Law of this Land not published. 349
153. The Origin of the Common Law. 351
154. Archion: or, the High Court of Justice in England. 353
155. Account of the Common Law of England. 355
156. Mr. Sebright, Town-Clerk of London, his Answer respecting his signing a Legallitie to a Deed brought to him by a Notary Public, 1599. 357
157. De Canell et Vicis. De Wardis. 358
158. Rex Hen. III. disclimat jus suum in Matrimonio inter Matildam sororem Ri. de Ross, et Gals. de Percie, &c. 359
159. Uxor Hugonis de Nevill dat Regi 200 Gallinas eo quod possit jacere una nocte cum Hugone de Nevill, 6 Joh. 359
160. Notes of Fines for the Marriage of Heirelles. 360
161. That Marescallus Angliæ, or his Lieutenant Knight Marshall, was that Marshall which was joint Judge in the said Court. 362
162. That the Marshall is joint Judge with the Steward in Curia Marescallicæ Hospitalii Regis. 385
163. The Draught of a Letter from the Privy Counsell to the Earl Marshall about displacing Sir William Dethick. 393
164. The Names and Armes of the Earles Marshalls of England, collected by Francis Thynn in 1597 (imperfect). 395
165. Account of the Office of Steward of the Household. 399
166. Another Fragment concerning the Earls Marshalls. 400
167. Copy of a Grant of Earl Marshall to the Earl of Salisbury. 404
168. A printed Order from the Commission- 408

- ers of the Earl Marshall respecting Trademmen intermeddling with the marshalling of Armes, erecting Monuments with Armes,
&c. and fixing Fees for the Office of Arms for Funerals, 1618. 409
169. Extract from the Grant of Earl Marshall to the Earl of Pembroke, Hen. III. 410
170. Copy of No 98. 412
171. On the Power of the Marshall's Court. 414
172. Warrant appointing King's Physicians,
32 Hen. VI. 415
173. The Measure of a Perch of Land. 416
174. The Reason of the Merchants of Spayne mayneteyning their Aft restrayning Corn
Ships to return Commodities, Bullyen, Salt, and Oranges excepted; addressed to the Earl of Leicester (no Date). 418 175. The Case of Merchant Adventurers and Enterlopers. 419
176. A Passport for 1000lb. Weight of Bullion for the Merchants of Muscovy, 1582. 420 177. Questions on the King's Power in laying on Customs on Goods, &c. 421
178. Notes of Rewards given to King's Messengers. 422
179. Notes of Offenders being examined and punished. 423
180. The Oaths of the Chancellor of England, the Treasurer, Barons of the Exchequer, Justices, Justice of Weights and Measures, Sheriff, Sheriff of Oxford and Berks, Escheator, Comptroller of the Customs, Weyer of Wolles, Customes, Justices of Oyer and Terminer, Justices in Itinere, Clerk of the Statute, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Seneschal of the Duchy of Gyenne, Meter of the Clothe, Mayre of the Staple and of the Constables, Bearer of the Rolles of Chancery, the Renunciation of a Bishop, de Fidelitate Episcoporum, de Fidelitate Dominorum Spiritua-lium, the Clerke of the Chancery, and the King's Yeomen; by the Vice-Chamberlain. 425
181. Articles for the Ordering of the Manrede of this the King's Realm, and for the good Advancement of Justice, Preservation, and Maintenance of the Common Weale of the same. 439
182. Oath of a Clerk of the Office of Privy
Seal, 39 Eliz. 443
183. The Oath of the Counsellors, with Instructions to the Counsellors of the King's Daughter, and Commissioners of Wales (no
Date). 444
184. Collections concerning Violators of the Peace. 446
185. An original Letter of Council against fortifying Castles in Wales (no Date). 447
186. Collectanea de Justitiariis Pacis. 448
187. Sentence against William Fil. Osberti for Rebellion, 1195. 449
188. Order for seizing the Knights Templars and their Possessions, 1 Edw. II. 450 189. Proceedings against the E. of Northumberland in the Star Chamber. 452 190. Collections of Proceedings against various of the Nobility. 452
191. Collections relating to Officers offending, and how punished. 455
192. Collections relating to Petitions to the King, or to whom he appointeth. 458
193. Case of Robert Calvyn, a post-natus. 459
194. Original Orders set down and allowed by the Lords of his Majesties Privy Counsell, and appointed to be put in Print, for the Postes between London and the Borders of Scotland, Jan. 14, 1583. 467 195. A Discourse of the Prerogative Royal against authorizing Men to judge by Discretion and not by Law. 469 196. To prove that the Prerogative may be restrained. 471
197. Collections respecting the Prerogative. 473
198. An original Order of Privy Council to restore Sir John Nevill to his Possessions, 38 Hen. 476
199. An original License for the Merchants of Newcastle upon Tyne to buy and export
Wool for six Years, 7 Hen. 477
200. A particular Account of the Charges during Q. Elizabeth's Progress into Suffolk, 3 Eliz. 481
201. Collection of Royal Prohibitions. 490
202. Perprestures in Forests. 491
203. Records and Charters of his Majesties
Tower of London, compiled by Walter Darrel, Gent. Steward of her Majesty's
Court there, Sept. 30, 1587. 492
204. Original Order of Henry VI. for providing Writers and Books for copying the Red Book of the Exchequer and other Books, 24 Hen. VI. 496
205. Proposals and Rules for ranging and preserving the Records in the Treasury, with an Account of the Order they are in at present, and the general Contents. 497 206. A Scheme proposed for the better Preservation of the Records in the Tower and Rolls Chapel, with proper Directions for sorting and placing them. 507
207. The Nature of such Records in the Exchequer as Christopher Vernon hath voluntarily begun to sort. 508 208. Collections concerning the Records of the King's Court. 510
209. Collections of Proceedings against Rebels and Rebellion, with several original Warrants and Orders respecting the same. 511
210. Reasons why the Ecclesiastical Commission cannot well be executed in Cheshire according to the Instructions, 1588. 526
211. A Copie of Christopher Goodman's
Protestation of Obedience to the Queen,
Apr. 23, 1571. 528
212. The Abp. of Canterbury's Letter against Scismatiques, Apr. 24, 1584. 529.

213. The Bp. of London's Objections against Bullen and Bullingham being made Bishops, 1579. 530
214. The Bp. of Lincoln's Directions for preaching, 1574. 531
215. Collections of Rewards for Service. 535
216. Copie of a Letter written by her Majesty's Commandment to the Major of London in Defence of the Earl of Leicester, 1585. 536
217. Punishments for raising false Rumours. 537
218. The yearlie ordinary Expences of Savoye, with the Revenues certain and ordinary. 538
219. Copy of Q. Elizabeth's Warrant appointing W. Davison Secretary of State. 539
220. Lord Bacon's Speech in the Starr Chamber against seditious Books and Libels. 540
221. Notes concerning Surrender and Seizors. 542
222. Proceedings on Scandalum Mag. 546
223. Proceedings in the Starr Chamber. 547
224. Collections relating to Tourniaments. 553
225. A Paper for the better Government of the Army and Persons absenting after Gayge of Battayle, and going off from Battayle. 554
226. Rules for Government, and how Princes may behave themselves. 559
227. Eight soverain Things, which do make Princes, Lords, and others to live justly, and be beloved of their People. 560
228. A true Relation of all Things that happened betwixt my Lord General and Colonel Cheeke and myself [Thomas Dutton], 1610. 562
229. The Manner how the Defendants do answer the Princes Highness Challenge 568
230. Of Combats, 1601. 569
231. The Ordinances that belongeth in gayging of Battayle made by Quarrell, after the Constitutions made by King Philip of France. 570
232. Account of the Writ of Superfedeas, with two original Writs. 570
233. Licence to transport Corn, 1601. 574
234. Collections of D. Lopes's Conferences, 1571, and Proceedings on Traitors. 576
235. Warrant for pulling down the Earl of Northumberland's Hatchment at Windsor, 1569. 583
236. An original Letter of the Earl of Westmoreland to the Earl of Leicester, requesting him to solicit the Queen for his Recall. May 4, 1572. 584
237. Letter to the Newcastle Officers for manning and fitting out 4 or 5 Ships to prevent Traitors landing in England, and apprehending one Thomas Stafford then in Rebellion. 585
238. Collections relating to Tenants in Capite to the King. 588
239. Notes concerning Treasure Trove. 589
240. Notes concerning Swans. 590
241. Names of German Princes, Electors, &c. 591
242. Collections relating to Wards and Liveries. 592
243. Notes relating to Wine, and the Vintners at Oxford. 593
244. Notes relating to the Universities. 594
245. Notes of rating the Price of Victuals. 595
246. An Index to the general Heads of this Book. 596
247. Collections relating to Watchmen. 598
248. Letter to the Earl of Bedford concerning Wines, Mar. 8, 1558. 599
249. Ceremonial of the Lodging of the Earl of Essex and his Suit, with their Names, when he went to the Hague as Lord Lieutenant, Dec. 26, 1585 (in Dutch). 603
250. An Account of the Leagues and Confederacies between England and Foreign Princes. 611

S. A.

MR. URBAN,

THE Hydrophobia is a disease so dreadful, and the cause of it so frequent, that it is the duty of every humane person to make as public as possible every probable remedy that can easily and readily be obtained to prevent its approach.

The means that has hitherto been thought most effectual by way of preventive is instantly, or as soon as possible, bathing in the sea; but was this as effectual as it is generally believed to be, it would avail those persons but little who have the misfortune to be bitten at a great distance from the sea. The remedy therefore that I would wish you to make publicly known, and not you only, but every other periodical writer who has it in his power, is, COMMON SALT, which is almost every where at hand. SALT moistened and instantly rubbed into the wound, and often repeated till it dries and heals of itself, is said on good authority to be infallible; and in confirmation of this fact it is asserted, that the American savages who frequent the woods in pursuit of game, never go without Salt, on which they rely as a preservative against the bite of venomous creatures of every kind, and that the Hydrophobia is a disease not known among them.

A recent operation at one of our hospitals, by cutting out the part bitten three days after the bite, has brought to mind this simple remedy, which notwithstanding its being already, among many others, to be found interspersed among the volumes of your Magazine, cannot be too often repeated.

130. SHOOTING. A Poem. 410.

MR. P Y E, author of *The Progress of Refinement, has here presented to the world an attempt in a different species of poetical composition, commonly denominated the Georgic. The plan of his poem, like that of Virgil, is didactic; and there is an accuracy of polish, and a gracefulness of diction, throughout, that deserves to be studied and imitated. The following extract will serve as a specimen:

"The night recedes, and mild Aurora now
Waves her gray banner on the eastern brow:
Light float the misty vapours o'er the sky,
And dim the blaze of Phœbus' garish eye;
The sitting breeze just stirs the rustling brake,
And curls the crystal surface of the lake;
Th' expectant sportsmen, urg'd by anxious haste,
Snatch the refreshment of a short repaste,
Their weapons seize, their pointers call around,
And sally forth impatient to the ground.

"Here where the yellow wheat away is drawn,
And the thick stubble clothes the russet lawn,
Begin the sport — Eager and unconfin'd,
As when stern Æolus unchains the wind,
The active pointer, from his thong unbound,
Impatient dashes o'er the dewy ground,
With glowing eye, and undulating tail,
Ranges the field, and snuffs the tainted gale;
Yet, 'midst his ardor, still his master fears,
And the restraining whistle careful hears.
So when Britannia's watchful navies sweep,
In freedom's awful cause, the hostile deep,
Tho' the brave warrior panting to engage,
And loose on England's foes his patriot rage,
The tempest's howling fury deems too slow
To fill his sails, and waft him to the foe;
Yet, 'midst the fiery conflict, if he spy
From the high mast his leader's signal fly,
To the command obedience instant pays,
And martial order martial courage sways.

"See how exact they try the stubble o'er,
Quarter the field, and every turn explore;
Now sudden wheel, and now attentive seize
The known advantage of th' opposing breeze—

At once they stop!—yon' careful dog descries
Where close and near the lurking covey lies.
His caution mark, lest ev'n a breath betray
Th' impending danger to his timid prey;
In various attitudes around him stand,
Silent and motionless, th' attending band.
So when the son of Danaë and Jove,
Crown'd by gay conquest and successful love,
Saw Phineas and his frantic rout invade
The festive rights by Hymen sacred made,
To the rude Bacchanals his arm outspread
The horrid image of Medusa's head:

* For an account of this Poem see vol. LIII. p. 512.

Soon as the locks their snaky curls disclose,
A marble stiffness seiz'd his threat'ning foes;
Fix'd were the eyes that mark'd the javelin thrown, [stone.

And each stern warrior rear'd his lance in "Now by the glowing cheek and heaving breast

Is expectation's sanguine wish express'd.—
Ah, curb your headlong ardor! nor refuse
Patient to hear the precepts of the Muse.
Sooner shall noisy heat in rash dispute
The reasoning calm of placid sense confute;
Sooner the headlong rout's misguided rage
With the firm phalanx equal combat wage;
Than the warm youth, whom anxious hopes in flame,

Pursue the fleeting mark with steady aim.
By temp'rate thought your glowing passions
cool,

And bow the swelling heart to reason's rule;
Else when the whirring pinion, as it flies,
Alarms your startled ear, and dazzled eyes,
Unguided by the cautious arm of care, fair.
Your random bolts shall waste their force in "They rise!—they rise!—Ah yet your fire restrain,

Till the 'maz'd birds securer distance gain;
For, thrown too close, the shots your hopes elude,

Wide of your aim, and innocent of blood:
But mark with careful eye their lessening
flight,

Your ready gun, obedient to your sight,
And at the length where frequent trials show
Your fatal weapon gives the surest blow,
Draw quick!—yet steady care with quickness join,

Lest the shock'd barrel deviate from the line;
So shall success your ardent wishes pay,
And sure destruction wait the flying prey.

"As glory more than gain allures the brave
To dare the combat loud, and louder wave;
So the ambition of the sportsman lies
More in the certain shot than bleeding prize.
While poachers, mindful of the festal hour,
Among the covey random slaughter pour;
And, as their numbers press the crimson'd
ground,

Regardless reck not of the secret wound,
Which borne away, the wretched victims lie
'Mid silent shades to languish and to die.

O let your breast such selfish views disclaim,
And scorn the triumph of a casual aim;
Not urg'd by rapine, but of honour proud,
One object single from the scatt'ring crowd;
So, when you see the destin'd quarry down,
Shall just applause your skillful labour crown."

131. A Brief Relation of a New and Unfortunate Voyage to the South Seas. Undertaken by Mons. Marion.

FROM a full account of this voyage, which has appeared at Paris, the following particulars are selected.

M. Marion

M. Marion de Fresne, animated with an ardent curiosity, similar to that of Capt. Cook (whom he resembled also in his tragical end), for making new discoveries in unknown seas, offered government to carry back to Otaheite the young Indian, whom M. Bougainville had conducted from thence to Paris. He only demanded the addition of a King's sloop to the vessel of which he was himself the proprietor, and with these two ships he set out for the isle of France, where he was to take Aotourou on board.

"Soon after, Aotourou died, which disconcerted the projects of Mr Marion, with respect to the South Sea. He set sail, however, from Madagascar to the Cape of Good Hope; and after laying in provisions there for eight months, he proceeded for Van Diemen's Land, and arrived at it, after having discovered in his passage several islands. The view of this land, and of the rest of New Holland, appeared inviting, as a multitude of circumstances seemed to announce an inhabited country.

"Our adventurers landed: the natives came down to the coast, and discovered no marks of opposition or hostility: they gathered dry wood, and formed it into a sort of pile: they presented to the strangers some branches of the wood, and invited them, by signs, to set fire to the pile, which the latter did in effect, without knowing the meaning of this ceremony: while the pile was in flames, the savages seemed neither offended, nor pleased, nor surprised. With their wives and children (all black, naked, and cotton-haired) they beheld their new guests with an apparent indifference. But when presents of looking-glasses, handkerchiefs, iron, linen, and poultry were offered to them, they were rejected with disdain, and marks of resentment; and this rejection was followed by a declaration of war: for they retired to a rising ground, from which they sent a violent discharge of stones against the Europeans, wounding Capt. Marion, and one of his officers, who took to their boats, and made a new landing on another part of the coast. Here they saw a sandy country, covered with heath and small trees, of which the natives burn the bark to dress the shell-fish, which seemed to be their principal nourishment. They observed, in their excursion, the tyger-cat, crows, black-birds, turtle, doves, and a parrot, whose plumage resembled that of the parrot in South America.

"From New Holland M. Marion set sail for New Zealand, of which Tasman had perceived a point in the year 1642, and where M. de Surville (an extract from whose voyage is subjoined to this work) had anchored in a bay, which he called Lauriston, at the same time that Capt. Cook discovered the two points of the same bay, without knowing, as it seems, that the French lay there at anchor."

It was here that M. Marion met his fate. Having erected tents in the island of Motuaro, and conversed with the natives by means of a vocabulary of Otaheite, whose language is the same with that of the New Zealanders, as is well known, he found, at first, their behaviour promising. They came in crowds, with their Chiefs, on board his ships, and without arms. Thirty days were passed in seeming friendship, and the exchange of good offices; and their manners and way of living are here described at length; but to those who have read the voyage of Sir Joseph Banks and Capt. Cook, published by Hawkesworth, few of these relations will appear new.

In the midst of this apparent good intelligence, a bloody project was formed of putting to death M. Marion, and his attendants, who should not have trusted, with so much simplicity, to the good faith of these savages; more especially if he knew, that, two years before, they had been treated with the greatest and the most absurd severity by Mons. de Surville, who, to punish them for stealing his boat, had set fire to their huts, and spread terror and desolation through their villages.

Mess. Marion, Vaudricourt, and fourteen more of the ship's crew, went on shore for the third time, accompanied by several savages, on a fishing party; and were conducted by Tacoury, one of the Indian Chiefs, to whom Marion had shewn particular marks of civility and kindness. In the evening, he was expected in his ship, but did not appear. The next morning a boat was sent out, to take in water and wood; and, about nine o'clock, a man was perceived swimming towards the ship. He was the only one who escaped the massacre of his comrades, whom he had seen murdered, with their unfortunate commander, and their bodies cut into pieces, and divided among the savages.

Messieurs de Clesmeur and Crozet, on receiving this fatal news, took all the precautions that were necessary to save the detachments that were posted on the shore; and marched at the head of them through a crowd of savages, whose looks expressed hostility and resentment. In their passage through a village they found a part of the cloaths of their slaughtered companions, and a hua human thigh which had been half-devoured.

After discovering some other islands in the South Sea; our surviving travellers returned to Guam, the largest of the Marranne (or Ladione) islands, where M. Tobias, the Spanish Governor, had been active in the introduction of agriculture and other European arts. M. Crozet, in this voyage, gives a circumstantial and accurate description of this island, and particularly of that beautiful and useful tree, called the Rima [or Breadfruit], whose fruit has exactly the taste of our bread, though superior to it in a certain delicious freshness, and is sufficient for the nourishment of the inhabitants. This tree was transplanted into the Isle of France by M. Poivre, who has also transplanted several trees and shrubs from the spice-islands of the Dutch.

132. A Tour in the United States of America.
By J. F. D. Smyth, Esq. 2 Vols. 8vo.

THE picture, which the author of this Tour draws, is certainly calculated to convey a knowledge of the country and people of America, without any apparent intention to excite either animosity on one hand, or the spirit of emigration on the other. He appears to be a native of Great Britain. In what year he sailed for America, we are not informed; but on the 4th of August he came within the Capes of Virginia, and anchored the same evening in Hampton-road. The night being calm, the voyagers were much annoyed by musketoes, which prove extremely troublesome, not only by their bite, but by a small, shrill, disagreeable note, particularly preventive of sleep. The traveller, the day after his arrival, went up Elizabeth River, in the yawl, about 20 miles, to Norfolk, which he describes as beautifully situated at the forks of that river, with the town of Portsmouth at the distance of about 800 yards. Norfolk was, at that time, in a flourishing state of improvement, and daily increasing; but was unfortunately burned during the civil commotions.

Mr. Smyth, with the other voyagers, soon afterwards proceeded up James river, and came to anchor close by James Town, formerly the metropolis of Virginia, but now hardly deserving the name of a village.

The roads here are said to be excellent; the face of the country is level, the soil rather sandy; but the whole land appears to be one continued forest, interspersed with openings where the trees have been cut down, and the ground is cultivated in plantations of different dimensions, generally at the distance of four or five miles from each other. Williamsburg, which this writer visited, is an inland town, situated in a healthy climate, about seven miles from York river on the North, and the same distance from James on the South. Here is a handsome street, a mile in length, where the view is terminated by a commanding object each way. One of these is the Capitol, an elegant public building, in which the assembly and courts of judicature are held; the other, an old monastic structure, named the college of William and Mary. About the middle, between these two buildings, on the North side, a little retired from the street, stands a large, commodious, and handsome structure, then the residence of the governor. All the public edifices are built of brick, but the generality of the houses are of wood, chiefly painted white, and are all detached from each other. Races are held at Williamsburg twice a year, when such horses, we are told, are started as would make no despicable figure at the principal course in England. Annual sports of the same kind are established almost at every town and considerable place in Virginia. The inhabitants of Virginia, of all ranks and denominations, are excessively fond of horses, especially those of the race breed. The most indigent person has his saddle horse, which he constantly uses in travelling on business; for in this country, except when hunting, nobody goes on foot the smallest distance.

At Richmond, near the falls of James river, the appearance of the country undergoes a total change. From the sea to this place, through an extent of about 150 miles, universally covered with woods, hardly any hill, or even an eminence, is to be seen; but here a ledge of rocks interrupts the whole stream of the river, for the length of seven miles; during the course of which, this vast current of water rushes down with great impetuosity, tumbling and dashing from rock to rock, with a tremendous roar, that is heard at the distance of many miles. The land suddenly rises into hills of a great height, and abounds with prodigious rocks, and large stones, as well as trees. On the summits of those hills, hills, most of which overlook, and many of them overhang the falling torrent of the James, are built handsome houses, commanding a wild and extremely grand prospect.

"The James, here," says this author, "is about half a mile wide; the tide flows up to the very rocks of the fall, which continue to interrupt the current for the length of seven miles above. There are several islands in the river among the falls, which are chiefly covered with wood and rocks; but are of small extent: the tide reaches the lower end of one of these islands, which is serviceable in checking the violence of the torrent of the water in the falls, and thereby favours the passage of the ferry-boats below.

"There are three towns at this place. Richmond, the largest, is below the falls, and is separated only by a creek, named Shokoos, from the town of Shokoos, which joins the lower end of the falls; these are both on the north side of the river: on the south side stands the town of Chesterfield, best known by the name of Rocky-Ridge, from its situation.

"Vessels of small burthen come up to the rocks on the falls, and large ships come within two miles of them to load.

"At James Town, the river is between two and three miles wide; and just above it is always fresh water; the breadth decreases gradually to the falls.

"During my residence at Richmond, I made several little excursions around in the adjacent country, on visits to several gentlemen who honoured me with invitations. Among those from whom I received particular attention and civilities, were Thomas Mann Randolph, of Tuckahoe, Esq. R. Good, of Chesterfield, Esq. Mr. Cary, &c.

"I also rode as far as Westham, a small town on the James, seven miles above Richmond, just where the falls commence. Tobacco, the grand staple of Virginia, is navigated down the river from the back country to Westham, in hogheads of a thousand weight each, ready for exportation, every hoghead upon two canoes lashed together; then it is brought by land-carriage to Shokoos, or Richmond, as the falls totally intercept and preclude all communication by water for their continuance of seven miles.

"In floods, an immense body of water comes down the James, which swells to a great height and astonishing wideness, overflowing all the low ground for many miles; but at the falls, where the mountains arise abruptly on each side, and confine the river within more narrow bounds, the noise, violence, and impetuosity of the torrent are not to be described. It is dreadfully tremendous and awful!

"It seems that once, when the river was in such a state, a man, who was bringing down his tobacco to market, instead of landing at Westham, being quite intoxicated with spirituous liquor, was carried down the torrent; and, amazing to think on! arrived safe at Shokoos warehouse-wharf below, with his tobacco; having been brought to the shore, after he had got over all the falls, by boats sent out from thence to his assistance, by those who, with astonishment and horror, observed him in his dreadful rapid descent and passage over them. When he was brought to the shore, he was still in a state of insensibility and stupefaction, occasioned by inebriation and terror.

"This is indeed one of the most extraordinary accidents that has occurred, or perhaps was ever heard of; but I have no reason to doubt the fact, as it was related to me, and vouched for, by several persons of credit and veracity, who were eye-witnesses of this singular event."

The whole appearance of this country is represented as strikingly novel to an European. Mr. Smyth describes it as follows:

"The air, the sky, the water, the land, and the inhabitants, being two-thirds blacks, are objects entirely different from all that we had been accustomed to see before. The sky clear and serene, very seldom over-cast, or any haze to be observed in the atmosphere; the rains falling in torrents, and the clouds immediately dispersing. Frequent dreadful thunder in loud contending peals; thunder-gusts happening often daily, and always within every two or three days, at this season of the year. Eruptions and flashes of lightning, constantly succeeding each other, in quick and rapid succession. The air dry, and intensely hot in the summer, cold and piercing in the winter, and always keen and penetrating. During the night, thousands of lights, like bright burning candles, being large winged insects, called fire-flies, gliding through the air in every direction; frequently vanishing, and perpetually succeeded by new ones. The rivers, large expanses of water, of enormous extent, and spreading under the eye as far as it can comprise; nature here being on such a scale, that what are called great rivers in Europe, are here considered only as inconsiderable creeks or rivulets. The land, an immense forest, extended on a flat plain, almost without bounds; or rising into abrupt ascents, and at length swelling into stupendous mountains, interspersed with rocks and precipices, yet covered with venerable trees, hoary with age, and torn with tempests. The mountains suddenly broken through, and severed by mighty rivers, raging in torrents at the bottom of the tremendous chasm, or gliding in awful majestic silence along the deep valley between them. The agriculture on the plantations is different from every thing in Europe; being either tobacco, three feet high, with the plants a yard yard apart; or Indian corn, at the distance of six feet between each stalk *, in regular straight rows, or avenues, frequently twelve or fifteen feet in height.

"While the mind is filled with astonishment and novel objects, all the senses are gratified.

"The flowery shrubs which overspread the land regale the smell with odoriferous perfumes; the fruits, of exquisite relish and flavour, delight the taste, and afford a most grateful refreshment.

"The prodigious multitude of green frogs, reptiles, and large insects on the trees, as well as the bull-frogs in the swamps, ponds, and places of water, during the spring, summer, and fall, make an incessant noise and clamour; the bull-frogs, in particular, emitting a most tremendous roar, louder than the bellowing of a bull, from the similarity of whose voice they obtained their name; but their note is harsh, sonorous, and abrupt, frequently appearing to pronounce articulate sounds, in striking resemblance to the following words: Horsehead tobacco; Knee deep; Ankle deep; Deeper and deeper; Plunktant; and many others; but all equally grating and dissonant. They surprise a man exceedingly, as he will hear their hoarse, loud, bellowing clamour just by him, and sometimes all round him; yet he cannot discover from whence it proceeds, they being all covered in water, and just raising their mouth only a little above the surface when they roar out, then instantly draw it under it again. They are of the size of a man's foot.

"Nor can you perceive the animals from whence the sounds in the trees proceed, they being most effectually hid among the leaves and branches. So that at first this absolutely appears to be a country of enchantments."

(To be concluded next month.)

233. A Letter to Dr. Priestley, occasioned by his late Pamphlet addressed to the Rev. Mr. S. Badcock. 8vo.

AS we have not reviewed the pamphlet which occasioned this letter, we shall only say, that, after expostulating with Dr. P. for his freedom in calling on Mr. Badcock by name as his "criticiser" in the Monthly Review, Justino-philes joins with the Reviewer in exposing the Doctor's representation of Justin's State of the Heretics, the passage, in his translation, being evidently mutilated, and also in condemning his Observations on the Creed of Tertullian, (to which he has referred) in the Notes of Valesius, the editor of Eusebius, representing Hegesippus as a favourer of the Unitarians, and instances, as a proof of his fidelity, his translating reverencing reuerencing Jesus."

234. Letter to the Rev. S. Badcock, &c. &c. By Dr. Harwood.

THIS Letter appears to have been dictated more by the spirit of revenge than any principle that can confer credit on the writer, or gain him the esteem of one reader of judgment and candour.

Dr. H. gives us here a pretty good specimen how far his doctrine of contentment will carry him. On the brink of eternity he deals out firebrands and death at a rate which a Christian minister should be ashamed of. We have only to say,

"Foul whisperings are abroad, unnatural
"deeds

"Do breed unnatural troubles. Infected
"minds

"To their deaf pillows with discharge their "secrets.

"More needs be the divine than the phy"sician.

"God, God, forgive us all. Look after
"him;

"Remove from him the means of all an"noyance."

We take no part in the controversy between Dr. Priestley and Mr. Badcock. We are content to be spectators of the combat; and if Dr. Harwood had consulted prudence and decency, he would have been satisfied to have remained in the same humble station and not have rushed into the amphitheatre, where, if we guess right, Dr. Priestley will not accept of him for a second, nor Mr. Badcock hold any contest with him as a champion.

In a private letter from this sturdy veteran, we are accused of having published a MISREPRESENTATION.—

"The account," he says, "given of "my case is, That Mr. Birch, the elec"trician, failed, and that Mr. Ford suc"ceeded. Mr. Ford came clamouring "to me concerning the FALSEHOOD of "this public declaration. I impute all "my relief to electricity. The reco"vered use of my walking is entirely
"owing to electricity. The issues "which Mr. Ford cut in my neck,
"above two years ago, did my crip"pled limbs neither good nor harm.
"They kept a defluxion from my brain."
"Dec. 17. E. HARWOOD."

* Which now seems to have been dried up.

* Rather, "every two stalks."

GENT. MAG. December, 1784.

135. Observations on the Rights and Duty of Juries, in Trials for Libels; together with Remarks on the Origin and Nature of the Law of Libels. By Joseph Towers, LL. D.

THE principal design of this publication is, to prove that Juries have a right to determine the law, as well as the fact, in trials for libels, as well as in other criminal prosecutions. Dr. Towers has produced many arguments, and a variety of legal authorities, in order to prove that Juries ought not to convict any man of having published a libel, unless they are themselves convinced of the criminality of the publication so denominated. He also mentions several instances of persons who have been convicted as libellers, from too great a readiness in Juries to comply with the directions of the Court, for publications in which there was not the least degree of criminality. He likewise enters largely into the doctrines concerning libels, which are laid down in some of the law compilations; and proves that these doctrines derived their origin from the Court of Star Chamber, which, on account of its despotic nature and tendency, was abolished by Act of Parliament in 1641.—“Its doctrines,” he adds, “should have been abolished with it.” Dr. Towers also says, “Admitting Juries to be Judges of the law, as well as of the fact, in matter of libel, any man, who is charged with writing, printing, or publishing a libel against the Government, may, if a Jury, from the conviction of the criminality of the publication, find him guilty, be punished at the discretion of the Court. Any private individual, against whom any thing libellous has been published, has a right to bring his action against the party offending, and to recover such damages as may be given him by a Jury. These restraints upon the press are surely amply sufficient, and all that ought to be submitted to in a free country; farther restraints would be inconsistent with the liberty of the press, and highly detrimental to the public.”—But for a variety of other useful information we must refer our readers to the work itself.

136. Thoughts on the Slavery of the Negroes. 8vo.

THESE “Thoughts” seem well digested; and we heartily agree with the author, and the truly humane and matelligent Mr. Ramsay*, that “a candid enquiry into this subject must surely terminate in a call upon those, who are invested with a power of redress, for the gradual, indeed, but total, abolition of slavery in every part of the British dominions; and, till that be accomplished, for some authoritative act, to render the present situation of the slaves more tolerable, to allow them some profit from the sweat of their brow, to provide some mode of instructing them in useful truths†, and rigidly to prohibit the importation of more.”

137. The Man in the Moon; or, Travels into the Lunar Regions, by the Man of the People. 2 Vols. 12mo. 1783.

THE plan of this work (which has hitherto escaped our notice), though the execution of it is new and original, is evidently taken partly from that of Le Sage’s Diable Boiteux, and partly from Swift’s Laputa. The two heroes are, the Man of the Moon and the Man of the People, who, mounted on the nose of the former, is wafted to the Lunar Regions, where, in a magical glass, he sees moral good and evil in a true light, and also the difference between knowledge and error, truth and falsehood. Of each of these, expressive images are introduced, with Aristotle and his commentators, Plato, Socrates, Luther, John Knox, David Hume, &c. &c.—A discourse on the Metaphysics of Some Jenyns, Reid, Hume, and Beattie, ensues, in which the Lunar Sovereign takes a decided part against the latter. By means of a pair of winged shoes [what a pity it is that balloons had not then reached the moon!] Ch——x, after being purified and perfumed, is conducted to a convent of ladies on the borders of the great Mare Tranquillitatis; then travels to the city of Uranibourg, the Lunar Elysium, where he is entertained by Julius Cæsar, accompanied by Sempronia, Metellina, and Mary Queen of Scots, Marcus Brutus, Oliver Cromwell, and other heroes and sages. In the conversation (which is animated, and of

* See our Magazine for August, p. 597.

† When a plan of this kind was attempted, some years ago, the masters were so far from encouraging their slaves to attend divine worship, that they left off attending themselves, because they would not be seen in their company.

